In congenial company a jest may cause such merriment that one of the number will call out, 'The Lord cover (forgive) us for this laughter!' In the same way grief is vented to the point of physical reaction and dismissal. In lands that have given freedom to the press, there is an outspoken frankness about the statement of private intention and public affairs, but the feelings of the heart are kept in hallowed reserve; in the East, on the contrary, plans, motives, and expectations are seldom stated simply and sincerely, but the expression of feeling is always profuse and exuberant. The strongest possible terms of devotion to God and attachment to friends are in constant use, but only one of themselves can tell when language is the symbol of feeling and when its substitute. In modern Syria, a mere child detected in theft or falsehood at school boldly calls heaven and earth to witness that he is innocent. In the Arabic grammar, emotional apostrophe is treated as a commonplace of daily speech, and rules are provided for adjuration and imprecation. Conversation is usually conducted in a loud tone of voice; truth, in the interest of truth, is sympathetically exaggerated; the simple 'yes' and 'no' of the European are regarded as cold and deficient in humanity.

The Bible abounds in vivid narrative, and the dramatic form is approached in Job and Canticles, but neither among the Hebrews nor the Arabs has there been any dramatic literature in the European sense of the term. This may be largely due to the fact that their speech is generally so figurative and animated.

Such temperament and surroundings help to explain the fact that the language of Orientals is so rich in figure, and their spoken words to such an unusual degree helped and harmonized by appropriate gesture.

2. Expressiveness and variety of Oriental gesture.—To the European, Oriental gesture is lacking in self-command and husbanded energy, and approaches grimace and contortion. The whole body is pressed into the service. Two men engaged in warm dispute appear to be using the deaf and dumb alphabet. The body is one moment bent forward, the next is standing erect; the hands are stretched out in supplication, and then slapped and held on each side of the head in the anguish of distraction and the shock of assumed amazement. The eyes flash, and the voices rise higher, until one yields to the vehemence of the other (2 S 19^{43}), or both are separated by the bystanders (Ex 2^{13}). The head is shaken, nodded, jerked, and inclined sideways, forwards, and backwards in a variety of ways reaching in suggested meaning from indifference, impatience, acquiescence, and denial to amazement, sarcasm, denunciation, and disgust. The shrugging of the shoulders is similarly varied to express embarrassment, surprise, ignorance, and irresponsibility. An Oriental reading the Bible naturally supplies this shrug when reading Gn 25^{32} 37^{26} 44^{16}, Ex 3^{13} 15^{24} 17^{4}, 1 S 17^{29}, Ph 1^{22}, the first sentence of Rev 7^{14}, etc. In salutation the form varies with the relationship. A man greeting his senior or superior brings the hand with a round sweep towards the ground, as if he should be kneeling there, and lifts it to his breast and head, implying readiness to receive, understand, and obey commands. Relatives or intimate acquaintances meeting each other after an interval kiss each other on both cheeks. A son or daughter kisses the hand of a parent or aged relative, and the same respectful courtesy is shown towards priests as spiritual fathers. Frequently, a man meeting his friend puts out both hands as if to clasp and kiss his hand with the respect of inferior to superior, but the other is expected to defeat this intention, allowing his fingers to be touched, and by withdrawing his hand to claim the equality of a friend. When one enters a room where others are seated, those assembled rise in token of respect and welcome, this being especially observed in the case of the aged.

Many particular gestures and special actions might be noted. The beggar at the door brings his forefinger across his teeth to prove that he has eaten nothing that day (Am 4^{6}).

In friendly explanation, as an act of affectionate persuasion, and as a liberty of familiar friendship, the hand is put under the chin, and the face lifted up, or the beard stroked as Joab did to Amasa (2 S 20^{9}). The outstretched arm indicates authority and decision, if the hand is also open and extended (Ex 6^{6}); but when the fingers and thumb are drawn together to a cone, it implies a respectful request for permission to speak or interfere (Ac 21^{40}).

Naturally, the most characteristic gestures are those where the strongest emotions are called forth or appealed to, as in the dance, in bereavement, and the symbolical gestures and attitudes of Oriental prayer. See further such articles as FOOT, HAND, HEAD. G. M. MACKIE.

GET, GETTING.—1. The verb to 'get' (of which the parts are get, *gat or got, gotten or got) is frequently used in the sense of 'go,' generally followed immediately by a personal pronoun. Thus 2 S 4^{7} 'they smote him . . . and gat them away through the plain all night' (וַיֵּלְכוּ דֶּרֶךְ הָעֲרָבָה, RV 'went by the way of the Arabah'). Four times in NT ὕπαγε, the imperat. of ὑπάγω, to 'depart,' is so tr^{d}, viz. ὕπαγε Σατανᾶ, 'Get thee hence,† Satan,' Mt 4^{10} (Rhem. 'Avant Satan'); and ὕπαγε ὀπίσω μου Σατανᾶ, 'Get thee behind me, Satan,' Mt 16^{23}, Mk 8^{33}, Lk 4^{8} (the last omitted by RV after edd.). This idiom is still bolder in earlier versions, as in Tind., Mt 27^{62} 'the hye prestes and pharises got them selves to Pilate'; Lk 22^{41} 'And he gate him selfe from them, about a stones cast'; Jn 5^{13} 'For Jesus had gotten him selfe awaye, because that ther was preace of people in the place.'

2. The same form of expression (though the idiom is different, the pron. being now the remote object) is often used when the meaning is 'find' or 'gain.' Sometimes the pers. pron. is expressed in the Heb., sometimes not. Thus Gn 34^{4} 'Get me this damsel to wife' (קַח־לִי); Ex 14^{18} 'When I have gotten me honour upon Pharaoh' (בְּהִכָּבְדִי); 2 S 20^{6} 'lest he get him fenced cities' (פֶּן־מָצָא לוֹ); Ec 2^{7} 'I got me servants' (קָנִיתִי עֲבָדִים, RV 'I bought menservants'); 2^{8} 'I gathered me also silver' (כָּנַסְתִּי לִי); Jer 13^{1} 'Go and get thee a linen girdle' (קָנִיתָ לְּךָ, RV 'buy thee'). This remote object is expressed otherwise than by a pers. pron. in 1 Mac 3^{3} 'So he gat his people great honour' (καὶ ἐπλάτυνεν δόξαν τῷ λαῷ αὐτοῦ).

3. Other passages deserving attention are: Gn 4^{1} 'I have gotten a man from the LORD' (קָנִיתִי אִישׁ אֶת־

* The 1611 edition of AV spells this form 'gate' everywhere except Sir 46^{2}, 1 Mac 9^{32}.

† This passage has given the phrase 'get thee hence' a meaning in mod. Eng. which it did not always carry. Thus Mk 1^{44} Tind. 'Get the hence and shewe thy silfe to the preste'; Jn 5^{11} Tind. 'Take up thy beed, and get thee hence'; and Zec 6^{9} AV 'Get you hence, walk to and fro through the earth.'

יהוה, RV ‘I have gotten a man with the help of the Lord’ *); Wis 10^{3} ‘they gat not only this hurt, that they knew not the things which were good’ (ἐβλάβησαν, RV ‘were disabled’); Sir 13^{11} ‘Smiling upon thee [he] will get out thy secrets’ (ἐξετάσει, RV ‘will search thee out’); 21^{11} ‘getteth the understanding thereof’ (κατακρατεῖ τοῦ ἐννοήματος αὐτοῦ, RV ‘becometh master of the intent thereof’); 27^{19} ‘so hast thou let thy neighbour go, and shalt not get him again’ (οὐ θηρεύσεις αὐτόν, RV ‘thou wilt not catch him again’); 1 Mac 9^{32} ‘when Bacchides gat knowledge thereof’ (ἔγνω, RV ‘knew it’); 2 Mac 5^{6} ‘But Jason slew his own citizens without mercy, not considering that to get the day of them of his own nation would be a most unhappy day for him’ (οὐ συννοῶν τὴν εἰς τοὺς συγγενεῖς εὐημερίαν δυσημερίαν εἶναι τὴν μεγίστην, RV ‘that good success against kinsmen is the greatest ill success’ †).

Getting is used as a verbal subst. in Gn 31^{18} ‘the cattle of his getting’ (מִקְנֵה קִנְיָנוֹ, Dillm. das Vieh seines Erwerbes, ‘the cattle of his possession’; Kalisch, ‘the cattle of his acquisition’); and in Pr 4^{7} ‘with all thy getting, get understanding’ (בְּכָל־קִנְיָנְךָ, RV ‘with all thou hast gotten’: the meaning is not ‘whatever thou gettest, get understanding,’ but ‘by means of all thy gains, get understanding’; cf. Mt 13^{46} ‘went and sold all that he had, and bought it’). T. Lever (Sermons, 1550, Arber’s ed. p. 117) translates Is 56^{11} ‘Unshamefaste dogges, knowynge no measure of gredye gettynge.’ J. HASTINGS.

GETHER (גֶּתֶר).—Named in Gn 10^{23}, along with Uz, Hul, and Mash, as one of the ‘sons of Aram’ (in 1 Ch 1^{17} simply ‘sons of Shem’). The clan of which he is the eponymous founder has not been identified. Dillmann considers that Knobel’s explanations (Völkertafel, 235 f.) from Arabian genealogies, as well as the attempts of Glaser (Skizze d. Gesch. u. Geog. Arab. 421 f.), have failed to yield any acceptable results.

GETHSEMANE (Γεθσημανεί).—A ‘plot of ground’ (χωρίον, Mt 26^{36}, Mk 14^{32}), which appears to have been on the Mt. of Olives (Lk 22^{39}) and beyond the ravine of the Kidron (Jn 18^{1}). The ‘garden’ or enclosure (κῆπος) belonging to it was the scene of our Lord’s Agony. The name (from גַּת ‘press’ and שֶׁמֶן ‘oil’) means ‘oil-press’ (on the form of the name see Dalman, Gram. 152, 289 n. 3). Leaving Jerusalem by St. Stephen’s gate one comes to the traditional site of Gethsemane, at a distance of almost 50 yards beyond the bridge that spans the Kidron. A stone wall encloses a nearly square plot of ground, which contains eight very ancient olive trees. Some cling fondly to the idea that these were actual witnesses of the Agony; others hold that this is precluded by the express statement of Josephus (BJ VI. i. 1), that during the siege by Titus all the trees in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem were cut down. Robinson, Thomson, and many other recent explorers doubt the accuracy of the tradition which locates Gethsemane, although it is universally admitted that the real site cannot be far from the traditional one. The tradition in question dates only from the 4th cent., and Robinson may be right in his suggestion that the site of Gethsemane, like that of Calvary, was fixed upon during the visit of Helena to Jerusalem, A.D. 326. Eusebius (*OS*² 248, 18) says that Gethsemane was at, Jerome (ib. 130, 22) that it was at the foot of, the Mt. of Olives. The latter adds that a church had been built over it (see the Peregrinatio Silviæ, cf. the testimony of Antoninus Martyr at the end of 6th cent.). The traditional site is objected to on the ground that it is too near the city.

GEZER (גֶּזֶר, Γάζερ, Γέζερ, Γάζαρα, Γάζης, Vulg. Gazer).—Now Tell Jezer, near the village of Abû Shûsheh and 4 miles W.N.W. of ’Amwâs, the ancient Nicopolis (see Euseb. Onom. Sac. p. 254, 14), to the right of the road from Jaffa to Jerusalem. The site, which is marked by blocks of unhewn stone and early pottery, would well repay excavation. Here have been found two inscriptions on a rock, one containing the name ΑΛΚΙΟΥ in Gr. letters, the other תחם גזר ‘the boundary of Gezer’ in Heb. characters of the Maccabæan age. M. Clermont-Ganneau, to whom the discovery was due, suggests that Alkios should be identified with a certain Alkios son of Simon, whose sarcophagus has been found at Lydda, and points out that Tell Jezer is the Mount Gisart of the Crusaders. The inscription may define the Sabbatic limit of the city. Josephus (Ant. VIII. vi. 1) places the town on the frontier of the territory of the Philistines; and Strabo (XVI. ii. 29), who calls it Gadaris, states that it had been appropriated by the Jews. In 1 Ch 20^{4} Gezer is given in place of the otherwise unknown Gob of 2 S 21^{18} (where, however, the Sept. and Syr. read Gath).

When the Egyptians under the Pharaohs of the 18th dynasty conquered Canaan, Gezer was placed under an Egyptian governor. In the time of the Tel el-Amarna tablets (B.C. 1400) the governor was Yapakhi, and we hear of Gezer (Gazru) along with Ashkelon and Lachish sending provisions to Jerusalem. Subsequently, however, Gezer was occupied by the Bedâwi sheikh Labai (who had once been governor of Shunem) and his confederate Malchiel, and it joined in an attack on Ebed-tob, the king of Jerusalem. This was the subject of a charge brought against Labai before the Egyptian Pharaoh. When the Israelites entered Canaan, Horam (Ailam in the Sept.) was king of Gezer; he came to the help of Lachish, but was defeated and slain by Joshua (Jos 10^{33} 12^{12}). The town was included in the southern border of Ephraim, and was assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Jos 16^{3} 21^{21}); the Israelites, however, failed to capture it, and its Canaanite inhabitants paid tribute to the Ephraimites (Jos 16^{10}, Jg 1^{29}). A recently discovered inscription of Merenptah, the son and successor of Ramses II. (B.C. 1280), in which mention is made of the Israelites, speaks of Gezer having been taken by the Egyptians (or, according to another possible translation, by the people of Ashkelon). In the reign of Solomon it was again taken by an Egyp. Pharaoh, who handed it over to his daughter, Solomon's wife (1 K 9^{16}). Solomon thereupon restored it, as well as the neighbouring Beth-horon, and it henceforth remained in Israelitish possession. Under the name of GAZARA (wh. see), Gezer appears repeatedly during the Maccabæan struggles (1 Mac 4^{15} 7^{45} 9^{52} 13$^{43. 53}$ 14$^{7. 34}$ 15^{28} 16^{1}, 2 Mac 10^{32}). It was then an important stronghold, for whose possession both parties contended strenuously. See, further, Clermont-Ganneau, Arch. Researches in Pal. (1896), pp. 224 ff.

* There are two difficulties: (1) קָנִיתִי ‘I have gotten’ is evidently meant to explain the name קַיִן Cain. See under CAIN. (2) אֶת־יהוה is either simply ‘the Lord’ (אֵת being the sign of the object), or ‘with the Lord’ (אֶת being the prep.). The prep. is not elsewhere used with יהוה (yet cf. אֶת־מִי ‖ נִשְׁמַת־מִי Job 26^{4}). But the direct object gives so difficult a sense that most versions and commentators prefer the prep., as AV and RV. The LXX has Ἐκτησάμην ἄνθρωπον διὰ τοῦ θεοῦ; O.L., Vulg. possedi (acquisivi, procreavi) hominem per deum; Luther, Ich habe den Mann, den Herrn’; Wyc. 1382, ‘I haue had a man bi God,’ 1388, ‘Y haue gete a man bi God’; Tind. ‘I haue gotten a man of the LORDE’; Cov. ‘I haue opteyned the man of the LORDE’; Rog. ‘I haue obteyned a man of the LORD’; Gen. ‘I haue obteined a man by the Lord’ [Gen. marg. That is, according to the Lord’s promise, as ch. 3^{15}; some read, To the Lord, as reioycing for the sonne, whom she wolde offer to the Lord as the first frutes of her birth’]; Bish. ‘I haue gotten a man of the Lord’; Dou. ‘I haue gotten a man through God’; Kautzsch, ‘Einen Menschen habe ich erhalten mit Hilfe Jahwes.’ See Spurrell, in loc., supplemented by König in Expos. 5th Ser. vii. 205 f.

† This passage is referred to by Scrivener (Camb. Bible, p. 65 n. 1) as one of the colloquial forms which disfigure the AV Apocrypha, though he admits that it keeps up the verbal play of the Greek. It is, however, no colloquial or other English idiom, it is simply a literal tr. of the Greek. The Gen. Bible is more idiomatic, ‘not considering that to have the advantage against his kinsmen is greatest disadvantage,’ and it preserves the word-play also.

A. H. SAYCE.

GHOST.—Like 'ghastly' and 'aghast,' 'ghost' has had an h inserted in the course of its history—an Italian affectation, says Earle, and for the most part a toy of the Elizabethan period. The Anglo-Saxon form is gâst, the connexion of which with Ger. geist is obvious. The Middle-Eng. form is 'goost' and sometimes 'gost.' Wyclif's form is 'goost,' Tindale's 'goost' and rarely 'gost,' the Geneva 'gost,' the Rhemish NT and the AV always spell 'ghost.'

The root of the word, according to Skeat, is the Teut. GIS = Aryan GHIS = to terrify, so that the modern use of the word is as close to the primitive meaning as any other. The sense of 'apparition' or 'spectre,' appears, however, to be later in English usage than that of 'breath' or 'spirit,' so that the derivation is a little uncertain. The range of meaning in older English is considerable.

The principal meanings are: (1) Breath, as Bp. Andrewes, Sermons, ii. 340, 'Ye see then that it is worth the while to confess this as it should be confessed. In this wise none can do it but by the Holy Ghost. Otherwise, for an ore tenus only, our own ghost will serve well enough.'

(2) The soul or spirit of a living person. Thus Chaucer, Clerke's Tale, 972—

'"Nat only, lord, that I am glad," quod she,
"To doon your lust, but I desyre also
Yow for to serue and plese in my degree
With-outen feynting, and shal euermo.
Ne neuer, for no wele ne no wo,
Ne shal the gost with-in myn herte stente
To loue yow best with al my trewe entente"'

So Spenser, FQ II. i. 42—

'Whom when the good Sir Guyon did behold,
His hert gan wexe as starke as marble stone,
And his fresh bloud did frieze with fearefull cold,
That all his sences seemd bereft attone:
At last his mightie ghost gan deepe to grone,
As lion, grudging in his great disdaine.'

(3) It is applied especially to the soul or spirit departing from the body. Thus in 'The Forty-two Articles' of 1553 (Gibson, The XXXIX Articles, i. 71), Art. III—'For the bodie laie in the Sepulchre, until the resurrection: but his Ghoste departing from him was with the Ghostes that were in prison, or in helle, and didde preache to the same, as the place of S. Peter doeth testify.' Thence arise the phrases 'breathe out, yield up, give up the ghost,' as Chaucer, Legend of Good Women, 886—

'When that he herde the name of Tisbe cryen,
On her he caste his hevy deedly yën,
And doun again, and yeldeth up the gost.'

So Prioresses Tale, 1862—

'This holy monk, this abbot, him mene I,
His tonge out-caughte, and took a-wey the greyn,
And he gaf up the goost ful softely.'

And Spenser, FQ II. viii. 45—

'He tombling downe on ground,
Breathd out his ghost, which to th' infernall shade
Fast flying, there eternall torment found
For all the sinnes wherewith his lewd life did abound.'

(4) The most frequent application of the word is, however, to the spirit of a dead person, a disembodied spirit. Bp. Hall says (Works, ii. 114), 'Herod's conscience told him he had offered an unjust and cruell violence to an innocent, and now hee thinkes that John's ghost haunts him.' Cf. also Mk 6^{49} Rhem. 'But they seeing him walking upon the sea, thought it was a ghost, and cried out.' The word is found as early as Chaucer quite in the modern sense, as Prologue, 8—

'He was nat pale as a for-pyned (= tormented) goost.'

The application to the Holy Spirit is also very early. Thus Malory, Morte d'Arthur (Globe ed.), XIII. viii. 7—'In the midst of this blast entered a sun-beam more clearer by seven times than ever they saw day, and all they were alighted of the grace of the Holy Ghost.' Nor is it always accompanied by the adj. Holy: Chaucer (Seconde Nonnes Tale, 328) has—

'But ther is better lyf in other place,
That never shal be lost, ne drede thee nought,
Which Goddes sone us tolde thurgh his grace;
That fadres sone hath alle thinges wrought;
And al that wrought is with a skilful thought,
The gost, that fro the fader gan procede,
Hath sowled hem, withouten any drede.'

(5) Finally, it should be noticed that the word is sometimes applied to a dead body. Spenser, FQ II. viii. 26—

'Palmer, (said he) no knight so rude, I weene,
As to doen outrage to a sleeping ghost.'

Shaks. II Henry VI. III. ii. 161—

'See how the blood is settled in his face!
Oft have I seen a timely-parted ghost,
Of ashy semblance, meagre, pale, and bloodless.'

This is held to be the meaning of Hamlet, I. iv. 85—

'Still am I call'd, unhand me, gentlemen.
By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that let's me!'

And Dyce quotes from Hooker's Amanda (1653), p. 207—

'What stranger who had seen thy shriv'led skin,
Thy thin, pale, ghastly face, would not have been Conceited he had seen a ghost i' th' bed,
New risen from the grave, not lately dead?'

In AV 'ghost' is used only in the phrase 'give up' or 'yield up the ghost,' and in the name 'the Holy Ghost.'

1. The poetic and 'Priestly' word גָּוַע gâwa', which means 'to expire,' 'to perish,' is tr^{d} 'give up the ghost' in Gn 25$^{8. 17}$ 35^{29}, Job 3^{11} 10^{18} 13^{19} 14^{10}, La 1^{19}; and 'yield up the ghost' in Gn 49^{33}. This tr^{n} is partly due to the Geneva Bible (Gn 35^{29} 49^{33}), but seems in most places original to AV. There is no reason for so special a tr^{n} in those passages; elsewhere gâwa' is tr^{d} simply 'die,' except Jos 22^{20}, Job 34^{15}, 'perish.' The Heb. רוּחַ rûah, 'breath,' 'spirit,' is never tr^{d} 'ghost.' But נֶפֶשׁ nephesh, 'soul,' is twice so tr^{d}, Job 11^{20} 'their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost' (מַפַּח־נָפֶשׁ; AVm 'a puff of breath'); and Jer 15^{9} 'she hath given up the ghost' (נָפְחָה נַפְשָׁהּ). In To 14^{11} we find ψυχή tr^{d} in the same way, 'he gave up the ghost in the bed' (ἐξέλιπεν [B ἐξέλειπεν] αὐτοῦ ἡ ψυχὴ ἐπὶ τῆς κλίνης). In NT we do not find ψυχή so tr^{d}, but πνεῦμα twice, Mt 27^{50} 'Jesus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the ghost' (ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα; RV 'yielded up his spirit'); and Jn 19^{30} 'he bowed his head and gave up the ghost' (παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα; RV 'gave up his spirit'). Though ψυχή is not tr^{d} 'ghost,' the verb ἐκψύχω, which occurs three times, is twice (Ac 5^{5} 12^{23}) tr^{d} 'give up the ghost,' and once (Ac 5^{10}) 'yield up the ghost.' Similarly ἐκπνέω, which also occurs three times (Mk 15$^{37. 39}$, Lk 23^{46}), is each time tr^{d} 'give up the ghost.' Finally, the phrase ἐν ἐσχάτῃ πνοῇ (lit. as RV 'at the last gasp') is rendered in 2 Mac 3^{31} 'give up the ghost.'

2. Wherever πνεῦμα is accompanied with ἅγιον it is tr^{d} in AV after all the previous versions 'Holy Ghost' (in 1611 always spelt 'holy Ghost,' which is the more surprising that Rhem. NT has almost always 'Holy Ghost'). When πνεῦμα occurs without ἅγιον, and the reference is to the Holy Ghost, it is tr^{d} 'spirit' or 'Spirit.' The RV has a few times, Amer. RV always, replaced 'Holy Ghost' by 'Holy Spirit'; both have generally accepted 'give up' or 'yield up the ghost.' See articles HOLY SPIRIT and SPIRIT.

GIAH (גִּיחַ).—Named in the account of Joab's pursuit of Abner, 2 S 2^{24}, 'the hill of Ammah that lieth before Giah by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon.' Ammah is prob. taken correctly as a proper name, although it cannot be identified. Theod., indeed, tr. it by ὑδραγωγός, 'aqueduct' (so Vulg. aquæductus), but this would necessitate the article, הָאַמָּה (cf. Wellh. and Driver, ad loc.). Wellh. proposes to eliminate Giah from the text, and for עַל־פְּנֵי גִיחַ דֶּרֶךְ מִדְבַּר גּ׳ of MT to substitute עַל־פְּנֵי הַדֶּרֶךְ בְּמִדְבַּר גּ׳, holding that גִּיחַ has arisen out of גֵּי הַ (cf. the LXX Γαί, i.e. גַּיְא 'ravine'). It was natural to interpolate a gai answering to the preceding 'hill,' and the ח of גִּיחַ might readily arise from the ה of הַדֶּרֶךְ. This emendation is accepted by Budde (in SBOT) and Kittel (in Kautzsch's AT).

GIANT.—Most peoples have traditions in regard to gigantic men existing in earlier times. Not many decades ago these traditions were supposed to be confirmed by discoveries of remains of prehistoric men of enormous size. But a close scrutiny of the evidence indicates that prehistoric men were not larger than the men now living, and that the difference between the largest men that ever lived and men of normal size is less than used to be thought. Moreover, the giants of the traditions, when we come to study the subject closely, are found to be more or less confused with mythological beings or with ghosts, thus becoming, in a measure, unreal.

There was a time when the biblical accounts of giants were interpreted and coloured by the traditions and supposed historic remains. More lately there is a tendency to interpret them in the light of the unreality that is now assigned to the extra-biblical traditions. These facts are a reason for scanning carefully the biblical evidence and confining ourselves very closely to it.

In our EV three different words are translated giant. In Gn 6^{4} and Nu 13^{33} is used the word נְפִילִים (in LXX and Gr. Enoch οἱ γίγαντες). See NEPHILIM. This word denotes beings analogous to the demigods of the Greek and Latin mythology. When applied to the giant inhabitants of Pal. (Nu 13^{33}), it should perhaps be regarded as a figure of speech. The word used in Job 16^{14} is gibbor (גִּבּוֹר), a mighty man (RVm), a hero, an armed assailant, not a giant. The same word is used in the plur. in Gn 6^{4}, apparently as an equivalent for Nephilim, and is tr. in the Sept. γίγαντες; but it is evidently the equivalent of the word 'heroes' as used in mythological legends.

The true Heb. word for giant is different from these. In 2 S $21^{16.\ 18.\ 20.\ 22}$ is the word raphah (רָפָה), tr^d giant, and in 1 Ch $20^{4.\ 6.\ 8}$ is the variant rapha' (רָפָא). From the same stem, in this variant form, comes the plur. rĕphaim (רְפָאִים, also used for the 'shades,' see REPHAIM), and this is the proper equivalent of our Eng. word 'giants.'

Raphah means to become limp, to be slack, to be loosened. It often describes the physical and moral condition of one who goes to pieces through fear or discouragement, one who is physically and spiritually relaxed through terror or panic (in Qal, Jer 6^{24} 49^{24} 50^{43}; Hithp., Jos 18^{3}, Pr 18^{3} 24^{10}). Many regard the word rĕphaim as the plur. of the gentilic adject. rĕphai, Rephaite; but its use indicates that it is rather a common noun in the plur., and it will be so treated in this article.

1. GEOGRAPHICAL DISTRIBUTION.—In David's time, the accounts say, there were rephaim, that is to say, giant people, living in Gath, and they mention none elsewhere. The Goliath whom David slew was one of these (1 S 17 et al.). So were Ishbi-benob, Saph (in 1 Ch 20^{4} Sippai), Goliath the Gittite (in 1 Ch 20^{5} Lahmi, the brother of Goliath the Gittite), and a man of stature with twenty-four fingers and toes (2 S 21^{16-22}, 1 Ch 20^{4-8}). See each of these names, in its place. Some of these men individually, and all four of them collectively, are said to have been born 'to the raphah (in 1 Ch $20^{6.\ 8}$ rapha') in Gath.' Certainly raphah is here not a proper name. It is to be tr^d 'the giant.' It is to be understood either individually or collectively. If individually, then probably 'the giant' is the Goliath whom David slew, and the four men here mentioned are his sons. If collectively, then the assertion is that the four were of the breed of the giants that lived at Gath.

Some centuries earlier, just before the conquests by Moses and Joshua, the rephaim were more widely distributed. At that time, Og, the king of Bashan, was the only remaining representative 'of those that were left of the rephaim' E. of the Jordan (Dt 3^{11}). W. of the Jordan the ANAKIM (wh. see) had their principal seat, perhaps, at Hebron and its vicinity (Nu 13^{22}, Jos 14^{12-15} $15^{13.\ 14}$ 11^{21}, Jg 1^{20}); but there were Anakim also in the mountain country of Israel as well as in the mountain country of Judah, and among the Phil. cities near the Mediterranean (Jos $11^{21.\ 22}$). Further, there seem to have been rephaim in the forest region near Mount Carmel (Jos 17^{15}). There are traces, too, of giant occupation, either then or earlier, in such geographical names as the valley of Rephaim (Jos 15^{8} 18^{16} etc.), near Jerus., and 'the Avvim,' one of the cities of Benjamin (Jos 18^{23}). And it is presumable that they occupied yet other localities at this date.

Going back to earlier times, two passages are especially important. In Dt $2^{10\text{f.}}$ Moses is represented as mentioning, for the encouragement of Israel against the Anakim, several giant peoples that had been dispossessed by other peoples. In Gn 14 we have an account of the several peoples that were attacked by the four kings in their march southward, in the days of Abraham. The peoples mentioned in these two passages are mainly the same, and they are so mentioned as to enable us to locate them geographically. The four kings 'smote Rephaim' (Gn 14^{5}), and this region must have been so called because there were rephaim then living there, E. of the Jordan, well to the N., the region where Og afterwards reigned. Proceeding S. they smote the Zuzim, apparently the same with the Zamzummim, who occupied territory afterwards held by the Ammonites, and who are said to be rephaim (Gn 14^{5}, Dt 2^{20}). Still marching S., they reached the Emim, who are also said to be rephaim, in the territory afterwards held by Moab (Gn 14^{5}, Dt $2^{10.\ 11}$). Yet farther S., in the country of Seir, they attacked the Horim, who were probably rephaim, though this is not expressly stated (Gn 14^{6}, Dt $2^{12.\ 22}$).

W. of the Jordan, the Avvim were near Gaza at a very early period (Dt 2^{23}). The rephaim are mentioned along with the Kenite, the Hittite, the Perizzite, the Amorite, etc. (Gn 15^{20}), as in the land, apparently, in Abraham's time. The Anakim are not mentioned by name in connexion with this early period, but we are told that 'Sarah died in the city of Arba, which is Hebron, in the land of Canaan' (Gn 23^{2}); and that 'Jacob came to Isaac, his father, to Mamre, the city of the Arba, which is Hebron' (Gn 35^{27}). Evidently, the writer of these statements held that the city was called by the name of Arba in the time of Jacob and of Abraham. It follows that he held that the Anakim were already there, for Arba 'was the great man among the Anakim' (Jos 14^{15}). And from Nu 13^{22} it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that it was the Anakim who built Hebron 'seven years before Zoan of Egypt.'

2. HISTORY OF THE GIANT PEOPLES.—If what has been said is true, we are to think of them as widely spread in Pal., on both sides of the Jordan, as early as the time of Abraham. They are expressly said to have preceded the Caphtorite Philistines, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Edomites, the Israelites; it is not said whether they preceded the Can. peoples. Some affirm them to have been the aborigines of Palestine. This is not in itself improbable, and it is perhaps confirmed by what we know of their characteristics. In particular, the name Horite is supposed to denote a cave-dweller, and if we regard the Horites as rephaim, this is an argument of some weight.

Not all scholars accept the opinion stated above, that the Anakim and other rephaim were W. of the Jordan in Abraham's time. There is a theory that these were immigrants from the rephaim E. of the Jordan, after the invasion by the four kings; but this lacks confirmation. It is said, further, that the Anakim cannot early have had their seats W. of the Jordan, because the country was then in the possession of other peoples. But, as we shall presently see, the rephaim lived among other peoples during most of their known history.

As another objection, one might plausibly say that Arba was the father of Anak, and the three chiefs whom Caleb conquered were sons of Anak, and therefore the Anakite possession dated back only to the generation before the Exodus. But this inference is based entirely on the inexactnesses of translations. Arba is not said to have been the father of Anak, but 'the father of the Anak' (Jos 15[13]), 'the father of the Anok' (Jos 21[11]). The article here makes a difference. Arba is not said to be the father of some person named Anak or Anok, but the father of the Anak stock. This is another way of saying that he was 'the great man among the Anakim' (Jos 14[15]). Again, Sheshai and Ahiman and Talmai are not said to have been the children of a person called Anak, but 'the children of the Anak' (Nu 13[22], Jos 15[14]), and 'the three sons of the Anak' (Jg 1[20]). In other words, Arba was thought of as the greatest man commemorated in the traditions of the Anakim, and in that sense the father of the Anakim; and the three chiefs were the greatest living leaders of the Anakim. There is nothing here to disprove the antiquity of the Anakim. See further Moore, Judges, p. 24.

The rephaim seem to have had strong local attachments. Once in a locality, they remained there, unless they were wholly extirpated. After many centuries Moses, and Joshua, and Jair, and Caleb found Og in the old seats of the Rephaim, and the tribesmen of Arba at the city of Arba, and the Horite still living in Seir, though incorporated among the Edomites. Yet more marked seems to have been the persistence of the Avvim in the Phil. country (Dt 2[23]). The Caphtorim had destroyed them, but they were still there in the time of Joshua (Jos 13[3]), and survived his conquests. Presumably, they are to be identified with the Anakim who were left in Gaza, in Gath, and in Ashdod, the name Anakim being here used generically (Jos 11[22]). Presumably, Goliath and the other giants of David's time came of this stock.

3. THE GIANTS IN THEIR RELATIONS TO OTHER PEOPLES.—The diction of OT, when it speaks of the giant peoples, has a marked peculiarity which is not preserved in the EV; the gentilic name is always used in the plur., not in the sing. as in the case of other peoples. For example, we have 'the Gazite and the Ashdodite, the Ashkelonite, the Gittite, and the Ekronite, and the Avvites' (Jos 13[3]); 'the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Rephaites (better, rephaim), and the Amorite' (Gn 15[20]). Curiously, the names Caphtorim and Pelishtim follow the same usage with those of the giant peoples, 'the Philistine' never occurring in the singular to denote the people, but only to denote some individual. If the Horites were giants, their name is exceptional, 'the Horite' being the designation commonly used.

This use of language is certainly significant. Apparently, it shows that the writers of OT regard the giants, not as a group of nationalities or peoples, but simply as a breed of men, existing in several varieties. With this agree statements made concerning the giants at all periods. The Davidic giants, though children of the raphah, were politically Philistine and Gittite. Og, though of the breed of the rephaim, was politically Amorite (Jos 2[10] etc.). In the time of the conquest, the Anakim around Hebron were politically Amorite; in the time of Abraham, it is probably fair to infer that they were politically Hittite. Giants as they were, and formidable, they maintained their existence only where they became associated with some other race, the other race being always dominant. The case of the Horites, maintaining their position as a people among peoples, is probably to be accounted for by some peculiar turn taken in their relations with Esau and his Hivite connexions by marriage.

4. PECULIARITIES OF THE GIANT RACE.—They were of great stature. Probably, no authentic measurements of men exceed those of the Goliath whom David slew. The Israelites of the Exodus seemed as grasshoppers by the side of the Anakim.

There is no ground in the biblical accounts for inferring that they were monstrous in shape. The six-toed man of David's time must be regarded as exceptional and not typical. The name Avvim may be from a stem that denotes crookedness, physical or moral, but it is insufficient as evidence that the Avvim had distorted bodies. The Anakim are verbally 'men of neck,' and this is commonly interpreted to mean that they were long-necked. But it is quite as likely to mean that they were thick-necked. The name Emim, 'formidable ones,' may indicate that fearsomeness was the principal characteristic of the giants, but their terribleness apparently was due to their size and prowess, and not to anything uncanny about them.

The name Horite is supposed to denote cave-dweller; but even if the rephaim were originally cave-dwellers, most of them were certainly not so within the time during which we have information concerning them.

They were a numerous stock. 'A people great and many, and tall as the Anakim,' is a phrase used more than once.

Yet the rephaim, as a whole, were inferior to the peoples of normal stature who surrounded them. Individuals among them were leaders—for example, Og, or the three chiefs at Hebron; but these were exceptional. We might infer this from the general history of mankind, but it is better to infer it from the fact given in the Bible, that the rephaim, coming in contact with other men, became either extinct or subordinate. Doubtless they were more formidable, however, as fighters in the Amorite or Philistine armies than they would have been by themselves.

5. MENTION IN LATER TIMES.—We have no clear facts concerning the giants later than the time of David. In the LXX of Jer 47[5] we read: 'Ashkelon is cast away, the remnant of the Enakim.' Those who prefer this to the Heb. text find in it proof of a survival of men of the giant breed even to that date, but this is precarious.

Later writers confuse the rephaim with the Nephilim, speak of their foolishness, and of their bones or other relics as on exhibition at Hebron, or Damascus, or elsewhere (Jth 16[7], Wis 14[6], Sir 16[7] 47[4], Bar 3[26]; Jos. Ant. v. ii. 3; Benjamin of Tudela, Itin. p. 56). Yet others enlarge upon the biblical statements with the most extraordinary assertions, measurements, and legends.

GIBBAR (גִּבָּר 'hero').—A family which returned with Zerub. (Ezr 2^{20}). The name is probably an error for Gibeon (גִּבְעוֹן) of Neh 7^{25}. See GENEALOGY.

GIBBETHON (גִּבְּתוֹן 'mound,' 'height').—A town which is mentioned, along with Eltekeh and Baalath, as belonging to the tribe of Dan, and as a Levitical city (Jos 19^{44} 21^{23}). In the time of the early kings of northern Israel G. was in the hands of the Phil., and was a place of importance. Nadab, king of Israel, was besieging it when he was slain by his successor Baasha; and a quarter of a century later Omri was similarly engaged when he was made king by the army, to succeed Zimri (1 K 15^{27} 16^{15-17}). In Onom. Sac.^{2} (246, 255) a Gabathon is mentioned 17 miles from Cæsarea. But this is nearly W. of Samaria, and much too far to the north to agree with the biblical notices of G. The Pal. Survey maps identify it with Kibbiah, well down the western slope of the mountain country, 840 ft. above the sea, in lat. 31°·58 and long. 35°·1, nearly equidistant from Jerusalem, Shechem, and Joppa.

GIBEA (גִּבְעָא).—A grandson of Caleb (1 Ch 2^{49}). It is now generally admitted that the list of the descendants of Judah through Caleb given in 1 Ch $2^{42ff.}$ is geographical rather than genealogical, and comprises all the towns lying in the Negeb of Judah, to the S. of Hebron (Wellh. Proleg. p. 217). G. is probably only a variation in spelling of the more common Gibeah (גִּבְעָה). See GIBEAH 1.

J. F. STENNING.

GIBEAH (גִּבְעָה a 'hill,' as distinct from a 'mountain,' or 'mountainous district' [הַר]).—A careful examination of all the passages in which Gibeah occurs as the name of a place, seems to show that the uncertainty and confusion which have hitherto existed with regard to the actual situation of G. are largely due to two causes. In the first place, the older translators failed in many cases to distinguish between the use of the word as an appellative and its use as a proper name, the result being to multiply the number of the places bearing this name. Secondly, the name itself is so closely allied, both in form and meaning, to that of another well-known spot, viz. Geba (גֶּבַע), that the two have frequently been interchanged, and the difficulties of identification considerably increased. A consideration of these two facts makes it probable that the actual number of places mentioned in the OT under this name (excluding those which are further defined by some additional word) is to be reduced to two.

1. A city of Judah (Jos 15^{57}), possibly one of two villages called Gabaa, Gabatha (Lagarde, Onomast. 255. 160). The exact site is unknown, but the context clearly shows that it was situated in the neighbourhood of Maon, Carmel, and Ziph, on the fertile plateau which lies to the S.E. of Hebron (Hist. Geog. pp. 306 n., 317).

2. A city of Benjamin (Jg $19^{12f.}$), described elsewhere as 'of Benjamin' (1 S $13^{2.15}$ 14^{16}, cf. Jg 19^{14} 'which belongeth to Benjamin'), and 'of the children of Benjamin' (2 S 23^{29}); most probably it is to be identified also with 'G. of Saul' (1 S 11^4, Is 10^{29}, cf. 1 S 10^{26}), and with 'the hill (RVm Gibeah) of God' (1 S 10^5).

From the somewhat scanty notices supplied by the historical books of the OT, we gather (a) that Gibeah was quite distinct from Geba (1 S 14^{1-5}, Is 10^{29}); (b) that it lay to the N. of Jerusalem, close to the main N. road, and S. of Ramah (Jg 19^{12-14}); (c) that just N. of the town, the main road divided into two branches, one of which led to Bethel, and the other diverged to Geba (Jg 20^{31}). The situation of Tell (or Tuleil) el-Fûl, with which Gibeah has been identified by Robinson (BR^{2} i. 577–579) exactly fulfils all these requirements. It is the name given to a hill situated about four miles to the N. of Jerusalem, and lying a quarter of a mile to the E. of the main road. Er-Râm (Ramah) lies farther to the N., while the main road from Jerusalem divides in two just beyond Tell el-Fûl, one branch diverging to the right to Jeba (Geba), and the other going northwards to Beitîn (Bethel). The writings of Josephus furnish additional proof, not only of the correctness of this identification, but also of the identity of Gibeah and G. of Saul. He relates (BJ V. ii. 1) that Titus, while advancing to the siege of Jerusalem, halted for a night at Gophna (Jufna), and the following night encamped 'at a place called the Vale of Thorns, near a certain village called Gabath-Saul, which signifies "Hill of Saul," distant from Jerusalem about 30 stadia.'* During the night a legion coming from Emmaus ('Amwâs, Nicopolis) joined the main army; the reinforcement had doubtless come up by the road which in the present day joins the northern road just above Tell el-Fûl. Cf. also Jerome, Ep. 108. 8 (Opp. ed. Vallarsi, i. 690), and Robinson, l.c.

The town of Gibeah is associated with several striking events in the early history of Israel. (1) It occupies an important position in the second of the two supplementary narratives which conclude the Book of Judges (ch. 19–21). A certain Levite from the hill country of Ephraim is forsaken by his concubine, who flees to her father's house in Beth-lehem-judah. Here she is followed by the Levite, who remains several days in Bethlehem, enjoying the hospitality of his father-in-law. Despite the entreaties of the latter, they start on the return journey late in the afternoon of the fifth day ($19^{8.9}$), and towards nightfall reach Jebus or Jerusalem. Being unwilling to 'turn aside into the city of a stranger,' the Levite presses on in the hope of reaching either Gibeah or Ramah (v.^{13}), and finally spends the night at the former place. Here they are hospitably received by an old man, a sojourner in the place; but during the night the Benjamite inhabitants beset the house, and demand that the Levite be given up to them. The latter, in self-defence, surrenders his concubine to them, and in the morning finds her on the threshold dead from their ill-usage. He then returns to his home, cuts up her body into twelve pieces, and sends them throughout the borders of Israel (19^{15-30}). Ch 20 describes how the Benjamites refuse to surrender the men of Gibeah to the assembled tribes, who in consequence attack Gibeah, and destroy the tribe of Benjamin, with the exception of 600 men. The kernel of the story is undoubtedly historical, but it has been worked over and expanded by 'an author of the age and school of the Chronicler' (Moore, Judges, p. 402 ff.). Throughout the narrative the name of the place is given as Gibeah simply, except in 19^{14} 20^4 ('that belongeth to Benjamin'), and in 20^{10}, where the text wrongly gives 'Geba of B.' (לגבע) for 'Gibeah of B.'; the similarity of the two names has caused the same error elsewhere.

In 20^{31}, however, another Gibeah seems to be referred to by the narrator. After twice suffering defeat at the hands of the Benjamites, the men of Israel lay an ambush against Gibeah, and then entice the Benjamites into 'the highways, of which one goeth up to Bethel, and the other to Gibeah, in the field.' From this passage it has been concluded that there was another place called Gibeah in the immediate neighbourhood, which was distinguished by the addition of 'in the field.' But this view is opposed by the accentuation, according to which 'in the field' is parallel to 'in the highways' (so RV). It is evident that Gibeah is a mistake for Geba (Jeba), the road to which branches off just N. of Tell el-Fûl; Moore thinks it probable that the author had 'no clear conception of the topography' (Judges, p. 436).

* πρός τινι κώμη Γαβὰθ Σαοὺλ καλουμένη· σημαίνει δὲ τοῦτο λόφον Σαούλου, διέχων ἀπὸ τῶν Ἱεροσολύμων ὅσον ἀπὸ τριάκοντα σταδίων.

Again in v.^{33} it is stated that the Israelite liers-in-wait 'brake out of their place, even out of Maareh-geba.' AV and RVm give 'even out of the meadow of Gibeah,' their translation being based on that of the Targum. The rendering 'meadow' (for מַעֲרֵה), however, is very questionable, and it has been proposed to follow the Pesh., and render, with a change of the vowel points, 'cave.' The correct reading is doubtless that preserved by one large group of Greek MSS and Jerome, viz. 'from the W. of G.' (מִמַּעֲרָב לְגִבְעָה, cf. Jos $8^{9.12}$). See Moore, Judges, pp. 437, 438.

(2) From 1 S 10^{26} * we learn that Gibeah was the native village of Saul, to which he returned after his election as king; from this time onwards it is frequently called 'G. of Saul.' (The identity of the two places is sufficiently clear from the narrative of 1 S 13 and 14). It was here that Saul, while pursuing his ordinary occupations, heard of the grievous plight of Jabesh-gilead in consequence of the attack of Nahash the Ammonite (11^4). The occasion foreshadowed by Samuel (10^7) had now arrived, and Saul, following the promptings of the divine spirit, at once took action. He slew a yoke of oxen, and sent portions of them throughout the borders of Israel, bidding the people follow after him. The summons was promptly obeyed, and by means of a forced march Saul effected the release of Jabesh-gilead. From the account of the war with the Philistines (1 S 13. 14), which occupied the greater part of Saul's reign, Gibeah would seem to have been of considerable strategic importance. The exact sequence of events, however, is not quite clear, chiefly owing to the corruptness of the text, and the confusion which clearly prevails with regard to the two places Geba and Gibeah. According to the more probable view, Saul, with 2000 men, took up his position at Michmash (Mŭkhmâs), on the N. side of the Wâdy Suweinît, from which he commanded the heights of Bethel, while Jonathan, with 1000 men, remained at Gibeah, some three miles farther south (13^2). The signal for revolt was given by Jonathan, who destroyed the pillar † of the Philistines at Gibeah (emending v.^{3} 'and the Philistines heard saying, The Hebrews have revolted. And Saul blew the trumpet,' etc.; cf. Driver, Sam. ad loc.); the Phil. at once mustered in great force, and marched against the Israelites. Unable to withstand the advance of the enemy, Saul retreated down the eastern passes to Gilgal in the Jordan Valley, while the Philistines seized the deserted camp at Michmash (vv.$^{4.5}$). For a time the cause of Israel seemed hopeless, but Saul, having collected some 600 men, the remnant of his forces, effected a junction with Jonathan at Gibeah (v.^{15} following the LXX; in v.^{16} Geba must be a mistake for Gibeah). In the meantime the Philistines overran the country in three directions (for 'the border' [הגבול], v.^{18}, the LXX has הגבע; we should probably read הגבעה Gibeah, since it would be meaningless to talk of a company of spoilers starting from Michmash in the direction of Geba, situated on the opposite side of the Wâdy Suweinît). Hostilities between the opposing forces were again initiated by Jonathan. On this second occasion, accompanied only by his armour-bearer, he apparently proceeded from Gibeah to Geba, and thence (cf. 14^1 'that is on yonder side') made his desperate effort against the Philistine garrison at Michmash. The latter, believing, no doubt, that the two warriors were supported by a large force, offered but little resistance, and no fewer than twenty were slain at the first onset (14^{14}). The panic caused by this sudden attack rapidly spread throughout the Philistine camp, which soon became the scene of the wildest confusion. The news was conveyed to Saul at Gibeah by his scouts or outposts (v.^{16}), and a general onslaught on the terrified Philistines, in which the whole country joined, was successfully carried out. It does not seem, however, that the Israelitish victory on this occasion had more than a temporary effect, for we are told later on that 'there was sore war against the Philistines all the days of Saul' (14^{52}).

(3) In the appendix to 2 S (21–24) Gibeah is mentioned as the scene of the tragic incident of the hanging of the seven sons of Saul (2 S 21^{1-14}). The famine, which had troubled the land for three years, is declared by J″ to be due to the slaughter of the Gibeonites by Saul, though no such act is recorded in the history of Saul's reign. To appease the wrath of J″, seven descendants of Saul were handed over to the Gibeonites, and hanged by them. See RIZPAH.

(4) Lastly, in the imaginative description of the march of Sennacherib against Jerusalem given by Isaiah (10^{28-32}), the Assyrians are represented as advancing in a straight line from the North, undeterred by any obstacle. The prophet depicts the last stages of their victorious advance; the passage of the steep defile of the Wâdy Suweinît is secured by despatching a troop in advance to Migron, S. of the pass; the main army is thus enabled to cross in safety, and encamps at Geba; while the villagers of Ramah and Gibeah take refuge in flight (cf. Driver, Isaiah, pp. 71, 72). The passage is important as establishing the fact that Geba and Gibeah were two distinct places.

3. There are several place-names compounded with Gibeah (or Gibeath, גִּבְעַת the st. constr.), which are translated in the RV text by 'hill,' but given as 'Gibeah' in the margin. These are—

(1) Gibeath hā'ărālōth (גִּבְעַת הָעֲרָלוֹת), 'the hill of the foreskins' (Jos 5^3), between the Jordan and Jericho, so called as the scene of the circumcision, after the passage of the Jordan. See GILGAL.

(2) Gibeath-Phinehas (גִּבְעַת פִּינְחָס), 'the hill of P.' in Mt. Ephraim (Jos 24^{33}). The exact site is unknown. Conder (PEF Mem. ii. 218) follows Schwarz (HL p. 118) in identifying it with 'Awertah near Nablûs (Shechem); so apparently G. A. Smith. Guérin (Judée, iii. pp. 37, 38; Samarie, pp. 106–109), chiefly on the authority of Jerome (Ep. i. 888), identifies it with Jîbîa, three miles N. of Kuryet el-Enab (so Dillmann).

(3) Gibeath hammōreh (ג״ הַמּוֹרֶה), 'the hill of Moreh,' usually identified with the modern Jebel Duby, a slight eminence on the N. side of the valley above Shunem (Solam). On this view, which identifies 'the spring of Harod' (which see) with 'Ain Jālûd, at the foot of Mt. Gilboa, about half an hour to the E. of Jezreel (Zer'in), the camps of Gideon and the Midianites (Jg 7^1) would occupy much the same position as those taken up at a later period by Saul and the Philistines (1 S 28^4, cf. 29^1). So G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 397 f.; Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, 1856, p. 341 f. Moore, however

---

* 1 S 10^{25-27} has been clearly shown by Budde (Richter und Samuel, p. 174 f.) to be a harmonistic insertion of the editor; but this fact does not affect the point at issue.

† So Driver, Wellh., Th.; RV gives 'garrison.' The נְצִיב was probably a pillar erected in token of Philistine domination. See Driver, Sam. p. 61.

(Judges, p. 200 f.), objects that this view is based on the notice in 6^{33}, which is not from the same source as 7^{1} (J), and prefers therefore to place G. hammōreh near Shechem (Gn 12^{6}, Dt 11^{30}). See MOREH.

(4) Gibeath ha-Elohim (ג׳׳ הָאֱלֹהִים), 'the hill of God,' probably the same as Gibeah 2. It was the spot at which Saul, on his return from the city of Samuel, was to meet a band of the prophets (1 S 10^{5}). In v.^{10} it is called Gibeah, or 'the hill' simply; and as it is stated that there was a garrison (or rather 'pillar') of the Philistines there, it may safely be inferred that it is identical with 'G. of Benjamin' (cf. $13^{2.3}$; in v.^{3} we must read Gibeah for Geba).

(5) Gibeath ha-Hachilah (1 S 23^{19} 26^{1}). See HACHILAH.

(6) Gibeath Ammah (1 S 2^{24}). See AMMAH.

(7) Gibeath Gareb (Jer 31^{39}). See GAREB.

GIBEATH (גִּבְעַת), Jos 18^{28} = GIBEAH No. 2 (which see). Gibeathite (גִּבְעָתִי), 1 Ch 12^{3}, gentilic name from Gibeah (of Benjamin?).

GIBEON (גִּבְעוֹן, Γαβαών).—An ancient city of Canaan belonging to the Hivites* (Jos $9^{3\text{f.}}$), and apparently the capital of a small independent state (9^{17}); it was 'a great city, as one of the royal cities . . . greater than Ai' (10^{2}). It was later assigned to the tribe of Benjamin (18^{25}), and was eventually made over with its suburbs to the descendants of Aaron (21^{17}).

The identity of G. with the village of el-Jîb, which lies some 5 or 6 miles to the N.W. of Jerusalem, is practically beyond dispute. The modern village still preserves the first part of the older name, while its situation agrees in every respect with the requirements of the history of the OT. Just beyond Tell el-Fûl (Gibeah), the main N. road from Jerusalem to Beitîn (Bethel) is joined by a branch road leading up from the coast. The latter forms the continuation of the most southerly of the three routes which connect the Jordan Valley with the Maritime Plain (Smith, HGHL p. 248 f.) After the Israelites had crossed the Jordan at Gilgal and destroyed Jericho, their most direct means of access to the central plateau lay by the Wâdy Suweinît. From Michmash at the head of the valley the way ran almost straight across the tableland to the vale of Aijalon. Now, just before this road leaves the higher ground and descends into the Shephelah, it divides into two, the one branch leading down by the Wâdy Selman, the other running in a more northerly direction by way of the two Bethhorons (Smith, HGHL p. 210 n. 2). Here, on this open fertile plateau, slightly to the S. of the main road, rises the hill on which the modern village of el-Jîb is built, right on the frontier line which traverses the central range to the S. of Bethel. It was this natural pass across Palestine which in early times served as the political border between N. and S. Israel, and it was owing to its position on this frontier that G. acquired so much prominence in the reigns of David and Solomon. A short distance to the E. of the village, at the foot of the hill, there is further a stone tank or reservoir of considerable size, supplied by a spring, which rises in a cave higher up. Thus we find that the physical features of the modern el-Jîb correspond in every respect with those of the ancient Gibeon as set forth in the historical books of the OT.

1. We learn from the Bk. of Joshua, that after the destruction of Jericho and Ai by the Israelites the inhabitants of G. devised a scheme by which they hoped to avoid the fate that had befallen their neighbours. They accordingly despatched an embassy to the Israelite camp at Gilgal for the purpose of misleading the enemy by representing that they were not inhabitants of Canaan, but came from a far distant country. In support of this statement the embassy drew attention to the condition of their provisions and garments, which bore apparent traces of having been brought from a long distance. Their request for an alliance was at once granted by Joshua and the princes, and a covenant ratified between the two peoples. Within three days, however, the trick played by the men of G. was fully exposed, but, on account of the covenant oath, Joshua and the princes of the congregation determined to abide by the alliance, while they condemned the Gibeonites to perpetual service as 'hewers of wood and drawers of water to all the congregation' (Jos $9^{3\text{-}27}$). Meantime the neighbouring Amorite kings under Adoni-zedek of Jerusalem had combined to resist the forces of Joshua, and as a first step to lay siege to G. An urgent summons for help was sent to the Israelites, to which Joshua promptly responded by making a forced night-march from Gilgal with all his troops. The confederate kings were utterly routed by the Israelites, who pursued the flying foe down the valley of Aijalon as far as Makkedah in the Shephelah. It was on this occasion that, at the prayer of Joshua, 'the sun stayed in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day' ($10^{1\text{-}14}$; see BETH-HORON). We learn from 2 S $21^{1\text{f.}}$ that the Gibeonites were nearly exterminated by Saul, but no details are supplied in the narrative of his reign. Reparation was made by David through the sacrifice of seven of Saul's descendants.

2. We next hear of Gibeon at the beginning of David's reign, when he was as yet king of Judah only, and was still opposed by Ishbosheth the son of Saul. During the struggle for supremacy two bodies of troops, under their respective generals,—Joab the son of Zeruiah and Abner the son of Ner,—met, as if by agreement, on the frontier at Gibeon. The battle went in favour of David's men, and in the subsequent flight of Abner the latter slew Asahel, the younger brother of Joab (2 S $2^{12\text{-}32}$). The story clearly belongs to the older narrative (J^{1}) of the books of Samuel, and is undoubtedly genuine, though vv.$^{14\text{-}16}$ seem to interrupt the main narrative. These verses describe the mortal combat that took place between the 12 champions of each party. The name given to the spot, Ḥelḳath-haẓẓûrîm (חֶלְקַת הַצֻּרִים 'the field of sword-edges'), has probably been more correctly preserved in the LXX (Μερὶς τῶν ἐπιβούλων, i.e. ח׳ הַצֹּדִים 'the field of the liers in wait'; cf. Driver, in loc.), and should be transliterated Ḥelḳath-haẓẓôdîm. The 'pool of Gibeon' here mentioned (v.^{13}) is doubtless the reservoir referred to above. Similarly, in Jer $41^{11\text{f.}}$ Johanan the son of Kareah is stated to have delivered the captives of Mizpah from the hands of Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, 'by the great waters that are in Gibeon.' It was at this spring also, according to Josephus (Ant. v. i. 17), that Joshua surprised the five kings of the Amorites when they were besieging Gibeon.

3. Owing to the great similarity between the two names (see GEBA, GIBEAH), Geba seems to have been substituted for Gibeon in 2 S 5^{25}. The parallel passage (1 Ch 14^{16}) gives Gibeon, and this reading is also supported by the LXX and by Is 28^{21}, which connects Gibeon with Perazim as in 2 S $5^{17\text{-}25}$. Further, the Philistines were encamped in the valley of Rephaim to the W. of Jerusalem (Smith, HGHL p. 218, by a lapsus calami or a printer's error, places the valley S.E. of Jerusalem; it is correctly placed in the map, Plate IV.), while David was advancing from the S., when commanded to 'make a circuit behind them' (v.^{23}). His attack therefore from Gibeon to the N.W. of Jerusalem suits the requirements of the context; Geba was too far to the E.

4. The rebellion of Absalom, which culminated in his death, was quickly followed by an outbreak on the part of the men of Israel under one Sheba the son of Bichri (2 S $20^{1ff.}$). The task of suppressing the revolt was at first assigned to Amasa, but owing to his dilatoriness Abishai[*] was also sent in pursuit. The latter was accompanied by Joab, and the two parties of David's troops met 'at the great stone which is in G.' (20^{8}). Not suspecting any evil, Amasa advanced to salute Joab, and was treacherously slain by him. The 'great stone of G.' is not mentioned elsewhere; it was probably a pillar or cairn of stones such as we frequently find in connexion with the OT sanctuaries, e.g. at Mizpah, Bethel, Gilgal (cf. W. R. Smith, RS 186 f.).

5. It was, however, as the site of a bāmāh, or 'high place,' that G. was especially famous. At this sanctuary, because it was 'the great high place' (הַבָּמָה הַגְּדוֹלָה), Solomon inaugurated his reign by offering a thousand burnt-offerings, and received the divine blessing in a dream by night (1 K $3^{4f.}$). It is true that, according to 2 Ch 1^{3}, G. is represented as containing the 'Tent of Meeting of God' as well as the brazen altar; but this statement would seem to have no other foundation than the desire of the Chronicler to reconcile the action of the young king and its approval by J″ with the enactments of the later priestly legislation (cf. Wellhausen, Proleg.^{4} p. 182 f.). The earlier history knows nothing of the presence of the Tent of Meeting at G. (according to 1 S 1^{9} 3^{3} it was already replaced by a temple at Shiloh; 1 S 2^{22b} is omitted in LXX, and is clearly a later addition; so Driver, Budde, Wellhausen, Klost.), while 1 K $8^{1ff.}$ clearly places it, together with the ark of the covenant, 'in the city of David, which is Zion.'

'Men of G.' are mentioned as among those 'which came up at the first,' i.e. who returned from Babylon under Zerubbabel (Neh 7^{25}; in the corresponding list of Ezra 2^{20} Gibbar is probably a mistake), and also as taking part in the repairing of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh 3^{7}).

Lastly, Gibeon is mentioned by Josephus (BJ II. xix. 1) as the place where Cestius Gallus encamped on his march from Antipatris to Jerusalem, after he had fired the town of Lydda (Διὰ Βαιθωρὼν ἀναβὰς στρατοπεδεύεται κατά τινα χῶρον Γαβαὼ καλούμενον, ἀπέχοντα τῶν Ἱεροσολύμων πεντήκοντα σταδίους; elsewhere he puts the distance at 40 stadia). GIDDALTI (גִּדַּלְתִּי 'I magnify [God]').—A son of Heman, 1 Ch $25^{4.29}$.†

GIDDEL (גִּדֵּל 'very great').—1. The eponym of a family of Nethinim, Ezr 2^{47}=Neh 7^{49}, called in 1 Es 5^{30} Cathua. 2. The eponym of a family of 'Solomon's servants,' Ezr 2^{56}=Neh 7^{58}, called in 1 Es 5^{33} Isdael.

GIDEON (גִּדְעוֹן ?=feller, hewer), also called Jerubbaal (יְרֻבַּעַל Jg 6^{32} etc.) and Jerubbesheth (יְרֻבֶּשֶׁת 2 S 11^{21}), son of Joash, of the clan of Abiezer in the tribe of Manasseh, a native of Ophrah;[‡] deliverer of Israel from the Midianites (Jg 6–8). The nomad Arabs of the Syrian and Arabian desert had invaded the central district of Palestine. They must have entered it by the only natural approaches from the Jordan Valley, the Wady Fâr'a, which leads into the neighbourhood of Shechem, and the Nahr Jalûd, which opens on to the plain of Jezreel. The scene of the invasion and conflict lay in this region. Manasseh and Ephraim were the principal sufferers; accordingly a Manassite is the hero of the deliverance, and Ephraimites take part in completing it (7^{24}–8^{3}).

On one of their marauding expeditions the Midianites had murdered Gideon's brothers at Tabor (8^{18});[*] personal revenge, therefore, was one of the motives which instigated his action (8^{4-21}). National interests, however, were superadded. According to one ancient account, Gideon was called by an angel of the Lord to save Israel from the hand of Midian (6^{11-24}). The angel of J″, i.e. J″ Himself in the form of an angel (vv.$^{16.23}$), appears under the holy tree of Ophrah. He summons Gideon to the task of deliverance. The meal which is offered to the pilgrim stranger is miraculously consumed, and the angel disappears. Gideon, convinced by the miracle, builds an altar to J″-shalom.[†]

There follows what seems to be a second version of the call of Gideon (6^{25-32}). He is bidden destroy the village altar of Baal, and the sacred post beside it (ashērah), erect an altar to J″, and offer a bullock.[‡] The people of Ophrah are incensed at the destruction of their holy place, and threaten Gideon with death. His father rescues him by a witty taunt, which secures for Gideon the name Jerubbaal.[§]

After this Gideon collects the men of his clan Abiezer (v.^{34}), and encamps with them by the spring of Harod, on the S.E. edge of the plain of Jezreel, near the Midianite army (7^{1}).[‖] He pays a night visit to the enemy's camp, and overhears the telling of a dream, which encourages him to act at once (7^{9-15}). He skilfully posts his men under cover of night; the alarm is given; the camp is thrown into a panic, and the Midianites break up in flight towards the Jordan (vv.$^{18-22}$).[¶] There are clearly two accounts of the subsequent course of events. According to one (7^{24}–8^{3}), Gideon summons Ephraim to cut off the flight of the

[*] In v.^{6} Joab is read instead of Abishai by Then., Wellh., and Driver, but Budde defends the MT. See JOAB.

[‡] Site not identified. Gideon's home must have been near Shechem (ch. 9), and exposed to the Midianite inroads (6^{11}).

[*] Mt. Tabor is rather remote from the topography of the narrative. Tabor by Bethel (1 S 10^{3}) is nearer Shechem. Moore suggests טבור (cf. 9^{37}), altered to תבור to suit 6^{33}: Budde תבץ (9^{50}).

[†] In v.^{16a} omit יהוה', so Budde. V.^{17b} prob. editorial addition, anticipating v.$^{21f.}$. V.^{20} is perhaps secondary; the narrative does not imply that G. intended to offer a sacrifice. V.^{22a} editorial, anticipates G.'s recognition of the angel. With this § cf. Gn $18^{1ff.}$ J, and Jg 13^{2-23}. This § is ascribed by some critics to J.

[‡] In v.^{25} the words 'bullock, even the second bullock of seven years old,' are corrupt and ungrammatical. פר השני and פר השור are doublets.

[§] The name cannot='one who strives with Baal,' as the text would ingeniously suggest; but 'Baal strives,' Baal being a name for J″, used without offence in early times; cf. Eshbaal, Meribaal, etc. But Jerubbaal should prob. be written Jerubaal ='Baal (i.e. J″) founds,' ירה', cf. Jeruel, Jeremiah (Wellh. Text d. B. Sam. p. 31. So Bu., Moore). In v.^{31} 'he that will plead . . . morning' interrupts the condition. cl.; 'because one hath broken down his altar' is repeated from v.^{32}; both should be struck out as insertions. This § is attributed to E.

[‖] The account (7^{2-8}) of the test by which Gideon's large army was reduced to 300 belongs to some later tradition. It is obviously connected with 6^{35}; but this verse is inconsistent with 7^{23}, and neither can be original. At end of 7^{5} note LXX A+ μεταστήσεις αὐτὸν καθ' αὐτόν. In v.^{6} 'putting their hand to their mouth' is a gloss; it should come at the end of the verse.

[¶] This paragraph has been a good deal altered by editors. Two versions of Gideon's stratagem seem to have been combined. In the one version the 300 are armed with pitchers and torches; in the other, with trumpets only. The text has been greatly confused by harmonizing additions; see the commentaries. In v.^{20} the word 'a sword,' RVm, is prob. a gloss. In v.^{22b} the two narratives are combined again in describing the direction of the flight.

Midianites at the Jordan ford. The movement is successful, and the Ephraimites capture and slay the two princes Oreb and Zeeb.[*] In the pride of their success, the Ephraimites quarrel with Gideon for not having called in their assistance earlier. But Gideon appeases their jealousy by a shrewd speech: 'Is not the gleaning of Ephraim better than the vintage of Abiezer?' This certainly looks as if the victory were won, and the 'vintage' over: the Ephraimites had completed the work of Gideon on the W. side of the Jordan crossing. In the other narrative, however (8$^{4-21}$), we find Gideon in hard pursuit, with his 300, on the E. of Jordan. So far from having won a victory, the chances of success seem so unlikely that the people of Succoth and Penuel treat the pursuers with mockery, and refuse provisions for the wearied troops. At length, however, Gideon reaches the place where the Midianites are encamped, takes them by surprise, captures the two kings, Zebah and Zalmunna,[†] and returns in triumph, punishing Succoth and Penuel on the way. He then kills the two kings with his own hand, in revenge for their murder of his brothers. The divergence of the two accounts is apparent. An attempt to combine them can be made, as is done, e.g., by Kittel.[‡] He regards the exploit of Ephraim at the ford as merely an episode in the pursuit, which is continued by Gideon and his men on the E. side of the river, and overcomes the difficulty of 8$^{1-3}$ by supposing these verses to be merely an imitation of 12$^{1-3}$. It seems, however, much more likely that we have in 8$^{4-21}$ clearly a very ancient and homogeneous fragment, a narrative of the pursuit and final defeat parallel to 7^{24}–8^{3}.[§] Whether 8$^{4-21}$ is a direct continuation of 7$^{9-22}$ or not, is difficult to say. It implies some account of a successful rout of the Midianites, but not necessarily that given in 7$^{9-22}$. Perhaps we have here an ancient fragment, of which the beginning has been lost.[‖]

The Midianites triumphantly overthrown, Gideon's grateful countrymen offer to make him king. He declines; but asks for the golden earrings taken in the spoil. With these he makes an ephod, i.e. apparently an image of J", overlaid with metal,[¶] and sets it up in his house at Ophrah (8$^{24-27a\alpha}$ in the main). The judgment of a later age condemned the action, and saw in it the cause of subsequent disaster (v.$^{27a\beta b}$). The usual formula of the editor brings the story to a close (v.^{28}). The account of Gideon's family, the birth of Abimelech, and Gideon's death and burial (vv.$^{30-32}$), seems to come from the hand of the final editor, who was familiar with P in Genesis,[] and intended these verses to form a connecting link with the story of Abimelech in ch. 9. The remaining vv.$^{33-35}$ belong to the Deuteronomic framework of the Book of Judges. The story of Gideon is told in an extremely complicated narrative. Two main documents can be traced, but these have been so interwoven both before and after the Deuteron. redaction of Judges, that the analysis in detail must be regarded more as a critical experiment than as possessing any degree of certainty. In this article the two main narratives have been followed, and secondary elements noticed chiefly in footnotes. G. A. COOKE.

GIDEONI (גִּדְעֹנִי 'my cutter down').—Father of Abidan, prince of Benj., Nu 1^{11} 2^{22} 7$^{60.\,65}$ 10^{24} P.

GIDOM (גִּדְעֹם).—The limit of the pursuit of Benjamin by the other tribes, Jg 20^{45}. Possibly the word is not a proper name, but may be read as an infinitive, 'till they cut them off' (Moore, ad loc.). No place of the name of Gidom is mentioned elsewhere. LXX B has Γεδάν, A Γαλαάδ (Gilead). Another variant is Gibeah or Geba.

GIER EAGLE ('gier' is the same as the German Geier, 'vulture,' 'hawk') is tr^{n} in AV of רָחָם (rāḥām) in Lv 11^{18} and Dt 14^{17}, in both of which passages RV has 'vulture' (Driver more specifically 'carrion vulture'). RV gives 'gier eagle' also as tr^{n} of פֶּרֶס (pereṣ) in Dt 14^{12}, where AV has 'ossifrage' (lit. 'bone breaker'). The pereṣ is the bearded vulture or Lämmergeier, 'the largest and most magnificent of the vulture tribe' (quoted by Driver, Deut. p. 162, from Tristram, Nat. Hist. of Bible, p. 171). The name of the rāḥām is literally preserved in the Arab. rakham, the Pharaoh's Hen, Neophron percnopterus.

The adult rakham has the front of the head and the upper part of the throat and cere naked, and of a bright lemon-yellow. The plumage is of a dirty white, except the quill feathers, which are of a greyish black. Its appearance when soaring is very striking and beautiful. It is the universal scavenger of Egyptian cities. It is found in great abundance also in Palestine and Syria. See EAGLE. G. E. POST.

GIFT.—This, or the similar term present, is used to tr. a variety of Heb. and Gr. words, the principal of which are the following:—

1. מִנְחָה Gn 32^{13} 33^{10} (parallel to בְּרָכָה, lit. 'blessing' in 33^{11}; cf. 1 S 30^{26}, 2 K 18^{31}, Is 36^{16}), esp. of a gift offered by way of homage, e.g. 1 S 10^{27}, Ps 45^{12} (cf. the 'gifts' presented by the Magi, Mt 2^{11}), or tribute, Jg 3$^{15.\,17f.}$, 2 S 8$^{2.\,6}$, 1 K 4^{21} [Heb. 5^{1}], 1 Ch 18^{2}, 2 Ch 26^{8} 32^{23} (cf. אֶשְׁכָּר of Ps 72^{10}, Ezk 27^{15}). Minḥâh is used also of a gift (offering) to God, Gn 4^{4}, 1 S 26^{19}, Mal 3^{4} etc., and in Ezk and P is a technical term for the 'meal-offering,' Lv 2$^{1ff.}$ and oft., Ezk 46^{20} etc. The NT equivalent is δῶρον, e.g. Mt 2^{11} 5^{23} 8^{4} 23^{18}, He 5^{1} 8^{3} 9^{9}. δῶρον also answers in the LXX to קָרְבָּן (ḳorbān), which in Ezk 20^{28} 40^{43} and frequently in Lv and Nu (but only by P) is used for an 'oblation.' See art. CORBAN for a full account of the meaning of 'gift' in such passages as Mt 15^{5}, Mk 7^{11}.

2. מַשְׂאֵת (pl. מַשְׂאֹת) is the word used of the 'mess' which Joseph gave to his brethren Gn 43^{34}, which David sent to Uriah 2 S 11^{8}, of the 'gifts' which Ahasuerus sent upon the occasion of his feast Est 2^{18}, and of the ritual offerings referred to in 2 Ch 24$^{6.\,9}$ and Ezk 20^{40}. It is used in Jer 40^{5}, along with the similar term אֲרֻחָה of the 'victuals' (RVm 'allowance') and 'present' which Jeremiah received from Nebuzar-adan. An allowance (אֲרֻחַת תָּמִיד) of the same kind was given to the captive king Jehoiachin, 2 K 25^{30} = Jer 52^{34}. The 'exactions of wheat' (מַשְׂאַת־בַּר) of Am 5^{11} are 'the presents which the poor fellahin had to offer to the grasping aristocrats out of the hard-won produce of their toil' (Driver, ad loc.).

3. מַתָּן (from נָתַן 'give'), מַתָּנָה (in Dn 2$^{6.\,48}$ 5^{17} Aram. מַתְּנָא), מַתַּת (a by-form found only in 1 K 13^{7}, Pr 25^{14}, Ec 3^{13} 5^{18}, Ezk 46$^{5.\,11}$). This is the most general term for 'gift.' It is used in Gn 24^{53} and 34^{12} of the present given to a bride in addition to the 'dowry' (i.e. purchase price, מֹהַר) paid to her relatives; in Gn 25^{6} of the portions settled by Abraham on the children of his concubines (cf. the action of Jehoshaphat, 2 Ch 21^{3}); of gifts to the sanctuary or to a deity, Ex 28^{38}, Nu 18^{11}, Dt 16^{17}, Ezk 20^{26} (in this last of the sacrifice of children); in Ps 68^{18} * of ‘gifts’ in token of homage; in Pr 15^{27} Ec 7^{7} of ‘gifts’ intended by way of bribe; in Dn $2^{6.\,48}$ 5^{17} of the ‘gifts’ of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar.

4. שֹׁחַד. This always (even in 1 K 15^{19}, 2 K 16^{8} practically) means a ‘bribe.’ The taking of bribes by those appointed to dispense justice is forbidden in Ex 23^{8} (repeated in Dt 16^{19}), and is frequently alluded to in OT, e.g. Dt 10^{17} 27^{25}, Is 1^{23} 5^{23} 33^{15}, Mic 3^{11}, Ezk 22^{12}, Ps 15^{5}, Pr 17^{33}. ‘It blindeth them that have sight’ (פִּקְחִים, Ex 23^{8}; or ‘the eyes of the wise,’ עֵינֵי חֲכָמִים Dt 16^{19}), and ‘perverteth the words of the righteous.’

5. נֵדֶה (Baer נֵדֶה) and נָדָן each occur only in Ezk 16^{33} of a ‘gift’ in the sense of the hire of a harlot. The ordinary term for this is אֶתְנַן, which occurs in the same context, Ezk $16^{31.\,34}$ (cf. Dt 23^{19}, Is $23^{17\text{f.}}$, Hos 9^{1}, Mic 1^{7}).

In NT, while δῶρον and δόμα have generally a material sense, δωρεά (once in Jn, 4 times in Ac, 5 times in Paul, once in He) appears always to be used of a ‘gift’ belonging to the spiritual or supernatural order. The ‘gifts’ (AV ‘offerings,’ RV ἀναθήματα) to which the attention of Jesus was called (Lk 21^{5}) would be such as Josephus (BJ v. v. 4) describes, most of which had been presented to the temple by Herod. The Greek word in the same sense occurs (only) in 2 Mac 9^{16} (cf. for the idea 3^{3} and 3 Mac 3^{17}). For the gifts (χαρίσματα) of the early Church, see CHURCH, pp. 427 f., 434 f.

The above analysis will show the variety of occasions upon which a ‘gift’ might be offered and the variety of forms it might take amongst Orientals. It had its place in their dealings both with their fellow-men and with their God or gods. One did not come before prophet (1 S 9^{7}) or king (1 K 10^{10}) or God (Ex 23^{15}) with empty hands. The English words ‘gift’ and ‘present’ are apt, indeed, to convey an idea of spontaneity about the transaction which was generally absent. The ‘present’ of Ehud to Eglon (Jg $3^{17\text{ff.}}$) was really tribute, belonging to the same category as that offered by Jehu to Shalmaneser (see Moore on Jg 3^{17}). It is very important also to remember that while a man might offer a ‘present’ to his bride-elect, the ‘dowry’ (מֹהַר) was not a ‘gift’ but a price paid to the family of the bride as compensation for the loss of her services (W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 78 f.). The mōhar might consist of money (Gn 34^{12}, Ex 22^{15}, Dt 22^{29}), of personal service (Gn $29^{20.\,27}$), or of military services (Jos 15^{18}, Jg 1^{13}, 1 S 17^{25} 18^{24}, 2 S 3^{14}). From Dt 22^{29} we may probably infer that an average mōhar was 50 shekels of silver (see Driver, ad loc.)

So firmly established is the custom in the East of giving a present upon certain occasions that the latter is demanded as a right. Lane (Modern Egyptians, Gardner’s ed. p. 168) mentions that while male servants at Cairo are paid very small wages (from four to eight shillings a month), they receive many presents from their master as well as from his visitors and from the tradespeople with whom he deals. An Oriental servant, on quitting his master’s service, always expects not only his wages but a present as well, in token of friendship and satisfaction. This rule holds good from the lowest menials up to the highest officials. (For interesting examples see Trumbull, Oriental Social Life, 327 ff.). This practice may throw light upon the asking (not ‘borrowing’) by the Israelites of jewels of gold and silver, etc., from the Egyptians (Ex 11^{2} 12^{35}), although it is more than doubtful whether it accounts for the possession by the people of such stores of gold as are said to have been used in the construction of the Tabernacle of the Priestly Code.

Many of the usages connected with ‘gifts’ cluster round marriage. Abraham’s servant gave a present to Rebekah when he went to woo her on behalf of Isaac (Gn 24^{22}). After the conclusion of a marriage contract, Lane tells us, presents are expected by various functionaries connected with the different families. Presents are sent to the bridegroom’s house by his friends and by all who are invited to the wedding. The bride’s presents, including her trousseau, are sometimes borne in procession to her home in advance of her going to the house of her husband, or they are borne before her upon that occasion (Trumbull, op. cit. 44). At his first interview with his bride after the marriage ceremony, the bridegroom makes her a present of money, which is called ‘the price of the uncovering of the face.’ A marriage-portion (שִׁלֻּחִים) might be given to the bridegroom by the father of the bride (1 K 9^{16} Pharaoh and Solomon, cf. Jg $1^{14\text{f.}}$ Caleb and Othniel).

In the East friends frequently send presents to one another, but no pretence is ever made that a quid pro quo is not expected. David was as little disinterested when he sent a ‘present’ to the elders of Judah (1 S 30^{26}) as Ephron the Hittite was sincere in his offer to give the cave of Machpelah gratis to Abraham (Gn 23^{11}). The ‘gift’ expected from Nabal (1 S 25^{8}) was really a species of blackmail.

The power of a gift to propitiate one has always been recognized. Jacob made sure of appeasing Esau by the present he sent before him (Gn 32^{20}). The same notion was transferred to one’s dealings with God, δῶρα θεοὺς πείθει, δῶρ’ αἰδοίους βασιλῆας (Hes. ap. Plat. Rep. 390 E). Gifts were offered in homage to God (Mal 1^{3}), or to procure His favour or support. A prayer would often take the form of a conditional vow, ‘If J″ will be with me, I will offer so and so to Him’ (e.g. Jg 11^{30} Jephthah, Gn $28^{20\text{ff.}}$ Jacob). The notion of propitiating the Deity by a gift comes out in David’s words to Saul, ‘If J″ hath stirred thee up against me, let him be gratified by an oblation,’ 1 S 26^{19}. It is true at the same time that the ‘gift theory’ of sacrifice does not furnish an adequate explanation of all the facts connected with even the ordinary oblations, much less with the holocaust, and least of all with human sacrifice (cf. W. R. Smith, RS 375).

The blinding effect of a ‘gift’ upon the administrators of justice is described in the above citations, Ex 23^{8}, Dt 16^{19}. Bribery of judges has always been common in the East. Lane (Modern Egyptians, p. 103 ff.) gives a remarkable instance of its occurrence in the court of the Ḳâḍi at Cairo. Felix expected a bribe from St. Paul, Ac 24^{26}.

A ‘gift’ in OT times sometimes took the form of sending ‘portions’ (מָנוֹת) from a feast to friends or to the poor, Est $9^{19.\,22}$, Neh $8^{10.\,12}$ (cf. Rev 11^{10}). The most honoured of the guests present received the largest and finest portion (Gn 43^{34}, 1 S 1^{4} 9^{23}; cf. Iliad, vii. 321, viii. 162, xii. 310; Odyssey, iv. 65 f., xiv. 437; Diod. v. 28).

In the NT we find the Philippians singled out for commendation for the ‘gift’ (δόμα) which they sent once and again to St. Paul’s need (Ph $4^{16\text{f.}}$).

* In Eph 4^{8}, as is well known, St. Paul gives a peculiar turn to this passage, his ἔδωκεν δόματα τοῖς ἀνθρώποις corresponding as little to the LXX ἔλαβες δόματα ἐν ἀνθρώπῳ as to the MT לָקַחְתָּ מַתָּנוֹת בָּאָדָם. This is not the place to examine the legitimacy or the motives of the apostle’s procedure. A full discussion of the whole question will be found in Meyer, ad. loc. (cf. Driver, Expositor, Jan. 1889, p. 20 ff.). See also art. QUOTATIONS.

GIHON (גִּיחוֹן, Γηών, Gehon).—One of the four rivers of Paradise (Gn 2^{13}). If Eden is Edin, the 'Plain' of Babylonia, we must look for the Gihon in one of the rivers which in early days flowed into what the Babylonians called 'the salt river,' or Persian Gulf, close to the garden of Eridu, where grew the sacred tree of Bab. tradition. As two of the rivers were the Tigris and the Euphrates, our choice of the other two is limited. The G. compassed 'the whole land of Cush,' the Kassi or Kassites of the cuneiform inscriptions, whose original seat was in W. Elam, from whence they descended into Chaldæa, and there founded a dynasty of kings. The G. would seem, therefore, to have been the Kerkhah of modern maps (see EDEN). In Jer 2^{18} the Sept. substitutes Gihon (Γηών) for Sihor, the Nile, in consequence of a belief that had arisen among the Jews that the Cush of Gn 2^{13} was the African Ethiopia (see note ad loc. in Streane, Double Text of Jeremiah). In Sir 24^{27} the Gihon is introduced metaphorically into a description of wisdom.

GIHON (גִּיחוֹן).—A spring near Jerusalem (1 K $1^{33.\,38.\,45}$). Hezekiah 'stopped the upper spring of the waters of Gihon and brought them straight down on the west side of the city of David' (2 Ch 32^{30}). Manasseh 'built an outer wall to the city of David, on the west side of Gihon in the [torrent] valley' (2 Ch 33^{14}). These indications suffice to show that Gihon was in the Kidron ravine. The name ('bursting forth') and the notice of the aqueduct (see SILOAM) show that the spring now called the 'Virgin's Fountain' is intended. See BETHESDA, ENROGEL.

GILALAI (גִּלֲלַי).—A Levitical musician (Neh 12^{36}).

GILBOA (גִּלְבֹּעַ always with article except in 1 Ch $10^{1.\,8}$; LXX Γελβοῦε; meaning uncertain. For early explanations see Lagarde's Onom. Sacra, pp. 35, 180, 189).—A range of hills, now known locally as Jebel Fuḳûʽa, forming an arc of a circle to the E. of the plain of Esdraelon, and extending from Zerʽin first S.E. and then S. The range consists of limestone, mixed in the northern and western parts with chalk, the wearing away of which has caused rugged channels. The highest and steepest part is on the N. side, just where it begins to bend south. Here it rises to a height of more than 2000 ft. above the valley of the Jordan (i.e. about 1700 ft. above sea-level). Towards the S. the sides slope more gradually, and sink to a height of a few hundred feet. As the plain on the W. is 300 ft. above, and the Jordan Valley is the same number of feet below sea-level, Gilboa is much more imposing on the east than on the west. The W. side is drained by the Kishon, one of the sources of which is on its slopes; the N. side by the Nahr Jalud, which rises near Zerʽin and flows to the Jordan; the E. side by small streams running down to the Jordan Valley. Except on the lowest parts of the W. side the range is devoid of vegetation. At the present time there are two or three small villages on the slopes. One of them, Jelbun, still preserves a reminiscence of the ancient name of the hill. Zerʽin is the old Jezreel, while Conder thinks that Fuḳûʽa is possibly Aphek, and Mujeddʽa at the eastern foot of the range the probable site of Megiddo.

Gilboa is mentioned in OT only in connexion with the camp of the Philistines and the death of Saul (1 S 28^{4} $31^{1.\,8}$, 2 S $1^{6.\,21}$ 21^{12}, 1 Ch $10^{1.\,8}$). Saul and the Israelites went from Gilboa to the fountain which is in Jezreel. Near it they were defeated by the Philistines, and on its slopes they fell down wounded, and Saul and Jonathan were slain. But though mentioned so seldom, Gilboa, being the eastern boundary of the great battlefield of Palestine (cf. ESDRAELON), has at all times played an important part in the history of the country from the days of Saul to those of Saladin and Napoleon.

GILEAD (גִּלְעָד).—1. The 'son' of Machir (son of Manasseh) in Nu 27^{1} 36^{1}, Jos 17^{3} (all P), 1 Ch 7^{17}, as conversely Machir is said to have 'begotten' Gilead in Nu 26^{29}, and is called the 'father' of Gilead in 1 Ch $2^{21.\,23}$ 7^{14}. The eponymous ancestor of the district called Gilead (which see). An analogous personification no doubt underlies the statement (Jg 11^{1}) that 'Gilead begat Jephthah' (viz. by an illegitimate wife). 'Gilead is the name of a region or of its population (Jg 5^{17}), not of a man' (Moore, ad loc.), and a piece of tribal history is related (as sometimes happens in the OT) as though it were the domestic history of an individual; Jephthah's relations with the other inhabitants of Gilead being represented (v.^{2}) as his relations with the legitimate sons of his father Gilead. See further MANASSEH. 2. A Gadite, the son of Michael, 1 Ch 5^{14}.

S. R. DRIVER.

GILEAD (גִּלְעָד, Γαλαάδ).—This name is applied to persons, to a tribe or family (Nu 36^{1}), to a particular city (Hos 6^{8}),* to a mountain, and to a district east of the Jordan, whose dimensions varied somewhat when spoken of by different writers. It appears first in the account of Jacob (Gn 31^{25}), and thereafter is of frequent occurrence during the entire period of biblical history. As a geographical term it was still in use in the time of Josephus.

The present article is to deal with Gilead as a division of the Holy Land, its physical features, its geographical limits, and its historical associations.

From the mountains of Western Pal. the entire length of G. can be seen, and a large portion of its territory brought under the eye at once. It appears thence like a vast mountain range, varying from 3000 to 4000 ft. in height. To make up this height the depression of the Jordan Valley is reckoned, which is from 700 to 1300 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. The summit of this range does not rise into peaks, but is pretty uniformly level. Valleys, wooded sections, and bold headlands are noticed, which give the impression that the country is wild and rugged. On the other hand, if from any point in the plain of Bashan, which bounds G. on the east, one looks westward to this range, he sees only a long line of low picturesque hills. The reason is that Bashan is a plateau rising 2000 or more feet above the sea-level. From this point no one would think of describing G. as 'rough and rugged.' Again, when one comes to travel through G. in different directions, he finds himself in the midst of charming natural scenery, where streams, springs, and forests, rich fields, gentle slopes, and quiet valleys attract the eye. Thus, according to the point of view of the observer, three very different descriptions of this region can be given, each having the merit of apparent accuracy.

The etymology of the word as given by Gesenius and Fuerst, viz. 'hard, stony region, rocky mountain,' does not indicate the character of the country; certain limited sections might be thus described, but outside of these G. is in the main a fertile and beautiful country. Josephus (Wars, III.

* Possibly also in Jg 10^{17}. For Gilead of Hos 6^{8} some MSS of the LXX, which belong to the Luc. recension, read Gilgal (Γάλγαλα), which Nowack considers (comparing 4^{15} 9^{15} 12^{12}) worthy of consideration. See further Dillmann on Gn 31^{54}.

iii. 3) says that 'it is not favourable for the growth of delicate fruits,' but that does not invalidate the statement just made as to its general character.

In the conquest of the east Jordan country by Moses and Joshua (Nu 21), G. is not mentioned, although the sections as conquered one after another can be pretty clearly defined. Attention to these details will help us in fixing its geographical limits. Occasionally G. was used so as to include the entire country between Hermon on the north and the river Arnon on the south (Jos 22^{9}), but generally the region south of Heshbon and the north end of the Dead Sea, i.e. the territory of Reuben, was not included, and in the opposite direction the south end of the Sea of Galilee was its northern limit. The Jordan was its western boundary, and the eastern was the point where the hills meet the Bashan plain.

The entire country was called Amorite, with the exception of the district about Rabbath of the children of Ammon (Amman), the Upper Jabbok, which was not then conquered. Sihon was crushed at Jahaz, south of Heshbon (Nu 21^{23}), but the Jazer region, north of Heshbon, held out, and required a special expedition to subdue it (Nu 21^{32}). The third step was the successful battle with Og at Edrei, far to the N.E. of Jazer (Nu 21^{33}). The three final steps in the conquest of the northern portion of the country are mentioned in connexion with Machir, Jair, and Nobah (Nu 32^{40-42}).

In the division of the territory between the two and a half tribes the phrase 'half Gilead' occurs several times. Half belonged to Gad and half to Manasseh (Dt 3^{13}, Jos 13^{31}). G. had previously been divided in the same way between the two kings Sihon and Og (Jos $12^{2.5}$). The Hebrews simply retained, it appears, the old distinction. The suggestion has been made that the valley of the Jabbok should be the line dividing the two sections; but the objections to this view are serious, first, because this valley would not divide G. into halves; secondly, it would give to the tribe of Gad a small territory, and to Manasseh a very large one, whereas the number of warriors in these two tribes was about equal, requiring a more equal distribution of land.

The two and a half tribes may have differed in their tastes from their brethren, for they seem to have been exceptionally rich in cattle, and these wide pasture lands appealed to them as desirable for their future home (Nu 32^{1}). The present writer having lived in that region for months, and travelled through it in many directions, has often been impressed with its attractiveness, in contrast, for instance, with the rocky hills of Judæa. Its natural beauties, of many varieties, form landscape pictures which it is delightful to recall.

It is no wonder that these tribes were eager to call these lands their own. The portion of the Jordan Valley which belonged to G. was of such fertility that it might easily be made one of the gardens of the world. Streams descended from the hills; there were numerous fountains of sweet cool water, and copious sulphur springs existed in the valley at several different points (Merrill, East of the Jordan, pp. 143, 178, 183, 430). The great valleys of G. were likewise celebrated. Not to mention that of Heshbon on the south, there was that of the Jabbok, Zerka, famous in connexion with the history of Jacob; the Menadireh, near the south end of the Sea of Galilee, having a stream nearly equal to the Jordan in size; also Yabis and 'Ajlun, along the latter of which ran the great road between Shechem and Ramoth-gilead.

Among the principal cities of G. were Mahanaim, Succoth, Penuel, Mizpeh, Jazer (which was one of the census stations when David numbered the people—an evidence of its central position and importance), Jabesh-gilead, Ramoth-gilead (which was a city of refuge, Jos 20^{8}), and, in later times, Pella, Gerasa, and several others of the cities of the Decapolis. Of the three commissariat officers of Solomon who were assigned to the country east of the Jordan, two were stationed in Gilead proper—one at Ramoth, and the other at Mahanaim (1 K $4^{13.14}$). It is noticeable that four of its chief cities had the name Gilead affixed to them, viz. Ramoth, Jabesh, Mizpeh, and Jazer (1 Ch 26^{31}).

G. was to Pal. a sort of bulwark on its eastern border against invading armies from the south, east, and north, and it was a wise providence that planted there the most warlike tribes, ever ready to defend the national life (Jos 17^{1}, 1 Ch 5^{18}). As if in keeping with this idea, much of the history of G. which has a conspicuous place in the biblical records has to do with wars, partly of conquest and partly of defence against powerful enemies. At one time the Hebrews had conquered all the desert tribes lying to the east of them, and had occupied their lands (1 Ch 5). The Ammonites, who for a long time had resisted the invaders, were at last, under Jephthah, thoroughly subdued, and twenty of their strongest cities taken from them (Jg $11^{32.33}$). The same hero, partly by bravery and partly by a curious stratagem, gained a great victory over the Ephraimites (Jg 12). It was on the soil of G. that Gideon swept back to their desert home the routed hosts of Midian (Jg 8). Here occurred the fierce battle between the army of David and that of Absalom, in which the latter lost his life (2 S 18). Furthermore, at the national stronghold, Ramoth-gilead, battle after battle was fought for its ownership. The Syrians of Damascus had captured it, and an attempt to regain it cost Ahab his life. A little later Joram succeeded in wresting it from the enemy, and held it against the powerful assaults of Hazael the Syrian king (2 K 9^{14}). Once, indeed, and probably on several other occasions during their history, the strength of the brave inhabitants was broken by invading armies from Assyria, and, according to custom, Tiglath-pileser carried them away captive (1 Ch 5^{26}). See George Smith, Assyrian Eponym Canon, ch. vi. on 'Assyrian Notices of Palestine,' pp. 106–150.

Another phase of interest attaching to G. was that it was a refuge for royalty. It was here that Saul's son Ish-bosheth was made king by Abner (2 S $2^{8.9}$). Thither Absalom fled when he feared the anger of his father, and there he remained three years (2 S 13^{38}). David, in turn, found an asylum among its friendly inhabitants when the rebellion of Absalom was at its height (2 S 17^{27-29}).

G., however, was not always a scene of conflict, for some of the pleasantest incidents of sacred history are connected with it. It was the place of reconciliation between Jacob and Laban, when the memorable words were uttered, 'The Lord watch between me and thee when we are absent one from another' (Gn 31^{49}). No less characteristic and beautiful, taking all its incidents, was Jacob's reconciliation with Esau (Gn 33). When the brave men of Jabesh-gilead risked their lives to recover the bodies of Saul and his sons from the enemy, and from terrible disgrace, there was displayed in that act the highest type of both loyalty and humanity (1 S 31^{11-13}). The kindnesses shown by the people of G. to David in the hour of his sore extremity were the expression of true-hearted pity for their humiliated king; and a little later Barzillai's leave-taking of him on the banks of the Jordan was surpassingly tender (2 S 17^{27-29} $19^{31ff.}$). Again, we see Elijah, the greatest prophet of OT, coming forth from his home in the Gilead hills (1 K 17^{1}), and taking a foremost place among the spiritual leaders of the world. Still later and brighter we find our Lord making to this region at least two interesting visits; and not long after His death, when the armies of Rome were at the gates of Jerus., we find the Christians of the Holy City, now doomed to destruction, taking refuge in Pella, at that time one of Gilead's most attractive cities (Euseb. HE iii. 5).

In the history and struggles of the Maccabæan period G. played an important part; and later, during the Roman occupation, its natural resources were highly developed. These, even in the present degraded condition of the country, are seen to be great, and, under more favourable conditions of government than now exist, a wonderful degree of prosperity might easily be restored to ancient Gilead. S. MERRILL.

GILEAD, BALM OF.—See BALM.

GILEAD, MOUNT (הַר הַגִּלְעָד).—In Jg 7³, when Gideon, before his conflict with the Midianites, is about to reduce the number of the people with him, there occur the words, 'Whosoever is fearful and trembling, let him return and make a circuit (?)* from Mount Gilead.' Gideon's men are encamped (see v.¹) on the N. or N.W. spur of Gilboa; and as Gilead, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, was on the East of Jordan, it becomes a question what is here meant. (1) Studer (Comm. ad loc.) supposed that as the Midianites lay in the Vale of Jezreel, N. of Gilboa, between the men of Asher, etc. (6³⁵), and their homes, they were bidden to cross the Jordan, and so, by a circuit through Mt. Gilead, evade the enemy. If such were the author's meaning, it would be very obscurely and indirectly expressed. (2) Le Clerc (1708) proposed to read 'from Mount Gilboa' for 'from Mount Gilead'; and this reading is adopted by Hitz., Berth., Keil (alternatively), Grätz, Reuss, and others. The mention of the spot on which the host was encamped has been deemed 'superfluous' (Stud.). Yet the narrator (who, it is to be remembered, really penned the sentence) may have thus specified it for the sake of emphasis. (3) The Vale N. of Gilboa is now called the Nahr Jalûd, and there is a spring, 'Ain Jalûd, issuing forth from the foot of Mt. Gilboa, about 1¾ miles E.S.E. of Zerin (Jezreel), and probably the 'Spring of Ḥarod' of Jg 7¹; and it is possible that the part of the Gilboa range on which Gideon's men were, may have been called 'Mount Gilead'; there are cases in which the original ע is not preserved in a modern name (cf. Keil [altern.], G. A. Smith, Geogr. p. 398 n.). (4) Moore emends וַיִּצְרְפֵם גִּדְעוֹן: 'Let him return. And Gideon tried them; and there returned,' etc. But 'let him return' is rather abrupt (contrast Dt 20⁸); and try (test), in spite of v.⁴, is not altogether suitable in v.³. On the whole, (2) seems the most probable. S. R. DRIVER.

GILEADITES.—By this term a branch of the tribe of Manasseh is first meant, and the order of descent appears to have been: Manasseh the father of Machir, the father of Gilead, 'of whom came the family of Gileadites' (גִּלְעָדִי Nu 26²⁹). Secondly, the inhabitants of the district are likewise thus called, and for this purpose the phrase 'men of Gilead' is also employed (אַנְשֵׁי ג׳ Jg 12⁴). Jair (Jg 10³), Jephthah (Jg 11¹), and Barzillai, who befriended David (2 S 17²⁷), are specially mentioned as 'Gileadites.' Sometimes the name of the district, גִּלְעָד, is rendered 'Gileadite,' as in Jg 12⁵. In mentioning the cause of the war between Gilead and Ephraim, a peculiar charge is made against the Gileadites which it is difficult to explain (Jg 12⁴). Evidently, bitter reproach or supreme contempt was meant, and the charge or insinuation was resented with great violence and bloodshed. S. MERRILL.

GILGAL (גִּלְגָּל 'a circle' of stones, 'a cromlech,' always with the article, except Jos 5⁹, where a theory of the origin of the name is given. LXX has generally Γάλγαλα in the plur. (Jos 4¹⁹· ²⁰ 5⁹ 10⁷, 1 S 13¹⁵ etc. etc.), but also in the sing., τὴν Γάλγαλα (1 S 7¹⁶), τῆς Γάλγαλα (1 S 10⁸ A, B has Γαλαάδ); for the sing. indeclinable form Γαλγάλ see Jos 14⁶ (B) 15⁷ (A, B has Τααγάδ), Hos 9¹⁵ etc. These forms are used indifferently in reference to the same Gilgal. Vulg. Galgala, always in the plural).

Three distinct Gilgals are indicated by the references. 1. A place between Jericho and the Jordan (Jos 4¹⁹), בִּקְצֵה מִזְרַח יְרִחוֹ 'in the extreme east of Jericho, i.e. on the eastern border of its territory' (Gesenius). It was the first camp of the Isr. after crossing the Jordan (Jos 4¹⁹). Twelve memorial stones taken from the bed of the river were here erected (v.²⁰). Circumcision of those born in the wilderness (5²⁻⁹), consequently the place called Gilgal in memory of the rolling away (גלל) of the reproach of Egypt (v.⁹). The passover celebrated (v.¹⁰). The manna ceases (v.¹²). Joshua returns every night to this camp during the siege of Jericho (6¹¹). The Gibeonites make their treaty with Joshua here (9³⁻¹⁵). They ask aid from Joshua at Gilgal against the league of the five kings of the Amorites (10⁶). Joshua ascends with the men of war (v.⁷), and after a successful battle returns to the camp (v.¹⁵). After taking Makkedah (v.²⁸), Libnah (v.²⁹), Lachish (v.³²), Eglon (v.³⁵), Hebron (v.³⁷), and Debir (v.³⁸), and after smiting his enemies from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza, he returns again to Gilgal (v.⁴³). After completing the northern campaign, culminating in the great battle against the allied kings at the waters of Merom, Joshua is again found at Gilgal (14⁶), where he assigns by lot the inheritance of Manasseh, Judah, and Ephraim. The inference is that Gilgal was the central camp for the people, not only during the nearer campaigns, but 'until the land rested from war' (11²³). In 18³ we find the whole congregation assembling at Shiloh, where the other lots were granted.

A Gilgal appears prominently in the history of Saul and Samuel. It was one of the places where Samuel judged the people in his yearly circuit, which included Mizpah and Bethel. These three places are called sacred in the LXX (1 S 7¹⁶ τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις τούτοις). It was clearly one of the central places for sacrifice (10⁸ 13⁹⁻¹⁰ 15²¹); and here Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord (15³³). Here Saul was crowned (11¹⁴⁻¹⁵), and rejected as king (15²⁶). Though it is not certain that this is the Gilgal of the camp, it is placed here, as the following points favour the identification:—(1) References are made to going down to Gilgal from the hill-country (10⁸ and 15¹²), and up to Gibeah (13¹⁵). (2) The sacredness of the spot may have been due to the setting up of the twelve stones. We may also notice that while Saul was in Gilgal in fear of the Philistines, many Hebrews crossed the Jordan to Gad and Gilead.

* The word is a ἅπ. λεγ., and the meaning is far from certain. No root צפר, to go round, is known in either Heb. or the cognate languages. צפר in the Mishna, and ضفر in Arab., are to braid, plait; hence צְפִירָה, Is 28⁵, a plaited garland or chaplet (Aq. Theod. πλέγμα), and in the Mishna the plaited rim of a basket. The only support for a verb צפר to go round would be either (1) the assumption that it was the root of צְפִירָה in the obscure passage Ezk 7⁷ (in v.¹⁰ the sense chaplet suffices), supposing—what is anything but certain—that it there means the round (of fate), or the turn (of fortune—καταστροφή); or (2) the supposition that it was a denominative from צְפִירָה garland, regarded simply as something forming a circle. It is evident how hypothetical either of these etymologies is. Arab. ضفر means also to leap in running, to bound or run quickly; hence Siegfried-Stade, to spring away. It is, no doubt, possible that the root may have been in use in Heb. in this sense. AV depart early (denom. from the Aram. צַפְרָא morning) is quite out of the question.

The Gilgal of the camp is plainly mentioned in 2 S 19[15], where the people assemble at Gilgal to conduct David back over Jordan on his return from exile.

The Gilgal of Hos 4[15] 9[15] 12[11] and Am 4[4] 5[5] (in connexion with Bethel), evidently a place whose sanctity had been violated, seems to be the Gilgal mentioned above as a central place of worship, and is placed under this head for the reasons given. It may be identical with the Beth-gilgal of Neh 12[29].

The Gilgal of Jos 15[7] also should be here, as it is placed in Benjamin near the north border of Judah, over-against the going up of Adummim, which has been identified with the peak Ṭala'at ed-Dumm, south of the Wady el-Kelt, about halfway from Jericho to Jerusalem. [Driver thinks this impossible. See GELILOTH]. In the parallel passage, 18[17], it is called Gelîlôth (גְּלִילוֹת). There has been much dispute as to the identity of the Gilgal of Dt 11[30], but upon the whole it should most probably be placed here (see the very careful note by Driver, ad loc., also 2nd ed. p. xxi; and G. A. Smith, HGHL, App. 675; Buhl, GAP 202).

This Gilgal is to be looked for between Jericho and the Jordan. In 1865 Zschokke heard the name Jiljûlieh applied to a mound or tell near the tamarisk, Sejeret el-Ithleh, 4½ miles from the Jordan and 1⅓ miles from modern Jericho. In 1874 Conder recovered the same name, as applied to a birket or pool near the tree. According to Jos. (Ant. v. i. 4), Galgala is 10 stadia from Jericho and 50 from the Jordan. The former distance corresponds very well with the position of the birket. The distance of 50 stadia is impossible, as the plain is only from 50 to 52 stadia wide at this part, but reading 30 (λ') for 50 (ν') we get the distance from the Jordan at once, 3½ miles, which corresponds better to the position of Birket Jiljûlieh. In the 4th cent. Jerome (see 'Galgala' in the Onomasticon) describes it as a deserted spot, 2 miles from Jericho, held in great veneration by the inhabitants of the region. Whether the twelve stones were still pointed out is not clear, as the expression in the Epitomæ Paulæ (§ 12), 'Intuita est castra Galgalæ et secundæ circumcisionis mysterium et duodecim lapides,' may mean considered, and not beheld. Arculf (A.D. 700) saw a Galgalis, 5 miles from Jericho, with a large church covering the twelve stones of commemoration. Willibald (c. 730) mentions a moderately-sized church of wood, and places Galgala 5 miles from the Jordan, which he says is 7 miles from Jericho. In the 13th and 14th cent. the stones are mentioned by Thietmar and Ludolf de Suchem respectively. Thus the site of the Birket Jiljûlieh corresponds very well to the description of Josephus, Jerome, and Willibald. Hence the early Christian tradition may have been based on an older Jewish identification.

The birket measures 100 ft. by 84, outside measurement, with walls 32 in. thick, constructed of roughly-hewn small stones, apparently without cement. North of the pool may be traced lines of similar masonry, covering, according to the present writer's observations, a space 300 yards long, and apparently representing the foundations of three constructions. Conder sees here the ruins of a monastery. South and east of the pool there are 25 mounds, scattered irregularly over an area ⅓ of a mile square.* These are all small, the largest measuring about 50 ft. in diameter and 10 ft. in height. Two of these mounds show superficial traces of ruins, the rest being mere heaps of earth. Ganneau excavated two: the first revealed pottery, tesseræ, and glass, the second merely sand. Conder recovered from the natives a tradition which connected this site with a City of Brass, taken from the infidels by a great Imâm, who rode around the city and blew at the walls, which fell. Conder thus sums up (Mem. PEF, vol. iii. p. 173): Birket Jiljûlieh appears to be the early Christian site; there is nothing against its being the original one.

2. Another Gilgal is mentioned in 2 K 2[1] and 4[38] in the history of Elijah and Elisha. From 4[38] we cannot assume that it was a seat of a school of prophets, as these may have come from Bethel (cf. 2[3]). There is a large modern village called Jiljilîe, on the top of a high hill, about 8 miles N.W. of Bethel, from which it is separated by the great Wady el-Jîb (Mem. PEF, vol. ii. p. 290). It is 450 ft. lower than Bethel, but the descent into this valley may account for the statement that Elijah and Elisha went down to Bethel. This expression rules out the Gilgal of the Jordan valley.

3. In Jos 12[23] the king of the Nations of (RV Goiim in) Gilgal (מֶלֶךְ־גּוֹיִם לְגִלְגָּל, LXX Γεεὶ τῆς Γαλειλαίας, adopted by Dillm.) is named among the conquered kings, in the part of the enumeration following the maritime plain from north to south. The name occurs immediately after Dor, the modern Tantura. About 30 miles S.S.E. of Tantura there is the modern village of Jiljûlieh, which may be on the site of this Gilgal. F. J. BLISS.

GILOH (גִּלֹה). Driver [Text of Sam. p. 241] points out that the gentilic גִּילֹנִי implies that the original form was גִּלֹן, from the root גִּיל or גּוּל, not from גָּלָה).—A city in the southern hills of Judah (Jos 15[51]), the birthplace of Ahithophel the Gilonite, the famous counsellor of David (2 S 15[12] 23[34]). Its site is uncertain. There is a ruin called Jâla on the hills N.W. of Hebron. See SWP, vol. iii. sh. xxi. C. R. CONDER.

GIMEL (ג).—The third letter of the Heb. alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 3rd part, each verse of which begins with this letter. It is transliterated in this Dictionary by g.

GIMZO (גִּמְזוֹ; cf. Assyr. proper name Gamuzanu [Pinches, Hebraica, July 1886, p. 222]).—A town noticed with Aijalon and other places on the border of Philistia (2 Ch 28[18]). It is the modern Jimzu near Aijalon. See SWP, vol. iii. sh. xvii.; Robinson, BRP^{2} ii. 249; Baedeker-Socin, Pal. 21. C. R. CONDER.

GIN.—Two Heb. words are so tr^{d} in AV: (1) פַּח paḥ in Job 18[9], Is 8[14], and מוֹקֵשׁ môḳêsh in Ps 140[5] 141[9], Am 3[5], Job 40[24] AVm. The usual tr^{n} of both words is 'snare.' As Driver shows, however (Joel and Amos, on Am 3[5]), the paḥ is the snare, the môḳêsh something without which the snare is useless, perhaps the bait. See SNARE.

In the 1611 ed. of AV the word is spelt 'ginne' in Is 8[14], Am 3[5], Job 40[24m]; but in Job 18[9], Ps 140[5] 141[9] the spelling is 'grinne.' 'Grinne' was changed in 1613 to 'grin'; Dr. Paris in his ed. of 1762 cast out the r, and the word has been 'gin' ever since. But 'gin' and 'grin' are not the same. 'Grin,' from Anglo-Sax. grin or gryn, has many forms in Middle-Eng. (Wyclif's Bible, 1382, shows grene, grane, gryn, grynne), and does mean a 'trap.' 'Gin' is probably a contraction of 'engine' (Fr. engin), which comes from Lat. ingenium and is used of any ingenious contrivance. A trap, however, is a contrivance, and so the words got mixed in spelling and in meaning.

In early writers 'gin' is used both abstractly of a contrivance, device, and concretely of an instrument contrived for war, torture, or the like. Thus Piers Plowman, (B) xviii. 250—

---

* For plan see p. 182, PEFSt, 1894.

> 'For gygas the geaunt with a gynne engyned,' that is, 'For Gigas the giant with a contrivance contrived'; Spenser, FQ II. iii. 13—

> 'Which two, through treason and deceiptfull gin,
> Had slaine Sir Mordant and his lady bright.'

As an instrument of torture, FQ I. v. 35—

> 'Typhoeus joynts were stretched on a gin.'

The word 'grin' by and by went out of use, and 'gin' became restricted to the meaning of trap or snare. T. Fuller, Holy Warre, v. 1 (p. 247), says, 'Now Satan, the master-juggler, needeth no wires or ginnes to work with, being all ginnes himself; so transcendent is the activity of a spirit.' It was specially applied to snares for birds, as T. Adams, Works, i. 7, 'For hunting, they have nets; for fowling, gins; for fishing, baits'; and iii. 17, 'In the air, the birds fly high above our reach, yet we have gins to fetch them down.' J. HASTINGS.

GINATH (גִּינַת, Γάωνθ AB, Γωνώθ Luc.).—Father of Tibni, who unsuccessfully laid claim against Omri to the throne of Israel (1 K 16$^{21.\,22}$).

GINNETHOI, AV Ginnetho (גִּנְּתוֹי).—A priest among the returned exiles (Neh 12^{4}). The name appears in Neh 12^{16} 10^{6} as Ginnethon (גִּנְּתוֹן). See GENEALOGY.

GINNETHON.—See GINNETHOI.

GIRDLE.—See DRESS, vol. i. p. 626^{a}.

GIRGASHITE (in Heb. always sing. הַגִּרְגָּשִׁי 'the Girgashite,' and rightly so rendered in RV; in LXX and Josephus ὁ Γεργεσαῖος; in AV only twice in sing. Gn 10^{16}, 1 Ch 1^{14}; elsewhere plural, 'Girgashites').—Very little is known of this people, whose name, though occurring several times in OT in the list of Can. tribes [*] (Gn 10^{16} 15^{21}, Dt 7^{1} [and 20^{17} in Sam. and LXX], Jos 3^{10} 24^{11}, 1 Ch 1^{14}, Neh 9^{8}) affords no indication of their position, or to what branch of the Can. they belonged, except in two instances, namely, Gn 10^{16}, where the G. is given as the name of the fifth son of Canaan, and Jos 24^{11}, where the G. would seem to have inhabited the tract on the west of Jordan, the Isr. having been obliged to cross over that river in order to fight the men of Jericho, among whom were the Girgashites. It has been suggested that a town (now in ruins), near the mouth of the Wady Samakh, called Kersa, might be identified with Gergesa; the former being pronounced, it is said, nearly the same as the latter by the Bedawin. Gergesa contains, moreover, the same consonants as the Heb. גִּרְגָּשִׁי (Girgashi, LXX οἱ Γεργεσαῖοι; see GERASENES, p. 160^{a}), found in Gn 15^{21}, Dt 7^{1} etc., and, if the same word, would be the district or chief town of the G., which, according to Jerome and Eusebius (OS.^{2} p. 256, 14, p. 162, 18), was situated on a hill sloping steeply to the shore of the Sea of Galilee. There is, then, a probability that Girgashi, Kersa, and Gergesa (where our Lord healed the demoniac and allowed the demons to enter into a herd of swine which ran down the steep into the sea) are one and the same.

A fragment of an Assyr. tablet (K. 261, Brit. Mus.) possibly throws a ray of light on this people. In that text the Kirkišâti, possibly the Girgashites,[†] are mentioned more than once, in one case accompanied by the adjective rabbâti—'numerous.' These Kirkišâti seem to have been one of the nations attacked by an early ruler named Gazzâni (? father of Tidal). According to Origen (in Jo vi. 41), the Girgashites (οἱ Γεργεσαῖοι) were so called from an old town, on the shore of the lake, called Gergesa. This is hardly far enough east to make the Assyr.-Bab. Kirkišâti identical with the Girgashites, unless (as is possible) we suppose them (being a 'numerous' people) to have founded colonies in or near Mesopotamia; or that the Bab. ruler led an army all the way to the 'land of the Amorites,' as, in fact, many of the kings of Babylonia and Assyria are recorded to have done,—indeed, the 14th ch. of Gn not only states that the Bab. kings there mentioned went so far, but that one of their allies was Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, a country situated at a still greater distance. It is noteworthy that the Talmud contains a tradition of the G. appealing to Alexander the Great, during his sojourn in Palestine, complaining of having been banished from Canaan by the Jews, and asking justice. The existence of the G. at such a late period implies that they were, in early times, an important tribe or nationality, thus agreeing with what is stated in OT, and with the Assyr. reference to the Kirkišâti.

GIRZITE (Kethibh הַגִּרְזִי, Ḳerê הַגִּזְרִי, the Gizrite; B τὸν Γεσειρί, A τὸν Γεσερεὶ καὶ τὸν Γεζραῖον).—Acc. to 1 S 27^{8}, David and his men, while living at the court of Achish king of Gath, 'made a raid upon the Geshurites (which see), and the Girzites (RVm Gizrites), and the Amalekites: for those nations were the inhabitants of the land, which were of old, as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt.' The LXX (B) is probably correct in reading only one name 'Gizrites' for 'Geshurites and Girzites,' viz. the Canaanite inhabitants of Gezer, a town on the S.W. border of Ephraim (Jos 10^{33} 16$^{3.\,10}$, Jg 1^{29}), the modern Tell Jezer, between Emmaus ('Amwâs, Nicopolis) and Ekron ('Aḳir). The original population, which had not been driven out by the Ephraimites, retained its independence till the days of Solomon, when Pharaoh king of Egypt conquered the city, and gave it with his daughter to Solomon; the latter rebuilt it (1 K 9$^{15\text{-}17}$). See GEZER; and cf. Moore, Judges, p. 47 f.; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 215 f.

GISHPA, AV Gispa (גִּשְׁפָּא).—An overseer of the Nethinim (Neh 11^{21}), but text probably corrupt (cf. Berth.-Ryssel ad loc.). See GENEALOGY.

GITTAIM (גִּתַּיִם).—A town of Benjamin (?), 2 S 4^{3}, noticed with Hazor and Ramah, Neh 11^{33}. The site is unknown.

GIVE.—1. The verb [אָזַן] âzan, which is formed from אֹזֶן the ear, is used in the Hiphil, meaning 'to listen,' 41 times, and 32 times it is tr^{d} in AV 'give ear,' the other renderings being 'hearken' Gn 4^{23}, Nu 23^{18}, Job 9^{16} 33^{1} 34^{16} 37^{14}, 'hear' Ps 135^{17} 140^{6} (RV 'give ear'); 'give good heed' Ec 12^{9} (RV 'ponder,' RVm 'give ear'). Sometimes it is God that gives ear or is entreated to give ear, sometimes it is man. In Apocr. the phrase also occurs, 2 Es 8^{24} (auribus percipere); Wis 6^{2} (ἐνωτίζομαι); Sir 4^{15} (ὑπακούω), 6^{23} (ἀκούω). It is not found in NT. For the phrase cf. Marlowe, Faustus, V. iii. 'The devil threatened to tear me in pieces if I once gave ear to divinity; and now 'tis too late'; and Milton, PL ix. 1067—

> 'O Eve, in evil hour thou didst give ear
> To that false worm, of whomsoever taught
> To counterfet man's voice.'

2. The verb to 'give' is used with various substantives to form phrases, some of which are archaic and biblical, others obsolete. 1. Give attendance, 1 Ti 4^{13} 'give attendance to reading' (πρόσεχε, RV 'give heed'); He 7^{13} 'no man gave attendance at the altar' (προσέσχηκε). 2. Give heed, Wis 6^{18} 'the giving heed unto her laws' (προσοχή); 1 Ti 1^{4}, He 2^{1} (προσέχειν); cf. Ps 39^{2} Wyc. 1388, 'Y abidynge abood the Lord; and he gaf tent to me' (LXX προσέσχεν μοι). 3. Give diligence, 2 P 1^{5} 'giving all diligence' (σπουδὴν πᾶσαν παρεισενέγκαντες, RV 'adding all diligence'); 1^{10} 'give diligence' (σπουδάσατε); Jude ^{3} 'when I gave all diligence' (πᾶσαν σπουδὴν ποιούμενος). 4. Give audience, Ac 15^{12} (ἀκούω, RV 'hearken'); 22^{22} (ἀκούω, RV as AV). 5. Give reverence, He 12^{9} (ἐντρέπομαι). 6. Give occasion, Dt 22^{14} 'if a man take a wife . . . and give occasions of speech against her' (וְשָׂם לָהּ עֲלִילֹת דְּבָרִים; RV 'lay shameful things to her charge'; Driver, 'frame against her wanton charges'; the phrase, which is uncertain in meaning, is fully discussed by Driver, Deut. p. 254 f.), so 22^{17}, 2 Co 5^{12} (ἀφορμὴν διδόντες). 7. Give testimony, Sir 36^{15} 'Give testimony unto those that thou hast possessed from the beginning, and raise up prophets that have been in thy name' (δὸς μαρτύριον); Ac 13^{22} 'he raised up David to be their king; to whom also he gave testimony, and said' (ᾧ καὶ εἶπεν μαρτυρήσας, RV 'bare witness'); so 14^{3}. For 2 K 11^{12} 'And he brought forth the king's son, and put the crown upon him, and gave him the testimony' (אֶת־הָעֵדוּת, AV 1611 'the Testimonie'), see TESTIMONY. 8. Give witness, Job 29^{11} 'when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me' (וַתְּעִידֵנִי); Ac 10^{43} 'To him give all the prophets witness' (μαρτυροῦσιν, RV 'bear . . . witness'). 9. Give record, 1 Jn 5^{10} 'the record that God gave of his Son' (ἣν μεμαρτύρηκεν ὁ θεός, RV 'the witness that God hath borne concerning his Son'). 10. Give word, Ps 68^{11} 'The Lord gave the word' (אֲדֹנָי יִתֶּן־אֹמֶר, RV 'the Lord giveth the word'). 11. Give voice, Ps 18^{13} 'The Lord also thundered in the heavens, and the Highest gave his voice' (עֶלְיוֹן יִתֵּן קֹלוֹ, RV 'the Most High uttered his voice.' Cf. Gn 45^{2} AVm and RVm 'And he gave forth his voice in weeping' for text 'And he wept aloud,' Heb. וַיִּתֵּן אֶת־קֹלוֹ בִּבְכִי; and Jer 25^{30} Cov. 'He shal geve a greate voyce (like the grape gatherers)'; Ac 26^{10} 'when they were put to death, I gave my voice against them' (κατήνεγκα ψῆφον, RV 'gave my vote'). 12. Give commandment, Ex 25^{22} 'I will commune with thee . . . of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel' (אֲצַוֶּה אוֹתְךָ); 1 Ch 14^{12} 'And when they had left their gods there, David gave a commandment, and they were burned with fire' (וַיֹּאמֶר דָּוִיד, RV 'gave commandment'); Ezr 4^{21} 'Give ye now commandment to cause these men to cease' (שִׂימוּ טְעֵם, RV 'Make ye now a decree'); Ps 71^{3} 'thou hast given commandment to save me' (צִוִּיתָ); Jn 14^{31} 'as the Father gave me commandment, so I do' (TR ἐνετείλατό μοι, L Tr WH ἐντολὴν ἔδωκέν μοι); Ac 1^{2} (ἐντειλάμενος); 23^{30} (παραγγείλας, RV 'charging'); He 11^{22} (ἐνετείλατο). 13. Give charge, 2 S 18^{5} 'when the king gave all the captains charge' (בְּצַוּוֹת); Job 34^{13} 'Who hath given him a charge over the earth?' (פָּקַד עָלָיו, RV 'Who gave him a charge?'); Jer 47^{7} (צִוָּה־לָהּ); Mt 4^{6} 'He shall give his angels charge concerning thee' (ἐντελεῖται), so Lk 4^{10}; 1 Ti 5^{7} 'And these things give in charge'* (καὶ ταῦτα παράγγελλε, RV 'These things also command'); 6^{13} 'I give thee charge' (Παραγγέλλω σοι, RV 'I charge thee'). 14. Give judgment, 2 K 25^{6} 'and they gave judgment upon him' (וַיְדַבְּרוּ אִתּוֹ מִשְׁפָּט, AVm 'spake judgment with him,' RVm 'spake with him of judgment'); so Jer 39$^{5.9}$. Cf. Sir T. More, Utopia (Lumby's ed. p. 15), 'An other sorte sytteth upon their allebencheis, and there amonge their cuppes they geve judgment of the wittes of writers.' 15. Give sentence, Jer 4^{12} 'now also will I give sentence against them' (אֲדַבֵּר מִשְׁפָּטִים, RV as AVm 'utter judgments'); Lk 23^{24} 'Pilate gave sentence that it should be as they required' (ἐπέκρινε). 16. Give counsel, 2 S 17^{7} 'the counsel that Ahithophel hath given is not good at this time' (הָעֵצָה אֲשֶׁר־יָעַץ), so 1 K 12$^{8.13}$, 2 Ch 10^{8}. 17. Give assurance, Ac 17^{31} (πίστιν παρασχών). 18. Give place, (a) literally, Is 49^{20} 'give place to me that I may dwell' (גְּשָׁה־לִּי); Sir 29^{27} 'Give place, thou stranger, to an honourable man' (ἔξελθε, RV 'go forth'); Mt 9^{24} 'Give place: for the maid is not dead' (Ἀναχωρεῖτε); and (b) figuratively, Gal 2^{5} 'To whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour' (εἴξαμεν). Cf. Ro 12^{19}, Eph 4^{27}, and Babees Book (Early Eng. Text Soc.), p. 103—

[*] In the Hex. Girgashite is mentioned only by JE and D.

[†] See the remark upon the resemblance of the pronunciation of Kersa and Gergesa, above.

> 'Sit thou not in the highest place,
> Where the good man is present,
> But gyue him place: his maners marke
> Thou with graue aduysement.'

Knox in his 'Godly Letter to the Faithful in London' (Works, iii. 167), says, 'But, Deir Brethrene, be subject unto God, and gif place to his wraith, that ye may eschape his everlasting vengeance.' Cassius says to Brutus (Shaks. Jul. Cæs. IV. iii. 146)—

> 'Of your philosophy you make no use,
> If you give place to accidental evils.'

Tindale uses 'give room' in the same way, Prologe to the Pentateuch, 'Isaac, when his welles which he had digged were taken from him, geveth rowme and resisteth not.'

3. To 'give oneself to' is a phrase of occasional occurrence, representing various expressions in the original, but always implying energy or absorption in the pursuit spoken of. It occurs Ec 2^{3} 'I sought in mine heart to give myself unto wine' (לִמְשׁוֹךְ בַּיַּיִן אֶת־בְּשָׂרִי, lit., as AV, 'to draw my flesh with wine,' RV 'to cheer my flesh with wine'); Ac 6^{4} 'we will give ourselves continually to prayer' (προσκαρτερήσομεν, RV 'we will continue stedfastly in prayer'); 1 Co 7^{5} 'that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer' (TR ἵνα σχολάζητε τῇ νηστείᾳ καὶ τῇ προσευχῇ, edd. ἵνα σχολάσητε τῇ προσευχῇ, RV 'that ye may give yourselves unto prayer'); 1 Ti 4^{15} 'give thyself wholly to them (ἐν τούτοις ἴσθι). Sometimes the phrase is restricted to some part of the person, as the heart, Ec 1$^{13.17}$ 'I gave my heart to know wisdom,' Sir 39^{5}; or the mouth, Ps 50^{19} 'Thou givest thy mouth to evil' (פִּיךָ שָׁלַחְתָּ בְרָעָה). And then we have the frequent phrase given to, with the same meaning and used both of good and bad pursuits. The expressions in the original are as a rule much more forcible than the Eng. phrase. They are, Pr 23^{2} 'if thou be a man given to appetite' (אִם־בַּעַל נֶפֶשׁ אָתָּה, lit. 'if the owner of soul [=desire] thou'; so Ec 8^{8} 'given to it [wickedness]'); Pr 24^{21} 'meddle not with them that are given to change' (עִם־שׁוֹנִים 'changelings,' or perhaps, as Del., 'revolutionaries'); Jer 6^{13} 8^{10} 'given to covetousness' (בּוֹצֵעַ בָּצַע, lit. '[greedy] gainer of [greedy] gain'); 1 Es 2^{27} 'given to rebellion and war' (συντελοῦντες, lit. 'accomplishing'); Sir 17^{16} 'given to evil' (ἐπὶ τὰ πονηρά, RV omits); 19^{1} 'given to drunkenness' (μέθυσος, RV 'that is a drunkard'); Ac 17^{16} 'wholly given to idolatry' (κατείδωλον οὖσαν, RV 'full of idols'); Ro 12^{13} 'given to hospitality' (τὴν φιλοξενίαν διώκοντες, lit. 'pursuing hospitality,' as RVm); 1 Ti 3^{2} 'given to hospitality'

---

* Twice the phrase 'give in charge' occurs in Shaks. in the same sense of 'command,' but in a context which suggests the mod. meaning 'give charge of,' I Henry VI. II. iii. 1—

> 'Porter, remember what I gave in charge;
> And when you have done so, bring the keys to me';

Tempest, v. i. 8—

> 'How fares the king and 's followers?
> Confin'd together
> In the same fashion as you gave in charge,
> Just as you left them; all prisoners, sir.'

(φιλόξενος, lit. 'guest-loving'); 3^{3} 'given to wine' (πάνοινος, RV 'brawler'; so Tit 1^{7}); 3^{8} 'given to much wine' (οἴνῳ πολλῷ προσέχων); Tit 1^{7} 'given to filthy lucre' (αἰσχροκερδής, lit. 'basely greedy,' RV 'greedy of filthy lucre'); 2^{3} 'given to much wine' (οἴνῳ πολλῷ δεδουλωμένας, RV 'enslaved to much wine').

4. In the sense of grant, admit, 'give' is often found in writers of the date of AV. Thus Shaks. Winter's Tale, III. ii. 96—

> 'The crown and comfort of my life, your favour,
> I do give lost; for I do feel it gone';

and Milton, PL ii. 14—

> 'Though oppressed and fallen
> I give not heaven for lost.'

This idiom does not occur in AV, but closely associated with it is the sense of give leave to, seen in Mt 13^{11} 'Unto you it is given to know' (ὑμῖν δέδοται γνῶναι); and 1 Co 12^{3} 'I give you to understand' (γνωρίζω ὑμῖν, lit. 'I make known to you'), phrases which are as old as Wyclif, and in common use still. Cf. Milton, PL ix. 818—

> 'Shall I to him make known
> As yet my change, and give him to partake
> Full happiness with me, or rather not,
> But keep the odds of knowledge in my power
> Without copartner?'

There is a further extension of this sense in Job 24^{23} 'Though it be given him to be in safety,' i.e. though he be not merely permitted but enabled.

5. When followed by certain adverbs, 'give' is used in ways that are at least archaic now. (1) Give again=give back, restore, Lv $25^{51.52}$ (יָשִׁיב, RV 'give back'); Ezk 33^{15} 'If the wicked restore (יָשִׁיב) the pledge; give again (יְשַׁלֵּם, lit. 'make complete') that he had robbed . . . he shall surely live'; Lk 4^{20} 'And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister' (ἀποδούς, RV 'gave it back'). See AGAIN. (2) Give forth, Nu 20^{8} 'Speak ye unto the rock before their eyes; and it shall give forth his water' (נָתַן); Ac 1^{26} 'And they gave forth their lots' (ἔδωκαν). (3) Give out, Jos 18^{4} 'Give out from among you three men for each tribe' (='choose out,' which is Coverdale's tr^{n}, 'give out' is the Bishops' tr^{n}, Heb. הָבוּ לָכֶם, RV 'appoint for you'; in Dt 1^{13} the same phrase is tr^{d} 'take you' in both AV and RV; it occurs also in Jg 20^{7}, 2 S 16^{20}); Jer 4^{16} 'watchers come from a far country, and give out their voice against the cities of Judah' (יִתְּנוּ; cf. Mk 15^{37} Wyc. [1388], 'And Jhesus gaf out a greet cry, and diede'); Ac 8^{9} 'Giving out that himself was some great one' (λέγων, lit. 'saying,' as all previous Eng. versions, Vulg. dicens, but Luther gab vor). (4) Give over, always with the meaning 'surrender,' modern 'give up,' Ps 118^{18} $78^{50.62}$, Is 19^{4}, Sir 23^{6} 30^{21} 33^{20}, Ro 1^{28}, Eph 4^{19}. Cf. Pr. Bk., Collect for St. Andrew's Day (1559-1604), 'Grant unto us all, that we being called by thy holy word may forthwith give over ourselves obediently to follow thy holy commandments' (changed in 1662 into 'give up ourselves'). (5) Give up, 2 S 24^{9} 'And Joab gave up the sum of the number of the people unto the king' (וַיִּתֵּן)='delivered,' as most earlier versions (LXX ἔδωκεν, Vulg. dedit). J. HASTINGS.

GIZONITE (הַגִּזוֹנִי).—A gentilic name which occurs in 1 Ch 11^{34} in the colloc. הָשֵׁם הַגִּזוֹנִי 'Hashem the Gizonite.' In all probability this should be corrected to יָשֵׁן הַגּוּנִי 'Jashen (cf. the parallel passage 2 S 23^{32}) the Gunite' (so Klosterm., Budde, Driver, Kittel). The 'Gunite' (Nu 26^{48}) is confirmed by the reading of A and Luc. Γωυνι or Γουνι, and even by the meaningless Σομολογεννουνειν of B. See JASHEN.

GIZRITE.—See GIRZITE.

GLASS (זְכוּכִית, ὕαλος) is an artificial substance, fusible, usually more or less transparent or translucent, and composed of a mixture of metallic silicates. One of the metals present is always either potassium or sodium, the other being generally calcium or lead. Thus modern window glass contains the silicates of sodium and calcium, crown glass those of potassium and calcium, and flint glass those of potassium and lead. Other metals such as iron may be present, either accidentally as impurities, or designedly as colouring matters. Although the references to glass in Scripture are few, its manufacture is of high antiquity, and in the progress of civilization it has served many purposes both of use and ornament.

The origin of the art of glass-making is obscure. The account given by Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 25), of its accidental production through the melting of blocks of 'nitrum' employed by some sailors to support their caldron over a fire which they had made on the sands at the mouth of the river Belus in Syria, is well known but fabulous. The assertion, however, that no fire burning in the open air could possibly give rise to sufficient heat for the formation of glass, is incorrect, as crude glass is known to have been produced during the burning of a stack of wheat. But, even if Pliny's narrative were credible, the glass he describes, consisting of a single alkaline silicate, would have been soluble in water, and of no practical use. It is probable that the process of vitrification was first observed in the course of metallurgical operations. The art was widely known in the ancient world, and, while its origin may be difficult to localize, it is in Egypt that the earliest traces of it have hitherto been found. Glass-blowers are represented on the walls of the Tomb of Ti at Sakkhara, which dates from the 5th dynasty, and on many other tombs of later date, such as those at Beni-Hasan (Usertesen I., 12th dynasty, B.C. 3500). There is similar pictorial evidence that glass vases were used for wine in Egypt at least as early as the Exodus. Glass was also known in very ancient times in Assyria and Babylonia (see vol. i. p. 220a), and even in China.

The earliest glass was opaque or semi-opaque. The art of making it transparent was a later development; and even the first transparent glass was not colourless, but tinted. The oldest dated specimen of glass as yet known is a small ornament found at Thebes, in the shape of a lion's head. It is of opaque blue glass, and bears the name of Nu-Antef IV. (11th dynasty). Next to it comes an opaque glass jug of turquoise blue colour with yellow ornaments, having round the neck the name and titles of Tahutmes III. (18th dynasty). The oldest dated transparent glass known is a vase found by Layard at Nimroud, and bearing the name of Sargon (B.C. 722–705). (These objects are all in the British Museum. The first is figured in the Introduction to the Catalogue of glass objects in the South Kensington Museum, p. ix, the second in Wilkinson's Anc. Egyp. ii. 140, and the third in Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 197).

The sands at the mouth of the Belus, the scene of Pliny's legend, were famous for their glass-making excellence, and were largely exported for this purpose to Sidon and elsewhere (Strabo, Geog. XVI. ii. 25; Jos. Wars, II. x. 12). Pliny refers to Sidon as a famous seat of glass manufacture, and Strabo also mentions the glass-works of Alexandria. Glass has been made in Hebron since very early times, and the glass-works there are said to supply in modern times a large part of the glassware used in Southern Syria, Egypt, and Arabia.

The references to glass in OT are few, and only one is direct, viz. that in Job 28^{17}, where RV so renders זְכוּכִית (AV crystal), following LXX ὕαλος and Vulg. vitrum, the allusion being to a rare and valuable substance, than which wisdom is still more precious. From Pr 23^{31} it may be inferred that drinking-cups of transparent glass were used by the Hebrews. The phrase 'treasures hid in the sand,' in the blessing of Zebulun (Dt 33^{19}), is interpreted in the Targum of Ps-Jonathan as referring to the sands of the Belus with their glass-making properties. (See Driver, Deut. p. 410). It has been supposed that the name מִשְׂרְפֹת מַיִם 'burnings of waters' (Jos 11^{8} 13^{6}) may refer to glass-works, but the allusion may only be to the hot springs in the neighbourhood (for the various opinions and authorities see Keil, in loc.). There is a legend in the Koran (ch. 27) about a glass pavement in Solomon's palace at Jerus. which the queen of Sheba mistook for water. Recent excavations attest that glass was in use in Palestine at a very early date, and was most common during the Roman period (Warren, Underground Jerusalem, p. 518).

The Gr. word ὕαλος or ὕελος was applied by classical writers, not only to glass, but to mineral substances with similar properties (Herod. iii. 24; Achilles Tatius, ii. 3). Glass, indeed, was early used for making imitation gems (Pliny, xxxvi. 26), which Herodotus calls λίθινα χυτά (ii. 69). In NT ὕαλος and ὑάλινος are found only in Rev. The adj. is used in 4^6 15^2 of a sea; the noun occurs in $21^{18.21}$, gold being compared to it. In the former instances there may be an allusion to limpid transparency (in 4^6 the sea is ὁμοία κρυστάλλῳ, cf. 22^1), but in the latter, notwithstanding the adj. διαυγής in 21^{21}, the reference is obviously to brilliant lustre. Probably in all instances the point of the comparison is smoothness and sheen (in 15^2 the sea is μεμιγμένη πυρί, and in 22^1 the 'crystal' river is λαμπρός).

All other passages where glass occurs in AV refer to mirrors, and these were almost universally of polished metal. Pliny (Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 26) speaks of mirrors in connexion with the glass manufacture of Sidon, but his words seem to describe an unsuccessful experiment (see MIRROR). Windows in Pal. do not appear to have been glazed in ancient times, though glazed windows have been found in the ruins of Pompeii (Smith's Dict. Antiq. s.v. vitrum).

GLASS.—The word 'glass,' which is now colloquial Eng. for 'mirror,' occurs with this meaning in AV, both in OT and NT. In Is 3^{23} 'the glasses' are part of the 'bravery' of the daughters of Zion (הַגִּלְיֹנִים, RV 'hand mirrors'). The translation is disputed by Ewald, who prefers 'gauzes,' 'transparent garments,' but it is generally accepted. 'Glass' is, however, an unfortunate rendering, as the material of which the gillâyôn was made was polished metal. The same word is used in 8^1 of a writing-tablet. In Ex 38^8 we read of 'the looking-glasses (1611 'looking glasses') of the women assembling' (מַרְאֹת הַצֹּבְאֹת, AVm 'brasen glasses,' RV 'mirrors of the serving women'), which were given to make the laver of brass and its brazen foot in the tabernacle.* And in Job 37^{18} the sky is 'as a molten looking-glass' (1611 'looking glasse,' Heb. כִּרְאִי מוּצָק, RV 'as a molten mirror').

In Sir 12^{11} the metaphor is used of a person wiping the rust off a looking-glass, but never being able to wipe it altogether away. The Gr. word is ἔσοπτρον (RV 'mirror'), which is found once elsewhere in LXX, Wis 7^{26}, where it is tr^d in AV 'mirror' (the only occurrence of that Eng. word). This is the Gr. word which is tr^d 'glass' = 'mirror' in NT. It is found only in 1 Co 13^{12}, Ja 1^{23} (RV 'mirror'). In 2 Co 3^{18} the verb κατοπτρίζω (which occurs only here and in the middle voice) is tr^d 'beholding as in a glass' (RV 'reflecting as a mirror,' RVm 'beholding as in a mirror'). Cf. Spenser, Hymne of Heavenly Beautie—

> 'Those unto all he daily doth display
> And show himselfe in th' image of his grace,
> As in a looking-glasse, through which he may > Be seene of all his creatures vile and base,
> That are unable else to see his face,
> His glorious face! which glistereth else so bright,
> That th' Angels' selves can not endure his sight.'

T. Adams in like manner speaks of seeing through a glass (Practical Works, ii. 27), 'He that hath seen heaven with the eye of faith, through the glass of the Scripture, slips off his coat with Joseph, and springs away.' But he also uses 'in a glass' (ii. 2), 'The world is a glass, wherein we may contemplate the eternal power and majesty of God.' So Tindale (Expositions, Parker Soc., p. 89) speaks of the law as a glass in which a man sees his own damnation. Bp. Hall, in his 'Contemplations' (Works, 1634, ii. 107), uses the word literally: 'How witty wee are to supply all the deficiencies of nature: if wee be low, wee can adde cubits to our stature; if ill colored, wee can borrow complexion; if hayreless, periwiggs; if dim-sighted, glasses; if lame, croutches.' And again, metaphorically (Works, ii. 119), 'There cannot be a better glasse wherein to discerne the face of our hearts then our pleasures.' Knox employs 'mirror' and 'glass' together, 'Epistle to Mrs. Elizabeth Bowes' (Works, iii. 338): 'The expositioun of your trubillis, and acknowledging of your infirmitie, war first unto me a verie mirrour and glass whairin I beheld my self sa rychtlie payntit furth, that nathing culd be mair evident to my awn eis.' See preceding article and MIRROR.

GLEANING.—The Hebrew law on this subject is contained in Lv $19^{9f.}$ 23^{22} (both H) and Dt 24^{19-21}. The first of these passages reads, 'When ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners (פֵּאָה)* of thy field, neither shalt thou gather (תְּלַקֵּט) the gleaning (לֶקֶט) of thy harvest. And thou shalt not glean (תְּעוֹלֵל)† thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather (תְּלַקֵּט) the fallen fruit (פֶּרֶט) of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and for the stranger (גֵּר).' In Dt 24^{19-21} the law regarding gleanings in the cornfield and the vineyard is stated in substantially the same terms, and a similar provision is extended to the olive garden, 'When thou beatest (תַחְבֹּט, a technical term; cf. Is 27^{12}) thine olive tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again, it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow.' The story of Ruth illustrates the working of the above provisions, which give point also to the question of Gideon, 'Is not the gleaning (עֹלֲלוֹת) of Ephraim better than the vintage of Abiezer?' (Jg 8^2).

GLEDE (רָאָה râ'âh, γύψ, vultur, Dt 14^{13}).—In the passage (Lv 11^{14}) the word דָּאָה dâ'âh, also tr^d in the LXX γύψ, occurs in a corresp. position in the verse, and there can be little doubt that the רָאָה of Dt is a textual error for דָּאָה. In that passage AV tr. it 'kite' and RV 'vulture.' Dâ'âh, from a root signifying to dart or fly swiftly, is undoubtedly one of the raptatores, but which it is impossible to say with certainty. Glede is an old name for the kite, and has been adopted by RV as well as AV for râ'âh. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of Bible, p. 186) thinks that רָאָה may refer to the buzzard, Buteo vulgaris, Leach, which is one of the birds known in Arabic as 'aḳâb, and one of those known as shâhîn. See FALCON, KITE, VULTURE.

G. E. POST.

GLISTER.—The three verbs 'glisten,' 'glister,' and 'glitter' come from the same Teutonic base, gli, to shine, 'glitter' being traced to the Scandinavian, 'glisten' and 'glister' being apparently English in their earliest form. 'Glister' is simply a frequentative form of 'glisten.'

---

* For the religious significance of this passage, see Cobb, Origines Judaicæ (1895), p. 233 ff.; also Schechter, Studies in Judaism (1896), p. 381 f., and Expos. Times (1896–97), viii. 1.

* This is the technical term which gave its name to the Talmudic tract Peah, in which the interpretation of the 'corners' and the whole subject of the rights of the poor to the produce of the land are discussed.

† עֹלֵלוֹת is used of the gleanings of a vineyard (Jg 8^2, Is 24^{13}, Jer 49^9, Mic 7^1) or of an olive tree (Is 17^6), not of grain (לֶקֶט). The verb is used figuratively in Jg 20^{45} of the fate of the flying Benjamites, 'And they gleaned of them (וַיְעֹלְלֻהוּ) in the highways five thousand men,' and in Jer 6^9 'They shall thoroughly glean (עוֹלֵל יְעוֹלְלוּ) the remnant of Israel as a vine.' The other verb is used in Jg 1^7 of the seventy kings that gathered (מְלַקְּטִים) their meat under the table of Adoni-bezek; so frequently of picking up such articles as arrows, wood, etc.

The form 'glisten' is not used in AV :* 'glister' is found five times in AV of 1611 ; 'glitter,' nine times. Both words are used freely by writers of the period, and apparently without difference of meaning, so that the MSS and texts are sometimes uncertain. The tendency of later editions is to change 'glister' into 'glitter,' as has been done (since 1762) in AV with Job 20^{25}, which was 'glister' in 1611 ; and as is constantly done now in quoting the proverb, 'All that glisters is not gold,' a proverb found in Shaks. (Merchant of Venice, II. vii. 65), as well as in earlier writers, as T. Lever (Sermons, 1550, Arber's ed. p. 22), 'Alas, good brethren, as trulye as al is not golde that glystereth, so is it not vertue and honesty, but very vice and hipocrisie, wherof England at this day dothe most glorye.' As long as this proverb was quoted correctly (i.e. as long as 'glister' remained in good English use), it had a tendency to give 'glister' a depreciatory sense. This has been noticed in Milton (see Verity's notes on Lycidas in 'Pitt Press Milton,' p. 126). But there is no such distinction in AV. In course of time 'glister' went out of use, and now 'glitter' (perhaps under the influence of the same proverb) is often used with the depreciation of 'glister,' while 'glisten' has taken up the more honourable sense which once belonged to 'glitter.'

The occurrences of 'glister' in AV 1611 are : (1) Job 20^{25} 'the glistering sword cometh out of his gall' (בָּרָק bârâḳ, a word used either lit. of 'lightning,' and then mostly in the plur. 'lightning flashes,' or fig. of the lightning-flash of a weapon. This fig. use is always applied to a weapon. AV then tr. by 'glitter' in Dt 32^{41}, Ezk $21^{10.\,28}$, Nah 3^{3}, Hab 3^{11} ; but in Ezk 21^{15} the feeble tr^{n} is found 'it is made bright,' RV 'it is made as lightning,' as in vv.$^{10.\,28}$. In Dt 32^{41} the Heb. is particularly bold : 'If I whet the lightning of my sword,' as RVm, EV 'If I whet my glittering sword'). We find 'glister' applied to armour by Spenser, FQ I. i. 14—

> 'His glistring armor made
> A little glooming light, much like a shade.'

And by North, Plutarch, p. 395, 'For the glistering of their harness, so richly trimmed and set forth with gold and silver, the colours of their arming coats upon their curaces, after the fashion of the Medes and Scythians, mingled with the bright glistering steel and shining copper, gave such a show as they went and removed to and fro, that made a light as clear as if all had been on a very fire, a fearful thing to look upon.' The early Eng. versions apply the word frequently to fire, as Cov. Is 50^{11} 'Ye walke in the glistringe of youre owne fyre' ; Ezk 1^{4} 'And I loked, and beholde, a stormy wynde came out off the north with a greate cloude full of fyre, which with his glistre lightened all rounde aboute' ; and v.^{13} 'and the fyre gaue a glistre,† and out off the fyre there wente lighteninge.'

(2) 1 Ch 29^{2} 'glistering stones' (אַבְנֵי־פוּךְ ; RV 'stones for inlaid work'). RV is rather an interpretation than a translation. The puk was an eye-paint made of antimony, much used by Eastern ladies, and not confined to ladies (see Lane, Mod. Egyptians, Gardner's ed. p. 53 ; and Shaw, Travels in Barbary^{2}, 229). The word occurs also in 2 K 9^{30}, where in AVm the Heb. is tr^{d} literally, 'Jezebel . . . put her eyes in painting' ; Is 54^{11}, where 'I will lay thy stones in fair colours' is lit. as RVm 'in antimony' (it is the mortar, says Orelli, with which the new stones of Jerusalem will be set, that they may shine forth like dazzling eyes) ; and Jer 4^{30} where the eye-paint is directly spoken of. The nearest parallel to our passage is Is 54^{11}, and the 'glistering' of AV is better than the 'inlaid' of RV ; for some kind of coloured, brilliant stone seems meant. The LXX rendering is λίθους πολυτελεῖς ('very costly stones') ; Vulg. quasi stibinos (stibium, antimony) ; Wyc. 1388 'stonys as of the colour of wymmens oynement' ; Luth. eingefasste Rubinen (taking the previous word along with this) ; so Cov. 'set Rubyes' ; Rog. 'set stones,' with marg. 'some read Carbuncle, or ani other precious stone called Stibion' ; Gen. 'carbuncle stones' ; Bish. 'glystering stones' ; Dou. 'as it were stibians,' with marg. 'a kind of finne white stone' ; Ostervald, pierres d'escarboncle ; Segond, pierres brillantes ; Kautzsch, Puchsteine, with marg. 'pukh bedeutet anderwärts die Augenschminke, bezeichnet also wohl einen schwarzglänzenden Stein' ; Cheyne, 'stones of (i.e. edged with) antimony.' For the Eng. word cf. Spenser, FQ I. iv. 8—

> 'A mayden Queene that shone, as Titans ray,
> In glistring gold and peerelesse pretious stone.'

(3) 2 Es 10^{25} 'And it came to pass, while I was talking with her, behold, her face upon a sudden shined exceedingly, and her countenance glistered, so that I was afraid of her and mused what it might be' (species [Fritzsche specie] coruscus fiebat visus ejus, RV 'her countenance glistered like lightning'). The countenance has the epithet 'glister' applied to it in Spenser's Hymne of Heavenly Beautie, quoted under GLASS—

> 'His glorious face ! which glistereth else so bright,
> That th' Angels selues can not endure his sight.'

(4) 1 Mac 6^{39} 'Now when the sun shone upon the shields of gold and brass, the mountains glistered therewith, and shined like lamps of fire' (ὡς δὲ ἔστιλβεν ὁ ἥλιος ἐπὶ τὰς χρυσᾶς καὶ χαλκᾶς [A omits καὶ χαλκᾶς] ἀσπίδας, ἔστιλβεν τὰ ὄρη ἀπ' αὐτῶν, καὶ κατηύγαζεν ὡς λαμπάδες πυρός ; RV 'Now when the sun shone upon the shields of gold and brass, the mountains shone therewith, and blazed like torches of fire'). The verb στίλβειν occurs once in NT, Mk 9^{3} in the narrative of Christ's transfiguration, τὰ ἱμάτια αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο στίλβοντα, where RV renders 'his garments became glistering,' after Rhem. version.

(5) Lk 9^{29} 'And as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered, and his raiment was white and glistering' (ὁ ἱματισμὸς αὐτοῦ λευκὸς ἐξαστράπτων ; RV 'became white and dazzling'). This is the only occurrence in NT of the Gr. compound ἐξαστράπτειν. It is found in LXX, Ezk 1^{4} of the flashing of flames of fire, 1^{7} and Dn 10^{6} of the glittering of burnished brass, and Nah 3^{3} of flashing spears. The simple verb is used twice by St Luke (and by no other NT writer), 17^{24} of the flashing of lightning, and 24^{4} of the 'shining garments' (RV 'dazzling apparel') of the angels at the tomb.* The meaning of the simple verb, then, is to flash as lightning, and the compound means to flash forth, and may be consciously chosen (as Farrar holds) to suggest that the flashing was from some inward radiance. The versions as a rule are feeble and inadequate : Vulg. 'vestitus ejus albus et refulgens' ; Wyc.

* Nor in Shaks. or Milton, though it is at least as old as Udall, on Ac 10 : 'And sodainly beholde a certain man, whose countenaunce was full of maiestie, stood visible before me, in a glistening garmente.'

† In the New Ed. of Jamieson's Scottish Dictionary (vol. ii. 1886) we find the entry ; 'GLISTER, subst. Lustre, glitter, "The glister of the profeit, that was jugeit heirof to have insewit to Scottis men, at the first sicht blindit mony menis eyis"—Knox, Hist. p. 110. Su.—G. glistra, scintilla, Teut. glinster, id. glinsteren, glisteren, scintillare, fulgere. Although glister be used in Eng. as a verb, I have not observed that it occurs as a subst.' But here are two examples from Coverdale, and at v.^{13} the Gen. and Bishops' Bibles have the subst. also.

* Cf. Milton, Comus, 219—

> 'I see ye visibly, and now believe
> That he, the Supreme good, t' whom all things ill
> Are but as slavish officers of vengeance,
> Would send a glistering guardian, if need were,
> To keep my life and honour unassail'd.'

'his clothing whit shining'; Luther 'sein Kleid war weiss, und glänzte'; Tind. 'his garment was whyte and shoon'; so Cov. (shyned), Rog., Cran., Gen. 1557; Gen. 1560 'his garment was white and glistered'; Bish. 'his garment shining very white'; Rhem. 'his raiment white and glistering'; Ost. 'ses habits devinrent blancs et resplendissants comme un éclair'; Olt. 'ses vêtements devinrent éblouissants de blancheur'; Seg. 'Son vêtement devint d'une éclatante blancheur'; Weizsäcker 'sein Gewand ward strahlend weiss.' The RV word 'dazzling' (introduced also at Lk 24^{4}) is new, and involves a new idea which the Gr. word does not suggest, and which transfers the mind from the sight to the spectators.*

By a strange contrast Tindale uses 'glistringe whyte' (Lv 13$^{2.23}$) of the 'bright spot' in the skin which had to be examined for leprosy. Bunyan more appropriately (Holy War, p. 146) makes Emmanuel command 'that those that waited upon him should go and bring forth out of his Treasury those white and glistering robes that I, said he, have provided and laid up in store for my Mansoul.' And Rutherford (Letters, No. 51) writes to Marion M'Naught, 'I dare in faith say and write (I am not dreaming), Christ is but seeking (what He will have and make) a clean glistering bride out of the fire.' J. HASTINGS.

GLORIOUS.—The adj. 'glorious' had a wider application formerly than it has now. Thus Sylvester, Du Bartas's Weeks, ii.—

> 'Yet will I not this Work of mine give o're.
> The Labour's great: my Courage yet is more;
> Ther's nothing Glorious but is hard to get.'

It is applied in AV not only to the king (2 S 6^{20}), and the king's daughter (Ps 45^{13}), but also to the beauty of Ephraim standing above its fertile valley (Is 28$^{1.4}$), and the security of Tyre 'in the heart of the seas' (Ezk 27^{25}); Wisdom is glorious (Wis 6^{12}), and the 'fruit of good labours' (3^{15}), and the 'long robe of righteousness' (Sir 27^{8}); and (not only figuratively but literally) dress is described as glorious, Esther's (Ad. Est 14^{2} 15^{1}), the apparel of the young men of Judah in the peaceful days of Simon (1 Mac 14^{9}), and even Nicanor's apparel (2 Mac 8^{35}).

But the most evidently obsolete use of the word is when it means boastful, or as we still say vain-glorious, Ad. Est 11^{11} 16^{4} ('lifted up with the glorious words of lewd persons that were never good,' τοῖς τῶν ἀπειραγάθων κόμποις ἐπαρθέντες, RV 'boastful'). This meaning of 'glorious,' which follows Lat. gloriosus, was once common, and is still retained by the French glorieux. Thus Bacon (Essays, 'Of Followers and Friends,' Gold. Treas. ed. p. 198), 'Likewise Glorious Followers, who make themselves as Trumpets, of the Commendation of those they Follow, are full of Inconvenience'; and 'Of Vaine-glory' (p. 216), 'They that are Glorious must needs be Factions; for all Bravery stands upon Comparisons.' So Chapman, Homer's Iliads, xiii. 738—

> 'Vain-spoken man and glorious.'

J. HASTINGS.

GLORY (IN OT).—In EV 'glory' most frequently corresponds to the Hebrew כָּבוֹד, which is also, owing to the difference between Hebrew and English idiom, in some cases tr^{d} by 'glorious' (e.g. Is 4^{2} 11^{10}, Neh 9^{5}). But several other Heb. words are also sometimes tr^{d} by 'glory' or 'glorious,' viz. אַדֶּרֶת, אַדִּיר, and the Niph. and Hiph. of the vb. [אדר] in Zec 11^{3} and v.^{2} (RVm), Ex 15$^{6.21}$, Is 42^{21}; נָאוֹר Ps 76^{4}; הוֹד e.g. Ps 45^{3} 148^{13}; הָדָר e.g. Is 5^{14} (cf. הָדוּר 63^{1}), Ps 90^{16}; תִּפְאֶרֶת e.g. Ps 16^{31} 20^{29}; צְבִי e.g. Is 13^{19} 24^{16}. In Dn 'glory' occurs several times as tr^{n} of the Aram. יְקָרָא. The verb 'to glory' in EV generally corresponds to הִתְהַלֵּל 'to make one's boast of,' e.g. Jer 9$^{23f.}$; and 'to glorify' or 'be glorified' to various verbal forms of the roots כבד and פאר.

Full details as to the various Heb. words must be sought in the Heb. lexicon or in commentaries on the various passages. Generally speaking, the English term is sufficiently clear from the context in spite of the number of the Heb. words which it renders. But we have to consider here some characteristic or peculiar uses of the term, especially the important ideas expressed by the phrase 'the glory of J″.'

i. 1. The 'glory' of men or of material objects calls for little explanation. A man's 'glory' is sometimes the outward tokens of his prosperity, such as silver and gold, or the splendour of his appearance; sometimes his reputation, the esteem in which he is held. For the first sense we may refer to Is 61^{6}, where the term stands in parallelism with 'wealth.' Again in Hag 2^{7} 'glory' is parallel to the 'desirable things of all nations'; we must consider these to be more explicitly described by the next verse as consisting of silver and gold, and these in their turn (v.^{9}) as constituting 'the latter glory' of the temple; cf. also Is 66$^{11f.}$, Ps 49$^{16.17}$, Nah 2^{9}. In the last passage we are near to what was perhaps the original meaning of the Heb. kābôd, viz. 'weight'; cf. the use of the vb. kābēd in e.g. Job 6^{3}, and the noun kōbed in Pr 27^{3}. We may notice also the association of the word (kābôd) with 'ōsher 'riches' in Est 5^{11}, where it also stands in parallelism with rōb, 'multitude.' So the glory of a king (or a nation) consists in the warriors that betoken his might, Is 8^{7} 17$^{3f.}$ 21^{16}; of Lebanon (Is 60^{13}), in the trees with which it is covered. The 'king's daughter' of Ps 45^{13} is 'all glorious' in virtue of her richly adorned clothing; cf. Ex 28^{2}, and metaphorically Job 19^{9}.

2. For instances of 'glory' in the sense of 'reputation' see Ps 4^{2}, Job 29^{20}, 2 S 6^{20} ('How glorious was the king of Israel,' i.e. 'how much reputation did he gain for himself'—ironically). But in most cases where the Heb. word (kābôd) has this sense, it is tr^{d} in EV by 'honour,' e.g. Ec 10^{1}, Pr 21^{21}.

The usage in Ps 73^{24}, if the text be correct, is isolated; 'glory' here appears to mean the splendour into which men pass, who like Enoch and Elijah are translated by God; so RV text; RVm is hardly so probable a translation. Against the text, see, however, e.g. Wellh. in SBOT.

3. The 'glory' of a nation may be, as we have seen, its warriors as betokening its might. But it is a favourite prophetic doctrine that Israel's might does not consist in its armies and weapons of war, but in J″ (cf. Is 31$^{1-3}$, Zec 4^{6}, Ps 20^{7}). Hence, perhaps, we may derive a noticeable usage whereby J″ is described as Israel's glory. Thus Jeremiah (2^{11}) says, 'Hath a nation changed their gods which yet are no gods? but my people have changed their glory (i.e. J″) for that which doth not profit' (i.e. for other gods); and probably Hos 4^{7b} originally ran 'they have exchanged their glory for infamy' with a like meaning. Cf. also Ps 3^{3} (cf. 62^{7}) 106^{20}.

4. Another noticeable use of the term is to describe the self; thus it forms the parallel to 'my soul,' a frequent Hebrew term for self, in Gn 49^{6} 'O my soul, come not thou into their council; unto their assembly, my glory, be not thou united'; and to 'heart' in Ps 16^{9} 108^{1}. Cf. also Ps 7^{6} 57^{8} and 30^{12} (where read כְּבוֹדִי for כָּבוֹד). This usage is generally explained as a poetical expression for 'self'; and, unlike 'soul,' 'glory' in this sense certainly is confined to poetical passages. For a somewhat parallel usage we might then compare

* 'White and dazzling' is Mrs. Lewis's tr^{n} of the Sinaitic Palimpsest, but with marg. 'like lightning.' ܐܝܟ ܒܪܩܐ; cf. Delitzsch's Hebrew translation of the Gospels, הִלְבִּין וְהִבְרִיק.

'my darling' (יְחִידָתִי) in Ps 22^{20}. But another explanation deserving of attention has been offered (see e.g. Dillm. on Gn 49^{6}). In Assyrian kabidtu (כָּבֵד 'liver') is frequently used as a synonym for napištu (= נֶפֶשׁ 'soul'); it has therefore been suggested that in the Hebrew passages above cited we ought to point kĕbēdî instead of kĕbôdî and tr. literally 'my liver,' i.e. 'myself'; the liver, which was thought to be a seat of life, affording as suitable a periphrasis for the self as 'the soul'; cf. La 2^{11} and (for Assyrian usage) Fried. Delitzsch, Assyrisches Handwörterbuch, p. 317*a* (s.v. kabidtu). Some support is given to this view by the fact that the LXX translates the word in Gn 49^{6} by τὰ ἥπατά μου (i.e. 'my liver'); on the other hand, in the Psalms (which were translated later) the regular rendering is δόξα (otherwise 15[16]^{9}).

ii. The Glory of J″.—The glory of J″ (כְּבוֹד יהוה) or of God (כְּבוֹד אֵל, אֱלֹהִים) is, like 'the name of J″' (8^{2}), with which it stands in parallelism in Is 59^{19}, Ps 102^{15},* a summary term for the self-revealed character and being of God. It is also frequently used, especially in certain writings, to denote a particular physical appearance indicating the divine presence. It has been generally assumed that the latter is the original usage; but this, as will be seen, is far from certain, and, in any case, the sharply defined significance of the term in P cannot be traced back to early times. In several cases the meaning of the term is ambiguous, and it has been interpreted by some commentators in the one, by others in the other, of the two senses just indicated. But the cases in which the meaning is quite unambiguous render it possible and convenient to divide our examination of the usage and more detailed significance of the term into two sections, according as the reference is to the self-revealed character or to the physical manifestation of God. In conclusion, we shall have to consider certain ambiguous passages, and the relation between the two meanings.

1. The glory of J″ as a term for the self-revealed character and being of God.—Since Ex 33$^{17-23}$ belongs, in all probability, to a secondary (7th cent.) stratum of J (see below, § 3), the earliest occurrence of the phrase is in Isaiah, who uses it (6^{3}) quite unambiguously to denote the divine nature as revealed in the world; J″'s glory is the outward manifestation of His holiness. The sense is probably similar in 3^{8}, where Judah's sin is represented as culminating in this: that she wilfully opposed herself to a God who had manifested Himself to her in His majesty and might (cf. Am 3^{2}). Although these are the only two passages in Isaiah's writings in which the phrase actually occurs, the underlying idea of J″'s power and might as manifested in nature and history is fundamental with the prophet; cf. especially 2$^{10.21}$, where the recurring term is similar, but not as in EV identical, with the one we are discussing—the glory of His majesty (הֲדַר גְּאוֹנוֹ) in vv.$^{10.19.21}$. We may therefore reasonably attribute to Isaiah a commanding influence over both the phrase and the idea as they appear in subsequent literature. The direct influence of Is 6^{3} is seen in Hab 2^{14}, and also, in all probability, in Nu 14^{21} (cf. e.g. Kuenen, Hexateuch, p. 247). In Nu 14^{22} the glory of J″ is specifically the manifestation of His nature in history, in the life of the nation; and this is the case also in Dt 5^{24} [Heb. 5^{21}], although at first sight the context generally might suggest that the phrase signifies here a physical appearance; but the accompanying synonym 'his greatness,' the meaning of which is unambiguous (cf. 3^{24} 9^{26} 11^{2}), is decisive against this. The same predominant reference to history marks Ezekiel's use of the phrase in 39^{21}, and underlies his use of the verb (נִכְבַּד=to show oneself glorious, to manifest one's glory) in 28^{22} 39^{13}. The phrase is quite clearly to be taken in the same sense in Is 66^{19}, where J″'s glory is the counterpart of His 'fame,' and is to be declared among the nations (yet on this and the preceding verse see Dillm.); according to Cheyne (in his Commentary) also in Is 40^{5}. In the Psalms the particular nuance of the phrase differs in different passages. Judging from the general tenor of the Psalms, it is God's manifestation through His control of the lives of nations or individuals that the respective writers intend mainly to imply by their use of the phrase in 57$^{5.11}$ 63^{2} (cf. Ps 73^{17}—in the sanctuary the Psalmist realizes the meaning of J″'s moral government, and so perceives 'his glory'), 72^{19} (=Is 6^{3}, Nu 14^{21}), 96^{3} ('his glory' ‖ 'his marvellous works'), 97^{6} (‖ 'his righteousness'), 102$^{11f.}$ (cf. Is 59^{19}), 138^{5} (‖ 'the ways of J″'); cf. also 'the glory of thy kingdom' ‖ 'thy power,' 'the glory of the majesty of his kingdom' ‖ 'his mighty acts,' 45$^{11f.}$. On the other hand, in 19^{1}, where it is parallel to 'handy work' (מַעֲשֵׂה יָדָיו), and in 104^{31}, the chief emphasis lies on the fact that the natural world is a revelation of God; this is perhaps also the case with 8^{2},* although in this psalm it is, in particular, man's place in nature that reveals God's nature and purpose. Pr 25^{2} in connexion with the foregoing usages, and in the light of such passages as Job 28, may be interpreted to mean that the very mysteries of nature, the sense that there is much hidden which is not revealed, contributes to man's perception of God's nature. The term 'glory,' especially in a phrase that recurs more than once and deserves particular attention, is also used in the modified sense of the praise which God's character, as revealed in His works and deeds, should call forth; thus 'the glory of his [J″'s] name' or 'the glory due unto his name,' where both renderings of the RV represent the same Hebrew phrase (כְּבוֹד שְׁמוֹ), means the praise due to His self-revealed character from those to whom it has been revealed (29^{2} 66^{2} 96^{8}), and similarly the glory of J″ (Is 42^{8} 43^{7} 48^{11}; cf. also Ps 79^{9} in connexion with v.^{13}). In 113^{4}, as the parallel indicates, the phrase is barely more than a periphrasis for J″.

2. The 'glory of J″' denoting a physical phenomenon indicative of the divine presence.—With the exception of a single Jahwistic passage (Ex 33$^{17-23}$), and, according to a possible interpretation, a single passage in Jeremiah (17^{12}) which must be left for discussion in the next section, this usage first appears in Ezekiel, who in any case appears to have exercised as great an influence on this modification of the idea as Isaiah on that discussed in the foregoing section. Ezekiel, as we have seen, does indeed employ the phrase and the cognate verb in the manner already discussed in the preceding section; but generally with him the glory of J″ is a bright or fiery appearance that resembles the rainbow (1^{28} 10^{4}), causing the ground, where it appears, to shine (43^{2}); moves from one place to another (9^{3} 10$^{4.18}$ 43^{2}), or is borne from one place to another on cherubim (10^{19} 11$^{22f.}$), each movement being accompanied by a rushing sound (2^{12}, where read ברום for ברוך, and translate 'a great rushing when the glory of J″ was lifted up from its place'). Again, as in the vision of the coming judgment the 'glory of J″' is seen by Ezekiel to leave Jerusalem (11^{23}), so in the vision of coming restoration it is seen returning to the city (43$^{2ff.}$).†

* In the theophany of Hab 3^{3} the word used for 'his glory' in v.^{3} is different in the Hebrew (הוֹדוֹ). So also in Ps 148^{13}.

† Contrast the early narrative in Samuel of the loss of the ark to the Philistines (1 S 4$^{21.22}$). The ark symbolized J″'s presence; with it J″ is felt to be leaving Israel; but the 'glory' which departs is the glory of Israel. The possession of the ark was

In brief, with Ezekiel, 'the glory of J″' has become a term for a theophany; and accordingly when Ezekiel sees it, he worships (44^4). But it is important to observe that throughout it is a theophany seen in vision; Ezekiel no more regards the appearance which he terms the glory of J″ as visible to the natural eye, than he regards the whole complex appearance of the chariot in ch. 1 as being so visible. It is further to be observed that in 39^{21} the only passage where he refers to the 'glory of J″,' except in his visions, he uses the phrase in the sense discussed in § II. 1. Zechariah associates fire and glory when he says, 'For I, saith the LORD, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and I will be the glory in the midst of her' (2^5); but he is evidently speaking in metaphor. In P the usage is different; the idea that the glory of J″ is the divine nature manifested through the divine activity only finds expression—and that, perhaps, not quite consciously—in the use of the verb (נִכְבַּד), discussed above, in Ex $14^{4.17.18}$, Lv 10^3. The actual phrase 'the glory of J″' is invariably used by P of a physical phenomenon manifest to ordinary natural vision. The 'glory of the LORD' first appeared at the time of the giving of the Law on Sinai; it then 'abode upon Mount Sinai,' and its appearance was 'like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of all the children of Israel' (Ex 24^{16-18}). As a consequence of coming into close proximity with 'the glory of J″' (Ex 24^{18}), Moses' face shone with a brightness so fierce that he had to veil his face when he came before the people (Ex 34^{29-35}). With the exception of this unique occasion, 'the glory of J″' invariably appears at the tabernacle; see Ex 29^{43} $40^{34.35}$ $16^{7.10}$ [a misplaced narrative which should follow the narrative of the erection of the tabernacle: in v.^{10} restore המקדש (towards) the sanctuary, for the senseless redactorial המדבר=(towards) the wilderness; cf. e.g. Dillm. ad loc.], Lv $9^{6.23}$, Nu 14^{10} 16^{19} 16^{42} (He 17^7) 20^6. The appearance of 'the glory of J″' to the people was either a sign of the divine favour (Lv $9^{6.23}$), or, more frequently, a warning of divine anger, e.g. Ex $16^{7.10}$, Nu 14^{10}. It is never directly stated of 'the glory of J″' in connexion with the tabernacle that it was a fiery appearance; but this is clearly implied, for there, as on Mt. Sinai, it appears in connexion with cloud (Ex 16^{10}, Nu 16^{42}, and in Nu 14^{10} [LXX], cf. also Lv $9^{23.24}$). The cloud, it must be remembered, according to P, always abode upon or covered the tabernacle, and became fiery in appearance at night (Ex 40^{38} 9^{16}). We must therefore seek the peculiarity of 'the glory of J″' (as conceived by P) in the fact that it was a sudden fiery appearance in the cloud by day (cf. Ex $16^{7.10}$—note 'in the morning'), Nu $16^{16.19}$, cf. Lv $10^{2.3}$. Closely related to P's conception is that found in 1 K 8^{11}=2 Ch 5^{14} $7^{1.3}$, all of which passages have been influenced by P (on 1 K 8^{1-11} see Cornill, Einleitung, p. 109).

3. Before attempting to discuss the relation between the two conceptions already considered, we must examine certain passages where the phrase either possesses a different meaning or is ambiguous. Most important is the passage in Ex 33^{17-23}. This scarcely belongs to the earliest stratum of J. If it is correctly assigned by Kuenen (Hexateuch, p. 246 f.) and others (cf. Wellhausen, Composition, p. 96; see Driver, LOT^{6} p. 38) to the 7th cent., the earliest usage of the phrase in the extant literature is by Isaiah. Now, the conception of the author of Ex 33^{17-23} is clearly not identical with Isaiah's; but neither is it reasonable to identify his conception with that of Ezekiel or P. In Ex 33^{17-23} 'the glory of J″' is used with reference to a theophany in human shape; in reply to Moses' request that he may see J″'s glory, J″ promises that though he cannot see His face, and therefore, while His glory is passing by, Moses' face must be covered, yet, when His glory has passed by, he may look after J″ and see His back. The idea is clearly not the same as in 16^{10} or 24^{17}. In the Jahwistic passage we have a glorious appearance in human form to Moses only; in P, a fiery appearance, which can hardly have been, and is certainly not implied to have been, in human form to all the people. Jer 14^{21} (cf. also 17^{12}, which, however, is perhaps post-Jeremianic—cf. Cornill, Einleitung, p. 167; Driver, LOT^{6} p. 237) might at first appear to presuppose Ezekiel's or P's conception; but we really do more justice to the context, which is entirely concerned with J″'s activity in history and nature, by following the suggestion of the parallel term 'thy name,' and interpreting the phrase 'the throne of thy glory' in accordance with the usage discussed in § II. 1; cf. also Giesebrecht on 17^{12}. In certain late [*] passages of the Bk. of Isaiah it is most natural to interpret the phrase of a physical appearance; but all these passages are of a poetical character; see 35^2 58^8 $60^{1.2}$, and perhaps also 40^5 (cf. Dillm. ad loc.). The same interpretation should possibly be given to Ps 26^{8b}—'the place of the tabernacle of thy glory' (מְקוֹם מִשְׁכַּן כְּבוֹדֶךָ)—where the phraseology at any rate has probably been suggested by P. Perhaps we ought also to compare in the present connexion the (probably non-Isaianic) reference in Is 11^{10}; cf. also 60^{13}.

In the light of the preceding survey of the exegetical and critical data, the most probable conclusion appears to be that 'the glory of J″' was originally used to express the manifestations of J″'s power and might, or more generally of His nature; through Isaiah the phrase became enriched and deepened in meaning, and subsequently continued to express this idea, and became reflected also in the Niphal of the verb. Comparatively early, however, viz. in Ex 33^{17-23}, we find the phrase also used in connexion with, and perhaps itself expressing, a theophany in human form: possibly, however, 'glory' is here merely a periphrasis for self, just as it is in connexion with a human subject in an early poem (Gn 49^6), and several psalms (e.g. 7^5 16^9 57^8—yet on this usage cf. § I. 4); note the equivalence in Ex 33^{22} 'while my glory passeth by . . . until I have passed by.' The phrase first unmistakably expresses a physical phenomenon in Ezekiel, who uses it to express the form under which in his visions he realizes the movements of J″, more especially the coming removal of His presence from Jerusalem and His subsequent return after the Exile is ended. But it is not till we come to P in the 5th cent. that the phrase is used of a physical phenomenon actually supposed to have been visible to the natural eye. This writer uses it of a particular fiery appearance, by which the Deity indicated His presence in the tabernacle. The idea of such a theophany in fire and cloud is unquestionably ancient, as we may see in the case of the burning bush, or in J's account of the Pillar of Fire and Cloud; the use of the particular phrase 'glory of J″,' which originally possessed an entirely different significance, to express that idea, is first suggested by Ezekiel, and first really appropriated by P and his school (1 K 8^{11}, 2 Ch 7). As understood by P, 'the glory of J″' is closely related to the Shechinah of later Jewish theology (on which cf. Weber, Die altsynagog. Paläst. Theol. pp. 179–184). How thoroughly the priestly writer has materialized the earlier conception may be seen by a comparison with Dt. The recurring promise of that book is that God will cause His name to dwell at the one sanctuary. P has materialized this into a physical phenomenon. If we have rightly interpreted the phrase in certain post-exilic passages in the Bk. of Isaiah of a physical phenomenon, we may probably account for the use by the combined influence of Ezekiel, and such stories connected with the Exodus as those of the pillar of cloud (cf. Is 4[5]).

Israel's glory; the loss of it the departure of their glory (cf. § I. 3 above). The passage has not therefore a direct bearing on the conception of 'the glory of J″.'

[*] Cf. Cheyne, Introd. to Book of Isaiah, pp. 208 ff., 298, 381 (all post-exilic passages).

G. B. GRAY.

GLORY (NT).—The tr. in NT (AV and RV) once of κλέος 'renown' (1 P 2[20] only), and, in its verbal signification, occasionally representing καυχᾶσθαι 'to boast' and its cognates καύχησις 'boasting' (Ro 15[17]) and καύχημα 'something to boast of' (1 Co 9[16]); but almost entirely confined to the rendering of δόξα and its correlatives. Δόξα runs parallel in its significations with its parent δοκέω, though finally going beyond it. The history of this verb, from the oldest Greek downwards, shows that the chronological order of its meanings is (1) intrans. 'I seem,' (2) trans. 'I think'; the extension from δοκεῖ μοι 'it seems to me,' to δοκῶ 'I think,' being due to the same personalization as is the Eng. extension of 'If it please you' to 'If you please.' Its fundamental idea appears to be subjective judgment, which may be right or wrong, as opposed to φαίνεσθαι, which is objective and external to the thinker,—the look of a thing; which also, of course, may be either veracious or misleading. But δόξα stands for the classical sense of opinion once only in sacred literature, viz. 4 Mac 5[18]; and as mere outward appearance in opposition to reality (Plato, Xenophon) it does not occur in NT; for whereas the LXX version of Is 11[3] allowed itself δόξα there for the 'sight of the eyes' as the false guide to judgment, the NT at Jn 7[24] has 'judge not according to ὄψις.' But while it ignored the precise senses of appearance and opinion, the NT usage, following that of the LXX, accepted the classical and LXX development of outward appearance (rather than opinion) into reputation, and affords abundant instances of the LXX non-classical expansion of the same idea into outward splendour or manifested excellence. Both reputation and splendour (or manifested excellence) find their common expression in glory. Thus Jn 12[43] 'They loved the glory (honour) from men rather than the glory from God'; Lk 2[9] 'The glory (brightness) of the Lord shone round about them'; and 2 Co 3[9] 'Much rather doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory (manifested excellence).' [Cf. OT כָּבוֹד kābôd, in its varied senses: honour (to God) Jos 7[19], or men Gn 31[1] (Jacob); brightness (in the cloud), the rabbinical Shechinah Ex 16[10]; or beauty of appearance Is 60[13] (Lebanon, cf. 1 Co 15[40. 41]); manifested excellence Ex 33[22] 'my glory,' cf. v.[19] 'my goodness'].

These senses in NT are common and undisputed, as is also the closely related sense of majesty or magnificence of king or ruler, e.g. of God, in doxologies, 1 P 4[11]; of Christ, Ja 2[1], 2 Th 1[9] ('the glory of his might'), cf. He 1[3]; and of man as ruling for God, 1 Co 11[7] (the woman making conspicuous the authority of the man). But there are still differences of opinion as to the sense of brightness and the extensions of it. When used of God, of Christ, of regenerated and glorified humanity, how far is it literal, symbolical, ethical? That it is ethically used of God is obvious from such passages as Ro 3[23] 'All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God,' i.e. the manifested perfection of His character, or, according to the context (vv.[21. 22]), His righteousness. That it is ethically used of Christ is obvious from Jn 1[14] 'We beheld his glory . . . full (as He was) of grace and truth.' That it is ethically used of human nature in the process of glorification, i.e. of ethical and spiritual transfiguration, is obvious from 2 Co 3[18] 'We all, with unveiled face, mirroring in ourselves the glory of the Lord, are being transformed into the same image from glory to glory, even as from the Lord the Spirit.'

A literal element also presents itself. The conception and description in NT of the divine manifestation in heaven and on earth, of the form of heavenly beings, and of the future appearance (according to St. Paul) of the glorified children of God in the heavenly body, are in the line of the OT theophanies and angelophanies with their light and brightness. This fact is clear from the 'glory of the Lord' round the shepherds (Lk 2[9]), from the transfiguration of Christ (Lk 9[32]), from the appearance of Moses and Elias 'in glory' (Lk 9[31]), from St. Paul's vision of the Lord in the way (Ac 9[3] and parallel passages in Ac 22 and 26), and from the 'body of glory' (Ph 3[21]), perhaps suggested by this vision. By this apparent literalism in the conceptions of the divine and the coming 'glory,' Pfleiderer is induced to define the specially Pauline δόξα as 'the brilliant light which is everywhere the manifestation of the πνεῦμα, and forms a special attribute of the majesty of God' (Paulinism, Eng. tr. i. 135), the πνεῦμα being 'heavenly, supersensuous matter,' 'originally belonging to God and then to Christ the Son of God, in such wise that it constitutes their divine essence, and is presented in a concrete form in them' (i. 200). And Weiss, while denying that the 'essence of the Spirit is (in St. Paul) conceived as a luminous substance' (Bib. Theol. of NT, Eng. tr. i. 397), affirms that 'it is characteristic of the Pauline theology that the apostle has transformed the (earlier and vaguer) idea of the divine δόξα into an altogether concrete notion,—that of a heavenly radiant light proceeding from a supermundane substance of light' (i. 396), 'a luminous light-substance in which God reveals Himself' (ii. 187, n. 7). 'Out of it are formed the bodies of the heavenly beings, and . . . this same δόξα will believers yet bear when they are conformed to His image, to whom, as the Lord of the Spirit, this δόξα belongs.' Weiss, indeed, disclaims materialism in this interpretation; but it is hard, with this disclaimer, to see what is meant by 'supermundane substance.' Dr. Sanday also (Romans, p. 85), quoting from Weber (Altsyn. Theol. p. 214) the rabbinical view that 'the glory' (the first among the six things lost by Adam at the fall) was a reflection from the divine glory which, before the fall, brightened Adam's face, goes on to say: 'Clearly, St. Paul conceives of this glory as in process of being recovered: the physical sense is also enriched by its extension to attributes that are moral and spiritual.'

It is proverbially difficult, of course, to distinguish sometimes, in St. Paul's expressions, the literal from the freely symbolical: the discriminating critic will find this difficulty not only with δόξα but also with σάρξ, σῶμα, and πνεῦμα; and it is a difficulty that must be expected to arise when, in an old vocabulary, verbal expression has to be found for new thought. In this exigency words are often selected which, being in themselves subjective as well as objective, admit of being wholly subjectivized. One of these plastic words appears to be δόξα in the moulding hands of St. Paul: a word elastic and not rigid, a word 'thrown out at an idea' (like the words just mentioned), and not intended mechanically to define it. It seems unjustifiable, therefore, to chain St. Paul to the rigid, concrete conception of a literal light substance (even though it be elevated into the cloud-land of the supersensuous or supermundane), whether for the πνεῦμα (in God and Christ), or for the heavenly body of Christ and of the believer to be glorified through Him. In 2 Co 3^{18}, above quoted, the ethical sense of the glory is so pre-eminent as to suggest not merely an 'extension of the physical' but even a supplantation of it; and this ethical conception comes out again plainly enough in Ro 5^{2} and 3^{7}, where righteousness is the burden of the thought. A non-Pauline, but not an anti-Pauline, illustration is furnished by Jn 1^{14}, also above quoted: there the bright cloud (δόξα, Ro 9^{4}) in the tabernacle (cf. ἐσκήνωσεν) serves St. John for the historical and allegorical foundation of the idea of the Logos in the tabernacle of the flesh, and the incarnate God in the world of men or among the Jewish people.

Prudence may well, therefore, lead us to pause before we go further than this,—that the 'brightness' accompanying Theophany, Christophany, Angelophany, in OT or NT times, and the double meaning brightness and manifested perfection, contained in δόξα, led St. Paul to avail himself of it as the most significant symbol for the manifestation of perfected human nature; being also for him the most significant inherited symbol of the divine perfection as manifested to the human eye. His root-idea is spiritual: in the new life the Spirit is the vitalizing principle, and the new body 'raised in glory' (1 Co 15^{43}) (σῶμα not necessarily, with St. Paul, connoting the material) will be spiritual (πνευματικόν), the expression and the organ of the spiritual life. J. MASSIE.

GNAT (κώνωψ).—A term for any insect of the Culicidæ, a family of dipterous insects, with bristly stings, included in a flexible proboscis. They penetrate the skin, suck the blood, and at the same time inject a poisonous fluid, which causes swelling, and sometimes ulcerations. The humming noise produced by their wings in flight disturbs the rest of their victims, as they are for the most part nocturnal in their habits. The commonest species of gnat in Bible lands is the mosquito. The gnat is mentioned only once (Mt 23^{24}), where 'strain at' of AV is plainly wrong, and 'strain out' of RV right. G. E. POST.

GNOSTICISM is the comprehensive name used to embrace a large number of widely ramified sects, on the borderland between Christianity and heathen thought, which flourished in the 2nd cent. The name in this sense is modern. There were, indeed, sects who called themselves Gnostic (γνωστικοί), as claiming a deeper knowledge of spiritual things, and Church writers (especially Irenæus) were fond of bringing different false teachers under the condemnation of 1 Ti 6^{20}; but there was no common name for these varying systems, and the limit assigned to the present use of the word must be to a certain extent arbitrary. The following are among the tendencies characteristic of the so-called Gnostic sects:—(1) An attempt to grapple with the problems of creation, and especially the origin of evil; (2) an attempt at its solution by theories which postulate a string of emanations extending between the first God and the visible universe, thus concealing the difficulties of the problem rather than solving it; (3) a tendency towards dualism, resulting either in asceticism or licentiousness; (4) a syncretistic tendency, combining in an artificial manner with some more or less misunderstood Christian doctrines, elements from classical, Oriental, and Jewish sources, or even from common magic; (5) a tendency towards a Docetic Christology, i.e. one which looked upon the earthly life of Christ, or at any rate the sufferings, as unreal; (6) a tendency to represent γνῶσις (knowledge) as something superior to mere faith, and the special possession of the more enlightened. Some of these characteristics are more common in one, some in another of the heresies called Gnostic, nor probably is it possible to find any one idea common to them all.

i. The following is an account of the various places in the NT where reff. to Gnosticism have been found or imagined. These reff. have played a very large part in the critical discussions of the last sixty years, and in some cases touch on problems not yet solved. For a fuller discussion reference is given to the various separate articles.

1. In Ac 8^{9-24} we have our earliest account of SIMON MAGUS (wh. see), who has played a large part in the history of Gnosticism, and is regarded by ecclesiastical writers as the father of all false teaching. Many doctrines characteristic of Gnosticism are attributed to him in later writers, and works of his are quoted—how far genuine is very doubtful. From Acts we learn that he practised 'magical arts,' and was called the Great Power of God (οὗτός ἐστιν ἡ δύναμις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ καλουμένη μεγάλη). Both these were consistent with the tendencies we call Gnostic.

2. In 1 Co we find St. Paul using the word γνῶσις, which generally in NT implies a deep knowledge of spiritual things in a bad sense, and contrasting it with ἀγάπη (1 Co 8^{1} 'knowledge puffeth up, but love edifieth'). There was a tendency to lay undue stress on intellectual gifts.

3. In the Ep. to the COLOSSIANS (wh. see) false teachers are attacked who combined asceticism, scrupulousness concerning food, new moons, and sabbaths with angel worship (θρησκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων), and apparently a tendency to depreciate the person of Christ. Their teaching is called 'the philosophy and vain conceit' (διὰ τῆς φιλοσοφίας καὶ κενῆς ἀπάτης), is said to be according to the traditions of men, after the elements of (see ELEMENT) the world (κατὰ τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου), and a voluntary humility (ταπεινοφροσύνη, Col 2^{8-23}). According to Baur (Ch. Hist. Eng.tr. i. 127), 'the numerous echoes of Gnosticism and its peculiar doctrines, which are to be found in the three Epp. to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philippians, are sufficient, had we no other ground to go upon, to fix the position of these works in the post-apostolic age.' But this extreme statement has long ceased to be accepted. It has been pointed out by many that the Colossian heresy was clearly Judaistic, and that 2nd cent. Gnosticism was strongly anti-Jewish. Lightfoot accounted for the 'Gnostic' tendencies by supposing a Judaism modified under influences similar to that of the Essenes. Hort (Judaistic Christianity, p. 128) denies that there is any 'tangible evidence for Essenism out of Palestine,' and considers that we are on 'common Jewish ground,' but the Judaism of the Dispersion and not of Palestine.

4. 'Still more directly and indubitably do the Pastoral Epistles carry us to the period of the Gnostic heresy,' writes Baur, while here again his position is almost universally modified or set aside. The false teachers of these Epistles (see PASTORAL EPP., TIMOTHY, TITUS), to dwell only on leading features, taught a different doctrine (ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖν), consisting of fables and endless genealogies (1 Ti 1^{4}), foolish questionings, strifes, and fighting about the law (μάχας νομικάς), Tit 3^{9}; they forbade to marry, and commanded to abstain from meats (1 Ti 4^{3}). Their teaching is described as profane babblings and oppositions of the knowledge which is falsely so called (ἀντιθέσεις τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως). This last phrase seemed to suggest a reference to Marcion, and is so taken still by Harnack, who regards the verse as a later interpolation; and the Fathers were accustomed to hold that the expressions concerning 'genealogies' referred to Valentinian and other theories of emanations, while the prohibition of marriage suggested Encratite doctrine. But none of these allusions were really necessary, and the expression 'Jewish fables' (Tit 1^1) shows that we cannot be dealing with the anti-Jewish Gnosticism of the 2nd cent. Lightfoot sees a development of the Colossian heresy; and Hort, although his explanations are in some cases thoroughly convincing, perhaps goes too far in banishing all of what we should call Gnostic tendencies.

5. The First Epistle of St. John directly, the Gospel indirectly, combat a form of teaching which denied that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh (1 Jn 4^{1-3}). The most common explanation is to see in this a refutation of the peculiar form of Docetism associated with Cerinthus, with whom St. John is connected historically by tradition.

6. In the Apoc. we have reference to certain NICOLAITANS (wh. see), who are classed by Fathers (e.g. Iren. I. xxvi. 3) among heretics, to the teaching of one JEZEBEL (wh. see), and to some who knew the deep things of Satan (τὰ βαθέα τοῦ Σατανά), a phrase which has a Gnostic ring about it (Rev $2^{6. 15. 20. 24}$).

7. In the Ep. of JUDE and in 2 PETER (wh. see) there is a violent polemic against certain Antinomian tendencies. It has been the custom to see here a definite allusion to some of the Antinomian sects of the 2nd cent. Harnack (Chronologie der altchristlichen Litteratur, i. 466), for example, sees a reference to the Antinomian Gnostic sects described by Irenæus. But a careful analysis of the language of both the Epistles shows that it was at any rate primarily practical immorality that was in both cases attacked. They are 'ungodly men,' 'turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness,' they have 'given themselves over to fornication', 'they are blasphemous in their language,' they 'are sensual' (Jude v.$^{4. 7. 10. 19}$), 'they walk after the flesh in the lust of defilement,' and 'despise dominion' (2 P 2^{10}); to this corresponds the statement that they have fallen back into their old evil ways (2 P 2^{21-22}), and a theoretical basis seems to be given in the disbelief in the Parousia which is growing up. Even the expression 'denying their Master,' which occurs in both Epp. (Jude v.^{4}, 2 P 2^1), may mean only denying Him by lives unworthy of Him. In any case, even if the existence of a theoretical Antinomianism as well as practical immorality cannot be entirely denied, there are certainly no clearly defined traces of later Gnosticism implying the existence of any special 2nd cent. sect, and compelling us to place the two Epp. in the 2nd century.

The above are the references, real or supposed, to Gnosticism in the NT. A theory which flourished for some time referred them all to heresies of the 2nd cent., and signs therefore of the late date of the NT writings. This theory seems now to be given up or much modified, as may be seen by consulting the various modern commentators, and it is really more correct to say that the developed Gnostic heresies of the 2nd cent. presuppose the NT. Many of the names of the Valentinian æons seem derived from the prologue to St. John's Gospel. The Gnostics often used NT doctrines which they only half understood, and misapplied biblical texts. But if we cannot find what is now called Gnosticism in the NT, there are signs of the tendencies out of which it grew. Even Hort, who shows how much which was formerly explained as Gnostic is perfectly explicable as Jewish, admits that there are elements for which we cannot account, and that the Judaism of the Dispersion is different from the Judaism of Palestine. If we put together our data in the NT, we notice that to a very large extent it comes from Asia Minor. The Colossian Epp., those to Timothy, the Apocalypse, Cerinthus, the Ignatian letters, are all alike indications of a clearly defined tendency. To say that the origin of this is Essene influence certainly goes beyond our data, but the illustrations given by Lightfoot derived from the teaching of the Essenes and Therapeutæ are perfectly legitimate as showing that the Judaism of the 1st cent. was capable of being affected by very various and extraneous elements. The Jews in Phrygia (Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics, ii. p. 674) were, we know, peculiarly lax, and influenced by the surrounding heathen life and thought. The great movements of the 2nd cent., heathen, Jewish, and Christian, which arose from the intense spiritual earnestness with which Christianity had inspired the world, brought into life elements that had been working silently ever since the unification of the Roman Empire had broken down the old national religions, had brought into contact with one another very different faiths, and had turned men's minds from the political interests, which are always impossible under a personal government, to the problems and questions of religion. From this point of view, the embryo Gnosticism of the NT takes its proper place in the history of religious development.

There are other points of view from which the developed Gnosticism of the 2nd cent. affected the Bible, mainly the history of the Canon, of Interpretation, and of the Text. The idea of a CANON (wh. see) as a collection of several books was not created by Gnosticism, but opposition to that movement made the definition of its limit necessary. There were collections of sacred writings before Marcion, but the work of Marcion and the existence of many apocryphal writings showed the necessity of strict definition. Our first recorded commentary on any book of Scripture is that of Heracleon the Valentinian on St. John. And the belief at any rate that heretics mutilated Scripture caused careful attention to be paid to the transmission of the sacred text. How far any of the various readings still existing may be due to Gnostic influence is at present an open question.

LITERATURE.—On Gnosticism generally, by far the best work for English readers is Mansel's Gnostic Heresies, where there is a very full discussion of the biblical passages. In as far as it is behind modern criticism, it may be supplemented by the articles in Smith's Dict. of Christian Biography, where references are given to the special literature. On Biblical Gnosticism see esp. Lightfoot 'On the Colossian Heresy' in his Epistle to the Colossians, and Hort, Judaistic Christianity. For special literature on the Bible passages see the articles referred to.

ii. On account of his relation, real or supposed, alike to 1 Jn and to developed Gnosticism, it will be worth while to examine in detail the opinions of Cerinthus, so far as these can now be recovered. He taught in the province of Asia at the end of the 1st century.

I. HIS TEACHING.—The only method of acquiring critical information concerning his teaching is to distinguish the different sources from which it comes. (1) Polycarp († 154), acc. to Irenæus (Hær. III. iii. 4; Eus. HE III. xxviii. 6, IV. xiv. 6), related a story of the Apostle John. On going into a bath he saw C. there, and immediately rushed out saying, 'Let us flee lest the bath fall on us, for C., the enemy of the truth, is within.' Even if the incident be, as is possible, either exaggerated or a myth, it would not have arisen so early unless there were grounds for bringing the two together; the story may therefore be taken as sufficient and conclusive evidence for placing C. at the end of the 1st cent. The later date implied in less trustworthy authorities (Pseudo-Tertullian, 3, etc.) seems simply to have arisen from taking the order of Irenæus as chronological.

(2) Irenæus himself (c. 200) tells us that St. John wrote his Gospel to correct the errors of C. (Hær. III. xi. 1). He describes these as follows (Hær. I. xxvi. 1). C. taught in Asia; he said that the world was not made by the first God, but by a power separate from Him and independent of Him. Jesus was not born from a virgin, but was the son of Joseph and Mary like other men, but distinguished by his superiority in justice and prudence and wisdom. After his baptism the Christ descended on him in the form of a dove, and announced the unknown Father. At the end of his life the Christ left Jesus, Jesus suffered and rose again, the Christ being spiritual remained without suffering.

(3) The common source of the three writers, Pseudo-Tertullian (§ 3), Philaster (§ 36), Epiphanius (Hær. xxviii.), is generally supposed to have been an early treatise by Hippolytus (190). The account it contains seems to be much less accurate than that of Irenæus. The God of the Jews was one of the angels who created the world, and who gave the law. Christ was a man, the son of Joseph and Mary, on whom apparently a power came down. C. had Judaistic tendencies. He supported circumcision and the Sabbath, and rejected the Apostle Paul. He was identified with the opponents of the apostles in the Ac, an identification which Epiphanius developed at great length. It may be noticed that there is an element of inconsistency in this account. Cerinthus is a Judaizer, although he puts the God of the Jews in such an inferior position.

(4) In his later treatise (Ref. Omn. Hær. vii. 33, x. 21) Hippolytus (220–230) derives his information from Irenæus, adding the statement that C. was educated in Egypt.

(5) The only other information of importance is that of Caius (c. 200), the Rom. presbyter (ap. Eus. HE III. xxviii.), who ascribes to him a gross Chiliasm. There was to be a kingdom of Christ upon earth; it was to last 1000 years, and to be a time of fleshly indulgence—a perpetual marriage feast. This statement is repeated or corroborated by Dionysius of Alexandria (ap. Eus. HE III. xxviii. 4, 5, VII. xxv. 2–5).

It is unnecessary to examine later writers, who all seem merely to combine, or exaggerate, or corrupt the above accounts. If we examine these in detail, we shall notice that there are three quite independent traditions. Irenæus has no reference to Judaistic views, and Caius alone describes the Chiliastic opinions. The account in Irenæus is far the clearest and most trustworthy; to that we may add the information of Caius, remembering that the repulsive side may very likely be exaggerated. How far we can accept Hippolytus I., which clearly gives an inaccurate and confused account, may be doubtful.

II. THE CANON.—A special interest attaches to C. in relation to certain books of NT. Caius (loc. cit.) makes the following statement concerning him: Κήρινθος ὁ δι' ἀποκαλύψεων ὡς ὑπὸ ἀποστόλου μεγάλου γεγραμμένων, τερατολογίας ἡμῖν, ὡς δι' ἀγγέλων αὐτῷ δεδειγμένας, ψευδόμενος ἐπεισάγει. 'C., the man who makes use of revelations purporting to have been written by a great apostle, lyingly imposes upon us marvellous prodigies which he professes to have been shown him by angels.' Dionysius seems to have had this passage in his mind when he states that some ascribed the Apoc. to Cerinthus. It is doubtful, however, whether the words of Caius will bear this meaning. They may mean that Cerinthus used forged Apocalypses, or interpreted the Apocalypse in his own way, or possibly that he was the author of it; and we have other grounds for believing that Caius did not accept the book. The opinion that C. was the author of the Apoc. was also held by some heretics mentioned by Philaster (§ 60), and by those whom Epiphanius (Hær. li. 3, 4) calls Alogi. This opinion seems to have been one invented by those who disliked the Apoc. for the support it was supposed to give to Chiliastic opinions. Acc. to Epiphanius, these same Alogi ascribed to Cerinthus the Gospel of St. John —a statement which is certainly absurd, and looks as if it were an exaggeration of the statement in Philaster, who says that they reject the Gospel but does not say that they ascribe it to C. We are also told, if we are to believe Hippolytus I., that C. rejected the writings of St. Paul, the Acts of the Apostles, and all the Gospels except that according to St. Matthew, and that he accepted this only in a mutilated form.

III. RELATION TO ST. JOHN.—As we have seen, the most authentic accounts of C. make it quite clear that his teaching was Docetic, and that he was a contemporary of St. John. If we examine the writings traditionally ascribed to the latter, it becomes perfectly clear that he had a false teaching before him of a Docetic character. These two traditions then corroborate one another. The one demands an environment which the other supplies; nor does it seem in the least probable that either was invented to account for the other.

It may be further suggested that the developed Docetism taught by Cerinthus implies a developed theory concerning Christ's divinity from which it was a deviation, and that his heretical teaching concerning the birth of Christ has all the appearance of being developed in opposition to a belief in the Virgin birth.

LITERATURE.—References to ancient authors are given throughout the art.; the most useful modern book is prob. that of Hilgenfeld, Ketzergeschichte, pp. 411–421; see also Hort, Judaistic Christianity, pp. 188–191; Renan, Les Évangiles, p. 417 ff.; Westcott, On the Canon, ch. iv. § 1, and most early Church histories. The art. in Smith's Dict. Chr. Biog. is uncritical.

A. C. HEADLAM.

GO.—The verb to 'go' is found in the English versions of the Bible in many senses and constructions that have now gone out of use. A careful study of its occurrences will repay the labour it costs.

1. With all its freedom of usage there is a precision in the movement expressed by 'go' which we have now lost. If a person 'runs' or 'rides' we now can say that he 'goes'; but running and riding were formerly contrasted with going, which was therefore used as we now should use 'walk.' Thus Chaucer, Knightes Tale, 1351—

> 'That other wher him list may ryde or go,
> But seen his lady shal be never-mo.'

Shaks. Lear, I. iv. 134—

> 'Ride more than thou goest'; and Tempest, III. ii. 63, 'As proper a man as ever went on four legs.' So Ascham, The Scholemaster, 151, 'I purpose to teach a yong scholer to go, not to daunce.' The use is found as late as Watts, Come, Holy Spirit—

> 'Our souls can neither fly nor go
> To reach immortal joys.'

In the earlier versions this meaning is often found. Thus Is 40^{31} Wyc. (1388), 'But thei that hopen in the Lord, schulen chaunge strengthe, thei schulen take fetheris as eglis: thei schulen renne, and schulen not trauele; thei schulen go, and schulen not faile' (Cov. 'When they go, they shal not be weery,' Gen. 'they shal walke and not faint,' so AV); Mk 5^{42} Tind., 'And streyght the mayden arose, and went on her fete' (so Gen. 1557, but 1560 'walked' as AV, Gr. περιεπάτει); Hos 11^{3} Cov. 'I lerned Ephraim to go.' The last example has been retained by AV and RV, 'I taught Ephraim to go' (תִּרְגַּלְתִּי, lit., as Pusey, 'I set on his feet'). Other examples in AV are Pr 6^{28} 'Can one go upon hot coals, and his feet not be burned?' (after Wyc. 'go on colis,' אִם־יְהַלֵּךְ אִישׁ, RV 'walk'); Is 59^{8} 'they have made them crooked paths; whosoever goeth therein shall not know peace' (after Cov. 'their wayes are so croked, that who so euer goeth therein, knoweth nothinge of peace,' כֹּל דֹּרֵךְ בָּהּ); Jer 10^{5} 'they must needs be borne, because they cannot go' (Wyc. 'for thei moun not go,' כִּי־לֹא יִצְעָדוּ). See also Jos 18^{4}, Pr 4^{14} 6^{22} 9^{6}, Mic 2^{3}, Mk 12^{38}, where RV has 'walk' for AV 'go.'

2. 'Go' is sometimes superfluous or nearly so, as in Jos 9^{4} 'They did work wilily, and went and made as if they had been ambassadors' (וַיֵּלְכוּ וַיִּצְטַיָּרוּ); Is 37^{37} 'So Sennacherib king of Assyria departed, and went and returned, and dwelt at Nineveh' (וַיֵּלֶךְ וַיֵּשֶׁב). Somewhat similar is the very frequent use of 'go' immediately before some other verb, as 2 K 1^{6} 'There came a man up to meet us, and said unto us, Go, turn again unto the king that sent you.' Occasionally a pronoun intervenes between the verbs, as 1 K 20^{33} 'Then he said, Go ye, bring him.' In AV the usage is almost confined to the imperat., though some other moods occur, as 1 S 29^{8} 'What hast thou found in thy servant . . . that I may not go fight against the enemies of my lord, the king?' (RV 'go and fight'). Cf. Shaks. Hamlet, I. v. 132—

> 'And for my own poor part,
> Look you, I'll go pray.'

In these phrases the verb to 'go' has no such independent meaning as we associate with it, implying removal from a place; it expresses no more than the setting about the act contained in the following verb. And this is often all that it contains when 'and' comes between the two verbs, as Dt 31^{1} 'And Moses went and spoke these words to all Israel'; Ex 2^{1} 'And there went a man of the house of Levi, and took to wife a daughter of Levi'; 2 K 3^{7} 'And he went and sent to Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, saying, The king of Moab hath rebelled against me' (see 'Go to' below). This auxiliary use of 'go' is seen also in expressions like 'go childless' Gn 15^{2} (וְאָנֹכִי הוֹלֵךְ עֲרִירִי, which may mean, however, 'and I am going hence [i.e. to die] childless [lit. 'naked'],' as Del., Dillm., Spurrell, and RVm); 'go mourning,' Job 30^{28} (קֹדֵר הִלַּכְתִּי בְּלֹא חַמָּה, Dav. 'I go blackened, not by the sun,' so RVm); 'go crouching,' Sir 12^{11} (πορεύηται συγκεκυφώς); 'go gay,' Bar 6^{9} (παρθένῳ φιλοκόσμῳ, EV 'for a virgin that loveth to go gay,' Gifford 'fond of ornament,' the only occurrence of the Gr. word in LXX or NT). Cf. Shaks. Othello, II. i. 151—

> 'She that was ever fair, and never proud;
> Had tongue at will, and yet was never loud;
> Never lack'd gold, and yet went never gay.'

And Milton, University Carrier, ii. 22—

> 'Ease was his chief disease, and to judge right,
> He di'd for heaviness that his cart went light.'

3. To go is often to proceed, advance, make progress, whether literally or figuratively, as Shaks. I Henry IV. I. iii. 292—

> 'No further go in this
> Than I by letters shall direct your course.'

In 2 Mac 4^{40} we find the unusual expression (it does not occur in Shaks.) 'a man far gone in years,' which RV retains. The Gr. (προβεβηκὼς τὴν ἡλικίαν) is common enough, the identical phrase occurring again in 6^{18}, where it is tr^{d} 'an aged man,' RV 'well stricken in years.' Cf. Gn 24^{1} 'And Abraham was old, and well stricken in age,' AVm 'gone into days.' But the most important use of 'go' in this fig. sense is to express the progress of an undertaking, as in 2 S 1^{4} 'And David said unto him, How went the matter?' (מֶה־הָיָה הַדָּבָר, lit., as AVm, 'What was the thing?'); and To 10^{8} 'I will send to thy father, and they shall declare unto him how things go with thee' (τὰ κατὰ σέ). Cf. Tind. Prologe to the Pent. of 1534, 'Then go to and reade the storyes of the byble for thy lerninge and comforte, and se every thinge practysed before thyne eyes: for accordinge to those ensamples shall it goo with the and all men untill the worldes ende.' Cf. also Job 8^{13} Cov. 'Even so goeth it with all them, that forget God,' and Hos 10^{15} Cov. 'Even so shal it go with you (o Bethel) because of youre malicious wickednes.' So Shaks. Winter's Tale, III. ii. 218—

> 'Howe'er the business goes, you have made fault
> I' the boldness of your speech.'

The idiom is not obsolete; on the contrary, it has lately received a further and bolder extension, which may be illustrated by the following quotation from Harper's Magazine, lxxvi. 808, 'Society has invented no infliction equal to a large dinner that does not go, as the phrase is. Why it does not go when the viands are good and the company is bright, is one of the acknowledged mysteries.' More frequently, however, some adverb accompanies 'go,' to express the manner of progress. In AV we find: (1) Go well, Dt 4^{40} 'that it may go well with thee'; Heb. יִיטַב לְךָ, which occurs also 5^{16} $12^{25.\ 28}$ (EV 'go well with'), 5^{29} $6^{3.\ 18}$ 22^{7} (EV 'be well with'); and the similar phrase וְטוֹב לְ in 5^{33} (EV 'that it may be well with'), 19^{13} (EV 'go well with'). The Eng. phrase occurs also in 2 Ch 12^{12} 'in Judah things went well' (הָיָה דְּבָרִים טוֹבִים); Pr 11^{10} 'When it goeth well with the righteous, the city rejoiceth' (בְּטוּב צַדִּיקִים); To 12^{17} 'it shall go well with you' (εἰρήνη ὑμῖν ἔσται, RV 'ye shall have peace'); 14^{9} 'that it may go well with thee' (ἵνα σοι καλῶς ᾖ, RV 'that it may be well with thee'); Sir 1^{13} 'Whoso feareth the Lord, it shall go well with him at the last' (τῷ φοβουμένῳ τὸν Κύριον εὖ ἔσται ἐπ' ἐσχάτων).* Cf. Shaks. K. John, III. iv. 4—

> 'Courage and comfort! all shall yet go well.
> What can go well, when we have run so ill?'

(2) Go ill, Job 20^{26} 'it shall go ill with him that is left in his tabernacle,' so RVm, but RV 'it shall consume that which is left in his tent,' Dav. 'it shall devour him that is left in his tent' (Heb. יֵרַע שָׂרִיד בְּאָהֳלוֹ); Ps 106^{32} 'they angered him also at the waters of strife, so that it went ill with Moses for their sakes' (וַיֵּרַע לְ). So Shaks. Cymb. I. vii. 95—

> 'Doubting things go ill often hurts more
> Than to be sure they do.'

(3) Go evil, 1 Ch 7^{23} 'it went evil with his house (בְּרָעָה הָיְתָה). (4) Go sore, 1 S 31^{3} 'And the battle went sore against Saul' (וַתִּכְבַּד אֶל); 1 Ch 10^{3} (וַתִּכְבַּד עַל). This is Coverdale's tr^{n}; Wyc. 1382, 'And al the charge (1388 'weighte') of the batayl is turned unto Saul,' and Dou. 'And the whole weight of the battel was turned upon Saul,' are after the Vulg. 'Totumque pondus proelii versum est in Saul'; LXX is more literal, καὶ βαρύνεται ὁ πόλεμος ἐπὶ Σαούλ. Cf. Tindale, Works, i. 90, 'What shall we then say to those Scriptures which go so sore upon good works?' (5) Go right, Sir 49^{9} 'and directed them that went right' (RV 'and to do good to them that directed their ways aright,' reading καὶ ἀγαθῶσαι [for AV καὶ κατώρθωσε] τοὺς εὐθύνοντας ὁδούς).

4. One of the ways by which the verb to 'go' extended its meaning was by accepting 'went' as its past tense. 'Went' was the past tense of the verb to 'wend,' and had originally but little connexion with 'go' in meaning, as it had none in etymology. For 'go' is now the opposite of 'come'; but as a river may 'come winding' as well as 'go winding,' it was possible formerly to say that it 'came and went,' and yet express movement in only one direction. Hence we find 'went' and even 'go' used of a river, where the meaning is 'took its (winding) course.' Thus Gn 2^{10} 'And a river went out of Eden to water the garden' (יֹצֵא; LXX ἐκπορεύεται, Vulg. 'egrediebatur,' Wyc. 1832, 'And a flood gede out of the place of delice to watre paradis'). Cf. Milton, Lycidas, 103—

* 'Go well' occurs in another sense in Pr 30^{29} 'There be three things which go well' (RV 'are stately in their march').

> 'Next Camus, reverend sire, went footing slow.'

'Wend' has practically gone out of use, and 'yode' the original past tense of 'go' is obsolete long since, so that 'go' and 'went' serve as present and past with the same meaning throughout. Before passing from this matter of form, it may be well to notice the old-fashioned 'let us be going' (Jg 19^{28} 'Up and let us be going' קוּמִי וְנֵלֵכָה; Mt 26^{46} ἄγωμεν), which would now be called a 'Scotticism,' though RV retains it. The identical phrase (ἐγείρεσθε ἄγωμεν) tr^d in Mt 'Rise, let us be going,' is found in Mk 14^{42}, where AV gives 'Rise up, let us go,' but RV 'Arise, let us be going,' as in Mt 26^{46}. Again, in Jn 14^{31} we find ἐγείρεσθε ἄγωμεν ἐντεῦθεν, but 'let us be going hence' proved too much for RV; both versions give 'Arise, let us go hence.' Another grammatical peculiarity is found in Is 15^5 'for by the mounting up of Luhith with weeping they shall go it up,' for 'go up it,' the object preceding its preposition. Cf. North's Plutarch, Pelopidas, p. 324, 'Notwithstanding, when they came to the hilles, they sought forcibly to clime them up.'

5. The verb to 'go' forms with other words, chiefly adverbs, some noteworthy expressions.

1. Go about: This phrase has three clearly distinguishable meanings (see ABOUT). (1) 'Go round,' Jos 6^{11} 'So the ark of God compassed the city, going about it once' (הַקֵּף); (2) Go from place to place,' as Ac 10^{38} 'who went about doing good'; and (3) 'set oneself to do,' 'attempt,' as Ac 26^{21} 'For these causes the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me.' The verbs tr^d 'go about' with the second meaning are סָבַב sâbhabh, lit. 'turn' (Jos 16^6, 1 S 15^{12}, 2 K 3^{25}, 2 Ch 17^9 23^2, Ps 55^{10} [Piel], Ec 2^{20}, Ca 3^2 [Piel], 3^3 5^7), הָלַךְ hâlak, 'go' (Pr 20^{19}), שׁוּט shûṭ, 'wander' (Nu 11^8), סָחַר ṣâḥar, usually 'traffic' (Jer 14^{18}), חָמַק ḥâmaḳ, 'turn away' (Jer 31^{22} Hithp.='turn hither and thither'), περίαγω 'lead or go round' (Mt 4^{23} 9^{35}, Ac 13^{11}), and διέρχομαι 'go through' or 'throughout' (Ac 10^{38}). Cov. uses the same phrase in Job 27^{12} 'Wherfore then do ye go aboute with soch vayne wordes'; Hos 11^{12} 'Ephraim goeth aboute me with lies' (EV 'compasseth me'); and Tind. in Jn 7^1 'After that, Jesus went about in Galile and wolde not go about in Jewry.' Cf. Shaks. Macbeth, I. iii. 34—

> 'The weird sisters, hand in hand,
> Posters of the sea and land,
> Thus do go about, about.'

But the third meaning is the most archaic now. It occurs only once in OT, Dt 31^{21} 'I know their imagination which they go about' (עֹשֶׂה, AVm 'do,' Driver, 'worketh' [the 'people' being singular], lit. 'maketh'). In Apocr. once also, 1 Mac 11^1 'the king of Egypt . . . went about through deceit to get Alexander's kingdom' (ἐζήτησε, RV 'sought'). In NT seven times, Jn $7^{19.\,20}$, Ac 21^{31}, Ro 10^3 (ζητέω), Ac 26^{21} (πειράομαι), 24^6 (πειράζω), 9^{29} (ἐπιχειρέω). These verbs all mean to 'try,' 'attempt,' and are so tr^d elsewhere. Thus in Jn $7^{19.\,20}$ ζητέω is tr^d 'go about,' but in 7^{25} 'seek.' The earlier VSS have the phrase 'go about' still oftener. Thus in Tind. we find it Mt 13^{29} 'whill ye go aboute to wede out the tares'; Mk 12^{12} 'they went about to take him, but they feared the people'; Lk 17^{33} 'Whosoever will goo about to save his lyfe shall loose it'; Jn 10^{30} 'Agayne they went aboute to take him: but he escaped out of their hondes.' So Cov. in Job 32^{22} 'For yf I wolde go aboute to please men, I knowe not how soone my maker wolde take me awaye'; and Rhem. in Lk 1^1 'Because many have gone about to compile a narration of the things that have been accomplished among us.' Hooker begins his Eccles. Polity with the phrase, 'He that goeth about to persuade a multitude, that they are not so well governed as they ought to be, shall never want attentive and favourable hearers.' And it is common in Shaks., as Henry V. IV. i. 212, 'You may as well go about to turn the sun to ice with fanning in his face with a peacock's feather.'

2. Go abroad: There are two meanings: (1) 'Go from home,' 'go out of doors'; Dt 23^{10} 'then shall he go abroad out of the camp' (וְיָצָא אֶל־מִחוּץ לַמַּחֲנֶה). So Shaks. II Henry IV. I. ii. 107, 'I am glad to see your lordship abroad; I heard say, your lordship was sick; I hope, your lordship goes abroad by advice.' (2) 'Go hither and thither'; Ps 77^{17} 'Thine arrows also went abroad' (יִתְהַלָּכוּ: 'went hither and thither'—Del., Cheyne; God's arrows being the flashes of lightning); Mt 9^{26}, Jn 21^{23} (ἐξέρχομαι); Lk 5^{15} 'But so much the more went there a fame abroad of him' (διήρχετο). T. Lever (Sermons, Arber's ed. p. 29) uses the phrase more boldly, suppressing the verb 'go': 'loke at the merchauntes of London, and ye shall se . . . their riches muste abrode in the countrey to bie fermes out of the handes of worshypfull gentlemen, honeste yeomen, and pore laborynge husbandes.'

3. Go after: (1) 'Walk behind'; Jos 3^3 'When ye see the ark of the covenant of the LORD your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it, then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it' (וַהֲלַכְתֶּם אַחֲרָיו). (2) 'Follow'; 2 S 20^{11} 'He that favoureth Joab, and he that is for David, let him go after Joab' (אַחֲרֵי, no verb in Heb., RV 'let him follow'). In NT with Gr. ἀπέρχομαι ὀπίσω Mk 1^{20}, Jn 12^{19}, Jude ^{7}; without ὀπίσω Lk 17^{23}, and with πορεύομαι ὀπίσω Lk 21^8. But especially to follow so as to become a votary of, sometimes of J″ in OT (Jer 2^2), but most frequently of 'other gods,' the Heb. phrase being הָלַךְ אַחֲרֵי (Dt 6^{14} 11^{28} 13^2 28^{14}—the Heb. phrase occurs also 4^3 EV 'follow,' 8^{19} EV 'walk after'—Jer 2^{23} 11^{10} 25^6 35^{15}). The same Heb. is used of following 'strangers' (Jer 2^{25}), 'lovers' (Hos 2^{13}), and the 'strange woman' (Pr 7^{22}); and it has a fig. use in Ezk 33^{31} 'their heart goeth after their covetousness' (RV 'their gain'). In 1 K 11^6 the same idea is otherwise expressed, 'Solomon . . . went not fully after the LORD' (לֹא מִלֵּא אַחֲרֵי). (3) 'Pursue'; Jos 8^{17} 'And there was not a man left in Ai or Bethel, that went not out after Israel' (יָצְא אַחֲרֵי), Ezk 9^5 'Go ye after him through the city, and smite' (עִבְרוּ אַחֲרָיו). (4) 'Seek'; Lk 15^4 'go after that which is lost' (πορεύεται ἐπὶ τὸ ἀπολωλός).

4. Go again: always='go back' (see AGAIN), as 1 S 25^{12} 'So David's young men turned their way, and went again, and came and told him all those sayings' (וַיָּשֻׁבוּ, RV 'and went back'); 2 K 4^{31} 'Wherefore he went again to meet him' (וַיָּשָׁב, RV 'he returned'). The Heb. is always שׁוּב 'turn,' the Gr. ἐπιστρέφω (Ac 15^{36}).

5. Go along: The expression occurs Nu 21^{22}, Dt 2^{27}, Jos 17^7, Jg 11^{18}, 1 S 6^{12}, 2 S 3^{16} 16^{13}, Jer 41^6, and always stands for the simple verb הָלַךְ to 'go.' In Jos 17^7 it is the 'border' that is said to 'go along,' a Heb. idiom taken bodily into the Eng.; it is more frequent as 'go out,' see below.

6. Go aside: 'to go to one side.' (1) Literally, Heb. סוּר (Jer 15^5 'Who shall go aside to ask how thou doest?' RV 'turn aside'); Gr. ἀναχωρέω (Ac 23^{19} 26^{31}), ὑποχωρέω (Lk 9^{10}), ἀπέρχομαι (Ac 4^{15}). (2) Metaphorically, 'to go wrong,' Heb. שָׂטָה sâṭâh (Nu $5^{12.\,19.\,20.\,29}$), סוּר (Dt 28^{14}, Ps 14^3 'They are all gone aside, they are altogether become filthy'). The same idea is expressed by the verb alone in

Article IX (XXXIX Articles, 1571), 'man is very farre gone from originall righteousnes.'

7. Go astray: both literally and figuratively, but always the tr^{n} of a simple verb, mostly תָּעָה 'to err' (Ex 23^{4}, Ps 58^{3} 119^{176}, Pr 7^{25}, Is 53^{6}, Jer 50^{6} [Hiph. 'cause to go astray'], Ezk 14^{11} 44$^{10\ bis.\ 15}$ 48$^{11\ ter}$); also נִדַּח (Dt 22^{1} 'Thou shalt not see thy brother's ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself from them,' נִדָּחִים 'driven away,' i.e. parted forcibly from the herd through some mishap—Driver); שָׁגַג (Ps 119^{67} 'Before I was afflicted I went astray'); שָׁגָה (Pr 5^{23} and [Hiph.] 28^{10} 'cause to go astray'). In NT always πλανάομαι (Mt 18$^{12.\ 13}$, 1 P 2^{25}, 2 P 2^{15}).

In Gn 6^{3} RVm gives 'in their going astray they are flesh,' the text being 'for that he also is flesh.' The difficulty is with the word בְּשַׁגָּם [Baer בְּשַׁגָּם]. It has been taken as composed of בְּשֶׁ [=בַּאֲשֶׁר] and גַּם 'also.' So all the Versions, the Jewish interpreters, and most modern expositors. Thus LXX διὰ τὸ εἶναι αὐτοὺς σάρκας, Vulg. 'quia caro est,' Wyc. 'for flehs he is,' Luth. 'denn sie sind Fleisch,' Tind. 'for they are flesh,' Cov. 'for he is but flesh also' (the first version to recognize the גַּם), Gen. 'because he is but flesh,' Bish., Dou. 'because he is flesh,' Olt. 'car aussi ne sont-ils que chair,' Segond 'car l'homme n'est que chair.' But שֶׁ is nowhere else found for אֲשֶׁר in Gn, or even in the Pent., and the גַּם 'also' seems superfluous. Hence some modern scholars make the word an inf. of שָׁגַג, and translate somewhat as RVm. Dillmann and Kautzsch consider the word to be corrupt, and refuse to translate; Ball suggests בַּעֲוֹנָם (Lv 26^{39}), and translates 'owing to their guilt they are flesh.'

8. Go a warfare: 1 Co 9^{7} 'Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges?' (τίς στρατεύεται, RV 'What soldier ever serveth at his own charges?'). Elsewhere the Gr. verb is tr^{d} 'war' (2 Co 10^{3}, 1 Ti 1^{18}, 2 Ti 2^{4}, Ja 4^{1}, 1 P 2^{11}), as 1 P 2^{11} 'abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul'; except Lk 3^{14}, where the ptcp. (στρατευόμενοι) is tr^{d} 'soldiers.' For the Eng. phrase (which comes from Tind. 'Who goeth a warfare eny tyme at his awne cost?') cf. Tindale's Prologe to Leviticus, 'For the holy gost is no dome god nor no god that goeth a mumminge'; and Defoe, Crusoe (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 555), 'We then went to consulting together what was to be done.'

9. Go away: (1) 'Pass away,' 'perish,' Job 4^{21} 'Doth not their excellency which is in them go away?' (נִסַּע, RV 'Is not their tent-cord plucked up within them?' for the word tr^{d} 'excellency' means also a 'cord,' and the verb means first of all 'to pull up' a tent-peg or cord, though it thence is extended to the meaning 'break up an encampment,' 'go away.' Davidson translates the whole verse—'If their tent-cord is torn away in them, do they not die, and not in wisdom?' and remarks (Expos. III. iv. 279 f.), 'The striking of the tent is a graphic and not uncommon image for the removal which comes in death'); Jer 6^{4} 'Woe unto us! for the day goeth away, for the shadows of the evening are stretched out' (פָּנָה, RV 'declineth'). (2) 'Turn aside from,' 'desert,' Ezk 44^{10} 'And the Levites that are gone away far from me, when Israel went astray . . . they shall even bear their iniquity' (אֲשֶׁר רָחֲקוּ, RV 'that went far from me'); Mal 3^{7} 'Even from the days of your fathers ye are gone away from mine ordinances' (סַרְתֶּם, RV 'ye have turned aside'); Jn 6^{67} 'Then Jesus said unto the twelve, Will ye also go away?' (μὴ καὶ ὑμεῖς θέλετε ὑπάγειν), 12^{11} 'many of the Jews went away, and believed on Jesus' (ὑπῆγον). (3) 'Escape,' 1 S 24^{19} 'For if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away' (וְשִׁלְּחוֹ בְּדֶרֶךְ טוֹבָה, lit. 'will he send him along a prosperous way?').

10. Go a whoring: This strong expression, which comes from Tindale (Wyc. has 'do fornicacioun'), is used to tr. the Heb. verb זָנָה zânâh, 'to commit fornication,' when followed by אַחֲרֵי 'after' (Ex 34$^{15.\ 16}$, Lv 17^{7} 20$^{5.\ 6}$, Nu 15^{39}, Dt 31^{16}, Jg 2^{17} 8$^{27.\ 33}$, 1 Ch 5^{25}, Ezk 6^{9} 23^{30}, and once in Ex 34^{16}, where the vb. is Hiphil, 'make thy sons go a whoring after their gods'); also when zânâh is followed by מִן 'from' (Ps 73^{27} 'Thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from thee'), בְּ 'with' (Ps 106^{39} 'went a whoring with their own inventions'), מִתַּחַת 'from under' (Hos 4^{12}), and מֵעַל 'from' (Hos 9^{1}). It is used once without a prep. following, 2 Ch 21^{13} 'And hast made Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to go a whoring' (וַתַּזְנֶה). The Heb. phrase is always a figure of speech, and expresses 'the disloyal abandonment of J″ for other gods'—Driver. It suggests, adds Moore, both the sin of unfaithfulness and the sin of prostitution, the giving up of oneself, body and soul, to other gods. But whether it was a figure always, it is hard to say. In view of the fact that actual prostitution was not an uncommon feature in ancient Semitic cults, Driver thinks the original sense not improbably literal. It depends upon the date of the origin of the expression. Moore believes that it originated with Hosea, 'whose own bitter experience with his adulterous wife became for him the type of the relations of J″ and Israel.' Modern translators try to soften the expression: thus Cheyne in Ps 73^{27} 'every one that wantonly deserts thee.' RV retains, but Amer. RV prefers 'play the harlot.'

11. Go back: Besides the literal sense, notice (1) to 'depart from an engagement or course of action,' Jg 11^{35} 'I have opened my mouth unto the LORD, and I cannot go back' (וְלֹא אוּכַל לָשׁוּב); Ezk 24^{14} 'I will not go back, neither will I spare, neither will I repent' (לֹא־אֶפְרַע). (2) To 'decline to a worse way,' Jos 23^{12}, Job 23^{12}, Ps 53^{3} 80^{18}, Jn 6^{66}. Cf. Jer 44^{3} Cov. 'they wente backe to do sacrifice and worshipe unto straunge goddes.'

12. Go beyond is used in two senses: (1) to 'go outside of,' 'pass'; Nu 22^{18} 'I cannot go beyond the word of the LORD my God, to do less or more'; 24^{13} 'I cannot go beyond the commandment (RV 'word') of the LORD, to do either good or bad of mine own mind' (both לַעֲבֹר). Cf. Heywood, Works, i. 210, 'Shoomaker, you goe a little beyond your last.' (2) To 'overreach,' 1 Th 4^{6} 'That no man go beyond and defraud his brother' (τὸ μὴ ὑπερβαίνειν, RV 'transgress,' RVm 'overreach'). So Life of T. Cromwell, IV. v. 120, 'We must be wary, else he'll go beyond us'; and Shaks. Henry VIII. III. ii. 409—

> 'There was the weight that pull'd me down. O Cromwell,
> The king has gone beyond me.'

13. Go for, i.e. 'be accounted,' 1 S 17^{12} 'the man went among men for an old man in the days of Saul' (וְזָקֵן בָּא בַאֲנָשִׁים, RV 'was an old man in the days of Saul, stricken in years among men').

The AV tr^{n} is a bold and apparently an original attempt to render the Heb. literally. The nearest form in the previous versions is that of the Gen. Bible, 'this man was taken for an olde man in the days of Saul.' But the Heb. will not render so. The only literal rendering that the Heb. will stand is, 'and the man in the days of Saul was aged, entered in among men,'—which, as Driver says, affords no intelligible sense. Two suggestions have been made, the one to omit בא, when we get simply 'and the man in the days of Saul was aged among men'; the other, to change באנשים into בשנים, and translate 'and the man in the days of Saul entered into years.' The objection to the second is that the phrase elsewhere is always וזקן בא בימים, and Driver, on the whole, prefers the first. (See Heb. Text of Samuel, p. 108 f.; and a severe criticism by Jennings and Lowe of the RV tr^{n}, which they consider to be impossible as a rendering of the Massoretic text, in Expos. III. ii. 63).

The AV tr^{n}, though impossible as a rendering of the Heb., is good idiomatic English. Thus Sidney, Arcadia, p. 10, 'But because a pleasant fellow of my acquaintance set forth her praises in verse, I will only repeat them, and spare mine owne tongue, since she goes for a woman'; and Shaks. Macbeth, III. i. 92—

> 'We are men, my liege.
> Ay, in the catalogue ye go for men.'

14. Go forth: Among other expressions (see FORTH) notice especially 'motion away from a given spot,' in Lk 8^{14} 'And that which fell among thorns are they, which, when they have heard, go forth' (πορευόμενοι, RV 'as they go on their way'). Cf. Lk 5^{8} Rhem. 'Which when Simon Peter did see, he fel downe at Jesus knees, saying, Goe forth from me, because I am a sinful man, O Lord.'

15. Go forward—see under FORWARD.

16. Go hard='go close,' Jg 9^{52}, see HARD.

17. Go in and out: This phrase is found in Ac 1^{21} 'all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us' (εἰσῆλθεν καὶ ἐξῆλθεν ἐφ' ἡμᾶς), and the meaning may be no more than 'passed his time,' though the ἐφ' seems to imply leadership, whence RVm 'over us.' In 9^{28} occurs the fuller phrase 'coming in and going out,' 'And he [Saul] was with them coming in and going out at Jerusalem' (εἰσπορευόμενος καὶ ἐκπορευόμενος, RV 'going in and going out'), where, again, some more definite activity is meant than merely 'spending his time,' probably something like what is now called 'aggressive work.' In OT this fuller phrase occurs repeatedly (Nu $27^{17.\,21}$, Dt $28^{6.\,19}$ 31^{2} 33^{18}, Jos 14^{11}, 1 S $18^{13.\,16}$ 29^{6}, 2 S 3^{25}, 1 K 3^{7}, 2 K 11^{8} 19^{27}, 1 Ch 27^{1}, 2 Ch 1^{10} 15^{5} 16^{1} $23^{7.\,8}$, Ps 121^{8}, Is 37^{28}, Jer 37^{4}, Zec 8^{10}). While always recognized as an idiomatic expression for a man's active life, it is sometimes clearly used in a more technical sense than that. When Moses says (Dt 31^{2}), 'I am an hundred and twenty years old this day; I can no more go out and come in,' he intimates his failing fitness to be Israel's leader. More distinctly Joshua states (Jos 14^{11}) that in his 85th year he is still fit to be their leader in war: 'As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me: as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, both to go out and to come in.' Of David it is said (1 S 18^{13}), 'Saul removed him from him, and made him his captain over a thousand; and he went out and came in before the people,' where the reference must be to military expeditions. Solomon says (1 K 3^{7}), 'I am but a little child; I know not how to go out or come in,' and declares his unfitness to be king. See go out below. The phrase 'go in and out' occurs in Ex 32^{27} in the sense of 'go to and fro' (as RV); and in Jn 10^{9} 'by me, if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out, and find pasture' (εἰσελεύσεται καὶ ἐξελεύσεται, RV 'shall go in and go out') as in Ac 1^{21}, but figuratively to express the liberty of the sons of God.

18. Go on: (1) Continue a course begun, proceed, as in Shaks. Othello, III. iii. 413—

> 'I do not like the office;
> But, sith I am entered in this cause so far,
> Prick'd to 't by foolish honesty and love,
> I will go on.'

Generally of a journey, Gn 29^{1} 'Then Jacob went on his journey' (וַיִּשָּׂא רַגְלָיו, lit. 'lifted up his feet,' as AVm, RVm); so Ac 10^{9} 'as they went on their journey' (ὁδοιπορούντων ἐκείνων, RV 'as they were on their journey'); Mt 4^{21} 'And going on from thence, he saw other two brethren' (προβὰς ἐκεῖθεν, lit. 'going forward thence'). In 1 S 10^{3} the simple verb חָלַף 'to pass on,' is tr^d 'go on forward.' In Gn 19^{2} 32^{1}, 1 S 26^{25} 28^{22} we find the fuller expression 'go on one's way.' See Go one's way below. Sometimes the meaning is simply 'continue,' 'persist,' as 1 S 14^{19} 'the noise that was in the host of the Philistines went on and increased' (וַיֵּלֶךְ הָלוֹךְ וָרָב, LXX ἐπορεύετο πορευόμενος καὶ ἐπλήθυνεν); Ps 68^{21} 'such an one as goeth on still in his trespasses' (מִתְהַלֵּךְ בְּ). In Ezr 5^{8} it is to 'advance,' 'make progress,' 'this work goeth fast on and prospereth'; and in He 6^{1} the phrase is fig. 'let us go on unto perfection' (φερώμεθα, RV 'press on'). (2) To go to meet an enemy, generally 'go out,' Job 39^{21} 'he goeth on to meet the armed men' (RV 'he goeth out'). (3) To go forward, towards the front, said of the 'border' of a territory, Nu $34^{4.\,9}$. See Go out, below.

19. Go out: Besides its uses in modern English, this phrase has some peculiarly biblical senses, which are for the most part due to the freedom with which the verb יָצָא is employed in Hebrew. (1) To go from home: Ru 1^{21} 'I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me home again empty'; so Adonijah is threatened by Solomon, 'on the day thou goest out, and passest over the brook Kidron, thou shalt know for certain that thou shalt surely die'; and of Abraham it is said in He 11^{8} 'when he was called to go out . . . he went out' (ἐξελθεῖν . . . ἐξῆλθεν); while it is one of the rewards of the Christian victor that he will be at home in the Church of which he is made a pillar, and 'shall go no more out' (Rev 3^{12} ἔξω οὐ μὴ ἐξέλθῃ ἔτι, RV 'he shall go out thence no more'). In 2 Ch 18^{21} 'I will go out and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And the Lord said . . . go out, and do even so' (in 1 K 22^{22} 'go forth,' as RV here), the reference is the same as in Job 1^{12} 2^{7} 'So Satan went forth from the presence of the LORD.' Less definitely, Gn 41^{45} 'And Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt'; 2 Ch 19^{4} 'Jehoshaphat . . . went out again through the people from Beersheba to Mount Ephraim' (a formula during the separation of the kingdoms for the old 'from Dan to Beersheba'); and Ps 81^{5} 'This he ordained in Joseph for a testimony when he went through the land of Egypt' (בְּצֵאתוֹ עַל־אֶרֶץ מִצְרָיִם, RV 'when he went out over the land of Egypt,' the ref. being apparently, as in AV, to Joseph's administration (Gn 41^{45}), which is surprising, seeing that modern English commentators almost unanimously find the ref. to be to God).

The passage is difficult; there are three ways of taking it: (a) The ancient VSS tr. 'when he (Israel) went out from the land of Egypt,' as LXX ἐν τῷ ἐξελθεῖν αὐτὸν ἐκ τῆς Αἰγύπτου; Vulg. 'cum exiret de Terra-Ægypti,' after which Wyc. 1388, 'whanne he gede out of the lond of Egipt,' and Dou. 'when he came out of the Land of Aegypt' (with the marg. 'The people of Israel signified by Joseph, as Ps 80^{1}'); and so all the Eng. VSS before AV. But the trⁿ is quite impossible, the עַל never meaning ἐκ 'out of,' or anything approaching that. (b) 'When he (Joseph, in person) went out over the land of Egypt,' a direct ref. to Gn 41^{45}, which gives no appropriate sense. (c) 'When He (J″) went forth against the land of Egypt,' a reference to the death of the firstborn, and especially to Ex 11^{4} 'I will go forth through the midst of Egypt.' So Del., Perowne, Burgess, de Witt, Kirkpatrick, and nearly all recent commentators. Kay thinks that, while the ref. is to God, the special language recalls Gn 41^{45}: as Joseph once went out over the land of Egypt to benefit them, so now, since they have forgotten their benefactor, Joseph's God will go out over the land in righteous judgment. Cheyne believes the present Heb. text to be corrupt, and that the VSS exhibit the true text; he therefore would render, as (a), 'when he (Israel and Joseph) went forth from the land of Egypt.' So Wellh. (in Haupt) who reads מֵעַל for עַל (but is מֵעַל ever used simply of leaving?).

(2) To spread abroad: 1 Ch 14^{17} 'And the fame of David went out into all lands'; Est 9^{4} 'For Mordecai was great in the king's house, and his fame went out throughout all the provinces' (הוֹלֵךְ, RV 'went forth'). (3) In reference to war, the phrase assumes a highly technical sense, so much so that 'to go out' standing alone may be understood to mean 'to go out to make war.' Take the foll. passages in order: Nu 22^{32} (the Angel of the LORD to Balaam) 'behold, I went out to withstand thee'; Dt 28^{25} 'thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them'; Jg 2^{15} 'Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the LORD was against them for evil'; Jg 5^{4} 'LORD, when thou wentest out of Seir, when thou marchedst out of the field of Edom, the earth trembled' (see Moore, who holds the ref. to be to the battle just fought); 20^{1} 'Then all the children of Israel went out'; 1 S 8^{20} 'Nay, but we will have a king over us . . . that our king may judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles'; 18[5] 'And David went out whithersoever Saul sent him'; (RVm 'went out; whithersoever Saul sent him, he behaved himself wisely'); 1 K 2[46] 'So the king commanded Benaiah the son of Jehoiada; which went out and fell upon him [Shimei], that he died'; 1 Ch 20[1] 'at the time that kings go out' (both VSS add 'to battle' in italics); Is 52[12] 'For ye shall not go out with haste, nor go by flight'; and Am 5[3] 'The city that went out by a thousand shall leave an hundred.' (4) Another half-technical sense, which is in danger of being confused with the last, is found when 'go out' means 'go out of bondage,' mostly in reference to the exodus from Egypt or to the jubilee release. The chief references to the exodus are Ex 12[41] 14[8], Nu 33[3], Ps 114[1]; to the jubilee release, Ex 21[3 bis. 7], Lv 25[28. 30. 31. 33. 54] 27[21], the fuller expression 'go out free' occurring Ex 21[2. 5. 11]; 2 K 13[5] refers to the deliverance from the Syrian oppression; and Is 55[12] to the return from the Babylonian Captivity, with no doubt a fuller entrance into Messianic blessing. (5) By a peculiar Heb. idiom the 'border' or 'coast' of a territory is said to 'go out,' that is, 'proceed onward' to such a place. So frequently in Jos 15. 16 and elsewhere, the verb יָצָא being generally rendered 'go out' and עָלָה 'go up.' But notice especially the subst. תּוֹצָאָה denoting the end or extremity of a boundary line, generally used in the plu. and tr[d] 'goings out,' but 'outgoings' in Jos 17[9. 18] 18[19] 19[14. 22. 29. 33], which RV turns into 'goings out.' (6) Go out means 'proceed from' in Lv 10[2] 'And there went out a fire from the LORD'; Jer 21[12] 'lest my fury go out like fire' (פֶּן־תֵּצֵא); Mk 5[30] = Lk 8[46] 'And Jesus, immediately knowing in himself that virtue had gone out of him' (τὴν ἐξ αὐτοῦ δύναμιν ἐξελθοῦσαν); Lk 6[19] 'there went virtue out of him and healed them all' (παρ' αὐτοῦ ἐξήρχετο, RV 'came forth from him'); 2[1] 'And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus' (ἐξῆλθεν). Cf. Jer 44[17] Cov. 'what so ever goeth out of oure owne mouth, that will we do.' (7) 'Go out' implies religious separation in Is 52[11], Jer 51[45], 1 Jn 2[19]. (8) 'Go out of the way' in Ro 3[12] means to 'go astray' (πάντες ἐξέκλιναν, RV 'They have all turned aside'). See go the way, below.

20. Go to: This obsolete expression, which is found 11 times in AV, seems to have been introduced by Tindale, who uses it in other places, as Dt 2[24] 'Goo to and conquere and provoke him to batayle'; 2[31] 'goo to and conquere, that thou mayest possesse his londe.' Abbott (Shakespearian Grammar, p. 122) says that the 'to' has an adverbial force, as in 'to and fro'; and as 'go' in Elizabethan English meant motion generally, not necessarily motion from, 'go to' meant little more than our stimulative 'come.' This is practically how Johnson explains the phrase—'Come, come, take the right course,' spoken sometimes sarcastically, sometimes encouragingly. In Shakespeare it is always an exclamation, expressing either scorn, as Winter's Tale, I. ii. 182—or disapproval, as Macbeth, V. i. 51—'Go to, go to: you have known what you should not'; or merely dismissal, as Merry Wives, I. iv. 165—'But, indeed, she is given too much to allicholly and musing. But for you—well, go to'; or even encouragement, Merry Wives, II. i. 7—'You are not young, no more am I: go to then, there's sympathy'; always, however, mixed with impatience. But if 'go to' is a mere exclamation in Shaks. and Elizabethan English generally, it is often more than that in AV, for it must not be forgotten that AV represents a much earlier stage of English than its date of 1611. There it is (except perhaps in Ja) a verb in the imperative, and expresses lively encouragement. This is clearly seen in 2 K 5[5] 'And the king of Syria said, Go to, go, and I will send a letter unto the king of Israel.' Its occurrences are Gn 11[3. 4. 7] (הָבָה voluntative, fr. יָהַב to grant), 38[16] 'go to, I pray thee' (הָבָה־נָּא; the only remaining example of הָבָה, Ex 1[10], was tr[d] by Tindale 'Come on,' and this was retained in subsequent versions); Jg 7[3] 'go to, proclaim' (קְרָא נָא 'cry now!'); 2 K 5[5] 'go to, go' (לֶךְ בֹּא, lit. 'go, go in,' perhaps as Ball, 'depart thou [thither], enter [the land of Israel]'; LXX Δεῦρο εἴσελθε); Ec 2[1] 'go to now' (לְכָה־נָּא); Is 5[5] 'And now, go to; I will tell you' (וְעַתָּה אוֹדִיעָה־נָּא אֶתְכֶם); Jer 18[11] 'go to, speak' (אֱמָר־נָא); Ja 4[13] 5[1] 'Go to now' (Ἄγε νῦν). Tindale in his exposition of Mt 5[15-20] (Expos. p. 124) has 'go to and prove it'; and (p. 128) 'Go to, and judge their works'; and in the Prologe to the Pent. he says, 'Then go to and reade the storyes of the byble for thy lerning and comforte,' where the verbal force of the expression is always manifest. But he even uses 'went to' in Nu 11[4] 'And the children of Ysrael also went to and wepte and sayde: who shall geve us flesh to eate?'

> 'Go to, go to! How she holds up the neb, the bill to him!';

21. Go one's way: This full phrase sometimes represents an equally full expression in the original: thus, Gn 32[1] 'And Jacob went on his way,' Heb. הָלַךְ לְדַרְכּוֹ, so 19[2], Nu 24[25], Jos 2[16], Jg 18[26], 1 S 1[18] 26[25] 28[22], Jer 28[11]. But generally (always in NT) it is the rendering of a common verb with no adjunct. The verbs are אָזַל (Pr 20[14]); נָסַע (Zec 10[2]); הָלַךְ (Gn 12[19] 14[11] 18[33] 24[61] 25[34], Ex 18[27], Jg 19[5. 14], Neh 8[10], Ec 9[7], Dn 12[9. 13]); βαδίζω (Bar 4[19]); πορεύομαι (Lk 4[30] 7[22] 17[19], Jn 4[50], Ac 9[15] 21[5] 24[25]); ὑπάγω (Mt 5[24] 8[4. 13] 20[14] 27[65], Mk 1[44] 2[11] 7[29] 10[21. 52] 11[2] 16[7], Lk 10[3], Jn 8[21] 16[5] 18[8], Rev 16[1]); and ἀπέρχομαι (Mt 8[33] 13[25] 20[4] 22[5. 22], Mk 11[4] 12[12], Lk 8[39] 19[32] 22[4], Jn 4[28] 11[28. 46], Ac 9[17], Ja 1[24]). Sometimes what appears to be the plu., but may be an old genitive, is used, 'go your ways.' The phrase is good idiomatic Eng., and is still used in Scotland and the north of England, but often it is too cumbrous, sometimes singularly so, as in Ja 1[24] κατενόησεν καὶ ἀπελήλυθεν, which Mayor translates 'just a glance and he is off' (RV 'goeth away'). AV has a few times rejected it when found in earlier versions, as Mk 1[20] Tind. 'And they leeft their father Zebede in the shippe with his hyred servauntes, and went their waye after him'; Lk 8[14] Rhem. 'And that which fel into thornes, are they that have heard, and going their waies, are choked with cares.' Shaks. has it often, as Hamlet, III. i. 132—'We are arrant knaves all; believe none of us. Go thy ways to a nunnery.'

22. Go the way: This phrase, which has no connexion with the preceding, is used both literally and figuratively. (1) Ru 1[7] 'and they went on the way to return unto the land of Judah (וַתֵּלַכְנָה בַדֶּרֶךְ); 2 K 25[4] 'and the king went the way toward the plain' (וַיֵּלֶךְ דֶּרֶךְ הָעֲרָבָה, RV 'went by the way of the Arabah'), so Jer 39[4]; Jer 31[21] 'set thine heart toward the highway, even the way which thou wentest' (דֶּרֶךְ הָלָכְתְּי). (2) Jos 23[14] 'And behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth' (אָנֹכִי הוֹלֵךְ הַיּוֹם בְּדֶרֶךְ כָּל־הָאָרֶץ); so 1 K 2[2]; Job 16[22] 'when a few years are come, then I shall go the way whence I shall not return' (וְאֹרַח לֹא־אָשׁוּב אֶהֱלֹךְ).

GOAD.—1. דָּרְבָן (ב without daghesh, cf. קָרְבָּן (once) and אָכְרָן; see Driver, Text of Sam. p. 80, and references there) occurs in a corrupt passage, 1 S 13[21] 'to set the goads.' A fem. form in plur. absolute is found in Ec 12[11], where we read that the words of the wise are as goads (כַּדָּרְבֹנוֹת). 2. מַלְמָד (Siegfried-Stade; Moore thinks מַלְמֵד probably the absolute form) only in Jg 3[31], where Shamgar is said to have killed 600 Philistines with an ox-goad (בְּמַלְמַד הַבָּקָר). The goad was a pole of some 8 ft. in length, 'armed at one end with a spike, at the other with a chisel-shaped blade for cleaning the plough, and on occasion would make a very good substitute for a spear' (Moore, Judges, 105). See further AGRICULTURE in vol. i. p. 49ᵃ, where the ox-goad is figured, and Schumacher, 'Der arab. Pflug,' in ZDPV xii. 160 f.

In Apocr. 'goad' occurs in Sir 38[25] 'How shall he become wise that holdeth the plough, that glorieth in the shaft of the goad (κέντρου)?' In NT 'goad' (RVm 'goads') is substituted by RV for 'pricks' of AV in Ac 26[14] 'It is hard for thee to kick against the goad' (πρὸς κέντρα λακτίζειν; in Ac 9[5] these words do not belong to the true text). The same figure is employed by Greek and Latin writers (e.g. Pindar, Pyth. ii. 173; Aesch. Agam. 1633, Prometh. 323; Eurip. Bacch. 791; Terence, Phorm. I. ii. 28). J. A. SELBIE.

GOAH (גֹּעָה).—An unknown locality near Jerusalem (Jer 31[39]). LXX gives, instead of a proper name, ἐξ ἐκλεκτῶν λίθων.

GOAT.—Of the six Heb. words used for the tame goat, one signifies the g. generically, and, where the context indicates it, the she goat. One is used in the masc. and fem. forms to indicate the he g. and she g. respectively. Three are used for the he g. only. One is used in AV for the scapegoat, which was prob. no goat at all, and is therefore transliterated in RV 'azâzêl. Beside these there is one word which undoubtedly signifies the wild g., and another which prob. refers to the same.

1. עֵז 'êz, αἴξ, ἔριφος, capra, hædus, Arab. ma'z, fem. 'unz. The plu. עִזִּים 'izzîm signifies the g. generically (Ex 12[5] etc.). In this sense שֵׂה עִזִּים (Dt 14[4]) signifies a head or individual of the goats, גְּדִי עִזִּים (Jg 6[19]) a kid of the goats. It is also used for she goats, the context showing the meaning (Gn 30[35] 31[38] 32[14] etc.). It is also used elliptically for goat's hair (Ex 26[7] etc.). In the sing. (Lv 17[3]) it sometimes signifies an individual g., without reference to sex; at others, where the context points out the meaning, a she g. (Gn 15[9]). The Aram. plu. עִזִּין (Ezr 6[17]) also refers to goats generically, and the construct state צְפִירֵי עִזִּין signifies 'he goats of the goats' (cf. Dn 8[5. 8]).

2. שָׂעִיר sâ'îr, χίμαρος, hircus. This word occurs freq. in Lv and Nu as the designation of the g. of the sin-offering. In its masc. form in construct state with עִזִּים it signifies the he g. (Lv 4[23]), and in its fem. שְׂעִירָה sĕ'îrâh, χίμαιρα, in construction with עִזִּים, the she g. (Lv 4[28]). The compound expression is in AV rendered 'a kid of the goats,' in RV better, simply 'goat.' Sâ'îr comes from the root שֵׂעָר sa'ar=shag or rough hair (cf. Arab. sha'r). In this sense it is used with צָפִיר, one of the words for he g., to indicate his shagginess, Dn 8[21] (AV 'rough g.,' RV 'rough he g.,' lit. 'the he g. the shaggy').

3. עַתּוּד 'attûd, used only in plu. עַתּוּדִים 'attûdîm (the same as the Arab. 'atûd, plu. a'tidah), τράγοι, κριοί, χίμαροι, hirci. It is trᵈ in LXX of Ps 50[9] χιμάρους (AV and RV 'he goats,'), and v.[13] τράγων (AV and RV 'goats'). It is rendered (Gn 31[10. 12]) AV 'rams,' AVm and RV 'he goats,' LXX οἱ τράγοι καὶ οἱ κριοί, as if the translator were uncertain which was intended, or meant to indicate that both were included, or else read from a different text. 'He goats ('attûdîm, LXX δράκοντες) before the flocks' (Jer 50[8]) signifies leaders. 'Chief ones ('attûdîm, LXX ἄρξαντες) of the earth' (Is 14[9]) is a metaphorical rendering of he goats, AVm 'leaders' or 'great goats,' RVm he goats. 'Punished the goats' (RV 'he goats'), LXX ἀμνούς (Zec 10[3]) refers to chiefs.

4. צָפִיר ẓâphîr, τράγος, hircus; צְפִיר הָעִזִּים ẓĕphîr ha'izzim, τράγος αἰγῶν (Dn 8[5. 8]); צְפִירִים ẓĕphîrîm, χιμάρους (2 Ch 29[21], Ezr 8[35]). Aram. צְפִירֵי עִזִּין, χιμάρους αἰγῶν (Ezr 6[17]). This word (Aram. and late Heb.), from the root צָפַר ẓâphar, signifying to leap, refers to the he goat alone. It is combined with sâ'îr. See (2).

5. תַּיִשׁ tayish, τράγος, aries, hircus. The same as the Arab. tais, and means a he goat only (Pr 30[31]). Plu. תְּיָשִׁים tĕyâshîm, τράγοι (Gn 30[35] 32[14], 2 Ch 17[11], not in LXX).

6. עֲזָאזֵל 'azâzêl, ἀποπομπαῖος, caper emissarius, AV scapegoat, RV Azazel (Lv 16[8. 10. 26]). See AZAZEL.

Goats have always been a large item in the wealth of the people of Bible lands. Laban had large flocks of goats (Gn 30[33. 35]). Jacob gave two hundred she goats and twenty he goats to Esau (Gn 32[14]). Nabal had a thousand goats (1 S 25[2]). Sheep and goats were kept together in flocks (Mt 25[32. 33]). Kids especially were used as food (Gn 27[9], Jg 6[19] 13[15], Lk 15[29]). The prohibition against 'seething a kid in his mother's milk' (Ex 23[19] 34[26], Dt 14[21]) may refer to the dish known to the Arabs as leben immu, i.e. 'his mother's milk.' It consists of meat, stewed in clabber, with onions, mint, and other condiments. It was probably not intended to prohibit this savoury dish altogether, but to prevent the unnaturalness of stewing a kid in its own mother's milk. (For other possible explanations see W. R. Smith, RS p. 204 n., and Driver on Dt 14[21]). A provision of a similar kind forbade the taking of a hen bird with her brood, or her eggs (Dt 22[6]). The Jews, however, interpret the passage as interdicting them from this mode of cooking flesh altogether. Goat's milk was nevertheless much used then as now (Pr 27[27]). Goats were readily convertible into money (Pr 27[26]). The 'bottles' in which wine was kept (Jos 9[4], Ps 119[83], Mk 2[22]) were made of g. skins. They were made by cutting off the head and legs, and drawing the carcase out by the neck, and then tying the neck, legs, and vent, and tanning the skin, with the hairy side out. Goat's hair was used in the construction of the Tabernacle (Ex 26[7] 35[26] 36[14]) and for other purposes (1 S 19[13]). Its usually black colour is alluded to (Ca 4[1] 6[5]). The intractable and mischievous nature of the goat is contrasted with the gentle and innocent disposition of the sheep (Mt 25[32. 33]). The goat is mentioned in Apocr. (Jth 2[17]).

The goats of Bible lands, Capra mambrica, L., have long pendent ears. These are alluded to by Am 3[12] 'as the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs, or a piece of an ear.' Some Syrian goats are white or mottled, but most of them are black. They are destructive to young trees, and are the principal impediment to the propagation of forests on the bare mountain tops, where they find their favourite pasture.

The he goat was used as a symbol of the Macedonian empire (Dn 8[5]). The stately gait of the he goat is alluded to (Pr 30[29-31]).

Two words are used for wild goats:—1. יְעֵלִים ye'êlîm. This word occurs in three passages, viz. 1 S 24[2], where LXX has for 'upon the rocks of the wild goats,' ἐπὶ πρόσωπον 'Εδδαιέμ, Ps 104[18], where it has ἐλάφοις, and Job 39[1], where for 'wild goats of the rocks' it has τραγελάφων πέτρας. This animal is without doubt the ibex. The root יָעַל yâ'al, to climb, corresponds well with its habits. Its Arab. name wa'l is evidently the same as the Hebrew. The animal is also called beden by the Arabs. Its scientific name is Capra beden, Wagn., or C. Sinaitica, Ehrh. It is found in the wilderness on both sides of the Dead Sea, and in Sinai and the Syrian Desert. There is an 'Ain el-wu'ul, fountain of the wild goats, about six hours E. of Khareitun. The word wa'l is used in Pal. for the roebuck. The name En-gedi (Arab. 'Ain-Jidy), fountain of the kid, was doubtless given with reference to this animal. It is about the size of the domestic goat. The horns are from 2½ to 3 ft. in length, curved almost to a semicircle, and reinforced by large rough rings on the front face. Its flesh is said to be excellent. It may have been the venison which Isaac asked Esau to bring him (Gn 27[3]).

יַעֲלַת־חֵן the 'pleasant roe,' RV 'pleasant doe' (Pr 5[19]), is the female ibex, but tr^{d} by LXX πῶλος, a foal, Vulg. hinnulus.

2. אַקּוֹ 'akkô. This animal is only once mentioned (Dt 14[5]). Possibly ὄρυξ, in the LXX rendering of the passage, is the equivalent of 'akkô; but this is uncertain, as the LXX gives only five out of the seven animals mentioned in the Hebrew. Some suppose it to be the roebuck; but this animal is mentioned in the same list under the name yaḥmûr. Others suppose it to be the paseng, Capra ægagrus, Cuv., the wild original of the domestic goat. It is, however, most probably another name for the yâ'êl, or a kindred species.

For Goat's Hair see HAIR; and for Scapegoat see AZAZEL. G. E. POST.

GOB (גֹּב, גּוֹב).—A locality mentioned only in 2 S 21[18. 19], where David fought the second and third of the four battles with the Phil. that are there mentioned. Most copies of the LXX have Γέθ in the first instance (with which agree the Syr. and a few Heb. copies), and Ῥόμ in the second; while some Hebrew copies have Nob. The parallel passage (1 Ch 20[4-8]) locates the first of these two battles at Gezer (cf. Jos 10[33]), and omits to mention the place of the second. Certainly they were not at Nob, but in the land of the Philistines. Wellhausen, followed by Driver and Budde, finds Gob also in 2 S 21[16], where he would read וַיֵּשְׁבוּ בְגֹב, 'and they dwelt in Gob,' instead of וְיִשְׁבּוֹ בְּנֹב, 'and Ishbi-benob.' (See Wellhausen's or Driver's Sam., ad loc., and Budde's note in Haupt's OT). W. J. BEECHER.

GOBLET is found only in Ca 7[2] 'Thy navel is [like] a round goblet.' The Heb. term is אַגָּן (prob. from a root signifying 'circular,' 'round'). It is used in plur. (אַגָּנוֹת) in Ex 24[6] of the 'basins' (Socin, Opferbecken) in which Moses collected half of the sacrificial blood. In Is 22[24] (the only other occurrence of the Heb. word) כְּלֵי הָאַגָּנוֹת is tr^{d} both in AV and RV 'vessels of cups,' where 'basin-vessels' (Guthe, Beckengeschirr) or 'bowl-shaped vessels' (Cheyne) would be a more accurate rendering. For the Eng. word cf. 'Annotations to Lk 22' in Rhem. NT, 'The new Testament is begonne and dedicated in his bloud in the Chalice, no lesse than the old was dedicated, begonne, and ratified in that bloud of calves contained in the goblet of Moyses.' J. i. EXISTENCE OF GOD.—The OT belonging to the historical period, many questions now discussed in the history of religion lie behind it. It never occurred to any writer of the OT to prove or argue the existence of God. To do so might well have seemed a superfluity, for all prophets and writers move among ideas that presuppose God's existence. Prophecy itself is the direct product of His influence. The people of Israel in their relations and character are His creation. It is not according to the spirit of the ancient world in general to deny the existence of God, or to use arguments to prove it. The belief was one natural to the human mind and common to all men. Scripture does indeed speak of those who say in their heart there is no God (Ps 14[1] 53[1]); but these are the fools, that is, the practically ungodly, and their denial is not a theoretical or speculative one, but merely what may be held to be the expression of their manner of life. Even the phrase 'there is no God' hardly means that God is not, but that He is not present, does not interfere in life; and, counting on this absence of God from the world and on impunity, men become corrupt and do abominable deeds (Ps 14, Job 22[12ff.]), and for their wickedness they shall be turned into Sheol, the region of separation from God, together with all the nations that forget God (Ps 9[17]). Yet even this forgetfulness of God by the nations is something temporary. It is a forgetting only, no obliteration of the knowledge of God from the human mind, and these nations shall yet remember and turn unto the Lord (Ps 22[27]).

Again, as Scripture nowhere contemplates men as ignorant of the existence of God, it nowhere depicts the rise or dawn of the idea of His existence in men's minds. In the historical period the idea of God's existence is one of the primary thoughts of man; he comes possessed of this thought to face and observe the world, and his conception of God already possessed explains the world to him; the world does not suggest to him an idea hitherto strange, that of God's existence. And, of course, the bare idea of God's existence is not the primary thought which Scripture supposes all men to possess; this abstract conception has gathered body about it, namely, a certain circle of ideas as to what God is. And with these ideas the Hebrew took up his position over-against the world. To him God and the world were always distinct. God was not involved in the processes of nature. These processes were caused by God, but He was distinct from them. The Hebrew, however, came down from his thought of God upon the world, he did not rise from the world up to his thought of God. His thought of God explained to him the world, both its existence and the course of events upon it; these did not suggest to him either the existence or the nature of God, these being unknown to him. His contemplation of nature and providence and the life of man was never of the nature of a search after God whom he did not know, but always of the nature of a recognition of God whom he knew. When the singer in Ps 19 says 'the heavens declare the glory of God,' his meaning is that the glory of God, who is and is known and is Creator, may be seen reflected on the heavens. But the psalmist only saw repeated on the heavens what he already carried in his heart. And when in Is 40[25ff.] J″ asks, 'To whom then will ye liken me? Lift up your eyes on high and behold: Who hath created these things? bringing out their hosts by number'—it is assumed as known that J″ is Creator, and that His omnipotence is revealed in the nightly parade of His hosts on the sky, not one failing to answer the roll call, and the inference is that, with this God for their God, Israel cannot despond or be faint-hearted—'Why sayest thou, O Jacob, My way is hid from the Lord? An everlasting God is J″, creator of the ends of the earth; He fainteth not, neither is weary. He giveth power to the faint.' The passage teaches nothing new or unknown; it recalls what is known, reburnishing the consciousness of it, in order to sustain the faith and the hopes of the people. There is, however, in one or two passages an approximation to some of the arguments of Natural Theology. In Ps 94[5ff.] it is said, probably of the excesses of the heathen rulers of Israel, 'They break in pieces thy people, O LORD. Yet they say, The LORD doth not see. Understand, ye brutish among the people: He that planted the ear, shall He not hear? He that formed the eye, shall He not see?'

The OT as little thinks of arguing or proving that God may be known as it thinks of arguing that He exists. Its position is here again, so to speak, far in front of such an argument. How should men think of arguing that God could be known when they were persuaded they knew Him, when they felt they were in fellowship with Him, when their whole mind was filled and aglow with the thought of Him, and when His Spirit was within them? The peculiarity, however, of the OT comes out when the question is raised, How is God known? And here the characteristic conception of the OT is that of Revelation—if men know God, it is because He has made Himself known to them. The idea of man reaching to knowledge or fellowship of God through his own efforts is foreign to the OT. God speaks, He appears: man listens and beholds. God brings Himself near to men, He enters into a covenant with them, He lays commands on them: they receive Him when He approaches, accept His will and obey His behests. Moses and the prophets are nowhere represented as thoughtful minds, reflecting on the Unseen and ascending to elevated conceptions of Godhead: the Unseen manifests itself to them, and they know it. God reveals Himself to the patriarchs in angelic forms, to Moses in the bush and on the mount, to the prophets in the spiritual intuitions of their own minds. The form of manifestation may change, but the reality remains the same. The conviction in the mind of the prophet, that God revealed Himself and His word to him when the truth broke upon his mind, was not less vivid than that of the patriarch who was visited by angelic messengers when sitting at the door of his tent, or that of Moses who saw the God of Israel in the mount. This view of God's self-manifestation, and that He takes the initiative, is the characteristic conception of the OT. The view may not be peculiar to Israel, for increasing knowledge of the Semitic peoples tends to show that on general questions about Deity, such as His relation to the world and to men's actions, they all thought very much alike; the supremacy of Israel lay, not in these points, but in the ethical nature which they ascribed to their God, and in the redemptive hopes for mankind and the world which flowed from this conception of His nature. Interesting psychological questions are raised by such visions as that of Moses at the bush (Ex 3), that of Jacob at Jabbok (Gn 32[24ff.]), and that of Isaiah in the temple (Is 6). Such questions may never be answered, but there are two points not to be lost sight of in estimating the OT conception of Revelation. First, though it is the OT manner throughout to signalize the divine operation alone, and to pass over in silence any preparation or co-operation in the mind of man, we are entitled and compelled to throw back into these ancient histories something of our knowledge of how men's minds operate now when God is moving them. Isaiah's vision was no doubt preceded by reflection on the nature of J" and on the state of the nation, and the inevitable issue forecast. And similar reflections must have occupied the mind of Moses, along with aspirations in regard to himself and his people. These revelations of God to men were never mere objective calls to take a certain place or do a certain duty, there was always a personal element in them, they were a crisis in the individual religious life. It was this new personal relation to God, which was as real in the case of Moses as in that of Isaiah, that was the source of the power which such men wielded over the masses of their fellow-men. More than one commentator has said that Isaiah, in offering a sign to Ahaz in the heavens above or the depth beneath (Is 7[11]), was playing a dangerous game, and might have been left in the lurch. It is sufficient preliminary answer to say that Isaiah did not think so. But it may be added that there was in Isaiah something of that same consciousness which expressed itself in Christ when He said, 'I know that thou hearest me always.' Therefore, secondly, the reality of the divine influence must be upheld also. The idea of Revelation cannot be regarded as a mere Hebrew conception which, translated into modern thought, means nothing but the natural operations of the mind in the sphere of religion. Such a view leaves unexplained the consciousness of the prophets, the contents of their prophecies, and the religious life which they manifested. But, of course, however much the OT reposes on the ground that all knowledge of God comes from His revealing Himself, and that there is such a revelation, it is far from implying that this revelation of God is a full display of Him as He really is. An exhaustive communication of God cannot be made, because the creature cannot take it in (Job 11[7ff.]). At the same time there is no trace in the OT of the idea that God as revealed to men is not God as He really is in Himself, or that His revelation of Himself is meant merely to be regulative of human life, while what He is in truth remains far away in a transcendental background out of which it is impossible for it to advance, or into which it is impossible for men to penetrate. The revelation God gives of Himself is a revelation of Himself as He is in truth, though it may be impossible to reveal Himself fully to men. The OT conception of God is that of a Person with ethical attributes; it nowhere speculates on His physical essence. God is nowhere called spirit in the OT; like men, He has a spirit; but spirit never denotes substance, but always connotes energy and power, especially life-giving power.

ii. ANTHROPOMORPHISMS. — From the earliest period when God is spoken of, He is regarded as a Person. The word J" is a personal name. From the Exodus downward He is so spoken of in contemporary literature: 'Sing unto the LORD, for he hath triumphed gloriously' (Ex 15[21]); He is one whom men may 'love' (Jg 5[31]); He is self-conscious, and swears 'by his holiness' (Am 4[2]), that is, by His Godhead (Gn 22[16]). The idea expressed by M. Arnold, that the conception of God in Israel was first that of some power external to themselves which they perceived in the world, a power making for a moral order or identical with it, and which they afterwards endowed with personality, inverts the OT representation, in which God is fully personal from the first, while His moral being becomes clearer and more elevated, or, at least, receives fuller expression. The question rather rises whether the very vividness with which God's personality was realized in Israel did not infringe upon other conceptions necessary to a true idea of God, such as His transcendence? Was He not conceived as a magnified human person subject to the limitations of personality among men? Now, of course, all OT statements about God are given in the region of practical religious life. A theology of the schools where the laws of exact thought prevail was unknown in the OT period. There may be observed, indeed, the beginnings of such a theology in the Alexandrian translation, and more clearly in the Aramaic versions and in Jewish writings of this age. These express themselves, in regard to God, in a form that seeks to be more severe and exact, using circumlocutions for the anthropomorphisms of the OT—a fact which indicates that these caused some offence. But in the OT such anthropomorphisms are freely used, as we use them still. And their use is usually justified by the statement that man was made in the image of God. It is possible that by some in Israel, just as by some among ourselves, His personality was so vividly realized as to obscure or repress some other conceptions of Him which also have their rights. But this can hardly be charged against the OT. When it speaks of the hand, arm, mouth, lips, and eyes of God; when He makes bare His holy arm (Is 52^{10}), lifts up a signal to the nations (49^{22}), is seen at the head of the Medes mustering His hosts, and His military shout is heard (13^{4}), all this is but vivid conception of His being, His intelligence, His activity and universal power over the nations whom He directs. The human is transferred to His personality, as it could not but be; it is transferred graphically, as could not but happen when done by the poetical, vivacious, and powerful phantasy of the people of Israel. The language only testifies to the warmth and intensity of the religious feelings of the writers.

Another class of passages deserves attention. God is said to have walked in the garden in the cool of the day (Gn 3^{8}); to have come down to see the tower which men did build (11^{5}); to have been one of three men who appeared to Abraham, and to have eaten that which was set before Him ($18^{1.8}$); to have wrestled with Jacob ($32^{24ff.}$), and the like. Such passages, in addition to being a testimony to the vividness with which God's personality was conceived, are evidence also of the religious feeling that God did reveal Himself to men, and enter into the closest fellowship with them. Different minds may estimate these early narratives in different ways. So far as we consider the experiences, say of Jacob at Jabbok, real, we may suppose that with these early men a spiritual impression always reflected itself in an accompanying extraordinary physical condition, just as among the early prophets the ecstasy was usual, while, among the later prophets, though still occasional (Is 8^{11}), it became rare. And so far as we may consider the details of the description due to the narrator, it may be evidence that he could not conceive a spiritual experience apart from a corresponding physical accompaniment. And if early men so felt, it would not be judicious to deny that God might use an objective phenomenon, such as the burning bush, as a means of awakening the religious mind, just as our Lord used His miracles as a means of reaching the mind of those for whom He performed them. But these local manifestations of God never suggest that He was locally confined. It has been argued that Sinai was the local seat of J" before the Exodus, and that it was only later that He was believed to have removed to Canaan. In David's day it was certainly believed that Canaan was His 'inheritance' (1 S 26^{19}); and the oldest Pent. narrator speaks of Him 'coming down' upon Mount Sinai (Ex $19^{11.20}$). When the Ark, to which His presence was in some way specially attached, was captured by the Philistines, and Shiloh destroyed, the priests continued His worship with all the old ceremonial of shewbread and the like at Nob (1 S 21^{6}). The multitude of altars scattered over the country, if they did not suggest the positive idea of His ubiquity, suggested, at least, that there was no place where He might not let Himself be found, and the idea was confirmed by new self-manifestations in fresh places, as to Gideon (Jg 6^{20}), to Saul (who seems to have built many altars, 1 S 14^{35}), and to David (2 S 24^{18}). The idea men had of all these places was that expressed by Solomon in regard to the temple: 'The heaven of heavens cannot contain thee, how much less this house that I have builded' (1 K 8^{27}). But while God was thus present on earth, the tempest or the thunderstorm was at the same time a theophany in the heavens. Two beliefs characterize the Hebrew mind from the beginning: first, the strong belief in causation—every change on the face of nature, or in the life of men or nations, must be due to a cause; and, secondly, the only conceivable causality is a personal agent. The unseen power under all things, which threw up all changes on the face of the world, which gave animation to the creature or withdrew it, which moved the generations of men upon the earth from the beginning (Is 41^{4}), bringing Israel out of Egypt, the Philistines from Caphtor and the Syrians from Kir (Am 9^{7}), was the living God. Some phenomena or events, such as the thunderstorm or the dividing of the sea, might be more striking instances of His operation than others. They were miracles, that is, wonders, but they did not differ in kind from the ordinary phenomena of nature, from His making the sun to rise and sealing up the stars (Job 9^{7}), from His clothing the heavens with blackness (Is 50^{3}) and making them clear again with His breath (Job 26^{13}). Everything is supernatural, that is, direct divine operation. The regular alternation of day and night is due to J"'s covenant with them (Jer $33^{20.25}$).

Another class of passages may be referred to. The first class cited vividly suggested the personality of God. The second class added the idea that He manifested Himself to men in place and circumstance, though with no implication that He was locally confined. This third class brings in the idea of the moral in His personality. Thus He repents that He made man (Gn 6^{6}), and also of the evil He intended to do (Ex 32^{14}); He is grieved (Gn 6^{6}), angry (1 K 11^{9}), jealous (Dt 6^{15}), gracious (Ps 111^{4}); He loves (1 K 10^{9}), hates (Pr 6^{16}), and much more. All the emotions of which men are conscious, and all the human conduct corresponding to these emotions, are thrown back upon God. Now, it may be true that from another point of view God must be held free of all passion, and not subject to such change as is implied in one emotion succeeding another. Still, this latter conception if carried to its just conclusions would reduce God to a being not only absolutely unmoral, but even impersonal. The religious mind could express its relations to God in no other way but by attributing to Him a nature similar to its own. Scripture is not unaware that this mode of conception may be pushed too far: 'The Lord is not a man that he should repent' (1 S 15^{29}). What is of importance, however, in these representations of God is the general conception which they combine to suggest, viz. the moral Being of God.

iii. NAMES OF GOD.—(1) Some names express the general notion of Deity, as 'El, 'Elohim, 'God'; (2) others are descriptive titles applied to Deity, as 'El Shaddai (AV 'God Almighty'), 'El 'Elyôn, 'God Most High'; while (3) from the Exodus, J" is the personal name of the God of Israel. The names El, Elohim, Shaddai, and J" are probably all prehistoric, and their meaning is very obscure.

(1) The name El (אֵל) is the most widely distributed of all names for Deity, being used in Babylonian, Aramæan, Phœnician, Hebrew, and Arabic, particularly southern Arabic. It thus belongs to the primitive Shemitic speech before it became modified into dialects, though conceivably one or more of the dialects may have retained in use the root with which it is connected. (a) It has been referred to the Heb. root אול 'to be strong,' of which it would be the ptcp., meaning 'the strong.'* (b) Others have referred it to an

* Gesenius.

Arab. root 'ûl, meaning 'to be in front' (hence awwal, 'first'), 'to govern,' and assigned to it the sense of 'leader.'* This meaning would be more in harmony with other Semitic names for God, such as baal, 'adôn 'lord,' melek 'king,' etc. It is, however, against such derivations, which should give an unchangeably long ê in el, that the first vowel is short in Bab. 'ilu and in Arab., and changeable in Heb., as אֱלִימֶלֶךְ. (c) Some others have suggested a root אלה, either a cognate form to 'ûl, 'to be strong,' considering the word an abstract ='power,' 'might';† or a word connected with prep. אֶל־ 'unto,' God being the goal towards which men strive.‡ This last meaning is too abstract for a primitive name of Deity, and altogether improbable. No plausible derivation of the term has been suggested. In Heb. prose the word is usually connected with an epithet, as 'the living God' (אֵל חַי), 'the eternal God,' 'God Most High'; but in the prophets and poetry it is used alone for 'god' or 'God,' and in a few cases is found in the plur. 'gods.' It has maintained its place all through the language as well as in other dialects in the formation of proper names.

Elohim is a plur. of which the sing. is אֱלוֹהַּ, Aram. 'ĕlâh, Arab. 'ilâh (with art. 'al'ilâh='allâh, 'God'). The sing. is used in poetry (Ps 18, Dt 32), and occasionally in very late prose. It has been contended (a) that the sing. is an artificial form coined from the plur. Elohim; and (b) that Elohim is really the plur. of el, formed by inserting h, as occasionally happens. But decidedly against (a) is the existence of the similar sing. form in Aram. and Arab., which there is no reason to suppose late; and against (b) is the fact that it is only in plurals of fem. form that there is an insertion of h (Syr. plur. shemohîn, 'names,' cannot be held primary, as the word 'name' has fem. plur. in Heb. and western Aram.). El, too, has its own proper plur. 'elîm. The attempt to connect the word with 'elah, 'elon, names of trees,§ may be safely neglected. Whether the term 'ĕlôah be connected with 'el, and what its meaning is, remains uncertain. The use of the plur. Elohim is also difficult to explain. The plur. had so obtained the upper hand in usage that the more archaic sing. was confined to poetry. The plur. can scarcely be a remnant of polytheism; the Shemites did not use the general expression 'the gods' for Deity, like Lat. Dii (the Assyr. 'the Ishtars'='goddesses,' is like Heb. 'the Orions'='constellations,' Is 13^{10}); and the suggestion that the plur. was first used of the deities of some particular locality‖ is not without its difficulties, as usually each locality had only one deity. The idea that Elohim expressed the fulness of mights or powers contained in God ¶ is too abstract, apart from the uncertainty whether the sing. meant 'might.' After all, perhaps, the plur. may be easiest explained as a plur. of eminence, like 'ădônîm, bĕ'ālîm, 'lord,' tĕrāphîm (1 S $19^{13.\,16}$), and possibly nôgĕsîm, 'ruler' (Is 3^{12}). The plur. appears also in Ethiopic 'amlâk, 'God' (unused sing. malek), and in the Amarna letters the plur. ilâni, 'God,' is used in addressing the Egyptian king.

(2) As is the case with El and Elohim, the meaning of El Shaddai is altogether uncertain. Shaddai is probably an epithet, as it qualifies El, just as ,Elyon, 'Most High,' does. The name is old (Gn 49^{25}), and is said by P to have been the patriarchal name of God (Gn 17^{1}, Ex 6^{3}). The fanciful derivation שַׁדַּי (=אֲשֶׁר דַּי) 'the sufficient' was perhaps known to LXX (ἱκανός, in this sense twice in Ru, thrice in Job, once in Ezk), and also the sense 'mighty,' 'almighty' (ἰσχυρός, παντοκράτωρ in Job). If derived from שׁדד, the name would not mean 'the Almighty,' but 'the destroyer,' signifying presumably the storm-god, or possibly the scorching sun-god; if from Aram. שׁרא 'to pour,' it would have the similar sense of the rain-giver.* Such derivations have little to recommend them. Equally far from probability is the conjecture that the word should be read שֵׁדִי 'my lord' (Arab. sayyidi).† In Heb. shēdîm means 'demons' (Ps 106^{37}), and Dt 32^{17} when naming them adds 'no god.' Such a topsy-turvy of meaning is a triumph of etymology. More recently reference has been made to the Assyr. shadu, 'mountain,' from root 'to be high,'‡ with the suggestion that Shaddai either means 'mountain' (cf. ẓûr, 'rock,' as title of God) or has the adjectival sense of 'most high.' The most that can be said is that the meaning 'almighty' has a certain tradition in its favour.

(3) The name Jehovah is also probably an ancient name (Gn 4^{26}), though at the Exodus it received a special meaning by being connected with the Heb. verb 'to be.' (a) The pronunciation 'Jehovah' has no pretence to be right. The word יהוה acquired such a sacredness that, in reading, the name 'ădônāi, 'lord,' was substituted for it;§ hence in MSS and prints the vowels of 'ădônāi were attached to the letters יהוה, and 'Jehovah' (יְהֹוָה) is a conflate form with the consonants of one word and the vowels of another. It is not older in date than the time of the Reformation (1520). (b) The contracted forms in which the name appears suggest that the original form of the word was יַהְוֶה yahweh or yahve (a Greek transliteration is Ἰαβέ). (c) The occurrence of this name or a similar one in Assyr. cannot be regarded as certain. Hommel believes he has discovered in western Shemitic a divine name i, ai, or ya (e.g. I-zebel, Jezebel), which he considers the original form of the name, the Heb. יהוה being a more modern expansion. The last part of his conjecture at any rate cannot be considered probable. (d) The word being prehistoric, its derivation must remain uncertain. It has been connected with Arab. hawa, 'to blow' or 'breathe,' J″ being the god who is heard in the tempest—the storm-god; or with the verb hawa, 'to fall' (Job 37^{6}), in the causative meaning 'the prostrator'—again the lightning-god; or with Heb. hayah (old form hawah), 'to be' in causative ('make to be'), i.e. 'the creator,' or fulfiller of his promises; and so on. (e) In Heb. writing of the historical period the name is connected with Heb. hayah, 'to be,' in the imperf. Now with regard to this verb, first, it does not mean 'to be' essentially or ontologically, but phenomenally; and secondly, the impf. has not the sense of a present ('am') but of a fut. ('will be'). In Ex $3^{10\text{ff.}}$, when Moses demurred to go to Egypt, God assured him, saying, כִּי אֶהְיֶה עִמָּךְ ('EHYEH 'immāk) 'I will be with thee.' When he asked how he should name the God of their fathers to the people, he was told אֶהְיֶה אֲשֶׁר אֶהְיֶה ('EHYEH 'ăsher 'EHYEH). Again he was bidden say, 'אֶהְיֶה 'EHYEH hath sent me unto you'; and finally, 'יהוה YAHWEH, the God of your fathers, has sent me unto you.' From all this it seems evident that in the view of the writer 'ehyeh and yahweh are the same: that God is 'ehyeh, 'I will be,' when speaking of Himself, and yahweh, 'he will be,' when spoken of by others. What He will be is left unexpressed—He will be with them, helper, strengthener, deliverer.‖

The name J″ can hardly have been altogether new to Israel before their deliverance. A new name would have been in those days a new God. The name of the mother of Moses, Yôkebed (Ex 6^{20}), contains the word, and, if not among the tribes generally, the name was probably in use in the tribe of Levi, to which Moses belonged. The view (Tiele, Stade) that Moses became acquainted with the name among the Midianites, into a priestly family of which he had married, has no direct support in Heb. tradition. But the people in Egypt had, no doubt, connexions with the desert tribes on the east of them, as the flight of Moses to Midian suggests. The Kenites, the Midianite relatives of Moses, attached themselves to Israel (Jg 1^{16} 4^{11}). And the Rechabites, who originally may also have been Kenites (1 Ch 2^{55}), were fervent worshippers of J″ (2 K $10^{15ff.}$), and strenuous upholders of the severer nomadic ideal of religious life as against the corruptions which Israel's acceptance of the Canaanite civilization had introduced. Moses, too, demanded liberty to go 'a three days' journey into the wilderness' to sacrifice to the God of the Hebrews (Ex 3^{18} 5^{3}). These things at least suggest the question whether the name J″ was not known also in the Sinaitic peninsula (cf. Ex 18^{11}, Dt $33^{2ff.}$, Jg $5^{4ff.}$).

iv. IDEA OF GOD IN VARIOUS PERIODS.—(1) The pre-Mosaic period.—It has been made a question how much of the narratives regarding the patriarchal ancestors of Israel is history and how much legend. The stories were written down probably between the middle of the 10th and the middle of the 8th centuries, and it has been argued that they reflect in the main the religious ideas of this period. But the historians (J, E) from whom we have them did not invent them, but transcribed them from the national consciousness, and they must in any case reflect the ideas of an age considerably anterior to their own date as literature. The theory that names like Abraham and Sarah are those of extinct deities is perhaps overcome. But how far the wanderings of Abraham, Jacob, and Joseph, and their relations with other peoples, reflect tribal rather than individual movements, is liable to dispute. It is strange that while Edom, Moab, and the like have all one eponymous ancestor, Israel has three, all most unlike one another. Shall we hold them three distinct ideals? Or is Abraham the ideal of what Israel should be, and Jacob the type of that which it was? The story of Jacob and his brother Esau has been read as reflecting the historical relations of the peoples Israel and Edom, and their respective characters. If so, the historian who depicted his own people as crafty, unscrupulous, and godly, and their bitterest enemy as the careless, noble, natural man, was a humorous satirist of the highest rank. Historically, however, his satire must be judged less than just to his own people and more than partial to Edom. Abraham appears a purely personal figure. He may be transfigured by religious idealism, but the name must be traditional.

Apart from the patriarchal histories, sources of information for the condition of prehistoric Israel might be (1) the religious condition of the related peoples, Edom, Moab and Ammon, and Ishmael or the Arabs; and (2) any survivals appearing in post-Mosaic Israel from a lower stage of religion, e.g. stone, tree, and fountain worship, or rites connected with the dead, the possible remains of ancestor worship. Unfortunately, our knowledge of the peoples related to Israel belongs to a period long after the Exodus, being derived from the Bible or inscriptions. The assumption that the tribes which united to form Israel stood at the Exodus on the same religious plane as these peoples has its difficulties. When we consider the elevation at which eventually Israel stood above these nations we hesitate to fix any historical period, particularly so comparatively modern a period as the Exodus, at which they must have stood on a level. However powerful and creative the genius of Moses may have been, he did not create a religion, any more than he did a nation, out of nothing. It is usually assumed that these small peoples, such as Edom and Moab, to which Israel was related, were henotheistic, i.e. worshippers of one god to the exclusion of all others. The assumption seems without foundation. Moab had a chief god Chemosh, but a nation so polytheistic as Assyria had also a chief god, Asshur, and so other nations. A composite god, Ashtar-Chemosh, is named on the Moabite Stone; and as it is only in S. Arabia that Ashtar (Athtar) is masc., the deity here allied with Chemosh is probably Astarte. Neither is it certain that the Baal of Peor or of Meon was Chemosh. Mount Nebo may also be named from the god. Various deities also appear among the Edomites, as Ḳaush or Ḳos and Ḳuzaḥ. The personal names Hadad, Baal-ḥanan, Malikram* are all theophorous. And Dusares (Dhu-shShara, 'lord of Shara') was worshipped at Petra, though this may have been later.† And, of course, the Arabs in addition to a number of gods had the three great goddesses (the daughters of 'Allâh), al Lât (al-ilâhat, 'the goddess' of the sun), al 'Uzza ('the powerful,' possibly the Venus star), and Manât ('fate,' 'fortune,' τύχη, cf. Meni, Is 65^{11}). A monolatrous Shemitic people is not discoverable in the historic period. The territorial position of peoples like Moab and Edom exposed them greatly to influence from neighbouring nations. The name Hadad in Edom may suggest Aramæan influence, and Ashtar in Moab the influence of the Canaanites; but the occurrence of the latter name in a royal document like the inscription of Mesha implies that the worship of Ashtar was national. If these small peoples be supposed to have been originally monolatrous, their history exhibits a degeneration and movement towards polytheism. While the fundamental ideas of Deity may be presumed to have been similar among all the Shemitic peoples, if they could be ascertained, the complete difference in the divine names current among these small nations and in Israel suggests a prolonged period of separate religious development, and renders any comparison of their religion with that of Israel at the Exodus barren of results.

Certain usages are supposed to point to ancestor worship among the Hebrews. The teraphim, a term completely obscure, have usually been considered household gods; though household gods need not necessarily be images of ancestors. In one passage the teraphim appear in a house (1 S $19^{13.\ 16}$); in others they are represented as placed in temples (Jg 17^{5} 18^{14}, Hos 3^{4}). Laban calls them his 'gods' (Gn 31^{30}); that they were of human form or size can hardly be inferred from 1 S 19. Teraphim are usually coupled with EPHOD (wh. see), and in Israel were certainly used in consulting J″ and gaining oracles from Him (Hos 3^{4}), though their use is condemned (1 S 15^{23}). Nebuchadnezzar also used them to obtain an oracle from his gods (Ezk 21^{21}). That the 'Elohim' to which the servant was to be brought who desired to remain for ever with his master (Ex 21^{6}) was a family idol,‡ is wholly improbable from the context. The practice of cutting off the hair in mourning for the dead was probably a softening of the former more extravagant custom of tearing out the hair.§ The practice seemed perfectly harmless to the prophets (Is 3^{24} 15^{2}, Mic 1^{16}), though forbidden later (Dt 14^{1}, Lv 21^{5}); but the prohibition may repose on the feeling that the rite was characteristic of a religion alien to that of J″. If Dt 26^{14} mean that food was offered to the dead, such an offering was not of the nature of a sacrifice, but merely an expression of the feeling which the mourner strove to cherish that the departed were not dead, as appears from a multitude of passages in Arab. poetry. The mourner cried to the dead, 'Be not far'! though he had to answer himself, 'Nay, every one that is beneath the ground is far'! (Ḥamasa, 373). When two friends visited the grave of their comrade, and drinking each his cup of wine poured the third upon the grave, they only gave their friend his share as if he were alive (Ḥam. 398). There is no evidence that the dead were thought dangerous, and requiring to be placated by offerings. The name 'Elohim' bestowed on the spectre of Samuel (1 S 28^{13}) is strange, but the single instance can hardly suffice to prove that the dead in general were regarded as 'Elohim'; all other statements regarding the dead, the name rephāim given to them, and the fact that the 'obs twittered and muttered and spoke low out of the ground (Is 8^{19} 29^{4}), indicate that they were regarded as anything but powerful 'gods.'*

§ Wellh., Reste^{2}, 182. The passage Jer 41^{5} shows that 'cutting' one's flesh (Lv 19^{28}, Jer 16^{6} 47^{5}), whatever it originally meant, was then merely a token of excessive grief. Cf. Hos 7^{14}.

Certain things, such as Jacob's vision at Bethel (Gn 28), and names like the 'Oak of Moreh' ('the oracle,' Gn 12^{6}), the 'Oak of the soothsayers' (Jg 9^{37}), have been thought remains of the animistic stage of religion still surviving in the historical period. Certainly, the names Baal 'lord,' Melek Milk, Milcom 'king,' al Lat 'the goddess,' all show that the stage of promiscuous or general animism, if it ever existed, had long been overpast by all the Shemitic peoples. But to primitive minds the difficulty of realizing a deity apart from a local abode or some form would be great, and it was natural to localize the god in some fertile spot, grove or evergreen tree, or fountain of living water, where his beneficent operation was most perceptible. Why great or prominent blocks of stone should have been regarded as his dwelling-place is more obscure. At a later period men perhaps invited the presence of the deity by erecting pillars, mazzēboth, or artificial trees, 'ashēra, when the natural objects were not at hand. This difficulty of realizing a deity without abode and apart from some form explains the use of images, particularly when consulting him for an oracle, and it explains also the erection of a 'house' for the god. The difficulty was felt all through the history of Israel: at the Exodus (Ex 32), in the time of the Judges (Jg $8^{24ff.}$ 17^{3}), and much later (Is 2^{8}), as it has been felt in large sections of the Christian Church. The Ark, to which the presence of J″ was attached, relieved the difficulty without representing J″ under any form. When a house was built in which J″ was present, the Ark lost its significance and disappeared. The Ephod, whatever it was [EPHOD], was used when an oracle was sought. In David's days its use was held legitimate (1 S 21^{9} 23^{6}), afterwards it disappears from the legitimate cultus.

From the Exodus J″'s revelation of Himself was given, and men's thoughts of Him suggested through the national history. He showed what He was in great deeds rather than declared it in words. He was less the God of nature than of human history. Even when He performed wonders in nature it was usually in connexion with the life of the people and for moral ends, but in history His higher ethical attributes and purposes received direct illustration. Further, His operations being on the stage of Israel's national history, were much more conspicuous and easily read than they would have been if performed in the life of individuals. His deliverance of the nation from Egypt revealed His power and redemptive goodness on a scale that left an impression never effaced from the heart of the people. His destruction of the nation, predicted by the prophets and fulfilled, taught once for all that He was the righteous God and moral Ruler of the nations.

The religious development of Israel is virtually a development in the idea of God. As God was the only force in the world, particularly in human history, when a crisis occurred in history some conception of God had to be called in to explain it; and when mysterious problems arose in the national or individual life, the problem was immediately reflected back upon God, and became one in regard to His nature or action. In Israel the religious progress appears in the form of a conflict. And if a conflict implies lower elements and conceptions, it also implies a higher element which was conscious of the lower, and strove either to eject it or transform it. Such a transmuting force existed in Israel from the beginning, producing the results which mankind now inherit. This force may be identified with the moral in the conception of J″. Mere progress in itself does not decide that the progress was natural or supernatural. Our convictions in regard to this point will be formed rather from our contemplation of the results eventually achieved, from contrasting these results with those attained anywhere else, and from the trust we place in the consciousness of the prophets and leaders of Israel who felt that they were inspired. In a general way the religious history of Israel may be divided into three periods, in each of which the conflict resulted in a clearer conception of God, or of J″ the God of Israel:—

(a) The period from the Exodus to the revolution of Jehu.—The revolution of Jehu put its seal on the life-work of Elijah; it gave national expression to his demand: 'If J″ be God, follow him' (1 K 18^{21}). To the mass the struggle probably appeared an external one between two names, two deities; and it issued in the acceptance of the one. The numerical oneness of God was recognized. To Elijah and others the question was not one of numerical unity only, but also of moral nature.

(b) The prophetic period.—The conflict resulting in the recognition of J″ as God alone, at least in Israel, was followed by one more inward. Though Baal as another than J″ was set aside, Baal had incorporated himself in J″. Now, the conflict was not between J″ and another, it was an internal one between J″ and Jehovah-Baal, between two conceptions of Him—the popular and the prophetic. In the popular conception J″ was still mainly their national god, the god of the land, giver of its corn and wine, and whose most pleasing service was sacrifice and offering; while to the prophets He was a purely ethical Being, elevated far above the people, the righteous Ruler, to whom material offerings were inappreciable, and whose service could be nothing but a righteous life. What proportion existed between the prophetic party and the more backward popular mass cannot be known. The prophets now broke with the people as a whole, as they believed J″ had broken with it and determined to destroy it. In earlier times prophets had broken only with particular dynasties and threatened them with destruction. But there was no difference in principle between the earlier and the canonical prophets; the grounds on which J″ rejected a dynasty and the people were alike moral (1 K 22). A hundred years before the time of the canonical prophets, Elijah by his words, 'the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant,' and by his flight to Horeb, expressed his feeling that the breach was now one between J″ and the people. Yet the breach was not absolute or final. Isaiah's conception of the Remnant appears already in Elijah's days: 'I will leave me 7000 men in Israel' (1 K 19[18]). The destruction of the state, foretold by the prophets, verified the prophetic conception of J″: He was the righteous Ruler of the nations. It verified also their judgment upon the past religious life of the people.

* Against the construction put by Schwally on Jer 16^{7}, see Giesebrecht, Jerem., and Driver, Deut. 292.

(c) From the destruction of the State onward.—The prophetic principles regarding J″ had been conspicuously illustrated in the national history: J″ was God alone; He was righteous; His nature was inscribed in letters of fire across the people's life and experience. But being written on the national history, these principles were as yet, to the individual mind, rather abstract. They were schematic, diagrammatic, seen to be true on the great scale and intellectually, hardly yet felt to be true in the experience of the individual. They had to be assimilated into the personal experience, equated by reflection with the condition of the world, the state of the people, the life of the individual. The process raised great problems, all of which became problems about God. (α) J″ was God alone and righteous, yet He took no pains to assert Himself against the world. He slept; the throne of the universe seemed vacant; the nations knew Him not, and wrought unchecked their cruelties on the earth. (β) So, too, Israel was His people; they possessed the truth; His cause and theirs was one; because the eternal truth was in their hearts they were righteous as against the world, but all appeals to His tribunal were vain; their passionate cries that He would arise and plead their cause, and their passionate hopes, 'he is near that will justify me,' only expired on the air. (γ) And in like manner the individual pined away solitary and deserted: 'Mine eyes fail while I wait for my God' (Ps 69[3]). More daring spirits like Job rose in rebellion: the throne of the world was not vacant, it was filled by an Immorality; the human conscience rose, and, proclaiming itself greater than He, deposed Him from His seat. The OT closed leaving these conflicts still undecided, though not without efforts towards a reconciliation. The people found a peace in hope and the future, and endured as seeing Him who is invisible. The individual spirit, too, caught glimpses of a future beyond the borders of this life, and in the ecstasy of faith could say, 'I know that I shall see God.' A few in their loftiest moments were able to bring the reconciliation into the present and feel it if not think it. Though J″ was seen in the world and in events, He was not exhausted by them, He stood above them and apart. The mind, too, was its own place, it could detach itself from its external conditions. And thus J″ and the soul had fellowship, through no medium, spirit with spirit—'Nevertheless I am continually with thee' (Ps 73[23]).

(2) The Exodus to the revolution of Jehu.—From the Exodus onward J″ was the God of Israel. People and prophets were at one in this. Israel never had any other native God but J″; if portions of the people declined to the service of the local Baals, J″ was always the national God, and a conscience within the people constantly recalled them to His service. From Hosea downwards writers are in the habit of stigmatizing the corrupt worship of J″ at the high places as Baal worship,—as no doubt in principle it was,—but probably strict idolatry, in the sense of worship of other gods than J″, was never very widespread either in the north or south, though towards the decline of the Judæan state various Eastern idolatries were practised by some classes of the people. That J″ was God of Israel was the faith of all, though the faith might mean different things to different minds, or among different classes. To some it might mean merely that J″ was Israel's national God as other peoples had also their gods (Mic 4[5]); to others it might mean something higher. A Shemitic mind might rise to general conceptions very slowly; and while practically J″ was the only God to him, the theoretical notion that He was God alone might not have occurred to him. It perhaps needed that internal conflict which arose through the slowness of the popular mind, and that outward collision with idolatrous nations which occurred in the days of the great prophets to bring the unity of God to speculative clearness. Heb. tradition places the Decalogue at the beginning of Israel's national development, and the prophets by their references to the moral Torah as known to the people from the first, but 'forgotten' by them, appear to follow the tradition. Moses is everywhere regarded as a prophet, and probably his teaching, like that of the prophets, consisted (apart from his lofty conceptions of God) in the main of social and civil ethics. Though the first commandment does not say that J″ is God alone, the negative element, 'Thou shalt have no gods before me,' is without a parallel in the history of religions. J″ was a jealous God. Why was He jealous? Jealousy is the reaction of one's self-consciousness against a wrong done him. What was the idea held of J″ when it was thought His consciousness of Himself would feel other gods beside Him intolerable? If the Decalogue be Mosaic, there was virtual monotheism in Israel since the Exodus, though it might be only among the higher minds, and more latent than conscious. And that which made J″ unique at least, if not alone, was His moral being. Writers of all schools are agreed that ethical elements entered into the conception of J″ from the beginning. There was at least on His nature a crescent of light, which waxed till it overspread His face, and He was light with no darkness at all. When Moses sat judging the people, dispensing right and justice in the name of their God, it could not but appear to the people that He was a God of righteousness. It has been contended that in subsequent history J″ sometimes displayed 'unaccountable humours,' that is, moods of mind and a kind of action not reducible under the moral idea. The arguments for this are not quite cogent. At all events, Israel entered upon national existence with two articles of faith: that J″ was their God alone, and that in His Being He was moral, the impersonation of Right and Righteousness. And emotional energy was given to these two articles by the consciousness of having been redeemed by their God. Behind the people's national life lay the consciousness of redemption as much as it lies behind the life of the Christian.

Israel's self-consciousness as a nation was virtually identical with its consciousness of J″, its God. J″, indeed, was all in all, the people little else than the medium through which He displayed Himself. The old anthology recording Israel's conflicts with the nations is called 'The Book of the Wars of J″' (Nu 21[14]). Meroz is cursed, because it came not 'to the help of J″' (Jg 5[23]). The people's victories are 'the righteous acts of J″, the righteous acts of His rule in Israel' (Jg 5[11]). The furore of enthusiasm for J″ in the song of Deborah reflects back light on the Exodus and the work of Moses. The conceptions regarding J″ found in the oldest literature differ little from those of the prophetic age and subsequent times, except that they are less broadly expressed. (a) The dwelling-place of J″ was often at least conceived as superterrestrial. He 'came down' to see the tower which men did build (Gn 11[5]), and to discover if the wickedness of Sodom corresponded to the cry against it (18^{21}), and He rained fire on the cities of the plain from J″ 'out of heaven' (19^{24}). To Moses He said He had come down to save His people (Ex 3^{8}). But, though heaven was His throne, He manifested Himself over all the earth,—to Abraham in Ur and Canaan; to Jacob in Mesopotamia, to whom He also said, 'Fear not to go down to Egypt; I will go down with thee' (Gn 46^{3}); to Moses at Sinai and in Egypt; to His people, going before them into Canaan (Ex 33^{15}). There, though His presence was specially attached to the Ark, He also revealed Himself to Joshua as the captain of the Lord's hosts (Jos 5^{14}), and by His spirit He ruled the people, raising up judges, inspiring Saul and David. (b) As to His relation to nature, it is said in the oldest Creation narrative that He made heaven and earth, and all the creatures, as well as man (Gn 2). On the highest scale He commands nature, sending a universal flood upon the earth, opening the windows of heaven and breaking up the fountains of the great deep (Gn 7). By some convulsion of nature He 'overthrows' the cities of the plain (Gn 19). Before Joshua He made the sun and moon stand still in the sky (Jos 10^{12}); and at His command the stars fight in their courses against Sisera (Jg 5^{20}). All earthly and heavenly forces obey Him. He caused an east wind to blow, and rolled back the sea (Ex 14^{21}); He brought locusts on Egypt (10^{13}), and turned the river into blood (7^{19}); He sent hail and fire (9^{23}) and darkness (10^{22}). In the days of Ahab He scourged the land three and a half years with a drought (1 K 17^{1}), and in the time of David devastated the people with a pestilence (2 S 24^{15}). (c) In the early literature Israel had not yet entered greatly into relation with the nations; the teaching of Scripture regarding J″'s rule of the nations first appears in the prophets when the great Assyrian and Babylonian empires came upon the stage of the world's history. But the same conceptions appear in the earlier literature as in the later. J″ showed His power over Egypt when He brought out the people with a high hand, slew the firstborn, and overwhelmed the army in the sea. He drove out the nations before Israel, and gave David his victories over Aram and the peoples around. In Israel itself He is the Living God and Ruler. His angel leads the hosts of Joshua and Barak. The government of the people is in His hand. When in early times a crisis arises, He raises up a judge to save the people; when the old order changes, He elects Saul to the throne; and when the age of conflict is over and an era of peaceful development is inaugurated, He 'builds an house' for David, making his dynasty perpetual. Human leaders are but the form in which J″ clothes His own efficiency, for it is His spirit animating them that makes them heroes and saviours, such as were the judges and Saul. The spirit of J″ is J″ exercising efficiency. And though this efficiency is most visible in the external rule of the people it operates also in the sphere of thought, raising up prophets and Nazirites. The external and the inward often go hand in hand, as when David made Jerusalem the spiritual as well as political capital of the kingdom, and when prophets of the Lord like Nathan and Gad became his advisers. (d) J″'s rule of the world and of His people is moral. For his sin Adam forfeited Eden; for their wickedness mankind were drowned by a flood, and the cities of the plain overthrown. Ahab's sin was chastised by a drought, and David's by a pestilence. The histories being so greatly public annals, little is said of the relation of J″ to the individual. But such histories as those of Sarah, Rachel, and Hannah indicate how closely connected J″ was thought to be with family life; and such narratives as the covenants between Jacob and Laban (Gn $31^{44\text{ff.}}$), Abraham and Abimelech ($21^{22\text{ff.}}$), Joshua and the Gibeonites (Jos 9^{15}), show how He entered into the common life of men. That J″'s treatment of the individual was considered moral everywhere appears, e.g. the brethren of Joseph (Gn $42^{21\text{ff.}}$), Korah (Nu $16^{30\text{ff.}}$), Achan (Jos 7^{15}), Hophni and Phinehas (1 S 3^{13}), Ahab (1 K $21^{20\text{ff.}}$). In Ex 32^{33} J″ says, 'Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book.' And in narrating the death of Abimelech, the very ancient historian says, 'Thus God requited the wickedness of Abimelech which he did unto his father' (Jg $9^{56.\ 57}$). And on reward of righteousness, comp. David's words, 1 S 26^{23} 'The LORD render to every man his righteousness.' Cf. 2 S 2^{5}, 1 K $18^{12\text{ff.}}$. And, finally, (e) the idea of J″'s foresight and predetermination is illustrated in the protevangelium (Gn $3^{14.\ 15}$), in the covenant promises to Abraham (Gn 15), in the destinies appointed for Jacob and Esau (25^{23} $27^{37\text{ff.}\ 39\text{ff.}}$), and in the place and character predicted for the children of Jacob (Gn 49).

The earlier part of the period from the Exodus to the fall of the house of Omri was a time of warfare with external enemies till J″ gave His people rest under David; and it has been thought that the name 'J″ of Hosts,' or fully, 'J″, God of Hosts' (י׳ אֱלֹהֵי צְבָאוֹת), may have arisen during this time of conflict—the 'hosts' being those of Israel. It is strange that the name is not found in the Hex., appearing in Samuel, and particularly in the prophets. It is possible that the title had some concrete origin such as is suggested, and that it did not originally refer to the hosts of heaven, whether stars or angels, nor to the general cosmic forces of the universe. In the prophets, however, there is certainly no reference to the hosts of Israel. Between the time of the battle-cry, 'the sword of the Lord and of Gideon' (Jg 7^{20}), and the words of Isaiah, 'In returning and rest shall ye be saved' (Is 30^{15}), a world had passed away and a new one arisen. The ancient name 'J″ of Hosts' was used as the loftiest name for J″, suggesting His royal majesty and infinite power; but in all likelihood the prophets used the name as a single title without analyzing it, and never asking themselves what the 'hosts' were. J″ of Hosts means God of the universe.*

(3) The Prophetic period.—J″ was pre-eminently the God of human history, and it was in their history that the people learned to know Him. The stages through which the history ran led the people's thoughts ever more from the external to the inward in J″. First, the victories He gave them at the Exodus, at the entrance into Canaan, and in David's days, revealed the might of J″. Then, their defeats in after days, and the dissolution of the state, gave them a sight into His inward being. No prophet or writer ever attributed Israel's disasters to the might of the nations or their gods; they were due to J″ their God Himself. They were chastisements, revealing His moral being. And finally, in the depression that lay on them from the Exile, never uplifted, they learned to transcend both history and external conditions, and to know J″ as a spiritual fellowship. They were ever with Him (Ps 73^{23}). They were satisfied with His likeness (Ps 17^{15}); J″ was God of the spirits of all flesh (Nu 16^{22} 27^{16}). His afflictions had already enabled Jeremiah to reach this stage, in whom we see prophecy transfigured into piety.

Under Solomon, Israel entered into the circle of civilized nations. His father David was a fervent Jehovist; fervour was scarcely characteristic of himself in any direction. As he built houses for the gods of the neighbouring peoples among whom he found his wives, he cannot have been a logical monotheist. Neither was Ahab this even a hundred years later, though there is no evidence, but the reverse, that he abandoned the worship of J″. The century after Solomon witnessed the complete absorption of the native population; but if Israel subdued the Canaanites, it was in turn conquered by them. It inherited their civilization, but the heritage included a legacy of debased moral conceptions and practices. J″ took possession of the native shrines, and so became God of the land; but as He was worshipped where the Baals had been before, to many He might seem not unlike them. The confusion was increased by the fact that the name baal, i.e. 'lord,' was applied to J″.[*] Processes had been going on for long of which we have no clear account. It was in a way a fortunate thing that Ahab introduced the worship of the Tyrian Baal. It brought matters to a pass, and awoke men to see what was at stake. The persecution of the J″ party was no doubt caused by their opposition, for Ahab was no propagandist. Though Elijah was the spokesman of the party, he had a wide movement behind him. Obadiah, the chamberlain, hid 100 prophets of J″ in caves (1 K 18^{4}). The disaffection had invaded the army. When the people 'limped between two opinions' (18^{21}), it was a struggle between their own convictions and the influence of the court. Some indeed, like the Rechabites, were more radical, seeing in the Baal worship only a feature of the Canaanite civilization accepted by Israel, which they would have swept away, returning to the ancient ideal of a nomadic life. And Hosea appears to express a similar sentiment when he says that J″ shall allure Israel into the wilderness and give her her vineyards from there ($2^{14.15}$). At last the spirit of revolt embodied itself in Jehu, and swept away the house of Omri and Baal together. J″ stood with no rival. It was a great though only an external victory. The scene of conflict now changes to the nature of J″ Himself, and the conflict is waged by the canonical prophets.

The prophets taught nothing new about J″,[†] though, with history as their lesson-book, they taught many things more clearly. And to many who had been blind to J″'s operations in the past, what they taught may have seemed strange and even incredible. Each prophet has some special truth about J″ to declare, and the truth is perhaps a reflection of his own kind of mind. But as the separate colours combine to form the pure light, all their separate truths unite to reveal the full nature of J″, for it takes many human minds to make up the divine mind. The prophets, like their predecessors, are, first of all, seers; their function is to foresee and predict; their teaching about the nature of J″ only sustains their predictions. The simultaneous rise of four men such as Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah, each independent of all the others, is a mystery. Amos says, 'The Lord God doeth nothing without revealing his counsel to his servants the prophets' (3^{7}). But the revelation was probably in some way mediated. Did the prophet's ear catch distant sounds of movements among the nations, unheard by other ears? or was it their thought of J″, ever becoming more powerful and engrossing, that led them to project the calamitous future? Probably it was both combined. It is usually argued that the prophets reached their monotheism along the line of the ethical conception of J″; from being the Unique One J″ became the Only One. Possibly their minds moved along several lines. The prophets of the 8th cent. do not formally declare J″ to be God alone, though they silently ignore all other gods; it is only in the age of Dt and in that of Deutero-Isaiah that J″'s sole Godhead is directly expressed.

It is now a common-place to say that Amos taught that J″ is absolute Righteousness, the impersonation of the moral idea; that moral evil alone is sin; and that the only service J″ desires is a righteous life (though Amos also teaches that J″ is good and compassionate, $2^{9ff.}$ $7^{1ff.}$); and that Hosea represents J″ as unchanging Love, which no ingratitude of His people can weary or alienate (though Hosea does not forget the righteousness of J″, 2^{19}); and that to Isaiah J″ is the transcendent Sovereign and universal Lord (though he, too, recognizes the fatherly goodness and nurture of J″, 1^{2} $5^{1ff.}$). Isaiah expresses his conception in the term ḳâdôsh, of which 'holy' is a very imperfect rendering. 'Holiness' is not primarily a moral quality, it is the expression of Godhead in the absolute sense. 'The Holy One of Israel' is a paradox, meaning that the transcendent God has become God of Israel. Isaiah in one thought goes beyond his predecessors (but see HOSEA): he insists on religiousness—that the consciousness of J″ should be ever present in the mind. The want of this consciousness, insensibility to the Lord the King, failure to recognize Him in the events of history and human life,—this is sin ($1^{3ff.}$). And it is the cause of all sin, of the levity of human life (5^{12}), and the self-exaltation both of men and nations ($2^{10ff.}$ 9^{9} 10^{12}). The prophetic ideas form but half their teaching, the greater half lies in their own life and personal relation to God. Taken as a whole, the prophetic teaching amounts to the full ethicizing of the conception of J″. And the moral is of no nationality; it transcends nationality, and is human. The righteous God is God universal, over all. The principles of the human economy have at last clearly reflected themselves in the consciousness of the prophets, and human history is seen to be a moral process. And the idea naturally suggested the other idea of the issue of the process, the eschatology, which is the realizing of perfect righteousness in the world of mankind (Is 1^{26} 9^{7}). The movement of the prophetic thought towards universalism was aided by the entrance of the great empires of Assyria and Babylon on the stage of history. This gave them a new idea, that of the world; it created a new antithesis, J″ and the world; and it opened a new realm for the rule of the King, all the nations of the earth. Universalism is most broadly taught in Deutero-Isaiah; but there it is a theological deduction from the unity of God. J″ is God alone, the first and the last, initiating all movements and leading them to their issue; and His salvation shall be to the ends of the earth (49^{6}). The loftiest thoughts of God expressed in Scripture are found in Job and Deut.-Isaiah. In the latter writer all the operations and attributes of J″ are combined to sustain the faith that he is Redeemer of Israel and Saviour of all mankind,—His creation of the earth ($45^{18ff.}$) and man ($42^{5ff.}$), His call of Israel to be His servant and revelation of Himself within it (42^{1-6} 45^{19-25} 49^{1-6}), and its Restoration ($49^{7ff.}$ $50^{4ff.}$),—all these are in order that all the ends of the earth may look unto Him and be saved (45^{22} 49^{6} $51^{4ff.}$).

(4) From the Exile onwards.—Attributes.—In the last period of Israel's history new conceptions of God hardly emerge. The period was rather one of assimilation of the prophetic teaching into the individual mind and experience. What the prophets had taught of the nature of J″, of His purpose, and particularly of the eschatological issues of His purpose, formed the subject of reflection, and efforts were made to verify it in experience. The efforts, as has been said, raised problems which, if they baffled solution, led to a more inward knowledge of God (Ps $73^{16ff.}$). The problems were mainly three: God and the world; God and Israel His people; and God and the life and destiny of the individual (see above).

Perhaps in this period fuller and more formal expression is given to the attributes of God. But a detailed account of the divine attributes is of little moment or worth. When the idea is reached that God is a transcendent moral Person, it is but a matter of deduction or analysis to tabulate His attributes, for 'moral' embraces not only righteousness, but goodness, love, and compassion. In earlier times J″ revealed His nature in actions which illustrated some one of His attributes. The very surprising ancient passage Ex $34^{5ff.}$, in which J″ proclaimed His name, that is, His whole being, left little to be added later: 'Jehovah, Jehovah God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty.' In later times two causes contributed to a more frequent reference to the attributes of God: first, the tendency to reflection on His nature and on His historical operations, and their religious meaning. This tendency appears in Ezk, and Deutero-Isaiah, and downwards. The latter prophet is fond of turning God's creative and historical acts (43^{16}) into attributes; and thus His relation to the world as Creator becomes the basis and guarantee of His relation to it as Saviour ($45^{18ff.}$; cf. the cosmic christology of St. Paul's later Epp.). And, secondly, when the people wrestled with their God over their adverse destiny and hopes deferred, calling to mind His wonders of old (Ps 77^{11}, and the historical Pss), and the 'sure mercies' promised to David (Pss 89. 132), and appealing to Him not to be far (Ps 22), to make no tarrying, but shine forth for their salvation and stir up His might, they naturally often dwell on His attributes, for prayer is mostly calling to God's mind that which He is. Yet, however varied the emotions be in these psalms, in contents they hardly go beyond the prayers of Moses (Ex $32^{11ff.}$, Nu $14^{13ff.}$, Dt $9^{25ff.}$). The ethical being of J″ in combination with His attributes of omniscience and omnipresence is very profoundly realized by the author of Ps 139. (On special points in the various attributes see the separate articles).

The OT can scarcely be used as authority for the existence of distinctions within the Godhead. The use of 'us' by the divine speaker (Gn 1^{26} 3^{22} 11^{7}) is strange, but is perhaps due to His consciousness of being surrounded by other beings of a loftier order than men (Is 6^{8}). Some other things are suggestive, if nothing more. The angel of J″ is at once identical with J″ and yet different from Him. In Ezk and later prophets there is a movement towards hypostatizing the Spirit of God (see ANGEL). The 'word' of God is sometimes spoken of as if it had an objective existence, and possessed a native power of realizing itself. The 'wisdom' of God in some passages is no more an attribute of God, but a personification of His thought. In Pr 8 'wisdom' is God's world-plan or conception, the articulated framework of the universe as a moral organism. Its creation is the first movement of the divine mind outward. Being projected outside of the mind of God, it becomes the subject of His own contemplation; it is 'with' God. It is also His architect in creation, for creation is only the divine wisdom realizing itself. And as one work of creation arises after another embodying it, its self-realization is as if it 'played' before J″, and this play of self-expression was most joyous in the moral economy of man (cf. Jn 1^{1-3}, Eph 3^{9}, Col $1^{16.17}$). Whether the 'servant of the LORD' be a true being, or only a conception personified into a being, he may be defined as the word of God incarnated in the seed of Abraham. And if even the loftiest Messianic conceptions of the OT remain short of the idea that God 'became' man, yet in Is 9^{1-7} J″ is manifested in the fulness of His being in the Messianic King (cf. chs. 7. 11).

A. B. DAVIDSON.

GOD (IN NT).*—The main object of this art. must be to draw in broad outline the doctrine of God in the NT, so as to show more particularly what new elements are added, and what old elements are specially developed or emphasized. The details of the subject may be left to the special arts., but it is important to mark distinctly those points in which NT presents an advance upon OT.

With this object in view, our inquiry will naturally follow some such lines as these—

I. TENDENCIES OF CONTEMPORARY JUDAISM.
1. Monism.
2. Transcendence.
3. Particularist Limitations.
II. TEACHING OF NT.
1. Attributes of God.
(i.) Fatherhood.
(ii.) Love.
(iii.) Righteousness.
2. Revelation of God.
(i.) Through the Son.
(ii.) Through the Holy Ghost.
3. Distinctions in the Godhead.
(i.) The Father and the Son.
(ii.) The Holy Ghost.

I. TENDENCIES OF CONTEMPORARY JUDAISM.—It is impossible not to be impressed by the intense and passionate loyalty of Jews to the idea of God as they conceived that it had been handed down to them. The repudiation of idolatry could not have been more complete. It was this uncompromising monotheism which formed at once the largest and the purest element in the antipathy which the Jews felt for the heathen world, and in their impatience of its domination. The well-known instance of Caligula's attempt to set up his statue in the temple shows how the whole nation was stirred to its depths by the threat of such a sacrilege (Philo, Leg. ad Gaium, §§ 32–43; Jos. Ant. XVIII. viii. 2–9, BJ II. x. 1–3). And smaller incidents, like the hewing down of the golden eagle from the gate of the temple under Herod (Ant. XVII. vi. 2, BJ I. xxxiii. 2–4), and that of Pilate and the shields (Ant. XVIII. iii. 1, BJ II. ix. 2, 3; Philo, ad G. § 38), illustrate the jealousy with which the slightest approach of heathen profanation was resisted.

Christian apologists have often done scant justice to the intensity of this faith, which was utterly disinterested and capable of magnificent self-sacrifice. Those who believe most firmly that the Christian creed is an advance upon it are yet bound to recognize that it formed the base, broad and deep, on which that creed has been built. Judaism with all its faults and with all its corruptions was yet the religion of the Chosen People. However imperfectly it embodies the leading principles of Psalmists and Prophets, it yet had those principles behind it. It made great mistakes in the estimate and in the interpretation of its own past, but these very mistakes would seem to have been honest, and in the first instance at least mistakes of the head rather than of the heart.

* The writer of this portion of the art. very much regrets that he has not had the advantage of seeing the previous portion before writing.

A Christian cannot afford to misjudge or undervalue the better elements in Judaism, even in that branch of Judaism which rejected Christianity. At the same time he cannot help seeing certain weak points in it—points in which it demanded improvement, and which it has been one of the great results of the coming of Christ to improve. This holds good even of one of its best features, its doctrine of God. And that in three respects.

1. MONISM.—It was of the essence of the Jews' belief that God is One. The Jew repeated solemnly every day the words of Dt 6^{4} 'Hear, O Israel, J″ our God is one J″.' A stress was laid on 'one' to mark the contrast to the gods of the heathen. And it is said that Rabbi Akiba died his martyr's death with this word 'one' on his lips (Weber, Jüd. Theol.^{2} § 31, p. 151). Our Lord, as we know, took the same text as a starting-point of His own teaching (Mk $12^{29f.}$). And yet, after all, it expresses, or was apt to express, in the mouth of a Jew a rigid abstract idea of Oneness. The Jews appealed to it at a later date against the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. And it did for them exclude the deeper truth contained in that doctrine—the truth that God is not a mere Monad, self-centred and self-absorbed, without scope for the exercise of the highest affections within itself, but a Monad so distributed as it were within itself as to admit of a perfect interchange and reciprocity of those affections which can exist only as between persons. On this side the Jewish monotheism could not help being bare and dry and inadequate to the true richness and fulness of Deity.

The passages of OT in which the plural is used in reference to the divine action led the Jews to make some small approach towards the Christian conception by the idea of an 'upper or celestial familia or tribunal' (Taylor on Pirke Aboth, ii. 2). Taylor quotes Sanhed. 38*b*: 'The Holy One, blessed is He, does nothing without consulting the familia superna, for it is said (Dn 4^{17}), "This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones."'

2. TRANSCENDENCE.—At the time of which we are speaking there was a marked and widespread tendency in the higher minds to widen the chasm between God and the world. Philosophy was straining after a conception of the Supreme Good or the Supreme Being as transcending the conditions of finite existence (οὐκ οὐσίας ὄντος τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, ἀλλ' ἔτι ἐπέκεινα τῆς οὐσίας πρεσβείᾳ καὶ δυνάμει ὑπερέχοντος, Plato, Rep. 509 B). This was especially characteristic of Platonism, which contributed so much to the thought of Philo. And a like effort might be seen in the Oriental religions which were in contact with Judaism on another side. It may not be easy to say how far the movement in Judaism itself was sympathetic to these influences and how far it was internal and spontaneous; but that there was such a movement is evident.

(a) Names of God.—One marked indication of it is the treatment of the divine names. The great covenant name Jehovah (Jahweh) was considered too sacred to be pronounced aloud except in the temple (Schürer, GJV ii. 241, 381; Eng. tr. II. i. 296, ii. 82). Besides the common substitution of Adonai or Elohim in reading, a number of paraphrases were in use, all prompted by the instinct of reverence: 'Heaven,' 'Place,' or 'Space' (ὁ τόπος in Philo), 'the Name,' 'the Holy One, blessed is He' (Taylor on Pirke Aboth, iv. 7). In Greek the usual substitute was Κύριος. This conveyed, of course, indirectly the full connotation of J″; directly, it gave prominence to the idea of sovereignty. This idea meets us in a great variety of forms: 'God, King, Lord of the world'; 'Lord of all,' 'God, Lord of heaven,' 'Lord of the whole creation of the heaven,' 'Lord of lords, of the mighty, of the rulers,' dominator dominus (8 or 9 times in 2 Es); 'Great King,' 'King of kings,' 'King on the lofty throne'; 'Lord of judgment, of righteousness,' deus, dominus omnipotens. In close connexion with the sovereignty of God is His majesty: 'the Great One,' 'the Great Glory,' 'the Holy and Great One,' 'the Honoured and Glorious One,' 'the Mighty One,' fortis, fortissimus (esp. in 2 Es and Apoc. Bar). Less frequent is the idea of creation as an attribute of God (Enoch 81^{5} 94^{10}, Assump. Mos. 10^{10}), and that of eternity (Enoch 25^{3} 75^{3}, Assump. Mos. 10^{7}; cf. Cheyne on Is 40^{28}). After the simple titles Θεός and Κύριος, probably the commonest in the literature of this period is 'Most High' (ὕψιστος, altissimus, excelsus, ἐν ὑψίστοις κατοικῶν: on this title cf. Cheyne, Bamp. Lect. p. 83 f.). We may take this as the most direct expression of the idea which we call 'transcendence.'

On the names of God the reader may consult the excellent indexes in Charles, Book of Enoch and Assump. of Moses, and Bensly-James, Fourth Bk. of Ezra. There is less material in Pss of Sol and Test. of XII. Patriarchs. A list of the divine names in the earlier part of the Talmud is given in an essay by Löw, Gesamm. Schr. i. 177–186 (Schürer, LThZ, 1891, col. 275).

(b) Removal of Anthropomorphisms.—The older forms of Judaism are well represented in the Targums. In these the growing conception of the transcendence of God is clearly marked. The simple anthropomorphisms which are so common in OT are paraphrased away. The ground is cut from under them at the outset, as the creation of man in the likeness of God (Gn 1^{26}) is changed into his creation in the likeness of the ministering angels. God is represented as taking counsel with the angels, and creating man in their image. In pursuance of this tendency, where God is represented as 'coming down,' as seeing and hearing, etc., we find substituted the vaguer expressions, 'God revealed Himself,' 'it was revealed before God.' When we are told in Gn 18^{8} that Abraham's heavenly visitants 'ate' what was set before them, the later (though in this case not the oldest) Targum paraphrases 'it seemed to him as though they ate'; and in like manner in the case of Lot (Gn 19^{3}). Even the ascription to God of mental acts, such as 'knowledge' (Gn 3^{5}, Ex 3^{19}) or 'intending' (Gn 50^{20}), is avoided, and that in the older Targum of Onkelos. Other expressions which attribute to God the conditions and even the passions of man are removed (e.g. the 'man of war' in Ex 15^{3}), anger (Ex 15^{8}, Ps 10^{5}), repentance (Ex 32^{12}). Along with these changes go a number of others, the object of which is to spiritualize the realistic descriptions of the intercourse between God and man. In this way even Jacob's wrestling and Moses' speaking with God 'face to face' disappear; and in places where God and man are, as it were, bracketed together a distinction is introduced, e.g. Ex 14^{31} '[the people] believed in the LORD and in his servant Moses' becomes 'believed in the LORD and in the prophecy of Moses'; Nu $21^{5.7}$ '[the people] spake against God and against Moses' becomes 'murmured before J″ and disputed with Moses' (Weber, Jud. Theol.^{2} pp. 154–157).

The Greek version of OT (Sept.) is several centuries older than the written Targums as they have come down to us. And there, too, a very similar set of changes may be noted. There, too, we find paraphrases for God's 'repenting,' for the descriptions of God as seen, for 'the LORD is a man of war' (Drummond, Philo Judæus, i. 158 f.). The fragments quoted by Clem. Alex. and Euseb. show that one of the earliest Judæo-Alexandrian writers, Aristobulus, whose date is placed at about B.C. 170–150, had already discussed and explained at length the anthropomorphisms in OT (Schürer, GJV ii. 763; Eng. tr. II. iii. 240). And Philo deliberately rejects all real anthropomorphism or anthropopathism, though he regards the use of anthropomorphic expressions as a necessity, especially for the unlearned (Drummond, op. cit. ii. 12–15).

We have thus abundant evidence as to the general set of the current of thought in the century immediately before and immediately after the Christian era. And yet at a later date, and it may be to a certain extent even at this date, other causes were operating to bring back anthropomorphisms of a particular kind. We shall see this when we come to speak presently of the limitations imposed upon Judaism by its excessive self-consciousness of national privilege. However much it might avoid the conceiving of God as made in the likeness of man generally, it had not the same hesitation to conceive of Him as made in the likeness of the ideal Jew (see below, p. 208^a).

(c) Intermediate Beings.—In proportion as God was removed from direct contact with the world of matter, it became necessary to fill up the gap with intermediate agencies. So Philo: 'God generated all things (out of matter), not touching it Himself, for it was not right for the Wise and Blessed to come in contact with indeterminate and mixed matter; but He used the incorporeal powers whose real name is ideas, that each genus might receive its fitting form' (De Sacrificant. 13; ap. Drummond, Philo Judæus, ii. 113, with a slight difference of translation). Philo thus explains the action of God upon matter by the intervention of certain 'powers,' to which he also gives the Platonic name of 'ideas.' These, again, he sometimes calls 'Logoi,' which, in their turn, are summed up under the comprehensive name of 'Logos,' a quasi-personification of the divine reason. This is familiar ground (see art. LOGOS).

Palestinian theology did not go so far as Alexandrian in the use which it makes of intermediate agencies; but it, too, has and uses them. The most important of these for our purpose are the 'Memra' or Word of J″, the Shechinah, and the Holy Spirit.

The Memra is a personification, almost a hypostatizing, not of the Divine Reason, but of the executive Divine Word, on the model of such passages as Is $55^{10.11}$ 'As the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither . . . so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return to me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.' This executive Word of God is constantly substituted in the Targum, in places where the OT refers the action directly to God Himself. The introduction of the Memra is the chief expedient for the removal of anthropomorphisms of which mention has just been made. All bodily appearance or bodily action is ascribed, not to God, but to His Memra. It is the medium through which the presence of God among His people is realized. The intervention of God in history is conducted through the Memra. The Memra covers the whole ground over which God is represented as acting, as manifested, as revealed. It is remarkable that this conception, though extremely frequent in the Targums, is not found in the Talmud. But we cannot doubt that it existed, though perhaps on a more limited scale, in the period of the NT.

The place of the Memra is taken in the later Talmudic literature by the Shechinah. In the Targums the two conceptions stand side by side, the Shechinah representing the manifested glory of the divine presence. The Shechinah differs from the Memra as being, at least at this earlier date, impersonal. Prayer and trust are predicated of the one, but not of the other. The Memra does, and the Shechinah does not, take an active part in the redemption of Israel. The Greek equivalent δόξα is of frequent occurrence in the NT (Weber, §§ 38, 39).

In the OT there are a few allusions to the Holy Spirit (see sep. art.). One of the principal is Ps 51^{11} 'Take not thy Holy Spirit from me,' where its function is clearly indicated as keeping alive religion in the soul, and as the special medium of communication between God and the spirit of man. The 'Spirit of God' is repeatedly spoken of as the source of inspiration and revelation. It is, in particular, the moving cause of the utterances, and, so far as they are divinely prompted, of the actions of the prophets and other organs of the Deity. In one OT writing there is a tendency to go further than this, and to make of the Holy Spirit a distinct hypostasis. This is Deutero-Isaiah, where we have such expressions as, 'The LORD God hath sent me, and his Spirit' (48^{16}), and 'They rebelled and grieved his Holy Spirit' (63^{10}; cf. Cheyne, ad loc.). There is hardly any clear advance upon this until we come to NT. The conception is not one that is largely used: ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ occurs once in Ps.-Sol (17^{42}) and 'immitte in me Spiritum Sanctum' in 2 Es 14^{22}. But in neither case is there any attribution of personality. In Targ. and Talm. there is a fluctuating use, the tendency to personify being sometimes greater than it is at others (רוּחַ is both masc. and fem., but more often the latter, the sense of which is more impersonal, Weber, p. 191). The conception cannot be said to have assumed a fixed form at the time when NT literature begins.

Besides these intermediate agencies there is the Messiah ('Son of Man' in Similitudes of Bk. of Enoch), whose function is esp. that of judgment and of the restoration of the chosen people. And there is also the whole celestial hierarchy of angels, which, from the Persian domination onwards, had become more and more defined and elaborated.

The Jew had a valuable corrective against the injurious effects of an exaggerated doctrine of the transcendence of God in the OT doctrine of His omnipresence, though this was not one of the doctrines which took the strongest hold on the Jewish mind. 'In the development of the Jewish religion, this conception of God's omnipresence was only reached at a comparatively late period, and it was for long crossed and obscured by other simpler and more childish notions. To the moral attributes of Deity, to His supreme pity and justice, there are endless references in the Psalter and the Prophets; to the divine omnipresence there are but few. And, indeed, there is an element of philosophy and of mysticism in this conception, to neither of which the native Hebrew mind was pre-eminently prone.' Still, the doctrine finds magnificent and classical expression in Ps 139; and it is natural that the modern writer, who seeks for the germs of a belief in the immanence of God as well as in His transcendence, should fall back upon this (see Montefiore in Aspects of Judaism, London, 1895, pp. 107–124). On the relation of immanence and transcendence in the theology of Philo, see Herriot, Philon le Juif, p. 211 ff.

3. PARTICULARIST LIMITATIONS. — Although there was in Judaism this tendency to emphasize the transcendence of God, and although the attitude of mind corresponding to this tendency was one of reverential awe, which is often finely expressed, there was at the same time another set of tendencies which were apt to run counter to this, and to bring back in an unattractive form the very faults from which Judaism was trying to free itself. These counter-tendencies had their root in the overweening estimate of the Law and the rabbinical study of the Law, and of the privileged position of the Jewish people.

The fundamental mistake of Judaism, fraught with disastrous consequences along the whole line of religious belief and practice, was its neglect of the Prophets in comparison with the Law, and its failure to grasp the principle that the Law was to be interpreted in the spirit of the Prophets and not by the rules of a minute literalism. The Jew believed that his Law came from God, and we must do justice to the strength and tenacity of this belief. It is easy to see how many of his errors of interpretation flowed directly from it. But it must be confessed that his zeal was not according to knowledge (Ro 10^{2}). However well meant in the first instance, it was often strangely devoid of insight (though from time to time flashes of insight may be discerned in it for which we are hardly prepared by the general tenor of the surroundings). But this lack of insight caused the Jew to fall a too ready victim to the warping effect of interested motive. His love of the Law as the gift of God became pride in himself as the exponent of the Law, pride in his race as the recipients of the Law, security in the consciousness of formal obedience as though it dispensed from the prolonged and more difficult task of true spiritual conformity. Not that the rabbinical teachers by any means always lost sight of this, but that through this process of self-deception a standard which, on the face of it, seemed to be extremely high became in practice miserably perverted and low. [We are compelled to use such language, by an impartial study of Judaism in the 1st cent. of the Christian era as it appears not only in Christian writings but in the pages of the Jewish historian. The Christian, however, should remember that, though true, this is not the whole truth; there are exceptions and qualifications].

The Jew's horizon was almost limited by the Law. It absorbed the energies of the strongest minds, and the possession of it created a national self-consciousness which was anything but well adapted 'for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness.' This state of things reacted strongly upon the conception of God. Judaism sought to get rid of anthropomorphisms drawn from common human nature only to substitute for them another set of anthropomorphisms, in some ways less innocent, drawn from rabbinical human nature. It expelled idola tribus, only to fall a prey to idola specus et theatri.

Thus God Himself was regarded as devoted to the study of His own Law, and not only of the Law, but even of the rabbinical developments of the Law. By day He 'is engaged upon the 24 Books of the Torah, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa, and by night He is engaged upon the 6 divisions of the Mishnah. God is even represented as having companions in the study of the Torah. At least we have, according to Baba Mezia, 85^{b}, even in heaven an assembly, like the high schools on earth, devoted to the investigation of the Torah. Here the great Rabbis sit in the order of their merit and of their knowledge of the Law, studying Halacha, and God studies with them. They dispute with one another and lay down Halacha' (Weber, p. 158).

We may make allowance for such extravagances as this, and see in them only a play of fancy growing naturally out of the view that the Law embodied the Wisdom of God. But we see how the idolatry of the Law tended to contract the range of spiritual vision. And still more mischievous results followed when the Law and all the rest of the divine ordinances were regarded as having for their final cause the profit and glory of Israel.

LITERATURE. — Much material may be found in the larger works on the Life of Christ and the history and condition of the Jewish People (Edersheim, Schürer, etc.), or the works of Siegfried and Drummond on Philo (to which may be now added Herriot, Philon le Juif, Paris, 1898); in the editions of Pseudepigrapha, to which reference has been made above; and in Taylor's Pirḳe Aboth. But the most convenient and complete of all the collections bearing directly on Jewish thought and theology is the posthumous work of Ferdinand Weber, formerly called System d. altsynagogalen palästinischen Theologie (Leipzig, 1880), and in the new and improved edition brought out under the superintendence of Schnedermann, Jüdische Theologie auf Grund d. Talmud u. verwandter Schriften (1897). Weber, though of Jewish origin, wrote from the Christian standpoint; and the reader who desires to see what is to be said from the Jewish side will find it attractively presented in Montefiore's Hibbert Lectures (London, 1892), and in artt. in JQR.

II. THE TEACHING OF THE NT.—We thus have as the starting-point for the teaching of NT an idea of God very tenaciously held, up to a certain point high and pure, and still bearing at times, though fitfully and uncertainly, the marks of its inspired origin; but as a rule contracted and petrified, with far too much of the life and warmth of the old belief of Psalmists and Prophets dried out of it, and in many minds seriously infected with a cancerous growth of self-love and self-righteousness. How did Christianity vivify, restore, enlarge, and enrich this idea? It did so (1) by asserting with greatly increased breadth and emphasis certain of the attributes of Godhead; (2) by presenting in the person of Jesus Christ a special revelation, brought home in the most palpable of forms, of the nature of God as expressed in these attributes; and (3) by opening the eyes of men to the truth that God is not, as was supposed, a simple Monad, but that within the Oneness of His Being there were included certain distinctions which made possible a constant flow and return of the highest and purest affections, dimly shadowed in the like affections of men, and putting a crown to the divine perfections.

1. THE ATTRIBUTES OF GOD. — In respect to the attributes of God the teaching of NT grows directly out of that of OT, but in each case greatly strengthens, deepens, and extends that teaching. The leading particulars in which it does this are as follows:—

(i.) Fatherhood.—Perhaps there has been a tendency to minimize too much the part which the conception of God as Father plays in OT (Holtzmann, Neutestl. Theol. i. 48 ff.). Not only is the relation of God both to Israel as a whole and to the individual Israelite compared to that of a father (Dt 1^{31} 8^{5}, Ps 103^{13}), but God is frequently represented as the Father of Israel (Dt 32^{6}, Jer $3^{4.\,19}$ 31^{9}) and of Israelites (Is 63^{16} 64^{8}, Wis 2^{16} 14^{3}, Sir $23^{1.\,4}$, To 13^{4}). We have also the correlative expressions: Israel is 'God's son,' Ex $4^{22f.}$ (cf. Wis 18^{13}, Sir 37^{12}), Hos 11^{1}, Jer 3^{19} 31^{20}, Ps 89^{27}, and individuals in Israel His 'children' (Dt 14^{1}). Some of these passages are enunciated with full prophetic πληροφορία (Ex $4^{22f.}$, Hos 11^{1}, Is 63^{16}), and must be numbered among the axiomatic utterances of OT religion. We note also, that while the relation of son to father is predicated both of Israel as a whole, and mediately through the nation of individual Israelites, it is also predicated with especial force of the theocratic king whom, with the sequel of the history before us, we regard as a type of the Messiah (Pss 2 and 89).

There was therefore no lack of points of contact and connexion between the teaching of OT and of NT. And yet the doctrine of NT assumes such different proportions as almost to amount to a new revelation. So far as the idea of the Divine Fatherhood really entered into the popular consciousness, it was chiefly as an item in the general sense of privilege. Even that had its good side, and this good side was the saving virtue of Judaism. But the virtue and its corruption lay too near together. Over wide tracts of Judaism the former was very largely swallowed up by the latter. A new impulse was needed if the idea of the Fatherhood of God was to retain its highest qualities of warmth and intimacy, and was at the same time not to be the privilege of a chosen few, but was to be brought home to the common consciousness of mankind.

No one doubts that Christianity has succeeded in doing this. From the beginning of NT to the end the lesson of God's Fatherhood is presented in such mass and volume as to identify it with the very essence of Christianity in a sense which does not apply to any other religion. And this is a clear case in which all subsequent teaching does but reflect the teaching of the Founder. One of the leading features in that teaching is the (inherited) conception of God as King (the kingdom of God as representing His penetrating and pervasive sovereignty); but side by side with this, and in full equality with it, is the conception of God as Father. No name of God was more constantly on the lips of Christ; and no other name so dominated the whole thought of God, as He not only cherished it for Himself, but bequeathed it to His disciples. Fatherhood is no longer one attribute among many, but it is a central attribute which gives a colour to all the rest. It is characteristic of Jesus that He repeatedly argues downwards from this attribute as furnishing a safe basis for deduction (Mt 6[26. 32] 7[9-11] 10[29-31] etc.).

The idea of the Fatherhood of God is presented in the teaching of our Lord upon three planes. (a) God is Father of all mankind. His fatherly attributes are displayed even to 'the unthankful and the evil' (Lk 6[35], cf. Mt 5[45]). (b) He is in a special sense the Father of believers, disciples of Christ. In the uncertainty which attends the exact circumstances of many of His discourses, it may be often doubtful as to how far the phrase ὁ πατὴρ ὑμῶν extends beyond these. Probably, as a rule its application starts from the inner circle. But it is also probably not confined to this. It is certainly impossible in view of such sayings as Mk 9[40] ('he that is not against us is for us') to regard it as bounded by any hard-and-fast line. All those to whom Jesus speaks are potential disciples. The two classes run into each other. To both God stands in the relation of Father; but the fulness of His love is naturally felt by those who have learnt to come to Him as His children. (c) There is, however, yet a third sense in which the Fatherhood of God is unique. Jesus does not speak of 'our Father' as embracing both Himself and His disciples, but of 'My Father' and 'your Father.' In this He takes up the special sense in which (as we have seen) the terms 'Father' and 'Son' were applied to the theocratic King. The ministry of Jesus begins with an announcement from heaven: 'Thou art My beloved Son, in Thee I am well pleased' (Mk 1[11]). And this announcement is repeated on another culminating occasion (Mk 9[7]). It is by virtue of this unique relationship that the revelation of God which Jesus gives is also unique (Mt 11[27]). It contains further implications as to the nature of the Godhead. To both these points we shall return.

All the three planes of Fatherhood and Sonship reappear in the teaching of the apostles. The first is, as with our Lord Himself, the least prominent. Still it is not absent (Ac 17[28]), and it must always be remembered that if the Fatherhood of God is in the first instance and in the fullest sense for Christians (Ro 8[15-17], Gal 4[6], 1 P 1[17]), they hold their privileges in trust for the rest of the world. The fulness of the Gentiles, and after it the fulness of Israel, is some day to be brought in (Ro 11[25ff.]). The peculiar Sonship of Christ is very prominent in the apostolic writings. It is clear that the apostles too, and we may say the whole Church, regarded the relation indicated by it as unique. It is the full recognition of this by virtue of which Christians are Christians (see below, p. 214ᵇ, and art. CHRISTOLOGY).

(ii.) Love.—One of the points included under the Fatherhood of God is the extension of a Father's love to all who stand to Him in the relation of children. There had been a school of Prophets and Psalmists, of which Jeremiah seems to have been a leader, who laid especial stress on the 'loving-kindness' of J", i.e. the feeling of kindness and compassion which grows out of the covenant relation, the love of God for Israel as the covenant people. In the NT the horizon widens: God is a Father, not to Israel alone, but to all who claim their sonship. Towards them He turns, not paternal severity, but paternal love. The writers of NT generalize this love, so that one of them says in set terms 'God is love' (1 Jn 4[8]). Here is another salient characteristic of Christianity. As it insists far more than every other known religion that God is Father, so also is it the one religion which lays down in this emphatic way that 'God is love.'

There are two distinguishing features in this proposition that 'God is love.' (a) The argument on which it is mainly based is that supplied by the death of Christ. St. John lays down this in his Gospel: 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life' (Jn 3[16], an enlargement by the evangelist of the discourse with Nicodemus). In the First Ep. when he returns to the idea he draws the same inference from the same premises a little more widely stated: 'Herein was the love of God manifested in us, that God hath sent his Only-begotten into the world, that we might live through him' (1 Jn 4[9]). And it is a noticeable fact that St. Paul, to whom this attribute of the Godhead is no less prominent, grounds it also upon the stupendous sacrifice of the death of Christ: 'God commendeth his own love towards us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us' (Ro 5[8], cf. vv.[6-7] and 8[31-39]).

(b) The unwavering confidence of the biblical writers in the love of God may indeed be set down to revelation. The philosopher who sought to infer the character of the Author of Nature inductively from His works would not be able to adopt this tone. The waste which attends the processes of nature is accompanied by too much suffering. He might on the whole, and upon a balance of 'for' and 'against,' decide that the evidence for a benevolent purpose preponderates, and he might also see reason to think that that purpose became clearer in the progressive evolution of things; but further than this he could not go. He could not speak of benevolence as absolute; he could not say 'God is love.' The belief expressed in these words is not the product of an induction. None the less, when once it is entertained, and entertained on such grounds as those which the NT writers assign for it, the phenomena of the world may then be found compatible with it. The Christian may still cling to his belief, and trust that what is at present dark to him will be made clear in God's good time.

(iii.) Righteousness.—There can be no mistake as to the meaning and implications of the Fatherhood and Love of God. The case is different as to His Righteousness. Righteousness is a word of such varied signification that the exact sense in which it is used in any particular passage may really be doubtful; and there are certain places in NT where its meaning, as applied to God (δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ), has been a subject of much discussion.

We may say that there are really four leading senses which the phrase δικ. θεοῦ will bear. It may mean (a) 'rightness' or 'goodness' in general, including all moral excellence; or (b) in a narrower sense 'judicial righteousness,' the strict application of the standard of right by the judge; or (c) an application of that standard which is not strict but leans to the side of mercy towards the offender, and takes especial care of the weak and defenceless. Lastly, (d) there are a number of passages in the writings of St. Paul where it has been thought that δικ. θεοῦ ceases to be strictly an attribute of God at all, and comes to mean rather a state of man in the sight of God. This use we must consider. But it will be best to make our way upwards from the easier senses to the more difficult.

(a) It may be doubted whether there are any passages in NT where δικ. θ. is used precisely in this wide sense (unless we regard the case discussed below as in effect an application of it). But δικ. is frequently used of men in the sense of general uprightness or virtue; and this is brought into relation to God almost as if it were δικ. ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ, 'righteousness in his sight,' or 'of which he approves.'

In Lk 1^{75} we have λατρεύειν αὐτῷ ἐν ὁσιότητι, κ. δικαιοσύνῃ ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ, where ἐνώπ. αὐτ. strictly defines λατρεύειν, but in effect gives the wider meaning to δικ. In Mt 6^{33} it is a question whether the reading of most critical texts (incl. WH) τὴν βασιλείαν καὶ τὴν δικαιοσύνην αὐτοῦ (sc. τοῦ θεοῦ) can stand, and whether we ought not, with Lachmann, Weiss, and Holtzmann, to prefer the reading of cod. B, τὴν δικ. κ. τ. βασ. αὐτοῦ. In that case τ. δικ. would be absolute; to 'seek God's righteousness' would be an expression without parallel in the Gospels; we should have to connect it with Is 54^{17} quoted below. Ja 1^{20} comes under the next head, and in 2 P 1^{1}, where righteousness is referred to Christ, the sense is akin to (d).

(b) The simple judicial sense, though deeply rooted in language and always present in the background of thought, is not prominent in NT except in Rev. It naturally has a place in St. Paul's speech at Athens (Ac 17^{31}). It occurs also in 2 Ti 4^{8} and in Rev $16^{5.7}$ $19^{2.11}$. And the same idea is conveyed by δικαιοκρισία in Ro 2^{5}.

(c) The more distinctive senses in which righteousness is predicated of God come under the last two heads, and one of these, as has been said, is still somewhat of a problem. Both these remaining senses are certainly based upon the use of OT, and to understand them we need to recall the conditions of society in OT times. The OT covers a period of transition from comparative barbarism to comparative civilization. In all the earlier and less settled portions of such a period the rallying-point of society was the judge. It was a matter of the greatest moment that he should be strong enough to deal out even-handed justice without fear or favour. He would be beset by turbulent and powerful chieftains, who would make his task an extremely difficult one. By degrees it would be increasingly felt that the judge (or the king as judge) was the one refuge for all the weak and defenceless classes—the poor, the fatherless, the widow, the stranger; and his more characteristic functions would seem to be, not so much the safeguarding of equal rights, as the special protection of those who most needed protection. For king or judge to discharge this function in the face of all the dangers and uncertainties of his own position must often have required no little force and elevation of character. Hence we are not surprised to find either the great importance attached to righteousness as a name for this quality, or that it came often to mean vindicating the rights of the oppressed or dealing gently and leniently with the weak. We are apt to put righteousness in contrast to mercy, as Marcion opposed the 'just or righteous God' (δίκαιος) to the 'good God' (ἀγαθός); but to the Heb. 'just' or 'righteous' often meant 'merciful.'

These senses can be abundantly illustrated from OT. One conspicuous passage may be given out of many: Job 29^{14-17} 'I put on righteousness, and it clothed me: my justice was a robe and a diadem. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame. I was a father to the needy; and the cause of him that I knew not I searched out. And I brake the jaws of the unrighteous, and plucked the prey out of his teeth' (cf. vv.$^{9-13}$).

It was an inevitable process that this use of the word 'righteousness' as applied to men reacted upon its application to God. More and more as time went on, esp. in Deutero-Isaiah and certain psalms, the righteousness of God comes to be, not His strict justice, but His healing, rescuing justice. He is not 'a just God and yet a Saviour,' but 'a just God and a Saviour' (Is 45^{21}; cf. δίκαιος καὶ δικαιῶν, Ro 3^{26}). The two conceptions of 'righteousness' and 'salvation' are very frequently placed in juxtaposition: Ps 24^{5} 'He shall receive a blessing from the LORD, and righteousness from the God of his salvation'; $31^{1.2}$ (cf. 71^{2}) 'Deliver me in thy righteousness. . . . Be thou to me . . . an house of defence to save me'; 71^{15} 'My mouth shall tell of thy righteousness and of thy salvation all the day'; 98^{2} 'The Lord hath made known his salvation: his righteousness hath he openly showed in the sight of the nations'; 143^{11} 'In thy righteousness bring my soul out of trouble'; Is 46^{13} 'I bring near my righteousness, it shall not be far off, and my salvation shall not tarry'; 51^{6} (cf. ^{8}) 'My salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished'; 56^{1} 'My salvation is near to come, and my righteousness to be revealed'; 59^{17} (cf. 61^{10}) 'He put on righteousness as a breastplate, and an helmet of salvation upon his head'; 63^{1} 'I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save.'

In the Pseudepigrapha, speaking generally, the 'righteousness of God' is, as a rule, His judicial righteousness, as seen in the rewarding of the righteous and the punishment of the wicked. But we do also occasionally find its merciful side put forward, as in 4 Ezra (ed. Bensly-James) 8^{36}: In hoc enim adnuntiabitur iusticia tua et bonitas tua, domine, cum miser̄tus fueris eis qui non habent substantiam operum bonorum.

It is to be noticed also that in connexion with the righteousness of God there arises the idea of a righteousness in man derived from God. Thus in Is 54^{17} 'This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord, and their righteousness which is of me, saith the LORD.' And a like use is found in Bar $5^{2.9}$ 'Cast about thee the robe of the righteousness which cometh from God (τῆς παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνης); set a diadem on thy head of the glory of the Everlasting. . . . For God shall lead Israel with joy in the light of his glory with the mercy and righteousness that cometh from him' (δικ. τῇ παρ' αὐτοῦ).

There do not seem to be any instances in NT of a use of the 'righteousness of God' quite on the same footing with that in Deutero-Isaiah and the Psalms. But when we consider the collection of passages just quoted from these and from other books, we seem to be upon the line of antecedents of a very marked and characteristic doctrine, which is associated specially with St. Paul.

(d) The Pauline doctrine. We have spoken of this doctrine as still constituting a problem in the exegesis and theology of NT. It is a problem which has been sharply accentuated in recent years, but, if not yet wholly solved, it would appear to have been at least placed on the road to solution.

In Ro 1^{17} St. Paul formulates the thesis of the Epistle. It is an announcement to the world of the righteousness of God revealed in the gospel from faith to faith (δικαιοσύνη γὰρ θεοῦ ἐν αὐτῷ [sc. τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ] ἀποκαλύπτεται ἐκ πίστεως εἰς πίστιν). Here the key-phrase is evidently δικ. θεοῦ; but what exactly does it mean?

A few years ago there seemed to be a strong consensus of the best exegetes (Meyer, Weiss, Lipsius, Godet, Oltramare, and in England, Vaughan, Liddon, Beet, Moule, unequivocally, and Gifford with rather more qualification) in favour of taking δικ. θεοῦ as a righteousness, which though in some sense or other God's ('a righteousness of which God is the author,' most Comms.), yet denotes more directly a state of man ('of which man is the recipient'). And whatever may be urged against this view, the arguments for it are so strong that it seems impossible to regard it as devoid of a substantial basis of truth. St. Paul appears to make his own meaning more explicit in Ph 3^9, where he substitutes the phrase τὴν ἐκ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει. And if it is said that this is the view of a later Epistle, and that it is differentiated from Ro by the insertion of ἐκ, the same antithesis of ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ δικ. and ἡ ἰδία δικ. occurs in Ro 10^3, where in spite of the absence of ἐκ the former phrase can hardly be ambiguous. And other arguments derived from the transition from δικ. θ. to ὁ δίκαιος in the quotation from Habakkuk in Ro 1^{17}, and from the evident parallel in $3^{21.\,22}$ (where δικ. θ. is defined by δικ. θ. διὰ πίστεως, κ.τ.λ.), are hardly less cogent.

We must therefore include in the conception a righteousness which, whatever its origin, at least ends by denoting a state of man. But, on the other hand, it is no less impossible to explain δικ. θ. as in the first instance anything else than the personal righteousness of God. This is the sense of the phrase in the immense majority of the cases in which the word is used in OT and in other writings outside the Epp. of St. Paul. A phrase so familiar and so deeply rooted in the common language of men could not be violently wrenched from its usual associations and transferred to others without more explicit warning than any that is given.

At the same time those appear to be equally wrong who (like Häring in the treatise mentioned below) insist that the phrase can only have one meaning in such a way as to compel a choice between the two alternatives. When they speak of 'one meaning,' what they have in view is a definite logical tying-down of that meaning which is not necessitated by language. The array of logical possibilities set out by Häring (pp. 14–17) certainly was not present to the mind of St. Paul, nor was he compelled to discriminate everything that may be capable of discrimination. Language has in its earlier stages an elasticity of use which it may by degrees lose.

To understand the real drift of St. Paul, we ought to bear in mind, not so much the distinctions which we can draw, as those which had been actually drawn when he wrote. He really sums up a long previous development. He sums it up, and the language which he uses bears traces throughout of its several phases; but at the same time he puts upon it a new stamp; he focuses, concentrates, and defines it in a new sense of his own.

It may be worth while to note how the previous phases of which we have been speaking enter into his conception. They would do so in some such order as this—

(a) The broad fundamental meaning of δικαιοσύνη is conformity to right. As applied to God it is the sum of all moral excellence, of which He is the standard to Himself. Even when the word is used in narrower senses, this still remains in the background of the apostle's mind, and from time to time comes more to the front.

(β) In a primitive state of society, the decisions of the chieftain or king acting as judge are the standard of right. And the virtue most highly valued in the judge is that of equal dealing between man and man. There was therefore a tendency for the broad idea of righteousness in the ruler to contract into the narrower idea of justice.

(γ) In such a state of society, however, something more than simple justice was needed. The king or chief was the one efficient champion of the weak against the strong, of the poor against the rich, of the friendless against the powerful. Thus in the opinion of the common people, or of the masses, the form of righteousness for which they looked was even more than justice, care for the weaker side.

(δ) In direct dealings with the poor and weak, where the question was rather of what we should call criminal than of civil law, the virtue of the judge would be mildness and lenience, not exacting the full penalties for misdoing; in other words, treating an offender as innocent, or not so guilty as he really was.

(ε) Such acquittal or remission of punishment would be the act of the judge, of his own free grace pardoning the guilty. When the judge, for whatever reason, dismisses the culprit, pronouncing him 'righteous,' or free from guilt in the eye of the law, it is really the judge himself who, by his verdict, is the author of that righteousness or guiltlessness, and not the person acquitted. And the motive which impels the judge to this is his own personal righteousness of character, manifested under the particular aspect of lenience in judging.

(ϛ) This is the process that really takes place when the sinner is indicted before the judgment-seat of God; and that not merely at the final judgment, but whenever his state in God's sight is considered. The motive which prompts the absolution is no righteousness of the sinner's own, but the righteousness of God.

(η) When we attempt to analyze the nature of that righteousness, we might, on a superficial view, identify it with the narrower sort of judicial righteousness which is seen in the mild treatment or forgiveness of the guilty. But the righteousness of God, as St. Paul regards it, is something much more than this. The mildness of a judge may have in it no higher ingredient than a certain easy good nature because it is indifferent to guilt. The forgiving righteousness of God is not of this kind. It embraces nothing less than the whole scheme of salvation, in which the central feature is the atoning death of Christ. The absolution of the sinner is no act of momentary indulgence, but a deliberately contemplated incident in a vast and far-reaching plan which has for its object the restoration of the human race.

(θ) The leading factor in it, then, is the supreme energizing righteousness of God, which in the course of its operation includes several minor kinds of righteousness, and which ends by attributing to the sinner a condition of righteousness which he has very imperfectly realized for himself. So that from his point of view it may well be called a righteousness not his own, but 'of' or 'from God.' We have seen that as far back as Deutero-Isaiah and Baruch there were traces of this conception (ἡ παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνη). St. Paul therefore was not the first to introduce it. But it is a mistake to regard it as forming the whole or even the main part of his conception.

LITERATURE.—On this part of the subject the reader may consult the commentators on Romans, and in particular those mentioned above; also Pfleiderer, Paulinismus; Holsten, Evang. d. Paulus; Ritschl, Rechtfertigung u. Versöhnung. The stand which has recently been made for explaining δικ. θεοῦ of the personal righteousness of God is associated in this country esp. with the late Dr. James Barmby, Pulpit Comm. on Ro., and Expositor, 1896, ii. 124 ff., and Dr. A. Robertson in The Thinker, Nov. 1893; cf. Exp. Times, Feb. 1898, p. 217. In Germany an art. by Kölbing to somewhat similar effect appeared in SK, 1895, p. 139 ff., followed by a monograph on the subject by Prof. Häring of Tübingen (ΔΙΚΑΙΟΣΥΝΗ ΘΕΟΥ bei Paulus, Tübingen, 1896). Further literature is given on p. 5 of this treatise. The German writers were quite independent of the English, who preceded them in time. On the history of the OT conception there is a valuable tract by Dalman, Die richterliche Gerechtigkeit im AT, Berlin, 1897, which suggested much of the line of treatment followed above.

2. THE REVELATION OF GOD.—The more theological writers of NT clearly lay it down that in Christianity a new revelation is given of the nature and character of God. They connect this new revelation, (i.) with the coming of Christ, and (ii.) with the special outpouring of the Holy Ghost.

(i.) The Revelation through Christ.—The new disclosure of truths about God differed from all previous disclosures, inasmuch as it was no longer confined to a divine prompting of the minds of men, but was made through the incarnate presence of the Son of God Himself. After having in time past spoken to the fathers 'in' the prophets, God had at last spoken 'in' One who was not only prophet but Son (He $1^{1.2}$). This distinction of the New Covenant is emphasized most by St. John, but it is also expressed unequivocally by St. Paul, and Ep. to Hebrews, and the Synoptic Gospels refer to it sufficiently to confirm the evidence of the Fourth Gospel that the principle underlying it was brought out by our Lord Himself.

We may take two passages of St. John as typical of a great number of others: Jn 1^{18} 'No man hath seen God at any time: God only-begotten [reading μονογενὴς θεὸς with ℵBCL, etc., Tregelles, Weiss, WH, RVm] who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him'; and 14^{7-11} 'If ye had known me, ye would have known my Father also: from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him. Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip? he that hath seen me hath seen the Father: how sayest thou, Show us the Father? Believest thou not that I am in the Father, and the Father in me? the words that I say unto you, I speak not from myself: but the Father, abiding in me, doeth his works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me: or else believe me for the very works' sake.'

These passages might be said to be a compendium of a great part of the Gospel, and we may add the Epp. of Jn. This will appear from observing the number of parallels which exist for almost every clause. 'No man hath seen . . . he hath declared,' 'he that hath seen me hath seen'; cf. 3^{32} 5^{37} 6^{46} 13^{20} 15^{24} 17^{26}, 1 Jn 1^{1-3} 2^{23}. 'Who is in the bosom of the Father,' 'I in the Father, and the Father in me'; cf. 8^{16} 10^{38} 14^{20} 16^{32} 17^{21-23}. 'Not from myself'; cf. 5^{19} 7^{16} 8^{28} 12^{49}. 'Doeth his works'; cf. 4^{34} $5^{19-21.36}$ 9^{4} 17^{4}.

St. Paul does not enlarge upon this aspect of the Incarnation of the Son to the same extent as St. John. Still, he expresses it quite unambiguously when he describes Him as εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ἀοράτου (Col 1^{15}), a term which he had used in an earlier Epistle (2 Co 4^{4}) in such a way as to show that the conception was even at that date fully established. It is also implied in the ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων of Ph 2^{6}. The fulness of the revelation made through Christ is the subject of 1 Co 1^{30} ὃς ἐγενήθη σοφία ἡμῖν ἀπὸ θεοῦ (cf. 1^{24} Χριστὸν θεοῦ δύναμιν καὶ θεοῦ σοφίαν; also $2^{6.7}$), Eph 1^{8-10}, Col 2^{3} ἐν ᾧ εἰσὶν πάντες οἱ θησαυροὶ τῆς σοφίας καὶ γνώσεως ἀπόκρυφοι.

In close agreement with the language of St. Paul is He 1^{3} ὢν ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ. On the exact force of these expressions (which are parallel to if not suggested by Wis $7^{25f.}$) see Westcott, etc., ad loc. The purport of them is that Christ, visible and active, brought home to the sight and minds of men the essential nature of God. This is an expansion in a more 'ontological' or 'metaphysical' sense of the opening words of the Epistle. This sense is too deeply ingrained in the language of NT to be eliminated.

Although, as has been said, it is the more theological writers who lay the greatest stress upon this aspect of the Son as revealing the Father, there is one conspicuous passage of the Synoptics in which it is clearly implied. The verse Mt 11^{27}, with its very close parallel in Lk 10^{22} (both passages should be taken with their full context), is in form so like the characteristic sayings of Christ; it fits into and interprets such a number of other passages (Mt 16^{16}, Mk 2^{10} 4^{41} 9^{7} etc.), and, while in remarkable agreement with the general verdict of the primitive Church, stands so apart from the particular tendencies of the Synoptic Gospels that it would be wanton to doubt its genuineness. To make the picture of Christ on earth consistent, we need to see in it not merely the beneficent Teacher, but the Son of God, as this name is understood by the writers of deepest insight.

(ii.) The Revelation through the Holy Ghost.—If we look at the Fourth Gospel from another point of view, we shall find it dominated by the consciousness of a double revelation. That through the Incarnate Son of which we have just been speaking is one; that through the Holy Ghost is the other. Looking back over the space of time that had elapsed since the Ascension, the writer sees that a great force has been at work in the Church, the effect of which he regards as a direct fulfilment of prophecies by our Lord Himself before His departure. A second 'Advocate' ('Comforter' AV, RV) was to come after He was gone. It was to be a dispensation like His own, and was to be characterized by a like dissemination of truth, not so much wholly new truth as a revival and reinvigorating in the minds of the apostles and others who came within its range of truth already taught by Himself: 'These things have I spoken unto you, while yet abiding with you. But the Comforter, even the Holy Spirit, whom the Father hath sent in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you.' . . . 'Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you unto all the truth: for he shall not speak from himself; but what things soever he shall hear, these shall he speak: and he shall declare unto you the things that are to come. He shall glorify me: for he shall take of mine, and shall declare it unto you. All things that the Father hath are mine: therefore said I, that he taketh of mine, and shall declare it unto you' (Jn $14^{25.26}$ 16^{13-15}). There is an accent about all the passages in which the writer refers to this subject which is far more like the accent of real experience than a product of pure reflection without concrete experience behind it. The writings of the Fourth Evangelist contain no express reference to the Day of Pentecost and the history recorded in the Acts, but they contain a number of allusions which are well explained by that history. St. Luke in like manner has no express mention of the Paraclete, but both his Gospel and the Acts bear frequent testimony to the work of the Paraclete under His other name, the Holy Spirit. Here as in the Fourth Gospel we have a historical retrospect of facts and impressions recalled after a considerable lapse of time, but in the Epp. of St. Paul we are in the midst of the events, and we are allowed to see into the inner mind of one of the leading actors in them. From the language of St. Paul we may learn what is meant by being 'taught all things and having all things brought to remembrance,' or rather as he had not been an immediate disciple of Christ we are enabled to understand the πληροφορία with which he spoke. He certainly felt that the Gospel which he preached had its source outside himself. Nowhere, perhaps, does this come out more clearly than in the first of all his Epistles. Writing to the Thessalonians he says, 'For this cause we also thank God without ceasing, that when ye received from us the word of the message, even the word of God, ye accepted it not as the word of men, but, as it is in truth, the word of God, which also worketh in you that believe' (1 Th 2[13]). This is the central principle of the apostolic preaching. It is the 'demonstration of the Spirit and of power' of which he speaks elsewhere (1 Co 2[4]). And the substance of the preaching is just the new revelation about God and Christ and the Holy Spirit, and their united work for the salvation of men. 'Things which eye saw not and ear heard not . . . unto us God revealed them through the Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God' (1 Co 2[9, 10]).

Thus the method of divine revelation in the NT is very similar to that in OT. It is brought about through the action of the Holy Spirit upon certain selected instruments, with just the difference on which stress is laid in Ep. to Hebrews, that whereas, under the Old Covenant, God had spoken in and through the prophets, under the New He spoke 'in' and through the Son, and those expressly chosen and trained by the Son.

LITERATURE.—On the training of the apostles to be the vehicles of the new revelation, see Latham, Pastor Pastorum (Cambridge, 1890). Reference may also be made to the Bampton Lectures for 1893 on 'Inspiration,' and other works on the same subject.

3. DISTINCTIONS IN THE GODHEAD.—In the previous sections of this article we have had gradually to discriminate between the operation and functions of what we now call the different 'Persons' in the Godhead. At the time of which we are speaking (the period covered by NT) there was no such conception in the general mind as that of 'personality.' The term 'person' was just coming into use through the defining influence of Roman Law acting upon popular language (the distinction of persona and res appears to have come in during the 1st cent. B.C., shortly before the time of Cicero). But a long process had to be gone through before the idea of personality acquired an exact connotation; and that process was to a large extent involved in the theological controversies on the subject of the Trinity, the result of which was the formulated doctrine of Three Persons in One God, as we have it in what is commonly known as the Athanasian Creed.

It would be an anachronism to expect a definition of the doctrine in NT. And yet the doctrine is really a working out of data contained in NT. It is a rendering of these data intelligible to the consciousness as part of a reasoned and formulated whole. The Christian theologian is well aware that the only expression possible to him is approximate: he applies to the whole construction the dictum of St. Augustine; he says what he says, non ut illud diceretur sed ne taceretur (De Trin. v. 9). But he is almost compelled to say something, and the deliberate judgment of the Church has been that he is warranted in saying so much as he does.

In any critical study of that which we call by anticipation the doctrine of the Trinity in the NT, the starting-point must undoubtedly be the benediction in 2 Co 13[14] 'The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all.' In this verse we have an utterance of the mind of the apostle, which he knows will find an echo in the minds of his readers at a fixed point in time and place, probably about twenty-six and in any case not more than twenty-eight years after the Ascension. We are left to draw our conclusions as to the belief of the Church at this time. It is, of course, true that the object of the passage is not dogmatic. If it had been, its significance would have been less. It is not the expounding of any new doctrine. It is not even the expounding of doctrine at all. It is only an invocation of blessing. But the peculiar form which this invocation takes, points to much previous preparation in thought and teaching; it points to a settled, and we are obliged to think, uncontested belief, common alike to the writer and his readers.

The peculiarity of the belief consists in the remarkable way in which a group of spiritual blessings, such as man is accustomed to look for directly from God, is not referred to the Godhead conceived singly as a Monad, but distributively as Three, and yet Three so bracketed together as to be at the same time One. No graduated interpretation of the Three Names is possible. If it were, we should have Beings who were not Man and yet not wholly God. In the Arian Controversy an attempt was made to establish this interpretation; but it utterly and hopelessly failed.

The other alternative remains, that St. Paul and the Church of his day thought of the Supreme Source of spiritual blessing as not single but threefold—threefold in essence, and not merely in a manner of speech. How did he come to think thus? How was it that a Church so far from the centre of things and at so early a date was prepared to receive without question an assumption which to us seems to make such large demands upon the intellect?

It was certainly not a matter of course. We have seen that there was a certain tendency to hypostatize the Word of God, the Wisdom of God, the Spirit of God, even the Glory of God. The Messiah was thought of as more than human if less than in the full sense divine. But all these conceptions were fluid and tentative. Jewish theology had no fixed and settled belief in regard to them. Even if we add to OT the other writings current at this period, Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, the Jewish Apocalypses and the Sayings traditionally handed down of the oldest Rabbis, still we should not find anything to suggest a combination of the three terms handled with the precision with which St. Paul handled them.

One passage there is which would abundantly account for St. Paul's language if we could accept it as historical. That is the command to the apostles at the end of the first Gospel to go and baptize all nations 'into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost' (Mt 28[19]). This belongs to a comparatively late and suspected part of the Gospel. But one tradition may be later than another and more limited in circulation, and yet not be any less authentic. Now, the Didaché shows us that we no sooner cross the frontier of the apostolic age than we find baptism into the Threefold Name in full possession of the field (Did. vii. 1, 3). The tradition is continuous. It is taken up by Justin (Apol. i. 61), and Tertullian expressly tells us that the person baptized was dipped three times in recognition of the Threefold Name (Prax. 26). The practice, then, is at least very old. And it is no slight confirmation of the statement in the first Gospel that if it were true it would supply just the explanation that we want at once of the established rite and of St. Paul's language. In any case we seem compelled to assume that there was some foundation for both in the teaching of our Lord Himself. If there was not, at what point in the six-and-twenty years can the usage (doctrinal or liturgical) have been introduced in a manner so authoritative as to impose it upon St. Paul and the Churches of his founding? We may greatly doubt if any satisfactory answer can be given to this question.

On the other hand, the moment we assume that our Lord did really give this alleged command, and that He really did prepare for it by some corresponding teaching, a number of other facts are accounted for. We find the very teaching of which we are in search in many places of the Last Discourse as recorded by St. John (Jn $14^{16.\ 26}$ 15^{26} $16^{7.\ 10.\ 13.\ 15}$). And with such teaching in the background a variety of phenomena in St. Paul's Epp. fall into their place which would otherwise be very intractable.

(i.) The Father and the Son.—The Epistle (2 Co) ends with a triple benediction, and it begins with a double benediction. 'Grace and peace' are invoked upon the Corinthian Christians 'from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.' We observe here the same sort of bracketing of the two Divine Names as in the case of the Three. Although there is a distinction of names, and although there may be a certain distinction and special distribution of function, the source of spiritual blessing is in its essence One.

The fact that there is this alternation within the same Epistle of the Two names and the Three, shows that the one expression is in no way inconsistent with the other. A like alternation is found side by side in several other of St. Paul's Epistles. For instance, in 1 Co 12^{4-11} we have the Triad: Lord, God, Spirit; in 1 Co 1^3 and 8^6 we have (in the latter passage very expressly) the Duad: God [the (our) Father] and Lord [Jesus Christ]. In like manner, in Ro $8^{14-17.\ 26-30}$ we have the Triad, though not formally drawn out, just as clearly presupposed as in vv.$^{31-39}$ (cf. 1^7 etc.) we have the Duad; and a like relation appears in Eph 2^{18} $3^{2-5.\ 14-17}$ 4^{4-6} 5^{18-20} compared with $1^{2.\ 3.\ 17}$ $2^{4\text{ff.}}$ 5^5 $6^{6.\ 23}$.

Nor is this alternation confined to the Pauline Epistles. It is seen again in 1 P $1^{2.\ 3-12}$ 4^{13-19} by the side of 1^{17-21} 2^5 $3^{15-18.\ 20-22}$ etc.; and it is as conspicuous in 1 Jn 5^{4-8} compared with the general tenor of the Ep., which is constantly setting 'the Father' and 'the (His) Son' over-against each other. We may also compare Jude$^{20.\ 21}$ with $^{1.\ 4.\ 24.\ 25}$; Rev 1^{4-6} 2^{26-29} $3^{5.\ 6.\ 12.\ 13.\ 21.\ 22}$ with 5^{6-13} 7^{9-17} etc. And we are further reminded that in the Didaché baptism in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit is spoken of almost in the same breath with baptism in the name of Christ (Did. vii. 1, 3 and ix. 5).

There is thus an easy transition from the one way of speaking to the other. There is really a threefold usage. The apostles and early Christians generally speak of God, of God the Father, and God the Son, of God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, according to the context and the particular purpose with which they are writing; but the three modes of expression, so far from being mutually exclusive, are, in fact, closely connected and correlated. And it is noticeable, that while there is this free and natural interchange of the three terms, no fourth term is ever added to the three as at all upon the same footing. The mental bracketing of which we have spoken appears to subsist throughout. The usage, although it is in some respects wide and varied, is yet in others strictly circumscribed, and is regulated by fixed laws. When we look into it more closely we seem to become aware of a gradual development and expansion, if not in the original presentation of the doctrine, yet in the order in which the different parts of it—so to speak—become consciously and definitely realized by the apostles and first disciples. If (as we have seen reason to think) they had received fuller teaching on the subject directly from the Lord Himself than is contained in our extant Gospels, this did not prevent them from grasping the truth only by degrees, and the very gradualness with which it was grasped would account for some of the first statements being lost to us. It is the later teaching of events calling the earlier teaching to remembrance (Jn 14^{26}) which has preserved for us so much of this as we have. It is a matter of common experience that there are lessons latent in the mind which only become vividly realized when something occurs to bring them home, or when the logic of thought naturally reaches them.

In the case of the apostles the logic of thought started from Christ, the Incarnate Christ, whom they had seen with their eyes, and their hands had handled in the days of His flesh. If Christ was God, then it was certain that there must be in the Godhead some such distinction as that which we call personal; the attributes of personality attached to Him as unmistakably as to the apostles themselves. And if beneath these there lay a substratum of unity with the Power which ruled the heavens, that unity must still be such as admitted of personal distinction.

The language which the apostles use is thoroughly accounted for by the evidence of their own senses, taken with the utterances of Jesus Himself. The keyword which is constantly upon His lips is the name 'Father' with its correlative 'Son.' These terms established themselves from the very first in the Christian consciousness as the true expression of the mutual relation. That they must have done so appears from the fundamental place which they had in the theology of St. Paul, in spite of all the independence which he claims for its origin. No better argument exists for the view that at the time when he wrote his extant Epistles he had already some form of evangelic document before him. In any case he must have been familiar with an extremely solid and unanimous tradition. To that tradition it is not too much to say that all Christian speculation on the wider relations of the Godhead goes back. The central point in all subsequent argument is the relation of 'Father' and 'Son.' And the difference which in all ages has marked off a loyal from a disloyal interpretation of the data of Christianity has been this, that the one insisted upon a real Fatherhood and a real Sonship, which the other has attempted to explain away. This was the principle at issue in the Arian Controversy. And there has probably never been a controversy argued out more thoroughly or with a more abundant expenditure of both intellectual and moral force. The outcome of it was the definite and triumphant affirmation of the position that the Father is essentially Father and the Son essentially Son. The most abstruse clauses in the Athanasian Creed are nothing but the emphatic assertion and the systematic safeguarding of this.

(ii.) The Holy Spirit.—In framing their doctrine of the Holy Spirit, as in framing their doctrine of the Son, the apostles had before their minds a definite series of facts. There was a certain group of phenomena which they consistently referred to the action of the Spirit. The phenomena of what we call 'inspiration,' the divine influence of which they were conscious in preaching and teaching; the special and remarkable 'gifts' (χαρίσματα) which distinguished in an eminent degree the first generations of Christians; and, generally speaking, the felt communion of the human spirit with the divine, were regarded by them as manifestations of the activity of the Holy Ghost. If we read the three chs. 1 Co 12–14 we see that St. Paul felt himself to be in the midst of such activity; and there are many other allusions to it. The Early Church appears to have dated the energies at work within it in a special sense from the first Pentecost after the Ascension. They called this an 'outpouring' of the Holy Ghost, seeing in it a fulfilment of prophecy (Ac $2^{17.\ 18.\ 33}$, Tit 3^{6}).

But how was it that they came to speak of the work of the Holy Spirit as the work of a person? That they did so appears not only from such incidental passages as Ro 8^{26}, 1 Co 12^{11}, Eph 4^{30}, but still more from the great Trinitarian texts 2 Co 13^{14} and Mt 28^{19}, in which the Holy Ghost is placed on precisely the same footing as the Son and the Father. We have seen that this can have been no momentary freak of language, but that it must have had a broad foundation in the consciousness of the apostolic Church. Between the fluid usage of contemporary Judaism and the fixed usage of the apostles and their successors there intervenes the teaching of Jesus. And it seems impossible not to refer to this the impulse which determined the direction of Christian thought upon the subject. The fragments of that teaching which have been preserved for us in the Fourth Gospel (Jn $14^{16\text{ff.}\ 26}$ 15^{26} $16^{7\text{-}14}$) seem to imply a yet fuller context which has been lost; but of themselves they are sufficient to warrant the faith which the Church has evidently held from the first, though as the centuries went on it was compelled to define it with increasing distinctness.

There are two classes of passages in NT relating to the Holy Ghost. On the one hand, there are those of which we have been speaking, where the Third Person (of later theology) is clearly distinguished from the First and Second, and represented as confronting them. And, on the other hand, there are passages in which the Third Person is as closely associated with the First and Second.

The Spirit is repeatedly spoken of as the 'Spirit of God.' And the relationship indicated by this phrase is explained in 1 Co $2^{10\text{f.}}$ as analogous to that of the spirit in man. 'For the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For who among men knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of the man which is in him? even so the things of God none knoweth, save the Spirit of God.' But He who is thus described as the 'Spirit of God' is also described as the 'Spirit of Christ.' So notably in Ro $8^{9\text{f.}}$ 'But ye are not in the flesh but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ is in you,' etc. Here 'Christ' takes up the 'Spirit of Christ,' and that, again, takes up the 'Spirit of God' (defined a little later as the 'Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead') in such a way as to show that, at least for the purpose of the writer, the three terms are convertible. Nor is this the only place in which we read of the 'Spirit of Christ' (cf. 1 P 1^{11}), or 'of Jesus' (Ac 16^{7} RV), or 'of Jesus Christ' (Ph 1^{19}), or 'of [the] Son' (Gal 4^{6}), or 'of the Lord' (=Christ, 2 Co 3^{17}).

Again, we have to remember that the conception of the incarnate Christ is referred to the direct operation of the Holy Ghost (Lk 1^{35}), and that His endowment with the fulness of divine power for His ministry is also dated from the descent of the Holy Ghost at His baptism. This is the 'anointing with the Holy Ghost' of Ac 10^{38} as the sequel to which He is 'full of the Holy Spirit' (Lk 4^{1}), and acts through the Holy Spirit (Mt 12^{28}, Ac 1^{2}, He 9^{14}); He also communicated the Holy Spirit to the apostles (Jn 20^{22}).

There is thus another side to the mystery of the Triune God. Although in one sense Three, He is in another no less One. There is such a mutual interaction, such a fundamental unity, as prevents distinction from amounting to separation. The Three Persons are not three individuals. There are not three Gods, but One God.

This is the evident drift of the data which NT has handed down to us; and it is to these data that the later theology has sought to do justice. They find their most complete and ripest interpretation in the balanced clauses of the Quicumque. Those clauses are, no doubt, relative to the line of thought which leads up to them. Compared to some aspects of the biblical teaching, they will appear secondary where this is primary. It is more important for the great mass of Christians to have it brought home to them that God is love, that the proof of His love is the incarnation and death of His Son, and that He does impart of His own righteousness to men, than that (e.g.) the Son is 'not made nor created, but begotten.' But the significance of this latter proposition is that Christ is truly Son. And the question whether He is truly or only figuratively Son is a vital question, as vital now as it was in the days of Nicæa or Chalcedon. The question was quite sure to be raised, and, being raised, it has to be answered. The phrasing of the answer may vary with the philosophy of the time, but its substance cannot be any other than that which has been so deliberately adopted and ratified.

LITERATURE.—No considerable monograph on the doctrine of God as Triune has appeared since Baur's Die christliche Lehre von der Dreieinigkeit u. Menschwerdung Gottes, 3 vols., Tübingen, 1841–1843, and G. A. Meier, Die Lehre von der Trinität in ihrer historischen Entwickelung, 2 vols., Hamburg u. Gotha, 1844. A thorough discussion of the beginnings of the doctrine in English is still a desideratum. There is an instructive chapter on the Holy Spirit in Milligan, The Ascension of Our Lord (1892), pp. 166–226. [The literature on the previous sections of this art. has been given under each section].

W. SANDAY.

GOD, CHILDREN (SONS, DAUGHTERS) OF, are biblical phrases for near and blessed relations to God, but used with various applications and meanings. In NT the words 'children' (τέκνα) and 'sons' (υἱοί) are distinguishable in meaning: the former, in which the idea of origin is most prominent, is the favourite expression of St. John; while the latter, emphasizing rather the notion of relation and privilege, is the one used by St. Paul. But even in NT the distinction is not an absolute one; and in OT, though both ideas are found, the words are not definitely marked off.

It is therefore advisable to consider both phrases together, while marking their various shades of meaning: and their significance may best be understood by examining the places where they occur, as nearly as possible in their historical order.

A. IN THE OT.—In OT this cannot be done with certainty, because of the doubts and differences of opinion among scholars as to the dates of many of its books. But a pretty sure starting-point can be found in the Bk. of Hosea, the date of which, in the reign of Jeroboam II. of Israel, is universally admitted. In this prophecy the relation of Israel to God is depicted, first, as that of a wife to her husband (chs. 1–3). This describes the nation or land as a whole, and individual Israelites are represented as her children, who as born to God are children of God. The unfaithful wife is repudiated (2^{2}); but when led to repentance, as described in that parable ($2^{6\text{-}23}$), so wonderfully parallel to our Lord's of the Prodigal Son, she again obtains mercy, and is once more the people of God (2[1. 23]). In anticipation of that blessed restoration, it had been declared (1[10]) that the children of Israel would be called 'sons of the living God.' They are so named as born of her whose husband is J″, i.e. who is in covenant with God.

So, when the same figure of the conjugal relation of God to Israel is used by Ezk, the actual children of the nation are called God's children for the same reason (Ezk 16[20. 21] 'thy sons and thy daughters whom thou hast borne unto me . . . my children,' 23[37] 'their sons whom they bare unto me'). In these and similar passages, the notion of birth or origin is evidently the prominent one; and in Ezk 16[21], though the Heb. word is 'sons' as in the preceding verse, the LXX like the EV have rendered it by τέκνα, 'children.' As thus conceived, to be children of God is the same thing as to be born members of the nation or community that is in covenant with God. This notion of being God's children may probably be traced in the words of the Pharisees to Jesus, 'We were not born of fornication; we have one Father, even God' (Jn 8[41]), i.e. we are members of a people in covenant with God and true to him.

But Hosea also gives another conception of Israel's relation to God in 11[1] 'When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt.' With this must be taken Ex 4[22. 23], where God says to Pharaoh, 'Isr. is my son, my firstborn: and I have said unto thee, Let my son go that he may serve me; and thou hast refused to let him go: behold, I will slay thy son, thy firstborn.' Here 'my son'='my people' in God's previous words to Moses; and there is no emphasis on the idea of birth or origin; for 'firstborn' evidently conveys the notion simply of most precious or beloved, as in Zec 12[10]. It is the relation of Israel to God, and the value God puts on him, that is indicated: and so appropriately 'son,' not 'child,' is the word employed. The context that follows in Hos 11[3. 4] shows that fatherly training and teaching are included in the notion, and in [8. 9] fatherly pity and love. But throughout it is the people as a whole that is here called God's son. The relation that was before depicted as that of a wife to her husband, is now spoken of as that of a son to his father.

These two figures are still more closely connected in the first great discourse of Jer (chs. 2. 3), where the fundamental idea is that Israel has been J″'s unfaithful wife, while yet on her repentance she is invited to say, 'My father, thou art the guide (or companion) of my youth' (Jer 3[4]). The phrase, 'guide, companion, or friend of youth,' is used in Pr 2[17] for a husband, and prob. that is its significance also in Jer 3[4]; and the employment of the words 'my father,' as parallel, is not unnatural in a state of society when the head of the house stood almost in the same relation to his wife as to his children. In Jer 3[14] 'Return, O backsliding children, saith the Lord, for I am a husband unto you: and I will take you one of a city, and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion,' we have the people as a whole viewed as J″'s wife, and its members as his children; and so also in vv.[19. 20. 22]. But here the Israelites are called children of God, not, as in Hos and Ezk, simply as born of the people which is J″'s wife, but as taken by him one by one, and returning to him with personal repentance. The idea of physical origin has passed away, and the notions connected with sonship seem to be mainly divine pardon, protection, and inheritance.

This whole passage also shows how the figure of God's marriage to Israel served an important purpose, in elevating the notion of the relationship from a merely physical to a moral and spiritual one. The heathen peoples, esp. in the Semitic race, conceived themselves as children of the deity in a grossly physical sense, as appears even here (Jer 2[27] 'which say to a stock, Thou art my father; and to a stone, Thou hast begotten me'). The conjugal relation, as founded, not on nature, but on a covenant of love, involving duties and responsibilities, gave a foundation for the moral appeals of the prophets, and made possible such a transition as we see in Jeremiah's teaching, to a higher view of sonship to God as an individual privilege.

A similar and perhaps more direct transition, from the collective to the individual relation, is made in Dt 14[1] 'Ye are the children of (lit. sons to) the LORD your God . . .,' v.[2] 'For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God, and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people (i.e. a people of his own possession), above all peoples that are on the face of the earth.' Here sonship is ascribed to the Israelites individually on the ground that the people as a whole is holy, i.e. separated to God by his special choice of them to be his own possession (see Ex 19[5. 6]). The notion of birth or origin is here entirely absent, and that of privilege and corresponding duty is the one conveyed by the name 'sons of God.'

Dt also contains a passage remarkably rich in ref. to the sonship of Isr. in the song ascribed to Moses in ch. 32. Here God is called the people's Father because he bought, made, and established it (vv.[6. 15]), begat, gave birth to (v.[18]), led and nourished it (vv.[10-14]). These expressions refer to the divine action in forming Israel into a nation by delivering it from Egypt and training it in the wilderness. On the ground of this, the individual Israelites are called 'his sons and his daughters' (v.[19]), 'children' (v.[20]); and they are blamed for their provocation. But it is indicated that they who deal corruptly with God are not his children (v.[5]), and that God will take others to be his people so as to provoke them to jealousy (v.[21]), while the nations are called to rejoice with (or as being) his people (v.[43]). Here we see distinctly a moral significance attached to the title 'sons' or 'children of God.' Though it belongs properly to Israelites, it is forfeited by them if they are not faithful to God, and it may be given to men of other nations as well. Hence it is sometimes given specially to the godly, as in Ps 73[15] 'the generation of thy children'; Pr 14[26] 'In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence; and his children shall have a place of refuge.' See also the comparison in Ps 103[13]. On the other hand, the privilege is ascribed to Gentiles, especially in the prophecies of their calling in the later book of Isaiah. God still calls Israelites 'my sons' (Is 45[11]), because they are sons of Zion (49[17]), who has been married to J″ though put away for a time (50[1] and 54). But she is to receive children of whom she shall say, 'Who hath borne me these?' (49[21]), i.e. God and his Church are to have people from among the Gentiles sharing the blessings of Israel and enhancing her glory. Or, if those unexpected children are merely the exiled and forgotten Israelites, their sonship is now entirely independent of physical descent. 'For,' they say, 'thou art our Father, though Abraham knoweth us not, and Israel doth not acknowledge us: thou, O Lord, art our Father; our Redeemer from everlasting is thy name' (Is 63[16], cf. 64[8] 65[1] 66[19-21]). Even if sonship is not here directly extended to the Gentiles, the principle is laid down which implies that. But it is not on the ground of nature or creation that this is done, but expressly on that of redemption and grace, only a redemption not merely external and national, like that of Israel from Egypt, but spiritual and therefore universal.

In Mal 1^6, J″, appealing specially to the priests, calls himself a father and a master, as looking for the honour and fear given to earthly fathers and masters. In ch. 2^{10} the prophet asks, 'Have we not all one Father? hath not one God created us?' as a basis for a rebuke to the Jews for marrying heathen wives, v.^{11} 'Judah hath profaned the holiness of the Lord which he loveth, and hath married the daughter of a strange god.' Here plainly the fatherhood is not conceived as extending to all men, and the creation spoken of is the formation of Israel as a nation, as in Is 43^1 44^2 and elsewhere. In the time of Malachi it was necessary to insist on the separation of the restored Jewish community from the surrounding idolaters, and he makes no mention of the calling of the Gentiles. But he indicates (ch. $3^{16.17}$) that the true children of God are they that fear him, of whom the Lord says, 'I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him.'

Thus the OT affords a rich variety of statements about sonship to God as ascribed to men, which seem to exhibit successive stages in a development and elevation of the idea. (1) From the first it appears to be raised above the gross physical notion by the conception of it as origin from the people that is married to J″. Then (2) it is conceived as being members of the people that J″ has created as his son; (3) as being taught and trained by J″ as a father; and (4) as not constituted by mere natural descent, but by the fear of the Lord, and so possible for those who are not by birth members of the people of Israel.

Before proceeding to consider how this line of teaching is completed by Christ and his apostles, it will be proper to refer to a few passages in OT where the name 'sons of God' is given apparently to superhuman beings. In Job 38^7, where J″ challenges Job for ignorance of his wonderful works, he describes the creation of the world as being, 'When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy.' The parallel seems to be similar to the usage by which the hosts of God denote sometimes the stars and sometimes the angels: and since in Job 1^6 and 2^1 Satan, undoubtedly conceived as a superhuman spirit, is described as presenting himself among the sons of God, it is probable that in all these places the name is given to angels, and is used to indicate their nature, as the more common name 'angels' still retained its original reference to their office as messengers of God. It would indicate beings akin to God as being spiritual and superhuman, though derived from and inferior to the Creator. They are also called his 'holy ones' (Dt 33^2, Ps 89^5), and his 'hosts' (Ps 103^{21} etc.). In Ps 29^1 and 89^6 'sons of the mighty' should prob. be rendered 'sons of God' or 'of gods,' but it is not a usual form of the name when used of the true God. The phrase is sometimes used in the way in which in Heb. 'son of man' is simply 'man,' 'son of oil' = fruitful, 'sons of flame' = sparks; and as in early times the Israelites did not doubt the existence of the deities of the nations around them, they called them gods (e.g. Ex 15^{11}), which was afterwards softened into 'sons of God,' or 'of gods' (Ps 89^6), and then into 'angels of God' (as in LXX Ps $97^{7.9}$).

The passage in Gn 6^{1-4} has been variously understood from very early times, and no interpretation is free from difficulty, but modern scholarship inclines to the view that by 'sons of God' are meant angels.

In Ps $82^{1.6}$ 'sons of the Most High' is synonymous with 'gods,' and is applied to rulers and judges in the congregation of God as invested by him with power, and called to rule in his name.

B. IN THE NT.—As the Bible contains no distinct doctrine about angels, it is impossible to form any definite conception of the relation implied in the name 'sons of God' given to them in OT, esp. as the usage is not followed out in NT, where in the Ep. to Hebrews it is denied that God ever gave the name 'my son' personally to any of the angels, that being the more excellent name obtained by him who is the effulgence of God's glory and the very image of his substance (He 1^{3-5}).

1. THE TEACHING OF JESUS.—While keeping silence as to the sonship of angels, Jesus and his apostles have much to say as to the truth and blessedness of men being sons or children of God. In the teaching of our Lord himself the fatherhood of God occupies a very large place, and is far more fully exhibited than in OT. Jesus came to reveal God, and the name in which he summed up his disclosure of his character was 'the Father.' He is the Father by way of eminence as being full of love, pity, and kindness, such as Jesus himself showed in his own person. And this love extended to the most unworthy and sinful, and to Gentiles who were outside the commonwealth of Israel. Thus it is assumed in Christ's teaching that the blessing of being sons of God is not limited to the Jewish nation, though that is nowhere expressly said, and though Jesus declares that such prayers as the Gentiles offer are not to be made by those who know God as their Father in heaven (Mt $6^{7.8}$). To be called sons of God is one of the blessings of the kingdom of God which he proclaimed, promised to its members, esp. as peace-makers and as loving their enemies (Mt $5^{9.45-48}$). As that kingdom is to be open to all nations (Mt 8^{11}), and to men simply as sinners (Mt $9^{12.13}$), it is free to all or any to be sons of God, and in that aspect his Fatherhood may be called universal; he has a fatherly heart towards all men, loves and pities all, and freely forgives the most sinful when they return to him. This is the lesson of the Parable of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15), and it is a most gracious and blessed one. In order to be entitled to call God our Father we need no other warrant than that we are sinners, willing to confess our sin and ask his forgiveness.

The blessings of being sons of God acc. to Jesus' teaching are forgiveness and gracious reception when we come to God as penitents; the assurance that God will hear our prayers, and give us good things when we ask him (Mt 7^{11}); that he cares for our welfare, and that we can trust him to provide for all our earthly needs, so that without anxiety about these we may make it our great aim to be like him (Mt 6^{31-34}); the Spirit of our Father to speak in and through us when we are called to speak for Christ (Mt $10^{19.20}$); and, finally, the full enjoyment of the kingdom (Lk 12^{32}, Mt 25^{31}).

Jesus always uses the term 'sons,' not 'children,' of God, thus directing our attention to the nature of the relation rather than to the origination of it. His main teaching is that we stand to God in a relationship in which we can trust him as loving us and caring for our soul's welfare, and can speak to him with freedom and confidence. Plainly, too, this is a personal and individual relation. We have such privileges each for ourselves, and not merely as members of any nation or community.

At the same time, Jesus teaches that this relation of sonship to God is connected with his own person, and to be enjoyed through him. He claimed for himself a peculiar sonship, speaking of God as 'my Father' in a way that, according to Jn 5^{18}, exposed him to a charge of blasphemy for making himself equal with God; and he made our entering the kingdom of God depend on our not only calling him Lord, but doing the will of his Father in heaven (Mt 7^{21}), and that is the same as doing his words (ib. ^{24}). He declared that no one knew the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son wills to reveal him (Mt 11^{27}); and he revealed the Father, not only by his words, but by his whole character and life. Hence he invited the weary and heavy-laden to come to him and learn of him, and this was his call in general to all who would enter the kingdom of God. He desired men to see in his own person and life what real sonship to God was, what childlike trust, what loving obedience, what zeal for his Father's honour and patient submission to his will it involved, and what rest and peace it brought with it. Into this blessedness he desires to bring men, and he recognizes those who will do the will of his Father in heaven as his brethren (Mt 12^{50}). They are sons of God through him and with him. Their following him implies a renouncing of earthly goods and even of life itself, such as is impossible to man and possible only to God (Mk 10[27]). Hence to enter the kingdom of God requires a conversion and becoming as little children, which in Jn 3[3. 5] Jesus calls being begotten anew of the Spirit.

Thus our Lord's teaching about sonship to God, though it is entirely of a practical religious character rather than scientific and theological, yet involves as its basis two ideas that he could not in his earthly life fully develop. One is that true sonship to God is a participation of his own unique relation to the Father, which is the archetype of all filial relationship to God, and the other is that it becomes ours through the impartation of a new life from God, in the strength of which we are enabled to renounce our own self-centred life. The former of these ideas is suggested by the fact that while Jesus habitually calls God his own Father, he as expressly calls those his brethren, whom he teaches to address God as 'our Father.' This shows that though he (e.g. Jn 20[17]) makes the distinction between his own relation to God expressed in 'my Father,' and ours expressed by 'your Father,' he does not mean that God is our Father in a quite different sense from that in which he is his, for in that case we would be only nominally and not really his brethren; but he would intimate that while his Sonship is indeed unique as being original and absolutely perfect, we partake of it through him. But this could not be fully explained as long as the truth about his own person could not be clearly revealed.

The other idea is implied in Jesus' teaching that God's sons are those who trust him and are like him, and that for us this implies a great change of mind and heart, a turning our back on our worldly selves, such as can be effected only under the influence of a power from God. But this, too, could not be made plain till the coming of the Spirit, whom Jesus promised to complete his teaching.

The outcome of that teaching is to be seen in the apostolic Epistles, and in these we find the former idea developed more especially by St. Paul and the latter by St. John.

2. THE TEACHING OF PAUL.—St. Paul views Christianity chiefly in its bearing on the personal relation between man and God. Apart from the salvation of Christ, that relation is that of a transgressor of the eternal moral law to the righteous Lawgiver and Judge, hence it is a state of condemnation and death. From that he is redeemed by the propitiation which consists in the obedience and sacrifice of Christ the Son of God. The truth that our Redeemer is God's own beloved Son is repeatedly emphasized in connexion with his sacrifice as enhancing the love of God and the self-emptying grace of our Lord; and St. Paul undoubtedly regarded Christ's Sonship as not merely an official or Messianic, but a pre-existent and eternal relation to God. But in his view Jesus' death is our redemption only in virtue of our being one with him in it by faith, so that by it we die to sin and to the law, and are freed from its curse. Since, then, we are redeemed from our natural state of condemnation as sinners by dying in and with the Son of God, who loved us and gave himself for us; since we live now only in him, our relation to God is henceforth the same as his, we are sons of God in Christ Jesus, because by faith, sealed in baptism, we have put on Christ (Gal 3[26. 27]). It has been questioned whether here and in Ro 6[3], where St. Paul uses the limiting (?) pronoun 'as many as' and the phrase 'baptized into Christ,' instead of the usual one 'baptized into the name of Christ,' he refers to the outward rite of water baptism at all, and not rather to the inward washing from sins by real union to the Saviour. Most commentators, however, consider that there is no reasonable doubt that by baptism into Christ he means the sacrament. But if this be so, the apostle certainly assumes that it was received in faith and sealed a real union to Christ, which is the ground of our sonship.

The sonship of believers in Christ, St. Paul connects with the OT view of the Israelites being God's sons in virtue of the covenant and promise to Abraham (Gal 3[29]), and he proceeds to explain the special privileges brought by Christ by comparing the position of Israel under the law to that of children under age, who, though really sons and heirs, have not practically more liberty than servants, but are under guardians and stewards by whom they are governed and their property is managed. So God's children, before Christ came, being immature, were in subjection to what St. Paul calls 'the rudiments of the world,' i.e. elementary teaching by precepts relating to outward things, such as meats, times, and seasons. But it is remarkable that the apostle speaks of the Gentiles also as in their heathen state having been under such rudiments (Gal 4[3. 9]), so that we may infer that he recognized a certain divine training even of them, as elsewhere he speaks of them being a law to themselves (Ro 2[14-16]). He views Christ's coming and work both as giving sonship to those who were only servants, and also as giving full filial rights to those who were children under age. But not as if it were the former only to Gentiles and the latter to Jews as such; but that it was a real gift of sonship to all, whether Jews or Gentiles, who were without God; and to all who were really seeking him, in whatever nation, though they might be very immature in their spiritual life, it was the bestowal of the full privileges of sons of full age having free and direct access to God as their Father. This view is in accordance with the highest conception attained in the OT, that in Deutero-Isaiah from which and other prophetic Scriptures St. Paul quotes in his discussion of the relations between Israel and the Gentiles in Ro 9–11.

In order to bring out the privilege of being made sons of God, St. Paul employs the notion of adoption as recognized in the Roman law. See ADOPTION.

Among the privileges flowing from sonship in Christ he mentions the bestowal of the Spirit, as the Spirit of God's Son, or of adoption, who cries in us, i.e. moves us to cry, 'Abba, Father' (Gal 4[6], Ro 8[15]), and with this is connected the access we have with boldness to God as our Father (Eph 2[18] 3[12]). Another benefit flowing from sonship is the inheritance which we have in and with Christ (Gal 3[26. 29] 4[7], Ro 8[17]). This means that the glory that is to be revealed is as sure to us as if we had a right to it in strict law, and at the same time is the free gift of the Father's love. In connexion with this St. Paul develops the idea that believers in Christ, though poor, afflicted, and persecuted in this world, yet really have the Messianic blessings promised in the OT as those of the kingdom of God, because they can rejoice in their tribulations, since these are means of their perfection, and are inconsiderable in view of the promised glory (Ro 5[3-11] 8[18-36], 2 Co 4[16]–5[9]). The further notion that afflictions are chastisements sent by God in love, and for our real and truest good, is expressed in the Ep. to Hebrews (12[5-11]) as a special blessing of God's children more distinctly than in the Pauline Epistles. For St. Paul does not conceive our relation to God as that of young children needing discipline, but rather as that of sons of full age in a relation of freedom and love to our heavenly Father. Hence he is not fond of the expression children (τέκνα) unless when the form of his argument from OT leads him to use it, as in Ro $9^{7.8}$. So, too, he does not use the idea of our being begotten anew of the Spirit to describe the beginning of Christian life; he conceives it rather as a new creation or a raising from death. In Tit 3^5 the word 'regeneration' is not the common expression for what is generally so called, and it is not certain that it refers to the new birth of individuals.

3. THE TEACHING IN HEBREWS.—Here again the notion of children is more prominent than that of sons, and the idea in ch. 12 is the position of young children needing education and chastisement. This writer also has in view the beginning of the relation in a birth rather than in adoption, for he calls God the Father of spirits in contrast with the fathers of our flesh (12^9). It is unnatural to suppose that he meant by these words to teach the philosophical doctrine that men derive from their earthly parents only their bodies, and their spirits directly from God. Whether this be true or not, the idea of the writer was manifestly the religious one, that while our relation to our earthly parents is physical, our relation as children to God is spiritual. But that he does not conceive this relation as a universal one, is plain from the fact that he speaks of the possibility of being without chastisement, and so being bastards and not sons (v.^{8}), here using the Pauline term for the relation.

There is one utterance of St. Paul, in his speech at Athens (Ac $17^{28.29}$), where he says of all men as such that they are the offspring (γένος) of God, because he has made us with the purpose that we shall know him; he is not far from any one of us, since in him we live and move and have our being. This relation is clearly not the same as that which the apostle in his Epistles ascribes to Christians when he says they are sons of God through faith in Jesus Christ. It does not include the blessings of freedom, of the spirit of adoption, or of being heirs of God. Hence, if this universal relation is to be called sonship, it must be clearly distinguished from that Christian sonship of which he speaks most frequently and most fully. But if it be considered that St. Paul does not use the word 'sons' (υἱοί), but the more indefinite one 'offspring' (γένος), that he borrows this from a Greek poet, and that the only use that he makes of the statement is to show that since we are so like God it is foolish to think that the Deity can be represented by material images, it cannot but appear very precarious to infer from this expression that St. Paul would say that all men are sons of God, or that the relation that is formed by our creation in God's image deserves to be called sonship. He does indeed teach that all things were created through and in the Son of God, who appeared on earth as Jesus Christ (Col 1^{15-17}); and he declares in the warmest and most glowing language the love and kindness, goodness and patience of God towards all men, seeking to lead them to repentance. If we think that these truths are fairly expressed by saying that God is the Father of all men, and they his sons, we may, on our own responsibility, use these phrases; but we should remember that St. Paul does not use them in such a sense, but means by being sons of God something far more blessed.

The Palestinian apostles do not use the Pauline term 'adoption'; but they describe in different ways how men are made 'children' of God, employing that word rather than 'sons,' because they emphasize the spiritual birth by which we are renewed.

4. THE TEACHING OF JAMES.—In the Ep. of James (1^{17}) God is called the Father of lights, from whom cometh down every good giving and every perfect boon, and to whom must not be attributed any temptation to sin, because he is unchangeable in goodness. Then it is added: 'Of his own will he brought us forth by the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures' (1^{18}). The 'we' here are clearly those who, as afterwards said, have 'the implanted word,' which is able to save their souls (1^{21}). This reminds us of Jesus' Parable of the Sower and the Seed, where the word of the kingdom is compared to seed having a living power of germination and producing new life, and the fruit of the good seed is said to be the sons of the kingdom (Mt 13^{38}), in opposition to the sons of the evil one. In Ja 1^{27} God is called the Father absolutely, to show that he is truly and purely worshipped by visiting the widows and fatherless in their affliction; and in 3^9, where is exposed the inconsistency of blessing God while we curse men, God is called the Lord and Father; but, as if to leave no doubt that all men are included, they are described, not as children of God, but as made after the similitude of God. It is maintained by many that since all men are made in God's image, and cared for by him with infinite goodness and love, they are all his children; and if they think it best to use the phrase in that sense, no one can object to their doing so, and the thing meant is most certainly taught in Scripture; but it does not appear that the apostles called it by the name of sonship, and it does appear that they described believers as sons of God in a higher sense because born again by his word and Spirit.

5. THE TEACHING OF PETER.—In 1 P 1^3 it is said that 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, according to his great mercy, begat us again to a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, into an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading, reserved in the heavens for us.' This by itself might be merely a rhetorical way of saying that the historical fact of Jesus being raised to life after his death and burial awakened in the souls of his followers a hope of immortal blessedness that made them practically new men, animating them with new life. But when we read further on in the same chapter (1 P 1^{23}), 'having been begotten again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, through the word of God which liveth and abideth for ever,' we can hardly doubt that the apostle means to describe a change that is wrought, not merely by the impression made by an event even as great and important as the resurrection of Christ, but by an influence working directly on our souls, and making us, as afterwards described (2^2), as newborn babes in our religious life and relation to God. This corresponds to what Jesus taught of the need of being turned, so as to become as little children (Mt 18^3), as well as of being begotten of the Spirit (Jn 3^{3-8}). It seems, therefore, to be in ref. to this new birth that St. Peter speaks of Christians calling God, the impartial Judge, Father (1 P 1^{17}), not as in the AV, 'if ye call on the Father,' but 'if ye call him Father who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work.' It is plainly not all men by whom God is to be addressed as Father, but believers in virtue of their having been begotten again. So, too, they are called to show themselves obedient children (1^{14}), or children of obedience. Throughout, the idea of birth is the prominent one, rather than that of the relation and privileges of sons. These are not developed as they are by St. Paul and by the writer to the Heb., the only one specially mentioned being the inheritance (1 P 1^4). It is in harmony with this conception of believers being children of God because born or begotten of him, that in 2 P 1^4 they are said to become partakers of the divine nature. Also we may observe that in 1 P God is distinctively called the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (1^3), and the notion of our being in Christ and dying with him to sin is also in the writer's mind (2^{24} 4^1). The opening sentence is formed after the pattern of that of the Ep. to the Eph.; but while St. Paul blesses God because he has foreordained us to adoption (Eph 1^4), St. Peter seems to have expressed the same idea of sonship by divine gift, in the more concrete form of a begetting.

6. THE TEACHING OF JOHN.—The teaching of St. John on this subject combines the elements of the Pauline and Petrine, though it is more akin to the latter, and uses the term 'children' rather than sons of God. The keynote to it may be found in the Prologue to the Gospel (1$^{12.13}$), 'to as many as received him (the Logos) he gave the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were begotten, not of blood nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.' Here we have the right to become children of God bestowed by Christ, which answers to St. Paul's statement, 'God sent forth his Son . . . that we might receive the adoption of sons.' The word 'adoption' is not employed; but the right to become children expresses the same thing in less technical language. Further, this is said to be given to those who receive Christ by believing on his name. St. Paul had also written, 'Ye are all sons of God by faith in Jesus Christ; for as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ' (Gal 3$^{26f.}$). Thus for St. John, as well as for St. Paul, our sonship to God is through union to Christ the only-begotten Son, and that union is effected by faith.

But St. John adds to this the conception found in St. James and St. Peter of a birth or begetting of God, which he emphatically distinguishes from the natural birth in every aspect of it. Those who believe in Christ's name are they who were begotten of God; and that this is not done by the process of natural generation is shown by a threefold contrast: not of blood, i.e. they did not become sons of God through or in virtue of their being of the one blood of which God has made all mankind. Neither was it by any movement or impulse of their own nature, whether the spontaneous tendencies of its animal faculties ('the will of the flesh'), or even the voluntary acts of personality ('the will of man'). The contrast is more briefly and pointedly expressed in our Lord's discourse with Nicodemus as between being begotten of the flesh and of the Spirit (Jn 3^6). St. John seems to conceive the Divine Spirit as a principle or power of life and holiness proceeding from God, given to Jesus Christ in all its fulness and by him communicated to his disciples. It is not unworthy of notice that Iren. and Tertull. apply Jn 1^{13} to Christ, apparently reading the verb in the singular ('who was born'); and though that reading is only found in some Lat. MSS and cannot be received, yet in 1 Jn 5^{18} our Lord, according to the most natural interpretation, is called 'he that was begotten of God.'

St. John seems chiefly anxious to show that the believer's being a child of God necessarily involves likeness to God in character and life; and hence, while he ascribes this privilege to the wonderful love of the Father (1 Jn 3^1), and to our being united to Christ by faith (Jn 1^{12}), he dwells most fully on the truth that our sonship is due, not merely to the gracious act of adoption by the Father and our being made one with the Son through faith, but also to our receiving a new life from the Spirit of God, which communicates to us that very principle of love which is the essence of God. In 1 Jn 2^{29} he says, 'every one that doeth righteousness is begotten of him,' and the uniform usage of the apostle seems to show that he means of God, though it is of Christ that he has been speaking just before. Wherever there is real righteousness in any man it is derived from him who is the archetype and source of all righteousness. Then, after expressing his joyful sense of the greatness of the Father's love and the reality of the sonship that it bestows, he returns to the subject of the inconsistency of that sonship with sin and its inseparable connexion with righteousness, and at 3^9 he says, 'Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin, because his seed abideth in him, and he cannot sin because he is begotten of God.' The statement is evidently an ideal one, describing the Christian life in its ultimate perfection when we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is (v.^{2}). But it is put in the present, because that perfection is really given in principle and germ to all who are begotten of God even now. The impossibility of their sinning is not to be achieved by any further or additional gift or power, but by the life from God that is given at the first, when it comes to its full maturity. That principle of sinlessness is called the seed of God which abides in his children. This seems to denote a spiritual life derived from God, whereby, as it is put in 2 P 1^4, we become 'partakers of the divine nature'; it is what Jesus indicates when he says, 'That which is born of the Spirit is spirit' (Jn 3^6). The divine nature acc. to St. John is love (1 Jn 4$^{8.16}$), and this love is implanted in us when God gives us of his Spirit. So in a spiritual sense our being begotten of God is not a mere metaphor, but a proper statement of what is a real communication of the most essential life of God. But, while giving this high transcendent view of the nature of believers' sonship to God, St. John is careful to insist that its reality must be proved by the practical test of conformity to the moral law in the common affairs of daily life. He does not allow the mystical union with Christ and God to obscure the distinct personal relations between us and God. There is to be a day of judgment, and one of the blessings of the children of God is to have confidence in that day, and not to be ashamed before Christ at his coming. In the present life the relation of the children of God to him as their Father, implies confession of sin and prayer for others as well as themselves, and requires perfect truth and frankness. The blessings of sonship to God are summed up by St. John in the one great idea of eternal life.

The world outside of Christ is described as lying in the evil one (1 Jn 5^{19}), of the evil one, children of the devil (3^{10}); but Christ is the propitiation for the whole world (2^2); and as the love of God is manifested in sending his Son to be a propitiation for our sins (4^{10}), it is implied that God's fatherly love has a universal aspect, though all men are not really, in St. John's view, God's children.

LITERATURE.—The subject of our sonship to God has not been much discussed until recent times, though it came incidentally into consideration in connexion with the Sonship of Christ, as in Athanasius' Orat. agst. Arians (esp. Or. ii.), and in the systems of theology, as in Calvin's Inst. (I. xiv. 18, II. xiii. 1, III. ii. 23), and practical treatises, as Thomas Goodwin's On the Work of the Holy Ghost. In modern times such writers as F. D. Maurice, F. W. Robertson, etc., have made great use of the idea that all men are children of God, to exclude the doctrine of God's judicial dealings. R. S. Candlish discussed the subject in his Cunningham Lectures on the Fatherhood of God, maintaining that sonship belongs to believers, and is founded on that of Christ. T. J. Crawford in his Fatherhood of God criticised these positions, and maintained a twofold sonship—one universal, founded on Creation, and another special, bestowed on believers in Christ. Another work that appeared at the same time is The Divine Fatherhood, by C. H. H. Wright, taking mainly Dr. Candlish's view. The other side is strongly maintained in A. M. Fairbairn's Christ in Modern Theology.

In these discussions the subject was connected more or less with far-reaching questions of systematic theology, and the notion of sonship to God plays an important part in the Dogmatik of R. A. Lipsius. Its exegetical discussion belongs properly to the Bib. Theol. of the NT, and reference may be made to the works, on that subject, of Schmid, Weiss, Beyschlag, also to Wendt's Teaching of Jesus, and to Bruce's The Kingdom of God and St. Paul's Conception of Christianity. There is a very interesting special study of St. Paul's conception of adoption in relation to Rom. law by W. E. Ball in the Contemp. Rev. Aug. 1891. J. S. CANDLISH.

GOD FORBID.—See FORBID.

GODHEAD.—This word occurs three times in AV. Ac 17^{29} 'We ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device' (Gr. τὸ θεῖον); Ro 1^{20} 'For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead' (Gr. θειότης); Col 2^{9} 'For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily' (Gr. θεότης). In each case the Gr. word is appropriately employed, and the one could not have been used for the other, so that to give 'Godhead' as the tr^{n} of them all is most unhappy.

In Ac 17^{29} τὸ θεῖον, 'the Divine,' is chosen by St. Paul in his speech to the Athenians as a familiar philosophical expression which enables him to carry their thoughts easily with him. Even they, with scarcely a personal conception of God, ought not to debase their conception to the level of men's handiwork. Hence RVm 'that which is divine' is better than text 'the Godhead,' though 'the Divine' would have been better. Wyc. errs on the other side when he offers 'godly thing' (after Vulg. Divinum). Tindale gave 'godhed,' and was followed by all the Versions except the Rhemish, which has 'the Divinitie,' though 'Godhead' is given as an alternative in the Annotation to the verse. The Gr. expression occurs nowhere else in biblical Greek, though the adj. θεῖος is common in LXX and occurs in 2 P $1^{3.\,4}$ (EV 'divine').

Lightfoot (on Col 2^{9}) expresses the difference between θειότης and θεότης thus: θειότης is the quality, θεότης the essence of God. The distinction is best seen by observing that θεότης comes from θεός 'God,' while θειότης comes from θεῖος 'Divine.' Therefore Sanday-Headlam (on Ro 1^{20}) more happily: θεότης=Divine Personality, θειότης= Divine nature and properties (cf. Bengel [on Col 2^{9}]: 'Non modo divinæ virtutes, sed ipsa divina natura,' and see Trench, NT Synonyms, p. 6 ff.). It is at once seen how appropriately St. Paul uses θειότης in Ro 1^{20} where he speaks of such attributes of God as can be read in the book of Nature; and how appropriately θεότης in Col 2^{9} where he asserts of the Son that in Him dwells the fulness of the entire (revealed and unrevealed) Personality of God. The Latin Versions were forced to use divinitas for both words. But its insufficiency to represent θεότης was early felt, and Augustine says (De Civ. Dei, vii. 1): 'Hanc divinitatem vel, ut sic dixerim, deitatem: nam et hoc verbo uti jam nostros non piget, ut de Græco expressius transferant id quod illi θεότητα appellant.' The same feeling is now finding expression in English, and theologians prefer to speak of the Deity rather than of the Divinity of Christ, since the former word alone gives Him the full Personality of God. The Eng. Versions from Wyclif to AV make no distinction, but use 'Godhead' at both places, except that the Rhem. NT has 'Divinitie' at Ro 1^{20}. Yet Beza (on Col 2^{9}) had shown the distinction: 'Non dicit, τὴν θειότητα, id est divinitatem, sed τὴν θεότητα, id est deitatem.' Luther also was content with 'Gottheit' for both words; but De Wette gives 'Göttlichkeit' for θειότης; while Weizsäcker gives 'Gottesgüte.' RV has 'divinity,' retaining 'Godhead' for θεότης.

Each word occurs once only in NT. Nor is θεότης found in LXX, and θειότης only once, Wis 18^{9} (καὶ τὸν τῆς θειότητος νόμον ἐν ὁμονοίᾳ διέθεντο, AV 'and with one consent made a holy law,' AVm 'or a covenant of God or league,' RV 'and with one consent they took upon themselves the covenant of the divine law,' RVm 'Gr. law of divineness'). On this Westcott (Lessons of the RV of NT, p. 111 f.) draws attention to 'the care taken by the Revisers to represent words of a single occurrence in the original by words of single occurrence in the Eng. version.' Besides 'divinity' in Ro 1^{20} for θειότης and 'Godhead' (for which he seems to prefer 'deity') in Col 2^{9} for θεότης, he mentions 'apparition' for φάντασμα Mt 14^{26}, Mk 6^{49}; 'awe' for δέος He 12^{28}; 'billows' for σάλος Lk 21^{25}; 'concealed' for παρακαλύπτεσθαι Lk 9^{45}; 'conduct' for ἀγωγή 2 Ti 3^{10}; 'confute' for διακατελέγχεσθαι Ac 18^{28}; 'demeanour' for κατάστημα Tit 2^{3}; 'discipline' for σωφρονισμός 2 Ti 1^{7}; 'disrepute' for ἀπελεγμός Ac 19^{27}; 'effulgence' for ἀπαύγασμα He 1^{3}; 'goal' for σκοπός Ph 3^{14}; 'impostor' for γόης 2 Ti 3^{13}; 'to interpose' for μεσιτεύειν He 6^{17}; 'justice' for ἡ Δίκη Ac 28^{4}; 'to moor' for προσορμίζεσθαι Mk 6^{53}; 'sacred' for ἱερός 1 Co 9^{13}, 2 Ti 3^{15}; 'to shudder' for φρίσσειν Ja 2^{19}; 'stupor' for κατάνυξις Ro 11^{8}; 'to train' for σωφρονίζειν Tit 2^{4}; 'tranquil' for ἤρεμος 1 Ti 2^{2}; 'undressed' for ἄγναφος Mt 9^{16}, Mk 2^{21}; and 'without self-control' for ἀκρατής 2 Ti 3^{3}.

In modern English the word 'Godhead' is mostly confined to a neuter sense, as if it were the proper tr^{n} of τὸ θεῖον, and of that alone. In older English it was a synonym for 'divinity,' which, as we have seen, was not distinguished, as it is scarcely distinguished yet, from 'deity.' The Rhem. NT has the marg. note to Jn 6^{66} 'Heretikes beleeve not the real presence because they see bread and wine, as the Jewes believed not his Godhead because of the shape of a poore man.' Tindale (Works, i. 200) speaks ironically of 'the Pope's godhead.' And Chaucer (Knightes Tale, 1523) uses the word as a syn. for 'deity'—

> 'If so be that my youthe may deserve,
> And that my might be worthy for to serve
> Thy godhede, that I may been oon of thyne,
> Than preye I thee to rewe upon my pyne.'

GODLESS.—This word is found but once in AV, 2 Mac 7^{34} 'O godless man'; Gr. ὦ ἀνόσιε; RV 'O unholy man,' as EV translate the same adj. in 1 Ti 1^{9}, 2 Ti 3^{2}, its only occurrences in NT.

But RV has given 'godless' as the tr^{n} of חָנֵף hânêph, in preference to AV 'hypocrite' in Job 8^{13} 13^{16} 15^{34} 17^{8} 20^{5} 27^{8} 34^{30} 36^{13}, Pr 11^{9}, Is 33^{14}; and the same translation might have been given in the three remaining passages: Is 9^{17} (AV 'hypocrite'); 10^{6}, Ps 35^{16} (AV 'hypocritical'), where, however, RV gives 'profane.' For there is no doubt that 'hypocrite,' though it is the tr^{n} of all the versions since Wyclif, misses the meaning. The verb is used in the Qal in the sense of 'be polluted,' whether of land (Is 24^{5}, Jer 3^{1}, Ps 106^{38} so tr^{d} in EV, except Is 24^{5} AV 'defile,' but Mic 4^{11} of Zion, EV 'defile') or of persons (Jer 23^{11}, EV 'be profane'); and in the Hiphil 'to pollute' of land (Nu $35^{33\ bis}$ AV 'pollute'—'defile,' Jer 3^{2} AV 'pollute,' 3^{9} AV 'defile,' RV always 'pollute'), and of persons (Dn 11^{32} AV 'corrupt,' RV 'pervert,' RVm 'make profane'). Hence the idea of the adj. is separated from God so as to be openly hostile; not 'hypocritical,' but 'profane,' 'godless.' There are two substantives, each of which occurs once, חֹנֶף Is 32^{6} (AV 'hypocrisy,' RV 'profaneness'), and חֲנֻפָּה Jer 23^{15} (AV 'profaneness,' AVm 'hypocrisy,' RV 'profaneness'). J. HASTINGS.

GODLINESS is in NT the equivalent of the Gr. term εὐσέβεια (1 Ti 2^{2} 3^{16} $4^{7.\,8}$ $6^{3.\,5.\,6.\,11}$, 2 Ti 3^{5}, Tit 1^{1}, also Ac 3^{12} [RV], 2 P $1^{3.\,6.\,7}$ 3^{11}), except in one passage (1 Ti 2^{10}), where θεοσέβεια is used. 'It properly denotes,' says Ellicott, 'only "well-directed reverences" (Trench, Synon. § 48), but in the NT is practically the same as θεοσέβεια, and is well defined by Tittmann (Synon. i. p. 146) as "vis pietatis in ipsâ vitâ vel externâ vel internâ" (cf.

Eusebius, Præp. Evang. i. p. 3). Thus, then, εὐσέβεια conveys the idea, not of an "inward, inherent holiness," but, as Alford (on Ac 3^{12}) correctly observes, of an "operative cultive piety"' (Pastoral Epistles, p. 27). The substantive is used by St. Paul only in the Pastoral Epistles; and Pfleiderer (Paulinism, Eng. tr. ii. 210) maintains that in these writings, the Pauline authorship of which he denies, εὐσέβεια takes the place of the Pauline πίστις as 'the fundamental idea of the Christian holy life.' Weiss, however, denies this, and holds that 'as εὐσέβεια occurs along with πίστις (1 Ti 6^{11}), it is clear that it must rather be the basis of life from which true faith springs' (Bib. Theol. of NT, Eng. tr. ii. 129). St. Paul's use of the term 'ungodly' (ἀσεβής), in Ro 4^5 5^6, as descriptive of all mankind apart from Christ, would suggest that the more distinctively Christian sense of the term 'godly' is to be preferred in St. Paul's letters, as equivalent, not to reverence for God generally, but to the Christian feeling towards God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. On the other hand, in Ac $10^{2.7}$ the adjective εὐσεβής, translated 'devout,' is used to describe a man who, though a worshipper of God, was not even a Jewish proselyte. In the Sept. εὐσέβεια is used in some passages (Pr 1^7, Is 11^2) as the equivalent of the phrase 'the fear of the Lord,' but in others θεοσέβεια (Gn 20^{11}, Job 28^{28}). Thoughout the OT man's duty towards God is defined as fearing God (Schultz, OT Theol. Eng. tr. ii. p. 55); and in the 'Wisdom' literature the fear of the Lord (יִרְאַת יְהוָֹה) is assumed as the fundamental principle of piety and morality (Job 28^{28}, Ps 111^{10}, Pr 1^7 8^{13}, Ec 12^{13}. See Oehler's OT Theol. Eng. tr. ii. p. 446). For the use of the adjective or adverb 'godly' in 2 Ti 3^{12}, Tit 2^{12}, 2 P 2^9 see the following article. Elsewhere in St. Paul's letters the same word is used in AV to render either the genitive θεοῦ (2 Co 1^{12} 11^2, 1 Ti 1^4) or the phrase κατὰ θεὸν (2 Co $7^{9.10.11}$); while in 3 Jn ^{6} 'godly sort' = ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ, a use of the adjective which the meaning of the substantive does not warrant; and it is to be regretted that the RV retains this rendering in some passages. It must be added that in some OT passages (Ps 4^3 12^1 32^6) the adjective 'godly' is used to render the Heb. word חָסִיד, which not only describes God's relation to man, but also describes the mutual relations of men (see Cheyne, Hosea, 62 n.); and the use of this word shows that the OT phrase 'the fear of the Lord' does not mean any slavish dread of God, but a reverence which does not exclude love. The NT godliness also means a reverence that includes all the emotions which the revelation of God in Christ inspires. A. E. GARVIE.

GODLY is used both as an adj. and as an adverb. The adj. occurs only four times in OT: (1) thrice as tr^n of חָסִיד, which is properly 'kind,' but from the prominence of this quality in God, and in them that are like Him, comes to mean 'pious,' 'godly'; so Ps 4^3 32^6, and as subst. 'the godly man' Ps 12^1; and (2) once as tr^n of אֱלֹהִים 'God,' Mal 2^{15} 'a godly seed,' lit., as AVm 'a seed of God.' The proper equivalent of 'godly' in Gr. is εὐσεβής, which in Sirach is one of the characteristics of the 'wise man' (ὁ σοφός), as distinguished from the 'fool' (ὁ μωρός) who is ἀσεβής 'godless'; and in the plur. this practically becomes a subst. equivalent to 'the Wise.' Thus Sir $39^{26.27}$ 'The principal things for the whole use of man's life are water, fire, iron, and salt, flour of wheat, honey, milk, and the blood of the grape, and oil, and clothing. All these things are for good to the godly (τοῖς εὐσεβέσιν); so to the sinners (τοῖς ἁμαρτωλοῖς) they are turned into evil.' This word, which occurs thrice in NT, is only once tr^d 'godly,' 2 P 2^9 'The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptation' (εὐσεβεῖς); in Ac $10^{2.7}$ it is tr^d 'devout' by both AV and RV, the word being applied to Cornelius and to one of his soldiers. The TR gives εὐσεβής in Ac 22^{12} in reference to Ananias, but edd. after the best MSS prefer εὐλαβής, which elsewhere (Lk 2^{25}, Ac 2^5 8^2) is tr^d by EV 'devout,' as here. In He 12^{28} the subst. εὐλάβεια is tr^d 'godly fear,' for which RV gives 'reverence,' RVm 'godly fear.' But in 5^7 (the only other occurrence of the Greek word) RV tr. ἀπὸ τῆς εὐλαβείας, 'for his godly fear,' AV 'in that he feared.' (See this passage discussed in Expos. Times, vi. 434, 522; vii. 4, 118, 502). In 2 Co 1^{12} 11^2, 1 Ti 1^4 'godly' is the tr^n of θεός 'God' (cf. Mal 2^{15} above); thus 2 Co 1^{12} 'in simplicity and godly sincerity' (ἐν ἁπλότητι [edd. ἁγιότητι] καὶ εἰλικρινείᾳ [T WH -ίᾳ] θεοῦ [edd. τοῦ θεοῦ], RV 'in holiness and sincerity of God'); 11^2 'I am jealous over you with godly jealousy' (θεοῦ ζήλῳ, RV 'with a godly jealousy,' RVm 'Gr. a jealousy of God'); 1 Ti 1^4 'Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions rather than godly edifying (οἰκοδομίαν) which is in faith' (RV 'a dispensation of God,' οἰκονομίαν θεοῦ, RVm 'a stewardship of God'). The AV of 1611 omits 'godly' from the last passage (evidently by an oversight, for it is found in all the versions from Tindale to the Bishops), and it was not inserted till 1638. Wyc. has 'edificacioun of god,' and Rhem. 'the edifying of God,' after Vulg. 'ædificationem Dei.'* Elsewhere 'godly' as an adj. is the tr^n of some attributive phrase in the original. In 2 Co 7^9 'after a godly manner,' 7^{10} 'godly,' and 7^{11} 'after a godly sort,' all represent κατὰ θεόν 'according to God' as AVm (RV changes 7^9 into 'after a godly sort'); and in 3 Jn ^{6} 'after a godly sort' stands for ἀξίως τοῦ θεοῦ, lit. 'worthily of God,' as RV.

As an adverb 'godly' was once in common use, as Tindale, Pent. 'A prologe' (Mombert's ed. p. 12), 'Every man must worke godly and truly to the uttermoste of the power that god hath geven him: and yet not truste therein'; and Preface to AV, 1611, p. 5, 'The godly-learned were not content to have the Scriptures in the Language which themselves understood.' 'Ungodly' was used in the same way, as Mt 22^6 Tind. 'The remnaunt toke his servantes and intreated them ungodly and slewe them'; and T. Lever, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 118), 'Do ye not se how that prebendes whiche were godly founded as moste convenient and necessarye lyvyngs for preachers to healp the byshoppes and the persons too enstructe the people, be now ungodly abused to corrupte the byshoppes?' But there was a feeling against using the same form as adj. and adverb. Hence 'godlily' was sometimes used, as Knox, Hist. 136, 'That by his grave counsell, and godly exhortation, he would animate her Majestie constantly to follow that which godlily she had begun'; and sometimes the word was avoided. In Pr. Bk., Collect for Good Friday, 'That every member . . . may truly and godly serve thee' is found in all edd. from 1549 to 1662, but in the Scotch Liturgy 'godly' was changed into 'worthily.' 'Godly' is used as an adv. thrice in AV, 2 Mac 12^{45} 'there was great favour laid up for those that died godly' (μετ' εὐσεβίας, RV 'in godliness,' RVm 'on the side of godliness'); 2 Ti 3^{12}, Tit 2^{12} (εὐσεβῶς). GOEL (AVENGER OF BLOOD).—'Goel' (Heb. גֹּאֵל gô'ēl) is an important technical term of Hebrew jurisprudence. The primary meaning of the root

* For examples of the way in which RV has endeavoured to express this idiom (originally Hebrew) in English, see Westcott, Lessons of RV of NT, p. 32 ff.

גָּאַל is 'to make a claim,' vindicare, in the sense of claiming something that has been lost or forfeited, 'to resume a claim or right which has lapsed' (Driver); hence the goel is etymologically 'the claimant,' vindex, in practice 'the next of kin.' We shall consider the rights and privileges of the goel, (i.) in civil and (ii.) in criminal law.

i. In civil law the following were the chief rights and responsibilities of the goel. (a) When, through stress of circumstances, a Hebrew was compelled to sell part of his patrimony, it was the duty of 'his kinsman that is next to him' (RV)—in ordinary language his next of kin—'to redeem (גאל) that which his brother had sold' (Lv 25^{25}). This duty is in accordance with one of the fundamental ideas at the basis of the Hebrew law of real estate, by which land was the inalienable property of the clan (מִשְׁפָּחָה). According to the priestly legislation, indeed, the clan or tribe was in its turn the feudatory of J″, from whom, as the real owner of the soil, the land was held in fee (Lv 25^{23}). In the particular case under consideration, the various degrees of kinship are not stated, but they were no doubt identical with those laid down for the analogous case next to be considered (under b); that is, the right of redemption (מִשְׁפַּט גְּאֻלָּה Jer 32^{7}) appertained first to full brothers of the vendor; whom failing or who renouncing, it passed to his uncles on the father's side; whom failing, to their sons, i.e. the vendor's cousins on the father's side; whom failing, to 'any that is nigh of kin unto him of his family' (מִשְׁפָּחָה Lv 25^{49}). From the historical instance of the purchase by Jeremiah of his cousin Hanamel's property in Anathoth (Jer 32^{8-12}), it appears that the goel, or next of kin, had the right of pre-emption, or the right to the refusal of the property before it was exposed in the open market, as well as the right of redemption after it had been sold. In either case the prophet was his cousin's goel. Under this head, as it seems to us, must be placed the much-disputed case of Ruth the Moabitess (which many authorities regard as a case of levirate marriage), for the first and chief part of the transaction before the elders of the city (Ru $4^{1ff.}$) is clearly the redemption of 'the parcel of land which was our brother Elimelech's' (4^{3-6}). To this, the primary duty of the goel, the taking of Ruth in marriage is to be regarded as subordinate. Nothing is said of the precise relationship subsisting between Naomi—who here, contrary to the Pentateuchal laws, appears as her husband's heir—and the true goel, nor between him and Boaz, to whom, on the former renouncing, the right of redemption fell. Throughout the Bk. of Ruth our translators have rendered the Hebrew gô'ēl by 'kinsman.'

(b) A second duty of the goel in civil law was to redeem, not the property, but the person, of his kinsman, in the event of the latter being compelled by poverty to sell himself as a slave to a stranger or a sojourner (Lv 25^{47-49}). The order in which kinship was to be reckoned has already been given. For the details of the transactions under this and the foregoing head, see the art. JUBILEE. From this function of the goel as a 'redeemer' there has proceeded an extensive use of the verb ga'al in the sense of 'redeem,' with God Himself for the subject. Thus God is said to redeem Israel from the bondage of Egypt (Ex 6^{6} 15^{13}, Ps 74^{2} etc.) and from exile in Babylonia. The idea of J″ as His people's goel is a special characteristic of Deutero-Isaiah (41^{14} 43^{14} $44^{6.\,24}$ and oft.), as is the correlated idea of His people as the redeemed (גְּאוּלִים) of J″ (51^{10} 62^{12} 63^{4}, cf. 35^{9}).

(c) A third duty of the goel is mentioned incidentally in the course of an ordinance supplementing a previous law regarding certain cases of restitution (Lv 6^{1-7}, MT 5^{21-26}). The new law provides for a case where the injured person may have died before payment of the conscience-money; in which case the money, it is assumed, is to be paid to the goel of the deceased (Nu 5^{8}), whom failing, to the priest.

ii. In criminal law the next of kin had laid upon him the duty of enforcing the claim for satisfaction for the blood of a murdered kinsman; in this capacity he received the special name of the gô'ēl had-dām, 'the avenger (AV also 'revenger') of blood.' The custom of blood-revenge, as it is called, is almost world-wide in its range, and is especially characteristic of society in a certain stage of its development (see esp. the work of A. H. Post, Entwickelungsgeschichte des Familienrechts, §§ 15–18 'Die Blutrache,' with the modern literature on p. 113). It rests ultimately on the two fundamental principles of the sacredness of human life (cf. Gn $9^{5.\,6}$ 'whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed'), and the solidarity of the clan or tribe in primitive societies. When, with the advance of civilization and the gradual evolution of the state, the duty of safeguarding the rights of the community passes to the state, blood-revenge is obsolescent or obsolete. Hence blood-revenge as practised by imperfectly organized communities has often been compared to war waged by modern states for the vindication of their rights. The Semitic peoples have practised this custom from prehistoric times, and the earliest Hebrew legislation, that of the Book of the Covenant (see below), found it in full operation. Indeed it is not too much to say that the aim of the Hebrew legislators, from first to last, was so to regulate the practice that the shedder of blood should be, as far as possible, protected from the hasty and unconsidered vengeance of the next of kin, by providing for the judicial investigation of each particular case, and the safe-keeping of the accused until such investigation was completed.

Among the Hebrews, then, in primitive times, the murdered man's next of kin, i.e. his goel, was bound by tribal custom to avenge his blood by compassing the death, not merely of the murderer himself, but of all his family; for the family was in these early times the unit of society, and so the murderer's guilt was shared by all his family (cf. Jos 7^{24}, 2 K 9^{26}). Such, at least, is the Arab custom, and the law of Dt 24^{16} seems first to have limited the responsibility for a crime to the criminal alone (2 K 14^{6}). The Book of the Covenant deals with crimes of violence by formulating, first of all, the general principle of a life for a life (Ex 21^{12}; cf. Gn 9^{6}); it then proceeds to impose an all-important restriction on the exercise of indiscriminate blood-revenge, by emphasizing the distinction between accidental (v.^{13}) and deliberate manslaughter (v.^{14}). In both cases the manslayer is presumed to flee to the altar of the local sanctuary from the vengeance of the goel (cf. 1 K 1^{50} 2^{28}); but when deliberate murder has been done, the criminal must forthwith be handed to the goel (so we must infer), as the representative, not merely of the kin of the murdered man, but even of God Himself, the Supreme Avenger (Ps 9^{12}, MT ^{13}). This natural distinction between wilful murder and accidental homicide is elaborated in both the later codes (for the legal distinction see Homicide and Murder under CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS), which are chiefly distinguished from the older and simpler code above referred to by the provision of the cities of refuge (for which see REFUGE, CITIES OF), where the manslayer was to find protection from the hasty vengeance of the goel ('lest the avenger of blood pursue the manslayer while his heart is hot,' Dt 19^{6}), until it should be decided whether he was guilty of murder or of accidental homicide (Nu 35^{9-34}, Dt 19^{1-13}, Jos 20). Another important restriction consisted in the new proviso that two witnesses, at least, should be required to establish the crime of murder (cf. Nu 35^{30} with Dt 19^{15}). The right of pronouncing whether a particular case was one of accidental or intentional homicide seems to have been vested in the elders (Dt 19^{12}), as the official representatives of the community (עֵדָה Nu $35^{12.24.25}$) to which the accused belonged. The elders of the city of refuge to which he had fled must have formed, according to Jos 20^{4},* a court of first instance. On the accused being, after trial, found guilty of wilful murder, he is handed over to the goel, whose function, as restricted by successive legislation, has now become little more than that of a public executioner. If the verdict, on the other hand, is that of accidental homicide, the congregation (עֵדָה) was authorized 'to deliver the manslayer out of the hand of the avenger of blood,' and to 'restore him to his city of refuge,' where he was obliged to remain till the death of the then high priest (Nu 35^{25}). Until this event the accused was in so far still at the mercy of the goel, that, if he were found by the latter 'beyond the border of his city of refuge,' he might be put to death with impunity (Nu $35^{26.27}$).

A characteristic feature of blood-revenge, as thus regulated by Hebrew legislation, is the very limited extent to which compensation for blood (even when accidentally shed) by a money payment was admitted. Among many widely different peoples, money-compensation—the Greek ποινή, the Saxon wergeld—was legally admitted, but among the Hebrews such compensation or ransom (כֹּפֶר) was expressly forbidden for the case of wilful murder (Nu 35^{31}), and was admitted only in the case of a man or woman gored to death by an ox (Ex 21^{30}).

It is impossible to say how long the custom of blood-revenge by means of the goel remained in force among the Hebrews. The case stated by the woman of Tekoa in 2 S 14^{6-11} reveals its prevalence in the reign of David, and, at the same time, is instructive as showing how the growing power of the central authority had already begun to exercise a salutary control over this ancient practice. According to the Chronicler, Jehoshaphat required all cases of bloodshed to be brought before the new high court of justice in the capital (2 Ch 19^{10}); but, unfortunately, we cannot be sure how much of this narrative is historical and how much a reflection of the practice prevailing in the Chronicler's own time (cf. Kittel, Hist. ii. p. 284).

From the technical sense of one enforcing the claims of justice in the special case of bloodshed, as explained above, the term goel in later Hebrew acquired the more general signification of 'advocate,' one who enforces the claim of the oppressed (Ps 119^{154}) and the orphans (Pr 23^{11}). In this more general sense the word is perhaps to be understood in the difficult passage Job 19^{25} 'I know that my goel liveth' (see Budde, in loc.).

GOG (גּוֹג).—1. The eponymous head of a Reubenite family, 1 Ch 5^{4}. 2. See following article.

GOG (גּוֹג, Γούγ).—The 'prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal,' from 'the land of Magog,' and representative of the northern hordes who were to invade W. Asia in the day 'when Israel dwelleth securely' (Ezk 38. 39, cf. Rev 20^{8}). George Smith proposed to see in him Gagi, the ruler of the land of Sakhi, who is mentioned in the annals of the Assyr. king Assurbanipal. But the situation of Sakhi is unknown, and the Heb. name corresponds with that of the Lydian king who is called Gyges by the Greeks, and Gugu in the cuneiform inscriptions. Gyges was the first king of W. Asia Minor who became known to the Assyrians, and consequently his name may perhaps have become a title applied by them to the subsequent kings of that part of the world. The Cimmerians (Gomer) are included in the army of Gog; and as the invasion of Asia Minor by them brought about a great displacement of population, one result being the retreat of the Moschi and Tibareni (Meshech and Tubal) from Cappadocia to the shores of the Black Sea, it is possible that the irruption of the northern barbarians into Syria was connected with that event. (See MAGOG, and cf. Schrader, *KAT*², and the Comm. of Davidson and Bertholet, ad loc.).

A. H. SAYCE.

GOIIM (גּוֹיִם) is the Heb. word which in EV is variously rendered 'Gentiles,' 'nations,' 'heathen' (see Preface to RV of OT). In the obscure expression in Gn 14^{1}, where AV has 'king of nations,' RV retains Goiim (possibly a corruption from Gutî) as a proper name, although RVm offers the alternative rendering 'nations.' The same difference in rendering between AV and RV is found also in Jos 12^{23}. See, further, GENTILES, and next article.

GOIIM (גּוֹיִם), 'Nations,' the name of the kingdom of Tidal (Gn 14^{1}). The name of Tidal has been found by Pinches in a mutilated cuneiform tablet, where it is written Tudghula; and as in another broken tablet of the same series it is said that Kudur-Laghamar or Chedorlaomer, 'the king of Elam,' had 'collected the Umman Manda' or 'barbarian nations' in order to attack Babylon, it seems probable that it was of these Umman Manda that Tudghula was king. They represented the Kurdish tribes on the northern frontier of Elam. (See the paper of Mr. Pinches on Certain Inscriptions and Records referring to Babylonia and Elam, in the Transactions of the Victoria Institute, xxix. 45–81). A. H. SAYCE.

GOLAN (גּוֹלָן).—This appears to have been always a prominent place, and many historical facts about it are known, still its site has never been recovered. It was in Bashan, and belonged to the territory of Manasseh (Dt 4^{43}, cf. Driver, ad loc.). It was a Levitical city and likewise a city of refuge (Jos 20^{8} 21^{27}). About the beginning of our era it is mentioned in connexion with certain battles or sieges, and at that time, if not earlier, it had given its name to a district of such size that the territory was divided into Upper and Lower Gaulanitis, which together formed the E. boundary of Galilee (Jos. Wars, I. iv. 4, 8; III. iii. 1, 5; IV. i. 1; Schürer, HJP I. i. 304 n). The terms 'Upper' and 'Lower' no doubt divided the region from N. to S.; still the upper region is not distinguished by highlands, as might be supposed; for the entire country, while rolling, maintains a pretty uniform level.

* On the composite character of this chapter see the Commentaries of Dillmann and Oettli; and for the difficulties in harmonizing the different provisions with regard to the CITIES OF REFUGE see that article.

One division of the region E. of the Sea of Galilee is known at present as Jaulân (see Schumacher, Survey of the Jaulân, 1888), and this name represents the Gaulanitis of NT times and the Golan of Heb. history. With these indications it might be supposed that the task of recovering the place itself would be an easy one; but this is a case where modern research does not afford us much help. Nor does any light come from the meaning of the word, something surrounded, hence a district. Possibly, the political disturbances which visited that country from time to time, and the introduction of other settlers in place of the Jewish inhabitants, have obliterated all traces of the exact locality.

We have an indication in the Talm. (Makkôth, 9*b*), to which prob. some weight should be given, that Golan was due E. of Kedesh-naphtali, or rather that the cities of refuge were situated in pairs over-against each other, E. and W. of the Jordan. As this indication is true in the case of Shechem and Ramoth-gilead, there is no reason why it should not be true also in the other two cases.

The present writer has searched the region pretty thoroughly for the site of this ancient city, but has been unable to decide the question beyond dispute. Nawâ has been suggested; and the objection raised to it, that 'it is much too far to the east,' has no weight, since it is about the same distance to the E. as Ramoth-gilead. It might be a valid objection to say that it is too far south.

It must be remembered that the country just E. of Ramoth-gilead was not thickly settled, and hence was not very wide at that point, while E. of the Sea of Galilee it broadened out to nearly three times that width; and this would be an imperative reason for appointing, as the N. city of refuge, a place much farther to the E. than either of the others on that side of the river. This fact, together with the indication from the Talmud, would point to es-Sanamein as a possible site for Golan. The question of the actual site of this city of refuge is one, however, that is yet to be determined. S. MERRILL.

GOLD.—The essential word for gold in Heb. is zāhābh (in Aram. parts of Ezr and Dn dĕhabh, Arab. dhahab). Four other words occurring in Job are tr^{d} 'gold' in AV, viz. beẓer, Job 22^{24}, RVm 'ore' (the same word occurs in v.^{25} ‖ keseph 'silver'); ṣĕgôr, 28^{15}; pāz, 28^{17}; and kethem, 28^{19} (the last two often used elsewhere; cf. כֶּתֶם אוֹפִיר Job 28^{16}, Ps 45^{10}, Is 13^{17}; זְהַב א׳ 1 Ch 29^{4}, and אוֹפִיר alone, Job 22^{24b}). Another word for gold is ḥârûẓ, the usual Phœn. word, but in Heb. confined to poetry, Ps 68^{13}, Pr 3^{14} $8^{10.19}$ 16^{16} (Driver, Text of Samuel, p. xxviii). It probably comes from a root meaning 'to be yellow.' By some the Phœnician word is thought to be the source of the Gr. χρυσός.

That Syrians early had command of sources of gold is evident from the wealth of gold vessels and ornaments taken by the Egyptians in their depletion of Syria under the 18th dynasty. The gold of Egypt came at first from Nubia, and later from the eastern desert; but that of Syria probably came from Midian. At the first Midianite war the Israelites are said to have given as an offering about half as many shekels of gold as the girls of the captives taken (Nu 31^{52}). This would imply an offering of about three shekels from each family destroyed, and therefore a much greater wealth as a total. Again, Gideon personally gets 1700 shekels of gold ear-rings from the slaughtered Midianites (Jg 8^{26}), besides the rich spoil of gold from the royal trappings. That great wealth and ability should have existed there, is very likely, considering the civilization of the Amu on the Egypt. monuments, who probably came thence; and the conquest of Egypt by foreigners (Khyan, Yakub-el, and others) most likely from the same land. The absence of gold in the looting of Palestine under Joshua (the only piece named being an ingot of fifty shekels at Jericho, Jos 7^{21}) is probably due to the thorough exhaustion of the country by repeated pillaging under Ramses III. The quantities of gold mentioned are not at all improbable, looking to the wealth otherwise recorded. Putting amounts roughly into monetary value, we see

Tahutmes III. First year, plunder of Syria .	£20,000
Later years, perhaps	30,000
One year from Nubia	28,000
Other years, perhaps	22,000 ?
In one reign received	£100,000 ?
Ramses III. offered to Amen, mainly from Syria, £120,000; probably total plunder	1,000,000 ?
Total amount stated for Tabernacle . .	90,000
Spoil of Midian, offered £16,000; total at least	100,000 ?
Gideon (Jg 8^{26}) gets £2000; total at least .	10,000 ?
Hezekiah gives Sennacherib	90,000

These values will give a general idea of the amounts of gold dealt with in OT accounts, and their relation to the plunder which the Egyptians got in powerful reigns.

There does not appear to be any common word for alloys of gold in Heb.; and probably, therefore, the electrum or gold-silver alloy, so usual in Egypt, was not frequent in Palestine. See also MINING. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.

GOLDSMITH is the tr. of צֹרֵף in both AV and RV of Neh $3^{8.31.32}$, Is 40^{19} 41^{7} 46^{6}, and of RV in Jer $10^{9.14}$ 51^{17}, where AV has 'founder.' From early times elaborate gold work was made in Egypt; and the exquisite delicacy and finish of the jewellery found at Dahshur, of about B.C. 2500, shows that nothing has been gained in technical ability since that date. The special feature of this jewellery is the cloisonnée work of hundreds of minute pieces of coloured stones, each cut to a precise shape, and each inserted in a perfectly fitting socket, made by invisible delicate soldering of thin strips of gold. The preparation of the base, and the cutting of the inserted pieces, are alike beyond anything done in later ages. The same system was employed throughout Egyptian history in varying degrees of delicacy; and such work must have been the starting-point for Hebrew and Phœnician gold work.

In the account of the tabernacle both cast and beaten gold are mentioned. The hammering out of the lampstand, lamps, and trimmers from one talent of gold is specified particularly (Ex $25^{31ff.}$). The talent was probably 135 lb. troy, about 160 cubic in. of gold; allowing 20 cubic in. for the lamps and fittings, and as much for the foot, this would imply (if the whole were about 3 ft. high) that the stem and branches of the lampstand were about $\frac{3}{4}$ in. thick, including the ornaments. Such a weight, therefore, is quite consistent with this strength required, and the conditions of working such a mass. The form of the lampstand is so familiar from the Arch of Titus that we need not refer to it here. The hammer-work of the two cherubim (Ex 25^{18}) does not involve any special difficulties, as they were doubtless joined; and Egyptians were long before this adepts at soldering gold. But there is a question involved in the gold plating of the tabernacle boards (Ex 26^{29}). The total gold used was 29 talents, of which 1 was used for the lampstand, and we must allow at least 2 for the cherubim and mercy-seat. This leaves 26 talents for plating. The area of the boards and bars is about 1860 square cubits, that of the furniture only 54 cubits. This implies that the gold-plating was only $\frac{1}{300}$th of an in. thick. Such would be quite impossibly tender for a skin on heavy weights, such as the boards (which weighed at least 4 cwt. each), unless it were very firmly attached; otherwise, if a nailed sheathing, it would be soon torn by moving. The gilding, therefore, on such a scale as is stated, would need to be by the usual Egyptian method of sticking rather thick gold-foil firmly on to the wooden basis. The ark and altars may have been more thickly plated, as their area was but a small portion of the whole.

The very practical nature of these statements of quantities has an important bearing on the historical character of the account, which we do not enter on here.

The making of wire is expressly described as done by cutting sheet gold into narrow threads (Ex 39^{3}); and such wire for embroidery must have drawn somewhat more from the amount of the gold stated above.

One mention in Kings deserves notice. The shields of gold which were carried by the royal bodyguard (1 K $14^{26.27}$) weighed 3 manehs each (1 K 10^{17}). This is about 16 cubic in., and if the shields were about 2 ft. in diameter they would be but $\frac{1}{30}$th of an in. thick; they were therefore not entirely of gold, but had a back of bronze or wood. Such work is rather implied by the expression 'gold fitted upon the carved work' of the temple doors (1 K 6^{35}). It appears to have been repoussée work of gold, with a wooden backing to support it and maintain the shape, helped by an intermediate coat of stucco or plaster as in Egyptian work. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.

GOLGOTHA (Γολγοθά, from Heb. גֻּלְגֹּלֶת 'skull,' Aram. גֻּלְגַּלְתָּא).—The Hebrew name of the place where the crucifixion took place, Κρανίον and Calvaria being the Greek and Latin equivalents. Calvary is mentioned only in AV of Lk 23^{33}, being replaced by 'the skull' in the RV.

Mt 27^{33} AV 'A place called Golgotha, that is to say, a place of a skull.'
,, RV 'A place called Golgotha, that is to say, the place of a skull.'
Mk 15^{22} AV, RV 'The place Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull.'
Lk 23^{33} AV 'The place which is called Calvary.'
,, RV 'The place which is called The skull.'
Jn 19^{17} AV 'A place called the place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew, Golgotha.'
,, RV 'The place called the place of a skull, which is called in the Hebrew, Golgotha.'

Three evangelists agree in calling the spot the place 'of a skull,' while St. Luke calls the place 'The skull.' This difference may appear to allow of two explanations as to the name of the locality.

(1) It may have been the place of public execution, where bodies were allowed to be devoured by birds and beasts, etc. (Gn 40^{19}, 2 K 9^{35}, Herod. iii. 12), and thus have acquired this name. It was probably distinct from the place of stoning, because at this time the Jewish Sanhedrin, though it could condemn, could not put to death (Ant. IX. i. 1), without the intervention of the Roman governor (Jn 18^{31} 'The Jews therefore said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death'). Our Lord was crucified under Pilate for sedition against Cæsar, owing to the clamour of the Jews, in order to avoid a tumult (Mt 27^{23}). This method of punishment for this offence among the Jews was common at this time (Ant. XVII. x. 10, BJ II. xiv. 9). On account of the Jewish law (Dt 21^{23}), the corpses of Jewish criminals executed by crucifixion were allowed burial (Mt 27^{58}, Jn 19^{38}); and this was omitted only under very exceptional circumstances, as when the Idumæans, called in by the Zealots during the civil war at Jerusalem previous to the destruction of the city by the Romans, 'cast away their dead bodies without burial, although the Jews used to take so much care of the burial of men, that they took down those that were condemned and crucified, and buried them before the going down of the sun' (BJ IV. v. 2).

(2) The name may have been derived from the appearance of the place itself, from its round and skull-like contour, the Hebrew word Golgotha being applied to the skull from its rounded form. There is no indication, however, in the Bible that Golgotha was a knoll or hillock, and the expression 'Mount Calvary' appears to have come into use after the 5th cent. The Itiner. Hieros. speaks of it as 'Monticulus Golgatha.' Rufinus has the expression 'Golgothana rupes' (Hist. Ecc. ix. 6), and Bernhard again has 'Mons Calvariæ.' At that time the usage appears to have become fixed, and is found in works of all later pilgrims and writers (Robinson, BRP^{2} i. p. 376).

The place of execution, both with the Romans and the Jews, was without the city or camp (Plaut. Mil. Glor. ii. 4. 6; Dt 17^{5}, 1 K 21^{13}, Ac 7^{58}, He 13^{12}, Lv 24^{14}, Nu 15^{36}), and accordingly 'the place where Jesus was crucified was nigh to the city' (Jn 19^{20}). The use of the definite article 'the place of a skull,' 'the place which is called The skull,' indicates that it was a known spot, probably the ordinary place for crucifixion of malefactors. Golgotha was in a conspicuous position, as it is related that multitudes 'came together to this sight,' and it could be seen by those 'who stood afar off' (Mk 15^{40}, Lk 23^{49}); and it was near a highway leading from the country, where people were passing to and fro (Mt 27^{39}, Mk $15^{21.29}$, Lk 23^{26}). It was also near a garden and tombs (?): 'Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new tomb, wherein was never man yet laid'; and the tomb was 'nigh at hand' (Jn 19^{41}); it was Joseph's 'own new tomb,' the tomb of a rich man of Arimathæa (Mt 27^{60}).

The traditions which relate to Golgotha are very numerous, but there are none recorded earlier than the 4th cent. There can be no doubt that the present traditional site of Golgotha is that which was recovered by Constantine, but beyond this there can be no certainty. Eusebius alone of the writers of the 4th cent. describes this circumstance (Euseb. Life of Constantine, iii. 25) connected with the finding of the Holy Sepulchre; he was living in Palestine at the time, and was present at the dedication of the Church of the Resurrection, A.D. 335. This is summarized by Besant and Palmer (Jerusalem, p. 58) in the following words: 'In the time of Constantine a report existed that the spot then occupied by a temple of Venus was the site of our Lord's burial-place. Constantine took down the temple, meaning to build the church upon it; but, in removing the earth, supposed to be defiled by the idol-worship that had taken place upon it, they found to their extreme astonishment the cave or tomb which is shown to this day. Then came the building of the Basilica.' Most of the historians in the 5th cent. relate the discovery of the Holy Sepulchre with that also of Calvary, and attribute it to the aged empress Helena, the mother of Constantine. 'There is a tradition that Adam was buried under Mount Calvary. This tradition is mentioned and condemned by Jerome (Comm. in Matth. lib. iv. c. 27) and other early ecclesiastical writers. But the pilgrims, Breydenbach, Zuallardo, and Cotovicus, not only say that the head of Adam was found here, but some (as Bernardino) would have us believe that it is still to be seen in the fissure of the Apse'

(The Holy City, pt. II. ch. iii.). The tradition further went, that at the crucifixion drops of Christ's blood fell on the skull of Adam and restored him to life (Mt $27^{52.53}$, Eph 5^{14}; Epiphanius, Adv. Hær. xlvi. 5; Sæwulf, Early Travels in Palestine, pp. 39, 66; W. Tyr. lib. 13, p. 851).

There are many arguments in favour of the traditional site of Golgotha in addition to the tradition already referred to, but, until it can be ascertained whether it is within or without the city wall of the time of Christ, the whole question must still remain in doubt. The road from the tower of Antonia leading into the old road from the city to Jaffa would probably have passed close to the site, and on this road, outside the Jaffa gate, public executions have taken place in quite recent years, up to 1868. There are rock-cut tombs in the immediate neighbourhood, including that of the Holy Sepulchre.

During recent years several sites to the north of the city have been suggested as the site of Golgotha, in order, apparently, to comply with the view that the place of execution should be situated on the north side of the city (Lv $1^{10.11}$); but, though this may have been necessary for the Jewish place of stoning, there is nothing to indicate that the place of crucifixion during the Roman occupation was located according to Jewish ritual, or that it was identical with the place of stoning.

A knoll above 'Jeremiah's grotto' has been suggested by Otto Thenius in 1849 (followed by General Gordon, Colonel Conder, and others) as the genuine Calvary, on the ground principally that it is the place of stoning according to modern Jewish tradition. C. WARREN.

GOLIATH.—The giant whom David slew at Ephes-dammim (1 S 17). In the account of the fight he is spoken of as a Phil. from Gath. He was so politically, but it does not follow that he was of the ordinary Phil. blood. Presumably, he was of the rephaite or giant breed, elsewhere spoken of as living at Gath (2 S 21^{15-22}, 1 Ch 20^{4-8}), and was descended from the ancient Avvim or Anakim (see ANAKIM, AVVIM, GIANT, RAPHA, REPHAIM). The Heb. text makes him 6 cubits and a span in height. Josephus and some MSS of the Sept. reduce this to 4 cubits and a span. On general principles the Heb. reading is the more authoritative, and it fits best the figures given for the tremendous weight of his armour and weapons. Counting the cubit at 21 in., this would make him over 11 ft. high, and over 9 ft. high if we count the cubit a handbreadth shorter. If he was measured in his armour, from the ground to the top of his helmet-crest, this is not incredible, though he is probably the largest man of whom we have any authentic record.

The details of the fight are familiar, and need not be repeated here. It is often said that the account is quite Homeric. It is especially so in the boastful speeches the two champions make before the combat begins. The proposed condition of the fight was that the side whose champion was overcome should submit to the other. This was not done, for some reason. Instead, Israel fell upon the Philistines and defeated them with great slaughter. The incident in 2 S 23^{9-12}, 1 Ch 11^{12-14}, belongs to this battle, for Pas-dammim (1 Ch 11^{13}) is Ephes-dammim; and it shows that the Israelites had hard fighting, and not merely an unresisted pursuit. It also shows that David in later years remembered his first comrades in battle.

The story of David and Goliath is a favourite theme in the Rabbinical and the Arabian literature, where it is illuminated with no end of grotesque and extravagant additions.

The Goliath of 2 S 21^{19} is a different person; but see DAVID, vol. i. p. 562^{b}, ELHANAN, LAHMI.

GOMER (גֹּמֶר, Γάμερ, Γόμερ).—1. Gomer, the son of Japheth and father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gn $10^{2.3}$), is the Gimirrâ of the Assyr. inscriptions, the Cimmerians of the Greeks. The Cimmerians were an Aryan people who inhabited the Crimea and the adjoining districts of southern Russia, and in the 7th cent. B.C. poured through the Caucasus into W. Asia (Herod. iv. 12). They attacked the northern frontier of the Assyr. empire in concert with the Minni, the Medes, the people of Sepharad (Sapardâ), and other populations whose territories they had already overrun; but in B.C. 677 their leader, Teuspa (Teispes), was defeated by Esarhaddon, and they were driven partly eastward, where they overthrew the old kingdom of Ellipi and built Ecbatana, partly westwards into Asia Minor. Here they sacked Sinôpê and Antandros, which they held for 100 years, and finally invaded Lydia. Gyges or Gugu, the Lydian king, sent an embassy to Nineveh for help; in the end, however, he was slain in battle, and his capital, Sardis, captured by the invading hordes. His successor, Ardys, succeeded in exterminating or driving them out of the country. Meanwhile Phrygia had been occupied by them, and the temple of Artemis at Ephesus burned by their leader, Lygdamis (who seems to be the Tugdamme of the inscriptions of the Assyr. king Assurbanipal). Lygdamis was subsequently slain in Cilicia (Strabo, i. 3, 16), but Cappadocia had been so completely conquered by them as to bear henceforward among the Armenians the name of Gamir. In Ezk 38^{6} Gomer is included in the army of Gog.

GOMORRAH (עֲמֹרָה, LXX and NT Γομόρρα or Γόμορρα; see Winer-Schmiedel, § 6, 8*b*; Arab. ghamara, 'to overwhelm with water').—One of 'the cities of the Plain'; its position along with that of Sodom and the other three is now pretty generally admitted to have been in the Arabah, or plain, which lies to the north of the Dead Sea. Of the five original cities, all but Zoar (or Bela) were destroyed by fire from heaven (Gn 19^{23-29}). The situation has been verified by Tristram, who, on placing himself in the required positions, was able to recognize the view described as it was regarded by Lot on selecting his future residence (Gn 13^{10}), and by Abraham during the destruction of the doomed cities (19^{27}).* According to Josephus the vale became Lake Asphaltitis on the destruction of Sodom (Ant. I. ix.), but in another place he indicates that the country of Sodom borders upon it (Wars, IV. viii. 4). It has elsewhere been shown that the Dead Sea does not owe its existence to miraculous interposition (see DEAD SEA); and the view that the waters cover the sites of the cities of the Plain is now generally discarded. Certain ruins about a mile from the shore of the Dead Sea north of Râs el-Feshkhah, marked Khumrân (or Gumrân) on the Survey Map of Palestine, have been supposed by de Saulcy to mark the site of Gomorrah, and the position as well as the name lend probability to the view.

Throughout Scripture the cities of the Plain are used as examples of the judgments which fall on nations and cities in consequence of crime, and as warnings to mankind. In the time of Abraham and Lot the wickedness of these cities appears to have reached its climax (Gn 18^{20}), and in several passages is referred to as an example to be shunned (Jer 23^{14}, 2 P 2^{6}, Jude^{7}), and a warning for the future (Dt 29^{23}, Is 1^{9} 13^{19}, Jer 49^{18} 50^{40}, Am 4^{11}, Ro 9^{29}). But our Lord warns us that the rejection of the gospel message carries with it a greater degree of guilt than that of the cities of the Plain (Mt 10^{15}). E. HULL.

GOOD, GOODS.—The word 'good' is chiefly the rendering in OT of טוֹב, which is a verb, an adj., and a subst.; and in Apocr. and NT chiefly of ἀγαθός and καλός; and its meanings are determined far more by the meanings of those terms than by the native genius of the Eng. language. In other words, we have to deal with biblical English, some of whose peculiarities have been adopted into the common speech, through the influence of AV (though not always in their proper sense), and some have not.

1. As an adj. 'good' is used to express the following ideas:—

1. Agreeable, pleasant: Gn 3^{6} 'And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food'; $31^{24.29}$ 'Take heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad'; 49^{15} 'And he saw that rest was good'; 1 S 25^{8} 'We come in a good day'; 29^{9} 'And Achish answered and said to David, I know that thou art good in my sight, as an angel of God'; Job 13^{9} 'Is it good that he should search you out?'; Ps 45^{1} 'My heart is inditing a good matter'; 133^{1} 'Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity'; Pr 15^{23} 'A word spoken in due season, how good is it!'; 24^{13} 'My son, eat thou honey, because it is good'; Ro 16^{18} 'By good words and fair speeches [they] deceive the hearts of the simple' (χρηστολογίας καὶ εὐλογίας, RV 'smooth and fair speech,' Sanday-Headlam 'fair and flattering speech'; it is the only occurrence of χρηστολογία in bibl. Greek). In this sense we find 'good tidings' 2 S 18^{27}, Lk 2^{10}, 1 Th 3^{6}; 'good news' Pr 15^{25}; 'good report' Pr 15^{30}, Ph 4^{8} (εὔφημος, Lightfoot, 'winning,' 'attractive').

2. Of good quality (as compared with others of its kind), highly esteemed: Gn 1^{4} 'And God saw the light that it was good'; 2^{12} 'And the gold of that land is good'; 43^{11} 'Take of the best fruits in the land' (RV 'choice'); 1 K 2^{32} 'Who fell upon two men more righteous and better than he, and slew them with the sword'; 10^{18} 'Moreover the king made a great throne of ivory, and overlaid it with the best gold' (RV 'finest'); Ps 111^{10} 'A good understanding have all they that do his commandments'; Ec 7^{1} 'A good name is better than precious ointment' (Heb. 'a name'); Sir 26^{21} 'Having the confidence of their good descent'; Mt 7^{17} 'Every good tree bringeth forth good fruit'; 12^{12} 'How much then is a man better than a sheep?' (RV 'of more value,' Gr. πόσῳ διαφέρει); Lk 5^{39} 'No man also having drunk old wine straightway desireth new; for he saith, The old is better' (TR χρηστότερος, most edd. χρηστός whence RV 'good'); Ac 10^{22} 'of good report' (Gr. μαρτυρούμενος, RV 'well reported of'); 23^{1} 'I have lived in all good conscience' (πάσῃ συνειδήσει ἀγαθῇ); 1 Co 12^{31} 'Covet earnestly the best gifts' (TR κρείττονα; edd. μείζονα, RV 'greater'); Ph 2^{3} 'Let each esteem others better than themselves'; 1 Ti 3^{7} 'To have a good report'; Ja 2^{3} 'Sit thou here in a good place' (κάθου ὧδε καλῶς).

3. Profitable, advantageous: Pr 31^{18} 'She perceiveth that her merchandise is good' (RV 'profitable'); Ec 9^{4} 'A living dog is better than a dead lion'; 10^{11} 'and a babbler is no better' (RV 'then is there no advantage in the charmer'); Mt 18^{6} 'It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck' (RV 'it is profitable'); Lk 14^{34} 'Salt is good.' And the phrase 'good for nothing' Jer 13^{10}, Wis 13^{10}, Mt 5^{13}.

4. Befitting, appropriate: Gn 40^{16} 'When the chief baker saw that the interpretation was good'; Ru 2^{22} 'It is good, my daughter, that thou go out with his maidens'; 2 S 17^{7} 'The counsel that Ahithophel hath given is not good at this time'; Pr 19^{2} 'That the soul be without knowledge, it is not good'; Ec 7^{11} 'Wisdom is good with an inheritance'; Mt 17^{4} 'It is good for us to be here'; Mk 14^{21} 'Good were it for that man if he had never been born'; 1 Co 5^{6} 'Your glorying is not good.'

5. Happy, prosperous: Ps 112^{5} 'A good man showeth favour' (טוֹב־אִישׁ חוֹנֵן, RV 'Well is it with the man that dealeth graciously'; Perowne, 'Happy is the man'; but AV may have understood the word in the moral sense). In OT טוֹב is an epithet of the heart, but EV tr. otherwise: 1 K 12^{7} ‖ 2 Ch 10^{7} 'glad'; Est 5^{9} 'glad'; Pr 5^{15} AV 'merry,' RV 'cheerful'; Ec 9^{7} 'merry.' But we find in Apocr., Sir 30^{25} 'A cheerful and good heart will have a care of his meat and diet'; and Bar 4^{30} 'Take a good heart, O Jerusalem.' Cf. the phrase 'of good cheer' (= in old Eng. 'of happy countenance,' since the 'cheer' was the 'face'), generally as an imperative, 'Be of good cheer!' Est 15^{9}, Wis 18^{6}, Bar 4^{5}, Mt 9^{2} 14^{27}, Mk 6^{50}, Jn 16^{33}, Ac 23^{11} 27^{25}; but also Ac 27^{22} 'I exhort you to be of good cheer'; 27^{36} 'Then were they all of good cheer'; and, in a somewhat different sense, Sir 18^{32} 'Take not pleasure in much good cheer.' So Herbert, Temple, 'Employment,' 16—

> 'Life is a businesse, not good-cheer.'

6. Kind, gracious: 1 S 25^{15} 'But the men were very good unto us, and we were not hurt'; 2 Ch 30^{18} 'The good LORD pardon every one'; Ps 86^{5} 'For thou, Lord, art good, and ready to forgive'; Nah 1^{7} 'The LORD is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble'; Sir 35^{8} 'Give the Lord his honour with a good eye' (ἐν ἀγαθῷ ὀφθαλμῷ); 2 Mac 11^{6} 'They and all the people with lamentation and tears besought the Lord that he would send a good angel to deliver Israel'; Tit 2^{5} 'Keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands' (RV 'kind'). Cf. Milton, Lycidas, 184—

> 'Henceforth thou art the genius of the shore,
> In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
> To all that wander in that perilous flood.'

And PL viii. 651—

> 'Thou to Mankind
> Be good and friendly still, and oft return!'

7. Upright, righteous, morally and religiously good: 1 S 12^{23} 'I will teach you the good and the right way'; Mic 6^{8} 'He hath showed thee, O man, what is good'; 7^{2} 'The good man is perished out of the earth'; Mt 5^{45} 'He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good.'

8. Of quantity, considerable: 'A good way off,' Gn 21^{16}, Mt 8^{30}; 'a good way from,' Jg 18^{22}; 'for a good space,' 2 Mac 7^{5}; 'a good while,' Gn 46^{29}, Ac 18^{18}. But 'good measure' (Lk 6^{38}) is 'abundant measure'; and to 'give good ear' (Wis 8^{12}) is to be very attentive. In 2 Es 16^{21} occurs the phrase 'good cheap,' 'Behold, victuals shall be so good cheap upon earth, that they shall think themselves to be in good case' (so RV; Lat. erit annonæ vilitas). 'Cheap' is from the Anglo-Saxon céap, a market, a price; and Abbott (Shaks. Grammar, 132) thinks the phrase may arise from the omission of the prep.: 'good cheap'='at a good price' (for the buyer), 'at a bargain,' as in Shaks. III Henry VI. v. iii. 14—

> 'The queen is valued thirty thousand strong';

Merch. of Venice, III. i. 57—'He hath disgraced me and hindered me half a million.' But the oldest explanation is to refer the phrase to the French bon marché. So Palsgrave (1530), Introd. 49, 'Marché, a bargene or a marketstede or cheepe, as good cheepe, bon marchic.' And this is the explanation accepted by Murray (Oxf. Eng. Dict. s.v. 'cheap'). That the prep. may go with it, however, is shown by Caxton, Chron. Eng. ccxvii. 205, 'They toke the kynges prises for hir peny worthes at good chepe.' The meaning is simply 'cheap' (that word being now an adj., which was formerly a subst., a somewhat rare change in English). Thus Sir D. Lindsay, ii. 197—

> 'To sell richt deir, and by gude-chaip,
> And mix ry-meill amang the saip,
> And saiffrone with oyl-dolie.'

The phrase is not uncommon in early authors: Lever, Sermons, 1550 (Arber's ed. p. 130), 'For they that be true merchauntemen to by and sell in dede, shoulde and doo provide great plentye and good chepe by honest byenge and sellynge of theyr wares'; Rutherford, Letters (cxvi.), 'Law and justice are to be had by any, especially for money and moyen; but Christ can get no law, good cheap or dear'; and Herbert, Temple, 'Providence,' 97—

> 'Hard things are glorious, easie things good cheap.'

'Better cheap' was also used, as Lever in the same sermon as above (p. 130), 'Take awaye leasmongers, regrators and all suche as by byinge and sellynge make thyngs more dere, and when they be gone, all thyngs wylbe more plentye and better chepe.' So Rutherford, Letters (ccxv.), 'I trow that (if I were as I have been since I was his prisoner) I would beg lodging for God's sake in Hell's hottest furnace, that I might rub souls with Christ. But God be thanked, I shall find him in a better lodging. We get Christ better cheap than so.'

In He 11^{12} occurs 'as good as dead,' another phrase in which 'good' is used to express extent, quantity rather than quality. The Gr. is simply the perf. ptcp. of the verb (νενηκρωμένος), which in Ro 4^{19}, in a precisely parallel passage and construction, is tr^{d} in AV simply 'dead,' but RV gives 'as good as dead' there also. The phrase is from Tindale, whom most versions follow; but Wyc. has 'nygh deed,' Gen. 'dead,' Rhem. 'quite dead.' It is good idiomatic Eng., though Moon (Revisers' English, p. 126) speaks of 'the strange contradiction in the use of the word good for bad'; but it probably expresses less emphasis now than formerly. Cf. Tindale's use of 'a good' for 'in good earnest,' 'thoroughly,' Dt 9^{21} 'And I toke youre synne, the calfe which ye had made, and burnt him with fire and stampe him and grounde him a good, even unto smal dust.'

2. The uses of 'good' as a subst. may be given under three heads—

1. Material Possessions, goods: Gn 45^{20} 'The good of all the land of Egypt is yours'; 1 Ch 29^{3} 'I have of mine own proper good, of gold and silver' (RV 'I have a treasure of mine own of gold and silver'); 1 Jn 3^{17} 'Whoso hath this world's good' (τὸν βίον τοῦ κόσμου, RV 'this world's goods'). Cf. Chaucer, Parlement of Foules, 462—

> 'And but I bere me in hir servyse
> As wel as that my wit can me suffyse,
> Fro poynt to poynt, hir honour for to save,
> Tak she my lyf, and all the good I have.'

So Ex 22^{8} Tind. 'Yf the thefe be not founde, then the goodman of the housse shalbe brought unto the goddes and swere, whether he have put his hande unto his neighbours good'; Dn 11^{13} Cov. 'For the kinge of the north shal . . . come forth . . . with a mighty hoost and exceadinge greate good' (רְכוּשׁ, AV 'riches,' RV 'substance'); and Adams, Practical Works, i. 52, 'His heart is proportionably enlarged with his house: his good and his blood riseth together.' But in this sense the expression is more frequently 'goods' or 'good things,' as Ec 5^{11} 'When goods increase, they are increased that eat them'; Gn 45^{23} 'Ten asses laden with the good things of Egypt.'

2. Material and moral blessing, benefit: Ps 119^{122} 'Be surety for thy servant for good'; Ec 5^{11} 'What good is there to the owners thereof?' Ad. Est 15^{10} 'Who saved our life and continually procured our good'; Wis 5^{8} 'What good hath riches with our vaunting brought us?' Sir 2^{9} 'Ye that fear the Lord, hope for good'; 2 Mac 11^{15} 'Then Maccabeus consented to all that Lysias desired, being careful of the common good' (τοῦ συμφέροντος φροντίζων); Ro 15^{2} 'Let every one of us please his neighbour for his good to edification' (RV 'for that which is good'). Cf. Shaks. As You Like It, II. i. 17—

> 'And this our life, exempt from public haunt,
> Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
> Sermons in stones, and good in everything.'

In this sense we find 'good things' in Sir 39^{25} 'For the good are good things created.' And the phrase 'to come of good' occurs 2 Mac 14^{30} 'Perceiving that such sour behaviour came not of good, he gathered together not a few of his men, and withdrew himself from Nicanor' (ἀπὸ τοῦ βελτίστου). Cf. Shaks. Henry V. IV. viii. 4—'Captain, I beseech you now, come apace to the king; there is more good toward you, peradventure, than is in your knowledge to dream of.'

3. Moral or spiritual good, goodness: Gn 2^{9} 'the tree of [RV adds 'the'] knowledge of good and evil'; Ps $14^{1.3}$ 'There is none that doeth good'; Is $7^{15.16}$ 'to refuse the evil, and choose the good'; 2 Es 2^{14} 'I have broken the evil in pieces, and created the good'; Sir 33^{14} 'Good is set against evil, and life against death'; Ro 3^{8} 'Let us do evil, that good may come'; He 5^{14} 'those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern good and evil.' In this sense 'the good' sometimes is plu., 'good persons,' as Pr 14^{19} 'The evil bow before the good' (טוֹבִים); sometimes, however, sing., as Sir 12^{7} 'Give unto the good (τῷ ἀγαθῷ), and help not the sinner.'

These different meanings of 'good' are all illustrated in the history of the interpretation of Ps 16^{2}. The Mass. Heb. is טוֹבָתִי בַּל־עָלֶיךָ; its translations may be ranged in three classes according as טוֹב 'good' is understood.

1. Goods: LXX ὅτι τῶν ἀγαθῶν μου οὐ χρείαν ἔχεις [B omits whole clause]; Arab. 'And indeed thou needest not my goods'; Vulg. 'Quoniam bonorum meorum non eges'; Wyc. [1380] 'For of my goodis thou nedist not'; [1388] 'For thou hast no need of my goodis'; Cov. 'My goodes are nothinge unto the,' followed by Rog., Cran., Bish.; Dou. 'Because thou needest not my goods,' with marg. note, 'Christ's passion was not needful nor profitable to God but to man'; Burgess, 'My goods are at thy disposal' (reading בעלתך 'lorded over [owned] by thee' for בל־עליך 'not over thee').

2. Good: Syr. 'My good is from thee'; Symm. ἀγαθόν μου οὐκ ἔστιν ἄνευ σοῦ; Jerome, 'Bene mihi non est sine te'; D. Kimchi, 'My good is not (obligatory) upon thee'; Ewald, 'Thou art my highest good!'; J. A. Alexander, 'My happiness is not independent of thee'; Del. 'Besides thee there is for me no weal'; Perowne, 'I have no good beyond thee,' who is followed by RV, Jennings, and Kirkpatrick; Kay, 'My prosperity has no claims on thee'; Thrupp, 'My happiness! there is naught in comparison of thee'; Cheyne, 'Without thee my welfare is naught'; or (Parchment ed.) 'Welfare have I none without thee'; De Witt, 'I have naught that is good beside thee'; Segond, 'Tu es mon souverain bien!' Kautzsch, 'Es giebt für mich kein Gut ausser dir!' Wildeboer (in Feestbundel aan Prof. M. J. de Goeje, Leiden, 1891: see Cheyne in Expos. Times, iii. 164, and in Expos. III. Ser. v. 78), 'Thou art the good of [the people which thy prophet called] thy wedded one' (reading בְּעֻלָתֶךָ); but later (in Theol. Tijdschrift, Nov. 1893: see Taylor in Expos. Times, v. 384), 'Thou art my Lord, the treasure of her whom thou hast married' (reading בְּעוּלָתֶךָ); King, 'My good, beyond which there is none.'

3. Goodness: Aq. ἀγαθωσύνη μου οὐ μὴ ἐπὶ σέ; Gen. (after Calvin), 'My welldoing extendeth not to thee' (with marg. note, 'Thogh we can not enriche God, yet we must bestowe God's gifts to the use of his children'); J. Kimchi, 'The good which I am doing does not extend so far as thee'; AV, 'My goodness extendeth not to thee'; Ost. 'Le bien que je fais ne vient point jusqu' à toi'; Sharpe (p. 8), 'My goodness! nothing beside thee' [is good], but (p. 151), 'Adonai art thou, O my goodness, there is nothing beside thee to the holy who are in the land' (p. 387, 'to the saints who are in the earth').

The word goods had formerly a wider application than it has now. Thus Dt 28^{11} 'And the Lord shall make thee plenteous in goods'; 2 Ch 21^{14} 'Behold with a great plague will the Lord smite thy people, and thy children, and thy wives, and all thy goods.' RV changes 'goods' of AV into some other word in the foll. places: Gn 24^{10} 'all the goods of his master were in his hand' (כָּל־טוּב, RV 'all goodly things,' RVm as AV); 31^{18} 'And he carried away all his cattle, and all his goods which he had gotten' (כָּל־רְכֻשׁוֹ אֲשֶׁר רָכָשׁ, RV 'all his substance which he had gathered'); Nu 35^{3} 'the suburbs of them shall be for their cattle, and for their goods' (לִרְכֻשָׁם, RV 'for their substance'); Dt 28^{11} 'plenteous in goods' (לְטוֹבָה, RV 'for good'); 2 Ch 21^{14} 'all thy goods' (כָּל־רְכוּשֶׁךָ, RV 'all thy substance'); Neh 9^{25} 'houses full of all goods' (מְלֵאִים־כָּל־טוּב, RV 'full of all good things'); Job 20^{10} 'his hands shall restore their goods' (אוֹנוֹ, RV 'his wealth'); 20^{21} 'therefore shall no man look for his goods' (עַל־כֵּן לֹא־יָחִיל טוּבוֹ, RV 'Therefore his prosperity shall not endure'); Zeph 1^{13} 'their goods shall become a booty' (חֵילָם, RV 'their wealth'); Sir 14^{5} 'he shall not take pleasure in his goods' (ἐν τοῖς χρήμασιν αὐτοῦ, RV 'in his possessions'); Mt 24^{47} 'Verily I say unto you, That he shall make him ruler over all his goods' (ἐπὶ πᾶσι τοῖς ὑπάρχουσιν αὐτοῦ, RV 'over all that he hath'); Lk 15^{12} 'the portion of goods that falleth to me' (τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος τῆς οὐσίας, RV 'the portion of thy [RVm 'the'] substance'); He 10^{34} 'took joyfully the spoiling of your goods' (τῶν ὑπαρχόντων ὑμῶν, RV 'your possessions'); Rev 3^{17} 'I am rich, and increased with goods' (πεπλούτηκα, RV 'have gotten riches'). GOOD, CHIEF.—According to Scripture, the chief good for man is of a moral and spiritual nature. The fact that man was made in the image of God (Gn 1^{27}) is determinative. God is the highest and best of beings; and man, His image, while recognizing the relative goodness which is conveyed through material blessings, e.g., discerns the chief good, that which answers to our deepest needs, and leads us to the goal which our own nature establishes for us, in the region of the unseen, the spiritual and divine. God is revealed in the OT as holy, and Israel is chosen to be a holy people to Himself. The chief good is thus secured to the nation as a nation, by faithfulness in worshipping the God of Israel and in keeping His law. It consists in God's favour and friendship, and victorious aid against the nation's enemies; it appears in the acquisition of blessings which, in the absence of a clearly conceived doctrine of immortality, can only take the form of worldly prosperity (Dt 28$^{1ff.}$). The enigmas with which faith is often confronted, if it remains at any such low stage of development, are exemplified in the Bk. of Job; but there too, as we see, the struggle for light and peace goes on, not without success.

At all times the individual must have had his personal religious needs, and God must have had a regard for him, simultaneously with the favour which He showed to Israel. Accordingly, in many parts of OT a supreme good is represented as brought near to the soul of the godly person. It is obtained by worshipping the true God, and turning from sin to the righteousness of the law; and so healthful and comforting is it in the experience of its possessor that it is described by a special term, blessedness, a mode of designation which is still preserved. Other good things procure for men a measure of happiness, but only the chief good of religion confers blessedness (Ps 1. 23. 32$^{1.2}$, Pr 3, Is 55, etc.). The overthrow of the Jewish nation at the period of the Captivity taught the members that if a true blessing was thereafter to be looked for at all, it must be sought by pious individuals in the privacy of their own souls, and in the pursuit of righteous purposes such as God could approve (Jer 31$^{31ff.}$, Ezk 18).

Christ came preaching the kingdom of God. Men were invited to seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness. In that case they might have nothing, but yet they would have all; they should trust their Father in heaven, and suppress anxiety (Mt 6$^{31ff.}$). But, again, the Infinite Spirit is not sufficiently known even to the heart that turns to Him as Father. Christ has declared Him. Jesus was perfectly righteous in His human circumstances, and presented in Himself a copy of the divine nature which is level to our apprehension. In seeking the perfect blessing, men have thus to learn of Christ (Mt 11^{29}), to acknowledge Him as the Light of the world (Jn 8^{12}), to receive Him as the Bread that came down from heaven (Jn 6$^{27ff.}$), etc. Further, the righteousness and love of Christ were proved to be invincible and infinite by His voluntary endurance of death. The fullest revelation of divine goodness is seen in the cross of Christ, and through it man obtains the chief good, viz. full forgiveness, and power to live a life which approaches the perfect standard (1 Co 1$^{18ff.}$, Gal 6^{14}, Eph 2$^{13ff.}$, Col 1$^{19ff.}$, He 12$^{1ff.}$, 1 P 2$^{19ff.}$).

It is implied in Scripture that material possessions and intellectual advancement are good, and are legitimate objects of desire and pursuit. It is even an imperative duty to seek them, the obligation of the Christian being to do the most good he can, and therefore to call into requisition the best means attainable. People should use the world (1 Th 4^{11}), and if any will not work, neither ought he to eat (2 Th 3^{10}). Men require to be not slothful in business (Ro 12^{11}). It follows that the intellect, which enables us to subdue the world, ought to be cultivated. But then all powers and possessions have to be subordinate to the paramount aims of Christian love and righteousness. The chief end and privilege of man is to glorify God (Col 3^{17}, 1 P 4$^{10.11}$).

The chief good which is attainable by man in this world is only relatively to be so described. A Christian spirit is indeed better than all riches; it knows a peace which the world cannot give or take away (Jn 14^{27}); its faith overcomes the world (1 Jn 5^{4}); and through Christ, its Light, it derives instruction and blessing from everything that affects it, and often, as it were, sees heaven opened (2 Co 3^{18}). Hence it finds all gloomy pessimistic views of life unwarrantable. But sin and pain survive till death, even in all believers. A good which is absolute and unqualified is not to be tasted therefore on earth. The Christian, however, has the comfort and stimulus of the highest hope. A good which is perfect is anticipated as the reward of the glorified saints. It consists in their everlasting service of God (Rev 7$^{15ff.}$ 21$^{3.4}$). G. Ferries.

GOODLY, GOODLINESS.—Though 'goodly' was at one time used adverbially also, it is employed in AV as an adj. only. There it is found with two different meanings (and the mod. meaning, considerable, pretty large, 'a goodly number,' is not one of them).

1. Fair to look upon, fine, handsome. In this sense it is applied to persons, as Gn 39^{6} 'Joseph was a goodly person, and well favoured';* of

---

* Tindale's tr^{n}; Heb. יְפֵה תֹאַר, lit. 'fair of form'; LXX καλὸς τῷ εἴδει; Vulg. 'pulchra facie,' and Wyc. 'fayr in face,' which limit the meaning, the same epithet being used of fruit (Jer 11^{16}); RV 'comely.' The Heb. epithet is often used of women, as of Rachel (Gn 29^{17}, where the whole phrase is exactly the same as is used here of Joseph, EV 'Rachel was beautiful and well favoured'), of Abigail (1 S 25^{3}, where EV give 'of a beautiful garments, as Ex 39^{28} 'goodly bonnets of fine linen'; of trees, as Ps 80^{10} 'the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars' (אַרְזֵי־אֵל, lit. as AVm and RV 'cedars of God'); of cities (Dt 6^{10}), mountains (Dt 3^{25}), horses (Zec 10^{3}); and not only of majestic things, but of vessels (2 Ch $36^{10.19}$), precious stones (Mt 13^{45}, Lk 21^{5}), and even 'heritages' (Ps 16^{6}, Jer 3^{19}). It is also used of a price (Zec 11^{13}) paid for a slave, 'a handsome price!' spoken ironically there. In illustration we have Cov. using the word of Jerusalem, Ezk 16^{13} 'marvelous goodly wast thou and beutifull, yee even a very Queene wast thou'; and of Tyre, 27^{4} 'thy builders have made the marvelous goodly.' The Douay describes a cup so, Ps 23^{5} 'Thou hast fatted my head with oyle: and my chalice inebriating how goodlie is it!' and Bacon horse-trappings (Essays, 'Of Masques,' p. 158), 'For Justs and Tourneys and Barriers, the glories of them are chiefly . . . in the Goodly Furniture of their Horses and Armour.' Fuller illustrates 2 S 23^{21} 'he slew an Egyptian, a goodly man' (lit., says Kirkpatrick, 'a man of appearance,' a notable man, which is explained in 1 Ch 11^{23} to mean 'a man of great stature,' with the addition 'five cubits high'), when he says (Holy Warre, II. vii. p. 51), 'And though the Goths had a law, alwayes to choose a short thick man for their King; yet surely a goodly stature is most majesticall.'

2. Fair in speech, agreeable: Gn 49^{21} 'Naphtali is a hind let loose: he giveth goodly words' (אִמְרֵי־שָׁפֶר, a difficult passage, see Spurrell: the EV comes from Tindale, and is a good trⁿ of the MT).* Cf. T. Lever, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 73), 'Iudas pretence was wondrous goodly, to sell the oyntment for a great summe of money, to relieve the poore with.'

The compar. and superl. of the adj. are also used in AV, 1 S 9^{2} 'And he had a son whose name was Saul, a choice young man and a goodly: and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he'; 1 S 8^{16} 'your goodliest young men'; 1 K 20^{3} 'thy wives also and thy children, even the goodliest, are mine'; 1 Mac 8^{8} 'the goodliest countries.' So Shaks. Tempest, I. ii. 483—

> 'I have no ambition
> To see a goodlier man.'

Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 880—

> 'Ma dame, y-wis, the goodlieste mayde
> Of greet estat in al the toun of Troye.'

The subst. goodliness occurs but once, in a beautiful passage where it is a most appropriate translation, Is 40^{6} 'All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field.' The meaning of the Eng. word (which comes from the Bishops' Bible) is evidently 'that which makes it fair to look upon,' beauty, charm, as in Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 15, 'What travail and cost was bestowed that the goodliness of the temple might be a spectacle of admiration to all the world!' The RV retains the word. But the Heb. is חֶסֶד ḥeṣed, which everywhere else (and it is very common) means kindness. Nearly all mod. commentators (Ges., Hitzig, Del., Nägels., Cheyne, Dillm., Orelli, and Oxf. Heb. Lex.) accept this solitary instance as sufficient, supporting it by saying, as Cheyne, that its synonym ḥên has the double sense of favour and gracefulness. So Cov. 'bewtie'; Gen. 'grace'; and apparently Ja 1^{11} εὐπρέπεια. On the other hand, LXX gives δόξα; Vulg. 'gloria,' after which Wyc. and Dou. 'glorie,' and so the verse is quoted in 1 P 1^{24}: hence Lowth emends the Heb. to הוֹדוֹ, and Ewald to כְּבֹדוֹ (whom Briggs follows), getting 'the glory thereof,' which does not seriously alter the translation or the meaning. Salmond (on 1 P 1^{24}) happily illustrates the thought from Landor: 'There are no fields of amaranth on this side the grave; there are no voices, O Rhodopè, that are not soon mute, however tuneful; there is no name, with whatever emphasis of passionate love repeated, of which the echo is not faint at last.'

J. HASTINGS.

GOODMAN.—The ordinary word for a 'man' in Heb. (אִישׁ) is once trᵈ 'goodman' in AV, Pr 7^{19} 'the goodman is not at home.' This has passed from Cov. through the Bishops' to AV, and it is accepted by RV. The Gen. and Dou. have 'my husband is not at home'; and so Wyc. 1388, 'myn hosebonde is not in his hows'; but 1382, 'Thir is not a man in hir house,' after Vulg. 'Non est enim vir in domo sua.' This is exactly how the word 'goodman' has been used in Scotland from the beginning of written speech at least, and how it is in constant use still. Jamieson quotes from Douglas, Virgil, 255, 14—

> 'To Vulcanis hir husband and gudeman,
> Within his goldin chalmer scho began
> Thus for to speik.'

Once Shaks. uses the word in the same sense, putting it into the mouth of the low-born Christopher Sly, Taming of the Shrew, Ind. ii. 107—

> 'Sly. Where is my wife?
> Page. Here, noble lord: what is thy will with her?
> Sly. Are you my wife, and will not call me husband?
> My men should call me lord: I am your goodman.'

The word is found also in NT as trⁿ of οἰκοδεσπότης, 'master of the house.' This Gr. word occurs 12 times in the Synoptics and nowhere else (Mt 10^{25} $13^{27.52}$ $20^{1.11}$ 21^{33} 24^{43}, Mk 14^{14}, Lk 12^{39} 13^{25} 14^{21} 22^{11}: in the last passage τῆς οἰκίας is added). The Vulg. rendered by 'paterfamilias' everywhere except Mk 14^{14} 'dominus domus,' and so Wyc. gave 'housbond man' everywhere except Mk 14^{14} 'lord of the hous.' Tindale introduced the phrase 'goodman of the house,' using it everywhere except Mt 10^{25} 'lorde of the housse,' $13^{27.52}$ 20^{1} 21^{33} 'householder.' Cov. preferred 'good man of the house' in Mt 10^{25}, and 'householder' in 20^{11}; otherwise he followed Tind., whom the rest of the versions before the Rhemish copied exactly. The Rhem. gives 'householder' in Mt 13^{52} 20^{1} 21^{33}, Lk 12^{39}; 'master of the house' in Mk 14^{14}, Lk 14^{21}; elsewhere 'goodman of the house.' AV follows Tind. except in Mt 10^{25}, Lk 13^{25} 'master of the house.' The result is sometimes curious. Thus, as Trench points out, in the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard, the 'householder' of Lk 20^{1} becomes the 'goodman of the house' in 20^{11}. RV has redressed this anomaly, but still presents three different translations of the word, 'master of the house' in Mt 10^{25} 24^{43}, Lk 12^{39} 13^{25} 14^{21}; 'householder' in Mt $13^{27.52}$ $20^{1.11}$ 21^{33}; and 'goodman of the house' in Mk 14^{14}, Lk 22^{11}.

The word is a combination of 'good' and 'man' (not, says Skeat, a corruption of Anglo-Sax. gumman as suggested by Aldis Wright); and it is probable that the meaning 'master' arose from the meaning 'husband,' in which, it must be remembered, it is one of many similar combinations, as good-father, good-sister, etc.; in fact, all relatives by marriage were once so designated in England, and are still so designated in Scotland. How completely the adj. portion was swallowed up in the complete word * is illustrated by Trench countenance,' Gen. simply 'beautiful,' LXX again ἀγαθὴ τῷ εἴδει σφόδρα), and of Esther (Est 2^{7} יְפַת־תֹּאַר וְטוֹבַת מַרְאֶה, EV 'fair and beautiful,' AVm 'fair of form and good of countenance').

* The reading of most VSS and edd. is, 'Naphtali is a slender terebinth giving forth goodly boughs'; but G. A. Smith, in Expos. IV. Ser. vii. 166, prefers the MT, saying that it is 'beautifully expressive of a people in the position of Naphtali.'

* Being now one word, 'goodman' should be accented, as Earle remarks (Philology, p. 616), on the first syllable, like chapman, and so distinguished from the two separate words 'good man.' In AV of 1611, however, it is given as 'good man' everywhere except Pr 7^{19} and Lk 22^{11} where it is 'good-man.'

(On the AV of the NT, p. 96) in the line from Golding's Ovid, i.—

> 'The goodman seeks the goodwife's death.'

But it often furnished a word-play: Thus Cotgrave, Dict. s.v. 'Maistre'—'Also a title of honour (such as it is) belonging to all artificers, and tradesmen; whence Maistre Pierre, Maistre Jehan, etc.; which we give not so generally but qualify the meaner sort of them (especially in countrey townes) with the title of goodman (too good for many).' So Shaks. Twelfth Night, IV. ii. 141—

> 'Like a mad lad,
> Pare thy nails, dad;
> Adieu, goodman devil.'

And Fuller, Holy State, 'as he is called goodman, he desires to answer to the name, and to be so indeed.' Tindale uses the word once in the Pent., Ex 22^{8} 'the goodman of the housse shal be brought unto the goddes' (בַּעַל־הַבַּיִת, EV 'the master of the house'). Rutherford more than once describes Christ as 'the goodman of this house, His dear Kirk.' J. HASTINGS.

GOODNESS.—See GOOD and RIGHTEOUSNESS.

GOPHER WOOD (עֲצֵי־גֹפֶר 'ăẓê-gôpher, ξύλα τετράγωνα, ligna lævigata, Gn 6^{14}).—We have no clue from the etymology of the cognate dialects as to the kind of tree referred to. Celsius (Hierob. i. 328) argues that it is the cypress, from the similarity of sound between gopher and κυπάρισσος. Vossius argues that it was a resinous tree, from the similarity of sound between גֹּפֶר and כֹּפֶר 'resin.' Dillmann opposes Lagarde's view that גֹּפֶר is a contraction or clerical error for גָּפְרִית gophrîth='pitch.' In any case it was a wood suitable for shipbuilding, and the ark was constructed of it. In ZATW, 1898, Heft i. p. 163, Cheyne suggests that the cuneiform phrase which underlies Gn 6^{14} was misunderstood, but that some variety of cedar is intended. G. E. POST.

GORGET.—In 1 S 17^{6} Goliath is described as having 'a target of brass between his shoulders'; in the marg. it is a 'gorget.' The 'gorget' was a piece of armour for protecting the gorge or throat. Spenser has the word in FQ IV. iii. 12—

> 'His weasand-pipe is through his gorget cleft.'

And Jonson, Catiline, iv. 2 (Cæsar pointing to Cicero)—

> 'See how his gorget peers above his gown,
> To tell the people in what danger he was.'

Sir Walter Scott has it in Woodstock (Ch. I.), and in the Lay, v. 22—

> 'Undo the visor's barred band,
> Unfix the gorget's iron clasp,
> And give him room for life to gasp.'

J. HASTINGS.

GORGIAS (Γοργίας).—A general of Antiochus Epiphanes, who is described as 'a mighty man of the king's Friends' (1 Mac 3^{38}), and a captain who 'had experience in matters of war' (2 Mac 8^{9}). When Antiochus set out on his Parthian campaign (B.C. 166 or 165), his chancellor, Lysias, who was charged with the suppression of the revolt in Pal., despatched a large army to Judæa under the command of Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias. The Syrians met the Jews under Judas Maccabæus at the entrance to the hill-country of Judæa, and encamped at Emmaus. From this point G., with a body of 6000 men, attempted to make a night attack upon the Jews; but Judas, hearing of his advance, hastily quitted his camp, and, falling suddenly on the camp of the Syrians in the early morning, defeated them with great loss. When G. returned from a vain pursuit among the mountains, he found the Syrian camp on fire, and the Jews drawn up ready for battle; and, without risking an encounter, he fled to the Phil. country (1 Mac 3^{40}–4^{25}; Jos. Ant. XII. vii. 4; 2 Mac 8^{12-29}). From 2 Mac $10^{14ff.}$ it appears that G., who is described as commandant of the district (στρατηγὸς τῶν τόπων), remained in that country after his defeat, and continually harassed the Jews by means of his mercenary troops, assisted by the Idumæans. Two or three years later Judas led an expedition against Gilead, and, in the absence of his brothers, entrusted the command of the Jews to two officers, Joseph the son of Zacharias, and Azarias. Contrary to Judas' orders, they attacked the Syrians in Jamnia, but were repulsed by G. with heavy loss (1 Mac $5^{16ff. 55-64}$; Jos. Ant. XII. viii. 6). In 2 Mac 12^{32-37} this defeat is barely mentioned, but we are told how Judas defeated G., and how the accursed (τὸν κατάρατον) G. himself was nearly taken prisoner by a Jewish horseman named Dositheus. The description of G. in 2 Mac 12^{32} as 'governor of Idumæa' is perhaps an error for 'governor of Jamnia' (so Grotius, and cf. Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 8). H. A. WHITE.

GORTYNA (<εἰς> Γόρτυναν A, Γορτῦνα ℵV, 1 Mac 15^{23}).—The most important city in Crete, after Gnossus, situated about midway between the two ends of the island. After the successful embassy sent by Simon Maccabæus to Rome (B.C. 139), the Roman Senate drew up a decree in favour of the Jews, guaranteeing the independence of their territory. Among a number of small autonomous states and communes to which copies of the decree were sent, G. is mentioned. From this we may infer that Jewish residents were then to be found in Crete. For the evidence that G. was at that time an independent community, see Marquardt, Röm. Staatsver. i. 333 f. H. A. WHITE.

GOSHEN.—1. Named in connexion with the conquests of Joshua in the south of Judah (Jos 10^{41} 11^{16}, both D^{2}). Its exact situation has not been discovered. It was a district (אֶרֶץ), not a city. 2. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15^{51}, P). Its site is unknown. 3. See next article.

GOSHEN (גֹּשֶׁן city ?, Gn $46^{28. 29}$, the point at which Jacob aimed in going down into Egypt; and land of G., Gn 45^{10} 46^{28-34} $47^{1. 4. 6. 27}$ 50^{8}).—The country in Egypt in which Joseph proposed that his father and brethren should dwell during the famine, that they might profit by the wealth of Egypt, and be near to him (Gn 45^{10}), which Pharaoh accordingly granted to them (47^{6}), and in which the children of Israel remained, with their flocks and herds, through the oppression, until the Exodus (Ex 9^{26}, cf. 12^{32}). It was suitable for a pastoral tribe, which would be, as such, an abomination to the Egyptians (Gn 46^{34}). It evidently lay on the Syr. frontier (Gn 46^{28}), and was considered appropriate for the temporary settlement of foreigners. When it is described as 'the best of the land' (Gn 47^{6}), that was no doubt from a shepherd's point of view, and it is generally considered that the Pharaoh who welcomed Jacob to Egypt belonged to one of the foreign dynasties, known as the Hyksos or Shepherd dynasties, and who were themselves hated by the Egyptians. The LXX, made, it must be remembered, in Egypt, has important readings. 'In the land of G.' (Gn 45^{10}) is ἐν γῇ Γέσεμ Ἀραβίας, so also 46^{34}; in the later passages the defining word Ἀραβίας is dropped. In the Apocr. book of Judith ($1^{9. 10}$) γῇ Γέσεμ appears to be roughly all the borderland of Egypt E. of a line drawn from Tanis to Memphis, i.e. all the E. borderland of the Delta, with perhaps a good slice of the Delta itself, within the Pelusiac arm of the Nile. Acc. to the LXX the city of G. should be Heroopolis; Gn 46^{28} 'and he sent Judah before him unto Joseph, to show the way before him unto G.; and they came into the land of G.,' is simply συναντῆσαι αὐτῷ καθ' Ἡρώων πόλιν, εἰς γῆν Ῥαμεσσή, 'to meet him (Joseph) at Heroopolis, into the land of Ramesse'; and in the next verse '(Joseph went up to meet his father) to G.' καθ' Ἡρώων πόλιν, at Heroopolis. Hence we see that the Jewish view and tradition in the last centuries before Christ made the city of Heroopolis, near what was then the head of the Red Sea, the point at which Joseph met Jacob. Heroopolis is now fixed by Rom. milestones at Tell el-Mashkûta in the Wady Tumîlât, and is probably identical with Pithom. It was the first important station in Egypt on the S. road from Syria, and therefore a very likely place for such a meeting. But the city of G. can hardly have been identical with Heroopolis, even to the Jews; this mention of Heroopolis must rather perhaps be considered as the translators' improvement on the original.

The land of G. is to them the land of Gesem of Arabia. Now, from Ptolemy we know that Arabia was the name of a nome on the E. border of the Delta, with the capital Phacussa; and acc. to Strabo, Phacussa was the point at which the canal to the Red Sea branched from the Nile. At the spot which best answers to this description, viz. Saft el-Henneh, monuments have been found naming Per-Sopd and Ḳes, or Ḳesem. In the nome-lists of Ptolemaic times the xxth nome has the capital Per-Sopd, or Ḳesem, and is itself called Sopd. There can be no doubt that this is the nome of Arabia, and that Ḳesem is the equivalent of the LXX Gesem. In some cases the name of the city seems to be written Ḳes, which then can be at once identified with the principal element in the Gr. Phacussa. It would thus appear that Saft el-Henneh is the ancient Per-Sopd, Phacussa, Ḳes, and Ḳesem. There is, however, evidence of another kind that partly contradicts this. Farther N.E., beyond the entrance of the Wady Tumîlât, there is an important village called Fâḳûs, once capital of a large district corresponding to the Arab. nome, and identified by the later Copts with Phacussa. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the Arab. nome had two capitals—one Per-Sopd = Saft (el-Henneh), the other Ḳes or Ḳesem = Faḳûs. Strabo would then have confused the two capitals in making Phacussa instead of Per-Sopd the point at which the canal branched off. If Jacob aimed at reaching Faḳûs, he would probably have followed the N. route, close to the sea, since the S. route, to Heroopolis, would have taken him considerably out of his way. Why, then, does the LXX introduce Heroopolis for G.? It will be seen that the subject is still surrounded with almost incredible difficulties. When we know what ancient site was occupied by the modern Faḳûs, where considerable mounds still exist, it will be possible to speak with greater certainty.

With regard to the extent of the land of G., if Judith is to be taken as authoritative, it included at least four Egyptian nomes outside the Delta, viz. the Sethroite on the N.E. frontier, the Arab. and the Heliopolitan, and that of Heroopolis in the Wady Tumîlât. Possibly, however, it should be restricted to the Arab. nome, perhaps from about Belbeis to Faḳûs, although the Wady Tumîlât ought also to be included. By comparing Gn 47$^{4.\,6.}$ with ^{11} we find that the land of Ramesse and the land of G. are almost or quite identical.

It is, of course, possible that G. is an entirely foreign name, unknown to the ancient Egyptians, and that the LXX translators were only making conjectures as to its identification. Of two things we may be certain, that it lay on the E. border of the Delta, and furnished excellent pasture; and if it did not produce luxuriant harvests of corn and vegetables, like the ancient Arab. nome, we find that the Israelites dwelling there were at least plentifully supplied with 'leeks, onions, and garlic' (Nu 11^{5}). GOSPEL.—Anglo-Sax. Godspell = 'God story' (not 'good story'),—the tr., from Anglo-Sax. times, of εὐαγγέλιον in NT. In Homer, in the sing., and in Attic Gr., in the pl., it signified a reward or a thank-offering for good tidings. In later Gr. (Plutarch, in the pl., Lucian, in the sing.) it signified also the good tidings itself. In LXX, 2 S 4^{10}, the Attic meaning and the plural occur: in the two remaining instances (sometimes quoted for the sense good news), 2 K 18$^{22.\,25}$, it is probable that the non-classical fem. sing. εὐαγγελία ought to be read (cf. vv. $^{20.\,27}$, where this form is certain). In NT the neut. sing. alone is found (in Lk never; in Ac twice; in Rev once; in Jn—Gosp. and Epp. —never, whether subst. or vb.), and in the sense of good news only; a sense, moreover, always specialized, in accordance apparently with the Deutero-Isaian εὐαγγελίζομαι, as may be gathered from the quotation and comment in Ro 10$^{15.\,16}$, 'How beautiful are the feet τῶν εὐαγγελιζομένων ἀγαθά! But they did not all obey τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ.'

The content of this NT gospel had two stages. (1) In the mouth of Christ and of those whom, while He was on earth, He sent forth to proclaim it (Mt 10^{7}, Lk 9^{2} 10^{9} [Mk 16^{15}]), it was the good tidings of the kingdom of God (Mk 1$^{14.\,15}$, Mt 4^{23} 9^{35}) which He had come to establish; and this is called in Mk 1^{14} 'the good tidings of God,' i.e. coming from God (cf. 1 P 4^{17}); in Ac 20^{24} 'the good tidings of the free favour of God'; in 1 Ti 1^{11} 'the good tidings of (i.e. about) the glory (i.e. the manifested perfection) of the blessed God.' This good tidings about the kingdom Christ had also associated inseparably with His own person: Mk 8^{35} 10^{29} 'For my sake and the gospel's': hence it is likewise called in Mk 1^{1} 'the gospel of (i.e. about) Jesus Christ'; and thus it enters upon the second stage in its meaning.

(2) After Christ's death and resurrection it became the good tidings (not so much brought by, and proclaimed by, as) about Christ (cf. Ro 1^{1} 'The good tidings from God about [περί] His Son'); see 1 Co 9^{12}; also 'the good tidings of (about) the glory (the manifested perfection) of Christ,' 2 Co 4^{4}; or, simply, 'the good tidings,' 1 Co 9^{18}. So the apostolic (chiefly Pauline) use may be defined as the good tidings, coming from God, of salvation by His free favour through Christ. See Eph 1^{13} ('of our salvation'), Eph 6^{15} ('of peace'). Probably, though not so certainly as Weiss seems to think, the word (like our word preaching) sometimes expresses not so much the content itself as the act of proclaiming it: in this way we may perhaps explain the genitives of those who preach and those who hear in such passages as 2 Co 10^{14} 'We came as far as unto you in the gospel of Christ,' 2 Co 4^{3} 'our gospel,' Ro 2^{16} 16^{25} 'my gospel,' i.e. our, my, exposition of the gospel; and Gal 2^{7} 'I have been intrusted with the gospel (the preaching of the gospel) to the uncircumcision, even as Peter with the gospel to the circumcision'; not the content being different, but the sphere and the emphasis (cf. 1 Co 15^{11} 'Whether it be I or they, so we preach, and so ye believed'). In each of the passages where 'my gospel' or 'my preaching of the gospel' occurs, the writer appears, according to the context, to be laying stress on some particular point which it has been his way to expound with special fulness as having been emphatically borne in upon him at the time of his preaching, or as closely affecting the case of the people to whom he is writing. Thus Christ the Judge, the characteristic of the early missionary preaching (Ac 17[31]), is the element on which he lays stress in the 'our gospel' of 1 Th 1[5] (cf. vv.[7-10] and 2 Th 1[6-10]). Again, in Ro 2[16], after his theme has been the equal responsibility of Jew and Gentile as doers of law, he recalls his proclamation of the fact that God will judge by Jesus Christ all men alike, not by their outward situations but by their inward attitudes (τὰ κρυπτά). Once more, in 2 Ti 2[8], in order to encourage Timothy in the midst of suffering, the writer shows how, in 'his Gospel,' he lays stress upon the glorified state of Jesus the man and Christ the king,—king by royal descent and fulfilling prophetic anticipation. (Cf. 2 Co 4[3] τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἡμῶν, and v.[5] Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν Κύριον, the Lordship of the raised Christ being, in fact, the sum of the Pauline preaching, Ph 2[10]). In none of these passages is there a single sign that he is hinting at a specific difference in the content of the gospel preached by himself and by the Twelve.

The later sense of εὐαγγέλιον, a gospel in writing, and then one of the Four Gospels, does not appear in NT, though the way may be prepared for it by the usage in Mk 1[1] (see above). A second stage may be noted in the Didaché, c. xv.: 'Reprove one another, not in anger, but in peace, as ye have it in the gospel.' Here it seems to stand for a written body of Christian truth. Immediately afterwards we read: 'Your prayers and your alms and all your deeds so do ye as ye have it in the gospel of our Lord.' This might be a written collection of the teachings of Christ. Harnack—taking into account the text of the Lord's prayer (viii. 2), also said to be 'as the Lord commanded in his gospel,' and xi. 3, 'Touching the apostles and prophets, according to the ordinance (δόγμα) of the gospel so do ye'—suggests the Gospel of the Egyptians as the source (Texte ii. Proleg. 69 ff. and 79). The plural εὐαγγέλια, of the Four Gospels, does not occur till Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 66).

This article will be taken up mainly with the subject of the Origin and Composition of the Four Canonical Gospels and their credibility as historical witnesses. These are points which can best be discussed for the four together, owing to the nature of the evidence, which is in part the same, or of similar character for all, in part arises directly from comparing them. Such an assignment of the space at command will, nevertheless, be felt to be disproportionate when the manifold interest of the Gospels, their exquisite beauty, the richness of the moral and spiritual instruction which they convey, and their preciousness to the Church, are considered. Yet it is rendered inevitable by the recent course and present position of critical inquiry, and the intrinsic importance of the questions as to the authorship of the Gospels, their relations to one another, or the sources used in them. The amount of controversy which there has been on these subjects during the last 100 years has been enormous, and the evidence bearing on them is exceedingly complex. The attempt to discuss them, even with that degree of fulness which seems to be required in an article such as this, will render it impossible here to treat the Gospels from other points of view. At the same time, it ought to be remembered that there is hardly any aspect under which the Gospels may be regarded, which may not contribute some element that ought to be taken into account in a full appreciation of their character even as historical documents. In particular, it is necessary for this purpose that there should be a sympathetic and discerning study of their doctrinal teaching and of its relation to the faith of the early Church generally, as it may be gathered from other sources.

I. TRADITION AS TO AUTHORSHIP.—The first three Gospels do not within their actual compass (i.e. apart from the titles) give any precise indication of their authorship. As to the fourth, in a concluding passage which appears to be an addition to the original work, it is alleged to have been written by the disciple 'whom Jesus loved, which also leaned back on his breast at the supper' (cf. Jn 21[24] with v.[20]), and to whom other allusions of the same kind in the course of the work doubtless also refer.

It cannot be asserted that the titles κατὰ Μαθθαῖον, etc., proceeded from the authors themselves. The names rest, indeed, on as good MS evidence as any part of the text. But, from the nature of the case, they might have been prefixed at some time subsequent to the issue of the first copies. They unquestionably represent, however, the belief of the most important Churches before the time when Irenæus wrote the first three books of his great work on Heresies, which he composed during the episcopate of Eleutherus (circ. A.D. 175–190). For a general consideration of the evidence up to this time we must refer to the art. NT CANON. It must suffice here to say, (1) that although our four Gospels did not at once attain that position of unique authority which they held not long after the middle of the 2nd cent., yet it is easiest to explain the history of their reception in the Church on the supposition that they were authentic records of the apostolic age concerning the life and work of Jesus Christ, and that they were this to a degree of fidelity and fulness, in which no other documents even then existing could compare with them; and (2) that the testimony of tradition raises a strong presumption in favour of the belief that they had severally some real connexion with the men whose names they bear. The formulas themselves, κατὰ Μαθθαῖον, etc., or εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μαθθαῖον, etc., need not as first used have implied more than this. They would be compatible with the belief that the work in question contained virtually the teaching of the man specified, though he had not himself written it down.

Further than this the external evidence by itself will not take us; nevertheless, it furnishes an important element for the solution of the problem.

There are two or three more circumstantial traditions in regard to the composition of the Gospels which need to be mentioned, because they have, as we shall presently see, served to suggest or been used to confirm some of the chief theories designed to explain the internal phenomena of the Gospels. The most important are contained in two fragments, preserved in Eusebius' HE (iii. 39), of a work of Papias which may probably have been written about A.D. 140. Often as they have been quoted, it may be well to give them here. The first relates to a writing by Mark—

> 'This also the presbyter used to say: Mark having become the interpreter (ἑρμηνευτὴς γενόμενος) of Peter, wrote down accurately—not, however, in order (τάξει)—as many as he remembered of the things either spoken or done by Christ. For he neither heard the Lord nor attended on Him, but afterwards, as I said, (attended on) Peter, who used to give his instructions according to what was required, but not as giving an orderly exposition (σύνταξιν) of the Lord's words. So that Mark made no mistake in writing down some things as he recalled them. For he paid heed to one point, namely, not to leave out any of the things he had heard, or to say anything false in regard to them.'

The second fragment is as follows—

> 'Matthew, however, wrote the Oracles in the Hebrew tongue, and every man interpreted them as he was able.'

The presbyter, on whose authority the former of these statements is made, was named John; and though he is to be distinguished from the apostle of that name, he was a companion of apostles and a personal follower of the Lord. Papias himself had conversed with this man, as we learn from another fragment (ib.). And from what we are told in that fragment as to the means by which Papias gathered information, it is reasonable to suppose that his statement as to Matthew's record was derived from the same or a similar source.

The more extreme critics of the earlier part of the present century used to argue that these accounts could not refer to our second and first Gospels. It is, however, coming to be admitted very widely among students of early Christian history that the statements in question would, at least at the time when Papias was writing, be connected with our Mt and Mk; for it is hard to imagine that these could in the interval between that time and the third quarter of the 2nd cent. have been substituted for other works bearing the same names, and could have completely expelled such predecessors. This, however, does not preclude the possibility that there may have been differences greater or less between the writings to which Papias referred the traditions preserved by him and the works concerning which the statements under consideration had been originally made. There was more particularly room for difference between the Greek Gospel according to Mt and the Hebrew work spoken of, which would not be readily detected owing to the general ignorance of Hebrew among Greek-speaking Christians. The description given of the work seems to point to a record in which discourses and sayings of Jesus decidedly predominated over mere narrative. The word λόγια, indeed, means 'oracles' and not 'discourses.' But while the term 'the oracles' might well from the first have been applied to our Lord's words, it is hardly likely that it should so early have been applied to a writing of the NT as such. Moreover, even when the inspiration of the NT had come to be as clearly recognized as that of the OT, the term 'the oracles' would not have been a fitting one for a single work, simply on the ground that it formed part of the collection.

Passing by Lk, concerning the composition of which tradition has nothing very significant to tell us, we subjoin an interesting statement regarding Jn. Clement of Alexandria relates (ap. Euseb. HE vi. 14), as a tradition handed down from the elders of former times, 'that John last of all, perceiving that the outward facts had been set forth in the Gospels, being urged on by his friends and inspired by the Spirit, composed a spiritual gospel.'

II. INTERNAL PHENOMENA.—Thus far we have spoken of the evidence supplied by tradition. It remains to be seen to what extent this confirms or is confirmed by the characteristics of the Gospels themselves. We proceed, therefore, in the first place, to consider the signs of relationship between the first three Gospels and the manner in which these are to be accounted for, or in other words the Synoptic Problem.

i. The Synoptic Problem.—(1) The facts to be explained. On comparing the first three Gospels, we observe in them a remarkable amount of similarity, both in the substance, the general arrangement and the precise order of their narratives, and the actual words and phrases employed. The general view of the course of events given in these Gospels is almost exactly the same, from the ministry of the Baptist onwards, the subject with which Mk opens. Not only so, but to a great extent they omit the same and record the same deeds and discourses and incidents. This common character becomes specially noticeable when we compare them with Jn, the contents of which are widely different; and the suitability of the name Synoptic, which has been given to the first three, comes home to us with special force when that contrast with the Fourth is borne in mind. Nevertheless, even had we possessed the first three only, the amount of agreement between them would have called for explanation. For they are very brief accounts of a very full though comparatively short life. Moreover, they all make summary references to journeyings, periods of preaching and teaching, the working of many miracles of which they relate no details. The fact that out of all this possible material they preserve so largely the same selection, and that they deliver it so nearly in the same form, must be due to some cause or causes.

So far we have spoken in general terms of the resemblances between the first three Gospels. But, in the closer study of the fact, resemblances between pairs of them have also to be taken into account. The two most important groups of phenomena are in fact (a) the resemblances of Mk with Mt and Lk, either together or separately, and (b) the wholly additional matter common to Mt and Lk, but not contained in Mk.

(a) With regard to the former, it is to be observed that by far the larger number of the narratives and pieces of discourse contained in Mk are given also in both Mt and Lk, and nearly all in either one or the other. Also that for the most part the order of narrative is the same in all three; so that we may speak of a Synoptic outline. The exceptions are somewhat more considerable in Lk than in Mt; but it is noteworthy that they are almost entirely different in the two. Further, the same mode of relating incidents, conversations, and sayings is frequently to be observed in all three, to the extent even of the same sequence of clauses, the same words and phrases being adopted; but, even where this is not the case, there is very frequently similar close parallelism between Mk and one of the others; and, as before, this holds most often between Mt and Mk.

(b) The additional matter, referred to above, which is common to Mt and Lk, consists for the most part of discourses and sayings. In a considerable portion of it the resemblance even in language is very great; in other parts of larger total extent the similarity of form is noticeably less, though the substance is the same. In place, however, of that similarity of order which we remarked upon in the case of the relations of Mt and Lk with Mk, we find in that of the matter now under consideration a great diversity of arrangement. In Mt we seem to see a disposition to mass it in discourses of some length, while in Lk various portions of it are given as belonging to various occasions. Again, they combine it very differently with the Synoptic outline.

Besides the features which have been mentioned, there are some others that are less strongly marked, of which it will be most convenient to defer the notice till we have occasion to speak of the attempts which have been made to explain them, and which have served to fix attention on them. It is, indeed, true of those broader characteristics also, which have been described, that the clear and accurate observation of them has progressed hand in hand with the discussion of their causes. And it is one of the most certain gains to be expected from the study of the problem before us, that (whether we succeed in solving it or not) we cannot fail, through framing and testing our hypotheses, to become better acquainted with the actual contents of the Gospels, and to have both their common substance and their individual traits imprinted more deeply upon our minds.

We will proceed to take a rapid survey of the theories that have been devised to account for the phenomena.

(2) The theories that have been propounded.—Explanations of three kinds may be employed, while the principles involved in each may also be in various ways combined. The three chief kinds were all in one way or another tried within the first 30 years, from the time when, rather more than a century ago, active speculation on the subject began.

(a) Direct dependence of one or of two of our present Gospels on the third, or of one on both the other two, might be assumed. This was the simplest kind of explanation of resemblances between them that could be given, and that which therefore lay most ready to hand. It had been employed by Augustine long before in one of the earliest examples of an interest, which was but momentary, in the literary criticism of the Gospels (De Consensu Evangelistarum, i. 2). He speaks of Mark as the 'pedisequus et breviator' of Matthew. When, however, towards the latter part of the 18th cent. the critical study of the relations of the Gospels to one another began in earnest, the theory was also put forward that Mk's was the original Gospel, which the others had expanded, while some even claimed this position for Lk. But the most celebrated theory of this period was Griesbach's, according to which Mk was regarded as a compilation from both Mt and Lk (Commentatio quâ Marci evangelium totum e Matthæi et Lucæ commentariis descriptum esse monstratur, A.D. 1789–90).

(b) Resemblances might be traced to the use of common documents, and more room was left in this way than by the last kind of explanation for the differences between the Gospels to have arisen, which are remarkably intermingled with their resemblances. Eichhorn, whose twofold hypothesis was for a long time the most notable one of the type which we are now considering, made special efforts to account for the differences. He supposed that there was one chief document, an Urevangelium, or primitive Gospel, to which various additions, derived from oral teaching, were made as time went on. The sections common only to two Gospels were explained by two evangelists having used the same copy. These were the governing ideas of his theory, both in its earlier and later form. At first (A.D. 1794) he attributed the differences between the Synoptic Gospels to the translation of the primitive Gospel by different persons (the evangelists themselves and others), and the verbal similarities to the use in part of the same translations by the evangelists, along with different ones and with the original. But the process here imagined of translation and of the cross use of other translations was felt to be too complicated. It was difficult, also, in this way to account for the large amount of the same or closely similar language. This pointed to a common Greek basis. Accordingly Eichhorn, in a revised form of his theory, assumed a single translation of the primitive Aramaic Gospel into Greek, and supposed this Greek document to have received additions and modifications, extending in his imagination the operation of this cause of variations, to make up for that of a multiplicity of translations which he had abandoned.

(c) The common source was supposed to be an oral tradition to which a high degree of fixity had been given. Oral tradition could readily account for differences. But could it account for the strange resemblances? A theory based on it could claim to be scientific only in so far as it could suggest and render probable the existence of special historical conditions in the case in question, which would make it natural that the tradition should be characterized by a fixity of form approximating to that of a written document, though still possessing somewhat greater pliability. Such a theory seems to have been first conceived, and was certainly first clearly set forth, by J. C. L. Gieseler, the celebrated Church historian, in his Historisch-kritischer Versuch über die Entstehung und die fruehesten Schicksale der schriftlichen Evangelien (A.D. 1818). Most of those who have found in oral tradition the key to explain the characteristics of the Synoptic Gospels, have, if they have shown any just appreciation of the nature of the problem to be solved, reproduced in the main very closely the features of Gieseler's conception and his arguments. There was not room in this case for the same diversity as in the forms which could be given to the hypotheses of direct dependence and of common documents. At the same time, even the oral theory has been to some extent elaborated since Gieseler's time to meet a fuller analysis of the phenomena.

The name which must be mentioned next, in order that the course which investigation into the origin of the Gospels has actually followed may be rightly apprehended, is that of the great Schleiermacher. Instead of Eichhorn's single parent document, he assumed a number of more or less extensive compilations of narratives, the idea of which, and his name for them (διηγήσεις), he took from Lk 1^1. This theory, which has been called Diegesentheorie, he put forth in his work on Lk (1817). The view, however, of his which has exercised a determining influence on subsequent criticism is not this, but his interpretation of the fragment of Papias concerning Mt, published in SK (1832). It was to the effect that Matthew put together only a collection of discourses and sayings which was afterwards embodied in our Mt. Next very naturally came the suggestion that this document was the source also of the matter in the third Gospel which it has in common with the first, and which is not in the second. And we find this view more or less clearly indicated by Credner (1836) in his Einleitung (§§ 87–89 and 91, pp. 201–206). He supposes also that the reminiscences of Peter's teaching alluded to in the other fragments of Papias were worked up by another writer into our Mk (ib. § 90).

The step most needed, however, in order that any decided progress should be made in solving the Synoptic problem was, that a clearer and juster view than had so far prevailed of the relations between Mk and the other two Synoptics should be attained. And the way to this had already been opened by C. Lachmann in his article, 'De Ordine Narrationum in Evangeliis Synopticis,' in SK p. 570 ff., 1835. He contended for the 'priority' of Mk, though he left open the question whether it was prior in the sense of representing an earlier form of the oral Gospel than the two others, or as having more simply and fully embodied a document used by the other two. C. H. Weisse, in his Die Evangelische Geschichte (1838), adopted the latter alternative, and combined with it the view that, along with this document, Matthew's 'Logia' was also used both in our first and our third Gospel. Here for the first time was that 'two-document hypothesis' which has since, and especially during the last 40 years or so, found so much favour. In the same year as that in which the above-named epoch-making book of Weisse's appeared, C. G. Wilke published a work on the theme, Matthäus oder Marcus, in which he did good service on behalf of Mk's priority, and of the documentary as against the oral hypothesis.

Nevertheless, the Tübingen School, which was just then rising into importance, and which for a considerable period held the most prominent place in the world of criticism, so far as Christian Origines were concerned, had committed themselves to the position that Mt was the first and Mk the last of the Synoptics. Later members of the school gave up the priority of Lk, but not of Mt. In the method of this school, the examination of the simple literary phenomena of the Gospels played only a very subordinate part. So far as these critics discussed the Gospels themselves and compared them, their object was chiefly to show how the several Gospels, by virtue of their individual characteristics, fitted in with and illustrated their own more general theories as to parties among the early Christians, and their tendencies. They endeavoured to distinguish the bias of each writer which had led him to mould the narrative in a particular way; and on the ground thereof they assigned to each document its age and the measure of historical importance which they were willing to accord it. They insisted in an exaggerated way on the peculiarities of the several Gospels, and drew unwarranted inferences therefrom; nevertheless, their work may be of use in preventing us from overlooking the individuality of the several Gospels, which in some other speculations is too much ignored.

The disposition of this school was to proceed to broad generalizations which had neither been reached nor verified by a careful and impartial examination of all the facts. In spite of the great ability of the chief men among them, and the permanent mark which they have left upon the study of early Christian history, their theories have in the main been overthrown, and that largely by men almost as 'free' as themselves from orthodox prepossessions. And in no respect has this been more signally the case than in regard to their criticism of the Synoptic Gospels.

The chief critical work of the last 40 years or so has been the lineal continuation and development of that of Weisse and Wilke. That is, the general tendency of it has been to establish more firmly the position that either the three Synoptic Gospels all made large use of a document which is to be seen with fewest additions, omissions, or changes of any kind in Mk; or that Mk itself is virtually that document; and further, that there existed another very early 'source,' a collection mainly of discourses and sayings, to which the matter common to Mt and Lk is to be traced.

Among the large number of critics, however, who would agree in these propositions when stated thus in general terms, there are not unimportant differences. The most considerable, perhaps, is that while (α) many, agreeing with Weisse, suppose that both the first and third evangelist had and used this collection in the same, or substantially the same form, and that the diversity in the mode of the presentation of the common matter in the Gospels is due to the different treatment of the same document by the two evangelists, (β) there are others who suppose that the collection must have come into the hands of the third in a markedly different form from that in which the first had it. The former view is that which has been most before the world: it is held by H. J. Holtzmann (Die Synoptischen Evangelien, 1863; Einleitung in NT, 1886), B. Weiss (Marcus-Evang. 1872; Matthäus-Evang. 1876; Leben Jesu, 1882; Einleitung, 1886), H. Wendt (Lehre Jesu, 1886), and others. But some eminent names may be cited on the side of the second view,—Reuss (Hist. of NT, p. 190 ff.), Lipsius (his views on the Synoptic problem are described by his pupil Feine, JB für Protest. Theol. 1885, pp. 1, 2). Weizsäcker may be said to hold an intermediate position (Untersuch. pp. 129–220).

Differences there are, also, among critics of the former of these two groups. One of the chief of these relates to the question whether the 'Logia' is most faithfully reproduced, especially as to order and arrangement, in Mt or Lk. Holtzmann and Wendt are on the side of Lk, B. Weiss of Mt. There are differences, again, as to the character and contents of the 'Logia.' Thus Holtzmann traces to it some portions of Lk which are peculiar to that Gospel as well as those common to Lk and Mt; while Weiss insists that historical circumstances must have been narrated in it as well as discourses.

Another important subject of controversy relates to the part of Mark, the disciple of Peter, in the composition of our second Gospel. In B. Weiss' view, Mark's Gospel, derived chiefly from his reminiscences of Peter's teaching, was itself the document used (along with the 'Logia') by our first and third evangelists. On the other hand, the matter common to the three Synoptics may be supposed to be derived from a document older than any one of them. This only leaves room for Mark to have introduced touches here and there. Again, B. Weiss supposes that Mark himself (as well as the first and third evangelists) made use of the 'Logia,' though to a much more limited extent, and that thus the first and third used the 'Logia' both directly and also in a measure mediately through Mk. But for this complicated theory he has found few adherents. [Resch (Agrapha, p. 27 f.) and Titius (Theol. Studien in honour of Weiss, Göttingen, 1897) may be mentioned as adopting it.]

Other critics, again, hold that the third evangelist must have known and to some degree made use of our Mt as well as his principal and older sources. Such arguments as may be adduced for this view have been most fully set forth by E. Simons in his monograph, Hat der dritte Evangelist den kanonischen Matthäus benützt? 1880.

The endeavour has also been made in recent times to supplement the theories as to the relations of the Synoptic Gospels by tracing back varieties of form to different translations of the oldest Hebrew document. This attempt has especially been carried out by A. Resch in his laborious investigations, in the course of which he examines the citations of our Lord's teaching in the whole range of early Christian literature, and compares them with parallels in the Gospels. See his

'Agrapha' in Texte u. Untersuch, v. Heft 4, 1889; and Aussercanon. Paralleltexte, x. Heft 1 and 3, 1893-95.

In England the oral theory has been far more widely accepted than it seems ever to have been in Germany, though among ourselves also it has, to a considerable degree, lost its hold in recent years. English readers will, however, rightly require that it should be kept in view in any discussion of the problem. The most recent advocate of it is the Rev. A. Wright (see his Composition of the Four Gospels, 1890; Synopsis of the Gospels, 1896; and Problems in NT, 1898). He has given to the theory a new development by supposing that the catechetical instruction of Christians in the facts of the Gospel history was carried out in a very systematic manner, and that there existed different schools of catechists. To the present writer it seems that no form of the oral hypothesis can furnish an adequate explanation of the phenomena of the Gospels; yet he believes that the influence of the period of oral teaching needs to be taken into account, in dealing with the whole problem of the origin of the four Gospels, far more than it commonly is by the adherents of the various documentary hypotheses.

The decision of most of the questions included in the subject before us must depend on the patient examination of a mass of particulars which cannot be set forth here. But it may be well to indicate in general terms the nature and bearing of the evidence on some of the chief points at issue. We pass on, therefore, to consider—

(3) The Source or Sources of the matter and order common to the three Synoptic Gospels.—It will not be profitless, in the first place, briefly to give the reasons for which Griesbach's theory has been generally abandoned. That theory is at first sight tempting. It seems to account readily for the fact that not only do we find in Mk so much that is common also to Mt and Lk, but that traits and words and expressions which occur, some in Mt, some in Lk, in narratives that are parallel, are frequently found in combination in Mk; so that this Gospel, while it is on the whole shorter, is generally fuller in the narratives it does contain. It is not impossible that in some, and even a good many cases, words, etc., from Mt or Lk may have been introduced, e.g. by the hand of an editor, into the second Gospel as we have it. But the theory of compilation cannot explain the phenomena as a whole. For (a) to carry out the process of analysis and combination to the extent required by this hypothesis would be a very complicated and difficult task, such as no one, especially in that age, would be likely to undertake. The supposition that Mt and Lk reproduced Mk, or the document embodied therein, with some abbreviations and alterations which are largely different because they acted independently, is a far simpler one. Moreover, it accounts for a large part of the similarity between Mt and Lk themselves, which, on Griesbach's theory, is left wholly unexplained. (b) The reasons that can be alleged, on Griesbach's theory, for Mk's relinquishing the order of narratives in Mt to follow Lk, and vice versâ, and for his omission of so much which those Gospels contain, though he is supposed in other cases to have combined them, appear to be very arbitrary. (c) A mere compiler could hardly have been able to give to his work the force and freshness and vividness which peculiarly characterize Mk.

We turn to the question whether the chief source common to the three was a certain tradition of oral teaching or a document. In judging of the adequacy of the former to account for the facts, it seems important, first of all, to distinguish between the effect which oral teaching might have, on the one hand, in determining the general character of the selection and presentation of the matter recorded, and, on the other hand, in securing a fixed order of sequence in the relation of particular incidents and pieces of discourse. Now, the contents and general form of the Synoptic outline, as we see it most simply in Mk, is such as might naturally arise from the circumstances and needs of the preaching of the gospel, as soon as its message was delivered to those who had not themselves known Jesus. In the earliest days after Pentecost, among the people of Jerusalem and the crowds from Galilee to whom the great Prophet of Nazareth had been a familiar figure, it was enough for the apostles to testify that He had risen from the dead. Even to a man like Cornelius, whom the fame of His deeds could not but have reached in a more or less distinct and accurate form, it might be enough to say, 'The word which he sent unto the children of Israel, preaching good tidings of peace by Jesus Christ (he is Lord of all)—that saying, ye yourselves know, which was published throughout all Judæa, beginning from Galilee, after the baptism which John preached; even Jesus of Nazareth, how that God anointed him with the Holy Ghost and with power; who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed with the devil; for God was with him. And we are witnesses of all things which he did, both in the country of the Jews and in Jerusalem; whom also they slew, hanging him on a tree' (Ac 10^{36-39}). But more and more, as years passed, and as the gospel was carried to fresh circles, men would wish to have particulars about the life and work of Jesus; and it would be necessary that a right impression of Him and His ministry should be imparted, in order that the meaning of His cross and resurrection should be in any measure understood. For this purpose an expansion would be needed of that brief summary which has just been quoted. The preachers would seek to set before their hearers in a comprehensive manner, and within such limits as oral teaching imposed, a view of the person of Jesus in its attractive grace and holiness and goodness, as He had been known to themselves and to the multitudes who followed Him, to enable them to realize His supernatural character, as it was evidenced by His wonder-working power, and the authority with which He spake. A detailed chronicle was not what was wanted; they wished simply to impart a clear conception of His mission and His credentials. The desired end could be best attained by a sketch which should give prominence to the salient features of His work, and which, while it contained some comprehensive descriptions of His occupations at different periods, and of the impression produced by His teaching and miracles, and marked a few chief epochs in His ministry, should be confined, for the rest, to an account of some important incidents and sayings, selected as examples out of a mass of others that might have been told. When they passed to the last days of His life, and His death, the mode of treatment would naturally be different. Here it would be no longer a question merely of illustrations. Besides all other reasons for giving a fuller narrative, such as the natural interest of the closing scenes, and the deep impression which all their details had made on the minds and hearts of the preachers themselves, it was necessary to press home and to justify the idea of a suffering Messiah. In addition to these aims, which tended to impart a particular form to the accounts orally delivered, the close intercourse maintained among the original group of Christian missionaries, even after they had begun to move about, and the similarity of the conditions under which this group at least was doing its work, and the influence which a few of the stronger characters would exert, together with the simplicity of mind and want of general education of the early disciples, would tend to establish and confirm a habit of telling the story in a particular way common to them all.

Now, the general mode of presenting the life and work of Jesus Christ in the Synoptic Gospels corresponds to that which has just been described. In other words, it is such as we might have expected, if the characteristics of the oral method of communicating the facts most needful to be known came to be imprinted on the written narrative. The form of the common record is not that which would have been naturally adopted by a writer who approached his subject and made use of his materials in the spirit and manner of a chronicler or biographer.

The range of the parallelism between the Synoptics must be considered in this connexion. The fact that it begins with the ministry of the Baptist may well be accounted for by all three having used a document which began thus. But even so, the cause of this being made the starting-point in such a document seems worthy of consideration, especially when we observe how that of the apostolic preaching as described in Acts was wont to be the same (cf. Ac 1^{22} $13^{24.25}$). We can understand that it was a natural one for those who had such an aim as has been above suggested. The mystery of Christ's birth could not be freely spoken of at first to the unconvinced. On the other hand, the testimony of His great predecessor, whose work had made such a wide impression, afforded a fitting point of departure for commending Jesus to the faith of men. In this respect also, then, the habits of the period of oral teaching seem to have left their mark.

Considerations which are in part analogous may help also to explain why the parallelism between the Synoptics terminates where it does in the midst of the evidences of the resurrection. All three describe in a very similar manner the visit of the women to the tomb, and the appearance of the angel (Lk two angels) to them. After this point they differ widely. The assumption that they used a common document, which ended abruptly here, will go far to account for this. Still it is remarkable that it should have terminated in this fashion, and also that the difference in the concluding narratives should be so wide as it is. The early history of the preaching of the gospel may possibly again furnish a clue to the right explanation. At first the apostles were mainly occupied with bearing testimony to the resurrection of Jesus. They were themselves profoundly convinced of this great fact, and they called upon men to believe it on their word. They did not care to enter upon an elaborate tabulation of all His appearances; such would not be demanded of them. They would speak now of one, now of another. Subsequently, as we have said, the need for some account of the life and teaching and death of Jesus arose. The two things were in a measure distinct, and might for a time be kept so. Moreover, a certain method of narration might, under the conditions which we have indicated, have been commonly observed in the latter case, such as may never have existed in regard to the testimony to His resurrection.

The correspondences between the Synoptics in words and phrases show that they are connected by derivation from common sources of information, which were in Greek. This, however, does not of itself put the oral theory out of court, though it has sometimes been supposed to do so. For when we remember that the Aramaic-speaking territory in Palestine was surrounded by a belt of Greek-speaking districts, and also that many Hellenists yearly visited Jerusalem, we can see that from very early days—from the moment, indeed, that the Church began to expand—an oral tradition in Greek must have arisen, corresponding to that in Aramaic.

The resemblance, however, between the three Synoptic Gospels extends far beyond those broad features of which above we have so far been speaking. If the additional matter in Mt and Lk be omitted, there will be found remaining in each of them, with, comparatively speaking, very few exceptions, the contents of Mk given in exactly the same order,—the same sequence being maintained not merely in respect to events which stood in close historical connexion, but also in respect to sections which do not appear to have been so united. This seems clearly to point to the use of a common document. It is specially difficult to understand how, after insertions, sometimes of considerable length, the common thread could again and again have been taken up in the first and third Gospels exactly where it had been dropped, solely under the operation of tradition. But it is exactly what would happen if the writers had a document before them.

A comparison of the language, the words, the succession of clauses, the structure of sentences and paragraphs in the Synoptic Gospels, leads to the same conclusion. The extent of the element common to all three is remarkable. But, in order that the evidence bearing on the question at issue may be appreciated, it is necessary that attention should be fixed, not so much on this, as on the resemblance of Mt and Lk separately to Mk. Between these pairs, and especially between Mt and Mk, there will be found to be close similarity, amounting frequently to identity, saving a few words here and there, in sentence after sentence and passage after passage. Moreover, the character of the resemblances should be noted. We can understand that even in oral tradition striking sayings should have been preserved in a fixed form; and there would be special reason for fidelity in repeating all the teaching of the Lord. But there is also in the Synoptic Gospels an amount of close agreement in ordinary narration which is very difficult to explain by oral transmission, because there could be no sufficient motive for the care necessary to secure it.

Advocates of the oral theory allege the retentiveness of Eastern memories, and the habit of preserving orally the Rabbinic traditions, or the instances, common among Mohammedans, of being able to repeat the whole or large portions of the Koran. But it should be remembered that what has to be explained in the present case is, not the preservation of a record after its very words had come to be regarded as sacred, but the process itself of forming the fixed tradition. Could it have been fixed down to so many mere turns of expression as the result of the work of the apostles' teaching and preaching freely? And would either they or their immediate fellow-workers in instructing others have had any reason to insist on the reproduction of what they taught with that sort of uniformity?

Again, it is said that the oral theory alone will account for the differences between the Gospels. But the force of this argument seems to depend on adopting a point of view which is too much that of our own time. The writers of our Gospels would feel themselves to be far more nearly on a level with those of the documents (assuming that they had such before them) which they used, than men of later generations could. And it is the natural tendency of historians who embody matter from other writings in their own works to abbreviate parts of it, to improve the style, or at least to alter it in accordance with their own habits of expression, and at times, after picturing to themselves the scenes described, to represent them in their own way. Many of the differences between Mk and the two other Synoptic Gospels are of this character. This is especially the case in regard to Lk, the differences between which and Mk are, as has been said, the greatest. Moreover, even in the case of intentional quotation, there was in ancient times less desire for scrupulous accuracy in regard to the exact words used than there is at the present day.

(4) The Source or Sources of the matter common to Mt and Lk.—The phenomena here are in various respects different from those examined under the last head, and other considerations have to be applied to them. The material in question forms such a distinct mass that even on the oral hypothesis it must be supposed to have been collected and shaped separately from that account of the life and work of Christ upon which our attention has so far been fixed, and to have been subsequently in the first and third Gospels combined therewith. And indeed we may, with at least as good reason as before, attribute an important share to the influences of the period of oral teaching in forming the body of tradition now in question, though the needs to be met were different from those which called forth a general presentation of our Lord's work. Disciples who were familiar with the main facts of His life would be impelled to recur again and again to His precepts, which were to be the guide and support of their lives. Those sayings especially would be called to mind and repeated which set forth the character that was to distinguish the true followers of Christ, or which gave an authoritative decision in matters of ordinary conduct, or which inculcated the spirit that was to govern the members of the infant Christian communities in their relations with one another, or prescribed the rules that were to guide the missionaries of the gospel, or which afforded a solace and stay under persecution and sorrow, or, lastly, which spoke of that great consummation, that coming of the Lord and judgment upon an evil world, for which their hearts yearned so eagerly. In view of these wants, it would be exceedingly probable that sayings, parables, and discourses upon these themes should soon come to be put together and handed on in the shape of larger or smaller collections even before they were written down (cf. Weizsäcker, Apost. Zeitalter, pp. 369–401). They would form, as it were, a body of divine law, treasured in the communities of Christians. The form and contents of the discourses in Mt specially suggest this origin. Other traits appear in Lk which would also be natural after such a history of the preservation of the material.

But can the resemblances between these two Gospels be explained solely on the oral theory? Those who think so have a stronger case here than in regard to the resemblances between the same Gospels and Mk. There the close parallelism between the sequence of sections furnished a strong argument against that theory; here the great dissimilarity of arrangement is a serious difficulty in the way of the hypothesis that the same document was used by both evangelists. There, again, the similarity is found in ordinary narrative; here the matter in question consists almost entirely of Christ's own teaching, which would be likely to be preserved with special accuracy even in oral repetition. Nevertheless, there is in a considerable portion of the passages under consideration an amount of verbal agreement which it is hard to account for without supposing some intervention of writing.

By those who suppose that the use of a single documentary source, which contained all this matter, will explain the phenomena, efforts are made to reconstruct that document through a critical comparison of Mt and Lk. In each it may certainly have been altered in different ways and at different points; and it will be fair to remember that the divergence between the two Gospels, as they now lie before us, would in all probability be greater than that between either of them and the common source. Further, many pieces of teaching in it may have been introduced by formulas such as 'Jesus said,' which specified no particular occasion. The recently discovered Oxyrhynchus fragment affords an illustration of sayings so compiled. The very different positions which the same sayings occupy in the first and third Gospels may thus be less inconsistent with their derivation from a common document than we at first fancy. Possibly, it would not have been necessary for either of the evangelists to do such violence to the source as we may be inclined at first to fancy, in pursuing different plans in the arrangement of their material. That the first was inclined to mass together similar material, seems to be rendered probable by the fact that there are one or two cases in which pieces of teaching from Mk and from another source seem to have been woven together in Mt, which in Lk remain separate. Thus Lk has an account of a charge to the Twelve (9^{3-6}) which is closely parallel to Mk 6^{8-13}. He has also an address to the Seventy in ch. 10. Now, the substance of vv.$^{3-12}$ of the latter is found woven with the substance of Mk 6^{8-13} in Mt 10^{7-16}. Something of the same kind may perhaps be observed on comparing Mt 24. 25, Mk 13^{1-37}, Lk 21^{5-36} 17^{22-37} 12^{39-46} 19^{12-28}. Yet, to show how cautious we must be in drawing inferences, it may be worth while to observe that in Lk 10^{12-15} compared with Mt 10^{15} and 11^{20-24}, the usual parts, so to speak, of the two evangelists are reversed.

In connexion with the question before us, the greater or less clearness and naturalness of the contexts in which the same sayings occur in Mt and Lk respectively must also be taken into account. But this is a subject on which there is wide diversity of view. To the present writer it seems that the connexions are far more often obscure and difficult in Lk than in Mt. But however this may be, and when every allowance has been made which our ignorance of the actual form of the common document may suggest, it remains very difficult to believe either, on the one hand, that any one in the circle in which the first Gospel must have been composed should have employed the amount of literary art and labour necessary to construct the discourses found in that Gospel out of fragments; or that, on the other hand, the third evangelist, if he had those wholes before him, should have felt it to be his duty to break them up.

Moreover, the hypothesis that the two evangelists derived all this matter from the same document, is as incapable as the oral theory of explaining the singular phenomenon referred to above as to the degree of agreement in different parts (see i. (1) (b)). For the character of the subject-matter in the two classes of parallel passages affords no reason for either evangelist having preserved it with so much less fidelity in the one case than in the other. It would seem to be more possible to account for the facts by supposing that two compilations which had in the main an independent history, though copies of some of the same written fragments have passed into each, have been embodied in the first and third Gospels respectively.

(5) Some subsidiary features of relationship.—There are no groups of facts indicative of connexion between the Synoptic Gospels, or between pairs of them, which are at all comparable in extent and prominence with those discussed under the two last headings. A few others, however, which need investigation must be briefly noticed.

(a) In spite of the signs of 'priority' in Mk on the whole, there are cases in which Mt or Lk or both of them have a stronger appearance of originality in particular words, or turns of expression, and even in the character of a whole section. Mk 1^{40-45} 2^{1-12} 3^{1-6}, compared with their parallels, may be taken as examples. Similarly, there are instances in which Mk has words or phrases not like his usual style, and which occur more frequently in one or both the others (e.g. ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς in Mk 11^{25}=Mt 6^{14}. It appears only here in Mk, but is common in Mt).

(b) Again, although the records of Christ's teaching are so much more limited in Mk than in Mt and Lk, that Gospel has, in certain cases, accounts of discourses which, so far as they extend, are closely parallel with Mt and Lk; at the same time, the accounts of these two are longer and, to a greater or less degree, parallel with one another. Here, plainly, Mk is not the source, and does not in all respects most fully represent it (e.g. cf. Mk $1^{7.8}$ with Mt 3^{7-12} and Lk 3^{7-17}; Mk 3^{22-30} with Mt 12^{24-37} and Lk 11^{15-26} and 12^{10}).

(c) In narratives in which Mt and Lk are on the whole closely parallel with Mk, they yet have little touches, phrases, etc., in common, which are not in Mk (e.g. cf. Mk 2^{3} with Mt 9^{2} and Lk 5^{18}; Mk 2^{9} with Mt 9^{5} and Lk 5^{23}; Mk 2^{22} with Mt 9^{17} and Lk 5^{37}).

Holtzmann's assumption, in his Synopt. Evang., that although the source common to the three Synoptic Gospels is on the whole most nearly reproduced in Mk, yet there are cases in which it has been more exactly preserved in the other two, seems capable of explaining many at least of these phenomena in a simple manner. It should, further, be remembered that some discourses or incidents of which that document may have contained accounts, may also have been elsewhere recorded in a fuller or slightly different form, and that Mt and Lk may have known of these other records, and have adopted them, or at least been influenced by their recollection of them, in particular instances.

These considerations render it unnecessary to suppose, with B. Weiss, that Matthew's 'Logia' (if we may for convenience so speak) was used in the composition of Mk, as well as in Mt and Lk, though in Mk only to a very much smaller extent. They also go far to destroy the force of such evidence as is alleged in support of the view that our first Gospel was known and made use of by our third evangelist. The wide differences between the two render it very difficult to suppose this to have been the case. Ways of accounting for coincidences between them which do not assume knowledge of one Gospel by the writer of the other are therefore to be preferred. In addition to those already suggested, it may be observed that accidental agreement, revision by later hands, and unintentional assimilation of the texts of the two by copyists, may well in conjunction be responsible for a considerable number of the instances. Others explain the class of phenomena to which we are referring, by the supposition (alluded to above, p. 237) that the third evangelist knew the first. Holtzmann himself has adopted this view, thus rendering his earlier hypothesis, that the original common document differed in certain respects from Mk, and is at times more exactly reproduced in the first and third Gospels, to a great extent unnecessary, as he has explained in his Einleitung, pp. 363, 364. It is only suggested, however, that the third evangelist was influenced by 'reminiscences' of Mt, which is in itself a confession that the evidences of dependence are somewhat vague and scanty. We believe that we shall have the majority of critics on our side in asserting that they are altogether too slight to withstand the case that may be made out, on pure grounds of general probability and apart from any theory of inspiration, against any knowledge of the first Gospel by the writer of the third, from the wide divergences between them.

(6) Features peculiar to the Synoptic Gospels severally, and summary with regard to the composition of each.

As the question of the composition of Mt is the most complex and difficult, we will reserve it till the last, and begin—

(a) With Mark. It will, I believe, be very generally allowed by critics at the present day that the Mark who is referred to in NT had a part of some kind in the composition of our second Gospel; for the tradition to that effect is too strong to be altogether set aside. But what was that part? It is well known that this Gospel is distinguished by many touches which it is specially natural to attribute to recollection of St. Peter's teaching. But did these form part of the work which was used in the composition of Mt and Lk, and were they eliminated by the writers of these Gospels? In other words, was our Mk itself, as we have it, one of the original documents into which the Synoptic Gospels are to be analyzed? Or, on the other hand, did Mark himself take a document—the same which was used in Mt and Lk—and revise it, though much more slightly, only adding to it traits here and there which he had derived from his close intercourse with St. Peter? It cannot be said that criticism has as yet even approximated to a decision on this point. If a well-assured position in regard to it is ever reached, it must be mainly through a careful examination and weighing of all those individual points in which Mk differs from the other two Synoptic Gospels in parallel contexts, in order to ascertain whether they can best be explained as the result of alteration in Mk, or revision in the two others. But, in regard to point after point, several considerations have to be borne in mind; there is also a possibility sometimes of other explanations of the facts; and throughout, the bias of each critic is apt to tell in favour of one theory or another, so that it is an exceedingly difficult matter to form a sound general impression.

(b) The question of the authorship and composition of the third Gospel cannot be separated from that of the Acts of the Apostles. It is generally admitted, on the ground of remarkably plentiful indications of style and other characteristics, that the composition of these two books was the work of the same hand; and further, that the second of them includes accounts of some of St. Paul's missionary journeys by one who was himself a companion of his at the time. But the question of the authorship is at first sight rendered complex by evident signs that other sources have been used as well in certain parts of both works. It will, however, I believe, be found to be much simpler than is generally supposed. For those portions of the Acts, or certain of them, which are allowed to be by a companion of St. Paul are, if I mistake not, marked to an eminent degree by those special words and expressions which are found throughout the two works, though in many parts they are scattered sparsely. That is to say, the man who wrote those memorials of journeys in which he himself accompanied the apostle, was the same who put together accounts, written and oral, which he obtained from others, of the life and teaching of Christ and the early history of the Church, and in reproducing them left upon them some marks of his own literary habits. (See Expositor, 1893, pt. i. p. 336 f.) If, then, the author of the Gospel and the Acts was a companion of St. Paul, it will be readily allowed that he was none other than Luke, who is singled out by tradition.

St. Luke has placed a short introduction at the beginning of his Gospel (1^{1-4}) which is full of significance both as to the method in which the knowledge of the life and teaching of Christ was preserved generally, and as to the purpose of his own book. He distinguishes virtually two periods in the history of the transmission of the facts up to the time at which he was writing. First they were delivered orally by those who 'from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word'; then after a time attempts began to be made to write down what had been thus learned, or portions of it. Individual members of the Church were also more or less fully and carefully instructed in the facts.

Advocates of the oral theory have asserted that St. Luke treats the written accounts to which he refers as no longer possessing importance. They find this meaning in the aorist ἐπεχείρησαν. But the force of the aorist will be fully recognized if we regard it as emphasizing the difficulty of the task and the tentative character of the efforts to perform it. Unquestionably, his aim was to supply something more adequate. But there is nothing in his language inconsistent with the supposition that he was prepared to make use of any suitable written material that came to his hand, as well as of traditions orally delivered. And it is in every way most natural to suppose that he would do this.

If the arguments described above (i. (3)) be sound, the record which is most nearly represented in Mk, or that Gospel itself, was one of the chief documents that he used. He may besides this have had another document, whence mainly he derived that subject-matter which is common to him with Mt—a document where it was arranged to a great extent in a manner different from that in which we find it in the first Gospel. Or, again, he may have obtained it by an independent labour of collection, by himself transcribing short pieces which had been early committed to writing, or by making extracts from longer accounts, such as those to which he seems to refer in his preface, and also by writing down some things immediately from oral tradition. In one or other of these ways, also, he acquired those additional parables, pieces of teaching, and incidents, special to his Gospel which he introduces into the Synoptic outline, including them more particularly in the long insertion between Christ's departure from Galilee (9^{51}) and His final ascent to Jerusalem (19^{31}), the point at which Lk again begins to run parallel to the other two Synoptic Gospels. His account of the birth of John the Baptist, and the birth and early years of our Lord, may very probably have been taken from some special written narrative. It has a peculiarly Aramaic colouring and other features of its own. It would have been a very congenial occupation to a man such as from his two works we know the author of the third Gospel to have been, to make notes of information that he received concerning the life and work of Jesus, to copy out and keep precious pieces of His teaching. He may have begun to do this long before he set forth the material he had amassed in his Gospel, or even thought of doing so; and visits to Palestine, as on the occasion when St. Paul was seized at Jerusalem and imprisoned at Cæsarea, would give him very favourable opportunities for going on with this work.

(c) The question as to the composition and authorship of the first Gospel is rendered specially complicated by the fact that there is a strong and unwavering early tradition that the Apostle Matthew wrote in Hebrew, while the relations of our Mt with the other Synoptics, and especially with Mk, which are evidently through the Greek, are of a kind to preclude the idea that, as it stands, it is a mere translation. The manner in which these facts are recognized and dealt with by such an eminent advocate of the oral theory as Westcott is very instructive. 'The parts,' he writes, 'of the Aramaic oral Gospel which were adopted by St. Matthew already existed in the Greek counterpart. The change was not so much a version as a substitution; and frequent coincidence with common parts of St. Mark and St. Luke, which were derived from the same oral Greek Gospel, was a necessary consequence' (Introd. p. 228 n.). It is, however, very difficult to conceive how the process suggested could have been carried out in such a way as to produce the actual phenomena. It is much simpler to suppose that, with the view of supplementing a Greek document which existed already (viz. Mk or the document most nearly represented by it), he translated from a Hebrew (or Aramaic) Gospel, which may well have been composed by, or may at least in some way have been connected with the teaching of, the Apostle Matthew. But we seem to have no means of deciding whether such a work contained other portions corresponding to the matter in Mk. It may have done so, and the touches peculiar to Mt and that Hebraic tone and disposition to emphasize the connexion between the new dispensation and the old, which are more or less noticeable in it as a whole, may be thence derived. The manner also in which the subject-matter taken from the different sources has been combined in the Greek Mt may have been influenced by the order in the Hebrew work. For although Papias' description of St. Matthew's work as 'The Oracles,' as well as the nature of the matter which there is most reason to suppose taken from it, make it highly probable that it was specially characterized by the records it gave of Christ's teaching, its contents need not have been strictly confined to this. Some light might be thrown on these points if we knew more of the Gospel according to the Hebrews; for it is not unnatural to surmise that this heretical Gospel may have been based upon, or have borne some similarity to, the Hebrew Mt. Unfortunately, our knowledge of this work also is so scanty that no conclusions can be safely drawn from it. (All that is known respecting the Gospel according to the Hebrews has been recently put together and reviewed by Harnack, Chron. i. p. 625 ff.).

Once more, however, it is difficult to conceive in a simple manner how the Greek Mt could have been translated from a Hebrew original, even in those parts where it is not parallel with Mk; for its observed relations with Lk have also to be taken into account. How does there come to be in these two Gospels that singular combination of parallel passages whose verbal similarity is such that they could not have been obtained through independent translation, with others sufficiently different to be so accounted for? We may, perhaps, get a hint of the circumstances under which this resulted from Papias' reference to a time when there was no received representative of Matthew's Hebrew work, but each translated it as he could. Such a state of things may well have led to the translation of different portions having been written down at different times. Some of these translated fragments may have become current before others, and so have been embodied in both Mt and Lk.

Finally, it is to be observed that, in spite of the difficulties which we have discussed in regard to the connexion between our Greek Mt and a Hebrew source, it is marked by features which fully justify us in regarding it as that setting forth of the Gospel history in Greek which kept closest both in spirit and in form to the mode of presenting the Gospel in the Aramaic-speaking Church.

ii. The Fourth Gospel, especially in its relation to the Synoptic Gospels.—It is impossible to review here the whole subject of the authorship and historical character of the Fourth Gospel, and many points connected therewith may be more naturally treated in the article specially devoted to this Gospel. In a general article on the Gospels, however, it will be suitable, and even necessary, that we should compare the first three Gospels as a class with the fourth, and consider some of the questions raised by the contrast which they present. Some of the chief difficulties felt in regard to the genuineness and authenticity of Jn are in point of fact due to, while others have been mainly suggested and are emphasized by, its differences from the Synoptics. It is also not less true, though it has been less commonly noticed, that there are features in the Synoptic Gospels which are not easily understood when they are viewed in the light of Jn; for the superior credibility of the respective accounts is by no means always on one side.

We will therefore touch on the main respects in which the representations of the life and work and person of Christ in Jn and the Synoptic Gospels need to be examined in relation to one another, and then discuss briefly the problem how the subject as a whole should have come to be presented in these two ways, and whether it is consistent with the truth of each, and with the traditional authorship of the Fourth Gospel.

(1) The march of events, manner in which Christ's person and office were manifested, and method and effects of His ministry.—That Synoptic outline, to which allusion has already been made, is of a simple character. Immediately after the baptism of Jesus and His temptation in the wilderness have been recorded, it proceeds to the opening of His ministry in Galilee, and is entirely occupied with His works and teaching in that district and the neighbouring parts to the east and north, till His final departure therefrom. It seems then to conduct Him continuously to Jerusalem for that Passover at which He suffered, though it does so by more or less protracted and circuitous journeyings, in the course of which He is still seen engaged in His work of teaching and healing. For anything the Synoptic Gospels say, we might suppose that Jesus paid no visit to Jerusalem during His ministry till that time when He was crucified. Further, we note that between the two limits, the first proclamation of the gospel in Galilee and His crucifixion, not one of them gives chronological marks properly so called. They scarcely even note the passing of the seasons. (There is an indication of the occurrence of a spring-time, Mt 12^{1} = Mk 2^{23} = Lk 6^{1}, and there are one or two allusions to observances which were connected with particular times of year). It is true that the more carefully we study the Synoptic Gospels, the more clearly do we perceive in our Lord's work as they represent it certain stages and turning-points which follow one another according to a very natural order of development. And we may conclude that their arrangement of His words and deeds corresponds in the main to successive periods in His life. But these periods can be ascertained only by a study of the internal character of the narrative.

In the Fourth Gospel, on the other hand, the flight of time during Christ's ministry is marked, not indeed by ordinary chronology or references to events of external history, but by the mention of several Jewish feasts. This Gospel is in fact chiefly taken up with records of what happened during the visits of Jesus to Jerusalem on the occasion of these feasts. In a word, the centre of interest in the Synoptic Gospels is Galilee, in the Fourth it is Jerusalem and Judæa.

When the two plans of narration are compared, it is found possible to fit them together, without forcing, to an extent which is remarkable, considering the difference between their plans, and the absence of any indication on the part of the fourth evangelist as to how the contents of his Gospel are to be combined with the Synoptic record. He represents Jesus as in the neighbourhood of John the Baptist subsequently to His baptism, and as then returning to Galilee. The first visit to Jerusalem which he describes is for a Passover that happened soon after this, and before (as it would seem) the commencement of His regular ministry in Galilee (Jn 1^{29}–2^{12}). In the holy city itself and in Judæa, at the time of this feast, Christ's public work began, according to Jn (2^{13}–4^{3}). He returns to Galilee by the most direct route, through Samaria, and preaches there during His brief stay (4^{4-42}). So we are brought to a point (4^{43-54}) corresponding with the beginning and early days of the ministry in Galilee described in the Synoptic Gospels. The fourth evangelist then proceeds to give an account of a visit to Jerusalem for a Jewish feast. It is the only one occurring during the period of the Galilæan ministry, and curiously in this single instance he does not specify what feast it was (ch. 5). In 6–7^{9} we have narratives connected with Galilee, some of the main incidents of which are given also in the Synoptics, and which belong, according to all the evangelists, to the latter part of His ministry there. Jn gives notes of time; this section in his Gospel relates to the interval between the approach of a Passover (March), for which Jesus did not go up to Jerusalem, and the following Feast of Tabernacles (September), when He finally left Galilee. In contrast with the impression given us by the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus, according to Jn, went straight to Jerusalem for this feast, and His journey thither must have been swift (Jn 7^{2-14}). There followed at the beginning of winter the Feast of Dedication, for which Jesus was also there. It is not easy to decide how much of Jn 7^{14}–10^{39} is connected with the former, how much with the latter, of these feasts; how much, again, belongs to the intervening weeks, or whether Jesus spent the whole of this time in Jerusalem and its immediate neighbourhood, or retired for any part of it to a greater distance. The interval between the Feast of Dedication and His last Passover He spent in Peræa, where He still taught and won disciples (10^{40-42}), and in the north-east corner of Judæa (11^{54}), saving His visit to the neighbourhood of Jerusalem for the great miracle at Bethany (11^{1-44}). The Synoptic Gospels are so far in agreement with Jn that they indicate a ministry in this same region before the final going up to Jerusalem (Mt $19^{1.2}$ = Mk 10^{1}, Lk less definitely). The Synoptic and Johannine narratives begin to correspond more closely at the approach to the city on this last visit, though there are still many divergences in detail.

As regards the main and most characteristic difference thus far noticed between the first three Gospels and Jn, it is fair to say that all considerations of historical probability are in favour of Christ's having made frequent visits to Jerusalem, such as are related by the latter. As a religious Jew, and especially one who would not be detained by any of the occupations of a secular calling, He would naturally attend many of the feasts. It is, moreover, inconceivable that, having His great prophetic mission to discharge, He would confine His teaching till the last few days of His life to the north and east of Palestine, and never seek to declare His message in the great centre of the religious life of the chosen people, where the effects of doing so would be so much farther-reaching, and all the local associations would add to the significance of His words and deeds. Again, the catastrophe described by the Synoptic Gospels themselves, and the manner in which it was brought about,—the enmity of the ruling priests, lawyers, and Pharisees in Jerusalem,—must have been prepared for. The work of Jesus in the country districts could hardly of itself have threatened their authority in such a way as to inspire their determination to destroy Him. The two or three days of teaching in Jerusalem which preceded their formal conspiracy against Him would have been altogether insufficient to bring their hostility to a head, if there had not been already deep-seated hatred. Various slight indications in the Synoptic Gospels, such as instances of His having disciples and friends in Judæa, may be also more easily explained if He had actually taught there during the earlier part of His ministry.

We pass on to consider the representation of the history, viewed not so much as a series of events as in its moral and spiritual aspects. From the Synoptic Gospels it appears that Jesus made the formation of a little band of devoted disciples and their instruction and training a primary aim of His earthly ministry. (See esp. Mk $3^{13.\ 14}$, Mt $13^{10-17.\ 51.\ 52}$, Mk 4^{34}, Mt 10). In Jn this work is more minutely and fully related. We see the first gathering of a few around Him (1^{35-51}), which would naturally precede any formal call to definite service, such as that which is referred to Mt 4^{18-22} = Mk 1^{16-20}. From the beginning almost of His public ministry He moves about surrounded by a few who have attached themselves to Him (Jn $2^{2.\ 12}$ 3^{22} $4^{2.\ 8.\ 27}$). The impression made on them by His deeds and words is specially recorded (Jn $2^{11.\ 17}$ 4^{27}). The conditions necessary for the slow growth and due probation of their faith were not interfered with by the singularly full and exalted declarations concerning His person and work made even by the Baptist ($1^{29.\ 36}$), and throughout by Himself to disciples (1^{51} 3^{13-15}), and also in the hearing of a wider circle as early as the second recorded visit to Jerusalem (5^{17-47}). For, distinct though these claims might be, their nature and the language in which they were expressed were so new, and His course of conduct as a whole corresponded so little with common expectation, that to apprehend His meaning rightly was a matter of great difficulty, and the faith even of those most favourably disposed to receive Him, or who had already given Him their allegiance, was put to a severe test thereby. The reality of the trial appears alike in Jn and the other three (comp. Jn 6^{66-71} with Mt 16^{13-19} = Mk 8^{27-30} = Lk 9^{18-20}). In each account the faith of the Twelve is recognized as a great victory, and they are contrasted with others. A class of persons who had for a time taken up the position of disciples, but who afterwards fell away through the perplexity which He caused them,—through becoming disappointed in Him,—is clearly portrayed in Jn (6^{60-65}; and cf. 7^{3} $8^{31\text{ff.}}$ $11^{45.\ 46}$ 12^{11}), though in the Synoptic Gospels they hardly come before us. Jesus Himself saw that some of those who professed to be disciples were of this unreliable character, before either they themselves or others knew it (2^{23-25}). That there should have been this class is in every way probable, under the conditions of the case, and in view of facts like the wide popularity for a time of the Prophet of Nazareth, which the Synoptic Gospels, too, relate. But it is almost inconceivable that any one writing at the end of the 1st or beginning of the 2nd cent. should have described them in a manner so true to historical circumstances, except from actual recollection of instances. There was no motive or guidance for doing so in the trials of the Church at that time. Those who fell away then did so under the influence of the love of the world, or of philosophy, or the fear of persecution. A moral in regard to the last-named cause of defection might be pointed from examples of secret believers who were afraid to confess Christ, and such are spoken of in Jn (12^{42} 19^{38}; cf. also 7^{13}), but they are a distinct class from those mentioned above, whose conduct was such as would have occurred among those who were compelled to judge of the claims of Jesus during His lifetime, but not afterwards.

The chief points on which the conflicts of Jesus with the Jews turn in the Synoptic Gospels, appear also in Jn (cf. Mt 12^{38-45}; Mt 16^{1-4} = Mk 8^{11-13}; Lk $11^{16.\ 29-32}$ with Jn 2^{18}). They make charges of demoniacal possession (cf. Mt 9^{34}, Mt $12^{24\text{ff.}}$ = Mk $3^{22\text{ff.}}$ = Lk $11^{15\text{ff.}}$ with Jn $8^{48.\ 49.\ 52}$ $10^{19.\ 20.\ 21}$). They charge Him with disregarding the Sabbath (cf. Mt $12^{1\text{ff.}}$ = Mk $2^{23\text{ff.}}$ = Lk $6^{1\text{ff.}}$, Mt $12^{9\text{ff.}}$ = Mk $3^{1\text{ff.}}$ = Lk $6^{6\text{ff.}}$, Lk $13^{10\text{ff.}}$ $14^{1\text{ff.}}$ with Jn $5^{10.\ 16.\ 18}$ $7^{22.\ 23}$ $9^{14.\ 16}$). At the same time the difference in the illustration which Christ uses as an argumentum ad hominem in Mt 12^{11} and in Jn 7^{22} should be noticed, and the exquisite suitability of each to the particular scene of controversy. The one would come home to the country-folk of Galilee, to whom such a case of conscience may even have been already familiar; the force of the other would be felt by the Jews of Jerusalem, with their high sense of the importance of such points of ceremonial law.

As regards the character of the miracles in Jn, it is curious that he does not relate any example of the cure of one possessed with a devil—which, according to the Synoptic Gospels, was one of the commonest kinds of our Lord's miracles. This is the more singular because teaching as to an important aspect of Christ's mission could be deduced from such miracles, and was so by Christ Himself, according to the Synoptic narrative (Mt 12^{25-30} = Mk 3^{23-27} = Lk 11^{17-26}). On the other hand, the first miracle recorded in Jn (2^{1-11}) is of a different type from any in the Synoptics. The other miracles in Jn are either the same as, or similar in kind to, those which they relate. The miracle of raising Lazarus, however, seems to surpass in wonder the raising of Jairus' daughter and of the widow's son, though on consideration it may well be questioned whether it does so to an appreciable extent. But it is in any case remarkable that so great a miracle, and one which, according to Jn, served to precipitate the action of the Jewish Sanhedrin, should be omitted in the Synoptic account. While recognizing this, it may be well to notice that the miracle of Christ which must seem the most stupendous of all from the point of view of naturalism,—'that of feeding the multitude,'—is related by all four evangelists.

Speaking generally, although Jn gives us a profounder view of the meaning of our Lord's work, and unfolds the great drama of the belief and unbelief which He provoked, with a more awful sense of its import than the Synoptic Gospels do, yet, in respect to the broad features of the history, they are either in essential agreement, or are not necessarily inconsistent with one another.

(2) Comparison in detail of passages in which the first three and the fourth Gospels are parallel or approximate to one another, or are in conflict.—We must be content with touching on a few points of special interest.

(a) The work of the Baptist (cf. Jn 1^{19-36} with Mt 3^{1-17}=Mk 1^{2-8}=Lk 3^{1-17}). Alike in the Synoptic outline and in Jn, the work of the Baptist is the starting-point of the history. But on comparing their accounts it is to be noticed, that while we have in the former a general description of the Baptist's preaching before the baptism of Jesus and of that event itself, the latter takes up the history at a time a little (probably a few weeks) later, when the Baptist had reflected on the signs which accompanied the baptism of Jesus, and when he could not only speak of 'the Coming One,' but point Him out. It does not appear from the Synoptic account who saw the signs and heard the voice. The words spoken from heaven have in Mk and Lk the form of an address to Jesus; nevertheless, it cannot be supposed that these evangelists, any more than Mt, imagined them to have been spoken simply for the assurance of Jesus. All three, we cannot doubt, record them as a proof of His Messiahship. From Jn it may be inferred that the knowledge of these signs rested on the evidence of the Baptist, who declared what he had seen and heard. To him the revelation was granted, as to one fitted by his exceptional spiritual enlightenment to receive it, not to all the bystanders, or, at all events, not to them with the same clearness. And this assuredly was in accord with the laws of God's spiritual kingdom. The views of the person and work of Christ taught or implied in the Baptist's language will be referred to below.

(b) The cleansing of the temple (Jn 2^{13-22} cf. with Mt $21^{12.\,13.\,23}$=Mk $11^{15-17.\,28}$=Lk 19^{45-48} 20^{2}). It is a well-known difference between the Synoptic Gospels and Jn, that while he records a cleansing of the temple at the very beginning of the public work of Jesus, they place their corresponding narrative among the events of the last week of His life. There is nothing inherently difficult in the supposition that such an act should have been performed by Jesus at each of these epochs in His ministry. If on an early visit to Jerusalem He saw the traffic desecrating the temple courts, as He must in all probability have done, it would be natural that He should be moved to righteous indignation against it. Nor need He have felt restrained by the fear of too soon proclaiming His Messiahship. By such an act He did not obviously do this; it was one which any prophet might have performed. The consciousness of a character higher even than that of a prophet is revealed only in words of mysterious import. It is likely enough also that the abuse would again in a short time appear, in spite of His rebuke. If, however, we assume that the difference between Jn and the other Gospels as to the time of the cleansing arose through reminiscences, which were fundamentally the same, having been combined and connected in diverse ways, the account of the fourth evangelist is certainly not the less reliable of the two. For he must have known that given by the first three, since, even if he were not acquainted with their Gospels, the fact of their all recording this tradition implies its being widely spread; and he would not have departed from it, whether in order to correct or to supplement their narrative, except on the ground of possessing good information. It is to be added that in respect of vividness, and of the appropriateness with which the scene and the several parts of the action are represented, the superiority is on the side of Jn. One or two differences in the two accounts appear to accord with the difference of time.

(c) The feeding of the five thousand and crossing of the lake (Jn $6^{1-14.\,15-21}$ cf. with Mt $14^{13-21.\,22-33}$= Mk $6^{30-44.\,45-52}$=Lk 9^{10-17}). This is the narrative in which Jn and the Synoptic Gospels are most closely parallel. As is commonly the case in Jn, the relation of the miracle is followed by teaching concerning spiritual mysteries, which appear to be suggested by the miracle, so that we are led almost to regard it as an acted parable. But the fact that the Synoptic Gospels record the miracle, without giving any corresponding discourse, shows that the fourth evangelist cannot be rightly accused of inventing the miracle as a basis for the discourse, and if he did not in this case, there is the less reason to suppose that he did so in others. Jn agrees in many points of detail and in some phrases with the Synoptic Gospels, esp. with Mk and Mt. It is possible that these may be due in part to acquaintance with these Gospels, or with the document embodied in them. But a common tradition would equally well account for such correspondences as may be observed. Indeed, this is the most probable explanation of the relation between Jn $6^{12.\,13}$, Mt 6^{20}, Lk 9^{17}. He would seem to give here in a fuller form the incident of which they have preserved a partial reminiscence.

Even in this narrative, where the resemblance between the four evangelists is greatest, Jn is still very independent. And many of the touches peculiar to him are such as would be imparted by an eye-witness. There is greater particularity in his account, e.g. words which, according to the Synoptic Gospels, were spoken to or by the disciples generally, were, according to Jn, addressed to or spoken by individuals amongst them. The more lifelike character of his account of the conclusion of the incident of the miracle should also be noticed. There was a scene of excitement and enthusiasm, and Jesus, after His wont, quietly withdrew (Jn vv.$^{14.\,15}$). This we can understand far better than that the multitudes should have been willing to disperse, simply on being bidden to go, after witnessing such a work (Mt v.^{23}=Mk vv.$^{45.\,46}$).

(d) The closing scenes. It will be impossible to do more than allude to a few of the divergences from and additions to the Synoptic Gospels which we find in Jn. As regards the much discussed subject of the Day of the Crucifixion, it must suffice to say that, whatever may be the difficulties arising from the Synoptic language concerning the Last Supper, the view that Jesus was crucified on the 14th of Nisan, which is the natural inference from Jn's language, must be accepted as the most probable. On this assumption, his statements throughout are clear and self-consistent, while they are supported also by some indications in the other Gospels. To pass on, there are many signs of accurate knowledge in Jn's whole account of the last evening with the disciples, the arrest, and condemnation of Jesus. For instance, the preliminary investigation before Annas, and the fact mentioned in Jn and nowhere else that he was the father-in-law of Caiaphas, fit well with all the statements contained in Josephus regarding the succession of members of the family of Annas to the office of high priest during Annas' own lifetime. Again, when Jesus is brought to Pilate, we obtain from Jn a clear and thoroughly probable view of the scene and of the successive acts of the drama. The prisoner, as was natural, is conducted at once within the governor's house, while the Jewish rulers remain outside for a ceremonial reason (18^{28}). Pilate passes to and fro. In vv.$^{29-32}$ he is outside parleying with the Jews; in vv.$^{33-37}$ he proceeds with the examination of the prisoner; vv.$^{38-40}$ Pilate again parleys with the Jews. 19^{1-5} Jesus is mocked and led out to them; vv.$^{6-16}$ they succeed by their clamour in securing His condemnation. In Mt 27^{11-26}=Mk 15^{1-15} the positions and the parts of the several actors are not nearly so distinctly indicated.

(3) The peculiar doctrinal character of Jn.—It is necessary to inquire whether the representation given us in the Fourth Gospel of the teaching of Christ, or the belief of others, has been affected by the special doctrinal point of view of the writer in a way to destroy its substantial truth.

We may first notice some signs that he was, to say the least, not wholly unconscious of the importance of preserving faithfully the language and thought of the time concerning which he was writing. The most striking is the fact that the term 'the Logos,' which, as he uses it in the Prologue, gives the very keynote of the Gospel, is nevertheless nowhere put by him into the mouth either of Jesus or any other speaker. But, again, he distinguishes more than once between the manner in which the disciples viewed acts and words of Christ at the time, and afterwards in looking back upon them (2^{22} 12^{16}, cf. also the Lord's words to Peter, 13^{7}). He does not read the full belief of a later time into the earliest days of discipleship. It should be noticed also that the evangelist need not be supposed to give 3^{16-21} and $^{31-36}$ as parts of the words spoken respectively by Christ and by the Baptist. On the contrary, they seem rather to be comments by the evangelist himself, which are not intended by him to be viewed in any other light.

At the same time, the way in which the record almost insensibly passes into exposition in these cases, suggests that the two may sometimes be even more closely conjoined. It is natural, and often almost necessary, under the limits of space to which all are subject, for any writer or speaker, in giving the substance of what has been spoken by others, so to report them as to bring out that which he conceives to have been the significance of their words. There might, no doubt, be a special tendency to do this on the part of one who, like the writer of the Fourth Gospel, had the definite object of impressing truth in which he profoundly believed. That which he had even quite soundly inferred as the conclusion from all that he had experienced and learned, might thus have unduly influenced him in his account of what was said on some particular occasions. Two instances in which it seems specially likely that his own perception of the meaning of Christ's work may be affecting his record, are the words which he assigns to the Baptist (1^{29}), and to the Samaritans (4^{42}). It is difficult to suppose that even the former, much less the latter, could already at that time have attained to a belief in Jesus as the Saviour 'of the world.' We will go on to compare Jn 1^{30} with the somewhat similar saying in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 3^{11}=Mk 1^{7}=Lk 3^{16}). In view of the stress laid in other passages in Jn on the pre-existence of Christ, it seems most probable that the evangelist himself would have held that this truth was conveyed in the words ὅτι πρῶτός μου ἦν. Yet this phrase is an enigmatical one; it does not strictly express any idea but that of essential priority, which might be in point of rank as well as of time. So regarded, it does not differ widely from the phrase in the Synoptic Gospels, ἰσχυρότερός μου, which also is enigmatical. Each brings out a somewhat different view of Christ's superiority. It would have been easy for the fourth evangelist to have made the assertion by the Baptist of the doctrine of Christ's pre-existence more distinct. Thus, although he may have been in a measure influenced in the form which he gives to the Baptist's words by the desire to teach through them an important article of faith, he has in doing so evidently been kept under control by his sense of historical truth.

We proceed to consider briefly the contents of Christ's own teaching as it is recorded in Jn.

(a) His unique relation to the Father—the unfolding of all that was comprised in the words 'My Father.' In the matter common to Mt and Lk one passage is included (Mt 11^{25-30}=Lk $10^{21.22}$) which is characterized by the thoughts and many of the expressions on this subject that we are accustomed to regard as most distinctly 'Johannine.' Mt 24^{36}=Mk 13^{32} supplies another instance of the use of ὁ υἱός and ὁ πατήρ as absolute terms. The preservation of this teaching, even though to such a limited extent, in the Synoptic Gospels, goes far to establish the credibility of the fuller record in Jn. If Christ dwelt on this theme at all, there is every reason to think that He must have done so more often and largely than they indicate. That He did so is also rendered probable by a striking, even though indirect, piece of evidence in St. Paul's Epistles. St. Paul more than once uses the phrase 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ro 15^{6}, 2 Co 1^{3} 11^{31}, Eph 1^{3}, Col 1^{3}). This remarkable expression may most naturally have had its origin in the historical fact that Jesus was accustomed to dwell upon the theme that God was, in an altogether unique sense, His Father.

(b) Christ's attitude to the Mosaic Law. It is certain that we derive in part a different impression on this subject from the Synoptic Gospels and Jn. There is nothing in the former corresponding to the phrases 'your law' (Jn 8^{17} 10^{34}) and 'their law' (15^{25}). In their record of our Lord's condemnation of the legalism of the scribes and Pharisees, the distinction between the law of Moses itself and the additions made to it in tradition appears more clearly (Mt 15^{2-9}=Mk 7^{1-13}). In one saying recorded in Mt ($23^{2.3}$), Christ even maintains the authority of the scribes on the ground that they are the representatives of Moses. There seems, at first sight, to be nothing in the Fourth Gospel equivalent to the assertion in Mt 5^{17-19} (=Lk 16^{17}) concerning the permanent validity of every point of the law; while in it the spiritual meaning of the OT, and the superiority of Christ to Moses (e.g. 7^{19-23}), are far more fully brought out.

Nevertheless, on a close examination, there appears to be fundamental similarity between their respective representations. The saying concerning the permanent validity of the law in Mt is immediately followed by the great passage which shows what Christ meant by its true fulfilment; while the words in Jn 10^{35} 'the scripture cannot be broken'—where 'the scripture' referred to is one occurring in what has just before been described as 'your law'—appear to involve a principle equivalent to that laid down in the saying in Mt 5^{17-19}. Further, the remarkable correspondence in the thought of Mt 19^{8}=Mk 10^{5-9} and of Jn 7^{22} should be noted. In both a distinction is drawn between the law of Moses and a more primitive law.

(c) Eschatology. The Jewish form of eschatological expectation is more marked in Christ's teaching given in the Synoptic Gospels than in Jn. In the latter we are especially taught that spiritual and eternal laws and principles are great facts of the present, and that judgment is ever being executed through their continuous and mysterious operation. So far as our thoughts are turned to the future consummation, they are especially fixed on the blessedness of completed union with Christ, and the circumstances attendant upon His coming drop out of sight. The Synoptic Gospels may be taken as witnesses to the fact that Jesus did make use of the current imagery in speaking of the things to come. But the view can hardly seem improbable to any one, that, on this subject at all events, the mind of the Master is more fully reflected in Jn.

(d) The maxims in regard to conduct which the Synoptic Gospels—more especially Mt and Lk—contain, are among the most precious portions of these Gospels. In the earlier part of Jn this element is absent, but it receives a large amount of recognition in the discourses at the Last Supper. Here the law of Christian love, and the duty of humbly ministering to others ($13^{1-15.\ 34.\ 35}$, $15^{12.\ 17}$), and generally of keeping Christ's commandments (14^{15} 15^{10}), are insisted on. Here, also, sayings on the conditions and privileges of discipleship occur, identical with, or closely parallel to, some of those which are found in other contexts in the first three Gospels. (Cf. Jn 12^{25} with Mt $16^{25.\ 26}$ = Mk $8^{35.\ 36}$ = Lk $9^{24.\ 25}$, and cf. also Mt $10^{37.\ 39}$ = Lk 17^{33} and Lk 14^{26}. Again, cf. Jn $13^{13.\ 14}$ with Mt 10^{24a}, Lk 6^{40}; and Jn 13^{16} and 15^{20} with Mt 10^{24b}. Again, cf. Jn 13^{20} with Mt 10^{40} = Lk 10^{16}). The encouragements to pray in these chapters of Jn should also be compared with sayings on prayer in the Synoptic Gospels.

(4) The style of Christ's teaching.—The difference between Jn and the Synoptic Gospels in this respect seems not to be so great in reality as is often imagined. Justin Martyr's description of our Lord's teaching as consisting in 'short, pithy, and abrupt sayings,' applies, no doubt, with special truth to the Synoptic records of it. But in Jn, too, its style is essentially proverbial or 'gnomic.' The sentences are short and oracular. The discourses consist of a series of separate propositions, and the development of the thought is effected, not through a ratiocinative argument of an ordinary kind, but by slightly altering the form of a proposition, or by placing it in a different connexion.

Again, the use of parables appears from the first three evangelists to have been specially characteristic of Christ. He employed them, however, more particularly in addressing the multitudes; and this part of His teaching is hardly at all recorded in Jn. Moreover, we have in Jn one genuine parable (10^{1-6}), followed in vv.$^{7-10}$ by its interpretation. Jn 10^{11-18} appears to be the interpretation of another parable, the parable itself being omitted by the evangelist (see Weizsäcker, Untersuch. pp. 252, 253). Or perhaps it may be truer to say that parable and interpretation are here merged in one. Although He was wont to teach His disciples by expounding to them the parables which they heard Him address to the people (Mt $13^{10ff.}$ = Mk $4^{10ff.}$ = Lk $8^{9ff.}$, Mk 4^{34}), it would be natural that He should vary His method in some such way as we have suggested, when His instruction of the Twelve did not take the form of a supplement to what He had spoken to others.

It has further to be remarked that Christ's own office is the theme of the figures in Jn. The parables related in the Synoptists are concerned most frequently with other subjects, especially the kingdom of God and its laws. Yet this one also is not absent from His thoughts there (cf. the physician, Mt 9^{12} = Mk 2^{17} = Lk 5^{31} and Lk 4^{23}; the servant of J″, Lk $14^{16ff.}$; the king's son, Mt $21^{37ff.}$, Mk $12^{6ff.}$, Mt $22^{2ff.}$; the judge, Mt $25^{31ff.}$).

The different aspects under which the life and work and person of Christ are presented in the Synoptic Gospels and Jn may be reconcilable. We have given some reasons for thinking that they are so in great measure. But the question remains, how the existence of such differences in the records can be explained. And it may be observed that it is one for which even those need to seek an answer who admit only, as the majority of modern critics do, that the Fourth Gospel contains considerable historical elements.

Now, the Fourth Gospel has a clearly defined aim ($20^{30.\ 31}$, and cf. 1^{1-14}), which goes far to explain the selective method on which the writer has proceeded in constructing his Gospel. When in addition to this we take into account the fact that he must almost certainly have been acquainted with the contents of the Synoptic Gospels, and that he would at least feel under no obligation to recount what was already recorded, and that he may even have avoided the repetition of it when it did not fall in conveniently with the plan of his own work, and that in point of fact he is in the habit of assuming in his readers the knowledge of things that he does not narrate, little difficulty can be created by his omissions.

The difficulty is rather to understand how the first three evangelists should omit so much that we find in Jn. The same reasons did not exist in their case for passing over facts as in that of Jn. To some small extent, indeed, they were influenced in what they relate by the bent of their own minds and the special needs of those whom they addressed. But the very fact that the matter and arrangement of all three are so largely the same, shows that their contents and form must have been in the main determined by some other cause than individual purpose or bias. Their fragmentariness must be due to the limited character of the material that had come to their hand. We have seen that the historical circumstances under which the documentary sources of the Synoptic narrative were shaped, were of a kind to circumscribe their range. But in order to explain the phenomenon now before us—the contrast between the Synoptic and Johannine accounts—it seems necessary to suppose further that the knowledge embodied in the latter had, at the time the first three Gospels were composed, been delivered only within a comparatively limited circle. It is difficult to imagine that even Mark and the editor of the Greek Mt would have remained unaffected by it if it had been widely spread through a considerable part of the Church. And it is impossible to believe that Luke would, seeing that he evidently had sought for information in different directions, and desired to give a certain completeness, so far as he could, to his narrative. There appears to be nothing unnatural in this supposition. The needs of simple Christians, and of the mass of the unconverted, which had led originally to the shaping of the oral instruction in a certain way, and which through it had influenced the character of the earliest documents, would continue to be most generally felt. The number of those able to appreciate the deeper teaching would be small.

III. THE DATE OF OUR GOSPELS AND OF THE SOURCES EMBODIED IN THEM.—In endeavouring to arrive approximately at the date of the Gospels, it is necessary to consider both the testimony of tradition and internal indications.

1. The Synoptic Gospels.—If, as is probable, the fragment of Papias about Mt is a report of what he had heard many years before from John the Presbyter, and preserves for us the recollections of the latter concerning a period already past when Papias met him, the composition of our Greek Mt would seem to fall within the 1st cent. General considerations respecting the history of the position of this Gospel in the Church point to its belonging at least to the 1st cent. It has often been argued, on the ground of Mt 24^{29}, that the Gospel was composed before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70; but the words in question may be explained by the fidelity with which the original source has been preserved. Nor do there seem to be other indications in the Gospel which enable us to assign it with confidence to a time either before or after that or any other date.

On the ground of the strongly supported tradition which connects the Second Gospel with Mark, we may somewhat more nearly determine the time of the composition of this Gospel. It would seem, according to the oldest form of the tradition, to have been after St. Peter's death that Mark wrote it, and consequently we cannot place its composition much before A.D. 70. The lower limit will be that of the period after this for which Mark, who must have been in middle life at the date just named, is likely to have lived. Internal indications do not help us in this case any more than in the last.

The lower limit for the composition of the Third Gospel is fixed by a consideration similar to that in the last case. Its author was a companion of St. Paul for some years, and there is in point of fact no reason to doubt the tradition which identifies him with Luke, named in St. Paul's Epistles. This Gospel consequently cannot have been written much later than A.D. 80. On the other hand, the greater precision with which the siege of Jerusalem is referred to than it is in Mt and Mk (see Lk 19^{43} 21^{20}), seems to show that in this Gospel the original form of the prophecy has been somewhat lost, owing to knowledge of the particular circumstances of the event.

But we have seen that sources, documentary and other, are embodied in the Synoptic Gospels. In order, then, to judge how near we are in reality brought to the events related, we have to inquire into the historical character of the matter which the evangelists used, and the faithfulness with which they have reproduced it. This is a fruitful field for study. It is only possible here to say that the subject-matter of the Synoptic Gospels is marked by traits which show that the information proceeds direct from those who have lived amid the surroundings described. The characteristics of Jewish life and thought in Palestine in the first half of the 1st cent. of our era are reflected in the narrative with a truth which could not have been otherwise imparted.

The fact that our Gospels were put forth far from Palestine, in the midst of the Græco-Roman world, and subsequently to, or at the earliest only a short while before, the destruction of Jerusalem,—that great catastrophe which profoundly affected the Jews everywhere, and above all in Palestine, and the Christian Church itself,—becomes (strange to say) a guarantee of their truth. Placed as the evangelists were when they wrote, they could not have accurately reproduced the features of an age which had passed away, as they are found to have done, except from immediate knowledge of their own, the reports of those who possessed it, or the use of documents based on it. Attention may be directed to the following points:—(α) The distribution in Pal. of the Jewish population on the one hand, and of the Grecized cities and regions on the other. It will be found that our Lord's work is confined, saving in a very few cases, which are of the kind that may be truly said to be exceptions that prove the rule, to the pre-eminently Jewish districts. In Galilee itself the incidents of His ministry are connected with Jewish villages and village-towns, not with the places known in the outside world. We may infer what Christ's own plan was for the work of His brief ministry on earth. Only the first evangelist lays stress on it; the records of the second and third, and we may add of the fourth, equally reveal it, but they do so, to all appearance, unconsciously. And although we can on reflection see clearly the reason for such a course of action, it is not one which would have naturally suggested itself to men who, like the third and fourth evangelists at least, were deeply impressed with the universality of the gospel. (β) The political and social circumstances, the strangely mingled Jewish and Roman institutions and remaining effects of the period of Grecian rule, the relations of the jurisdictions of Herod and the Roman governor and the Jewish priests and elders, and the influence of the Pharisees and scribes. (γ) The popular Messianic expectation, and the temper of different classes in respect to it, its various forms and the beliefs connected therewith. (δ) The subtle correspondences in form between the teaching of Jesus and that of Jewish Rabbis, combined with the vital differences in spirit.

The teaching, again, of our Lord is much of it such as could have been given only by Himself in His own lifetime, or is marked by the prominence of terms and ideas which speedily ceased to be much in vogue in the Church. This serves to show that the character of the record generally can have been comparatively little affected by the thought and language of the Church in a subsequent generation.

The following may be taken as illustrations:—(α) The use of the term and idea 'the kingdom of God' in the Gospels (see The Jewish and the Christian Messiah, by the present writer, pp. 226, 227). (β) The use in the Gospels of the title 'the Son of Man' (see ib. pp. 243, 244). (γ) The use of the term μαθηταί (see Weizsäcker, Apost. Zeitalter, p. 36).

In order that the Gospels may be tested in the respects indicated with the greater precision, those portions of them which appear to be derived from common sources, or from a source peculiar to one or other evangelist, or which are the setting or the remarks furnished by the several evangelists individually, should be separately examined.

2. The Fourth Gospel.—The history is contemplated in this Gospel from a point of view acquired through long reflection and experience, and through sharing in the ever-widening work and conflicts of the Church. And yet familiarity with Palestine and with the thought and feeling of its population at the time to which the record refers, is manifested in it not less markedly than in the others. If these two characteristics—the immediate knowledge of the facts, and a wide and large conception of their significance—belong, as appears to be the case, to one and the same person, we must suppose that he was one of the immediate disciples of Jesus whose mind underwent a remarkable growth during his subsequent life. There is next to nothing in the character of John the son of Zebedee, as we see it in the Gospels and the early chapters of the Acts, which marks him out as fitted to be the writer. And the allusion to him in Gal 2^9, as one of the apostles of the circumcision, may seem unfavourable to the belief that he was so. But tradition, which assigns to him the authorship, also represents him as having lived to a great age, and having passed his later years amid the influences of Ephesus. This leaves room for a change in his apprehension of the truth. And, strange as this change from the mode of thought of the Twelve in the early days of the Church at Jerusalem to that of the writer of the Fourth Gospel may seem to us, it is one well within the bounds of possibility, and hardly to be reckoned greater than some of those of which there have been instances among religious thinkers in our own century. It is to be added, that if the characteristics of this Gospel have been correctly described above, the difficulty as to the authorship would be in no way lightened by supposing that the writer was not the son of Zebedee. For there is no other of the earliest Palestinian disciples who, so far as we know, could more easily have become prepared to write the Fourth Gospel.

[The trustworthiness of the traditions as to the old age of John the son of Zebedee has been called in question, more especially of late by Harnack in his Chron. d. Altchrist. Lit. i. pp. 320 ff. and 656 ff. For a discussion of this question see NT CANON.]

IV. THE HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS.—A comparison of the Gospels, very different for the most part in its method and object from that which we have been reviewing, has been associated with the name of the Harmonists. Starting from the assumption that the inspiration of Holy Scripture involves its complete immunity from error even in the most unimportant historical details, they endeavoured to reconcile all inconsistencies in parallel accounts in the Gospels, and, when this was found to be impossible, they inferred that different incidents or occasions were referred to. For many years past, however, even those thoughtful students of the Gospels who have believed in the absolute infallibility of every part of Scripture, as well as others who had no wish to deny this thesis, have felt dissatisfied with the expedients resorted to by the Harmonists; and have been more inclined to say that our knowledge is not full enough to admit of such a process being soundly applied, and to suggest that if we were acquainted with all the circumstances the apparent discrepancies would vanish.

Recent criticism is seldom ready to admit that variations in two narratives which have a general resemblance, or in the form and setting of sayings which in substance are the same, point to two similar but distinct events, or to the repetition at different times of the same teaching. It is in the habit of attributing such variations to the natural action of tradition, where they were not due to one or other of the evangelists themselves. It would even account thus for the recurrence of similar sayings (or incidents) in the same Gospel. A tradition, it says, came to be embodied with greater or less differences of form in each of two documents which have been used by the evangelist; he has given the two reports of the same fact as if they were reports of distinct facts. And its chief interest in these 'doublets,' as they are termed, is that they may be a means of discovering more about the original documents. There are cases in which such an explanation appears probable. On the other hand, modern critics overlook far too much the consideration that history does sometimes repeat itself, and in particular that all men who feel that they have a message for mankind necessarily insist often on the truths which they are most anxious to inculcate, and in doing so use again and again the same language. Thus Christ must in all probability have spoken some of His most striking sayings many times. And this may well have been the cause of some at least of the variations and repetitions in our records. We are not, however, entitled to reject any of the above explanations on the ground of an à priori theory as to the nature of inspiration. The truth, so far as it is possible for us to ascertain it, can be reached only through the careful weighing of probabilities.

[The following may be taken as instances in connexion with which the various methods of explanation described above may be considered :—Mt 8^{5-13} cf. with Lk 7^{1-10} and with Jn 4^{46-54}; Mk $4^{21.22}$ with Mt 5^{14-16} 10^{26} and with Lk $8^{16.17}$ 11^{33} 12^{2}; Mk 4^{25} with Mt 13^{12} 25^{29} and with Lk 8^{18} 19^{26}.]

A truer kind of harmony may be sought for in the Gospels than that which, in the supposed interests of the Faith, men have too often mistakenly attempted to establish. We may inquire whether there is, or is not, amid all differences an essential inner agreement, or at least compatibility; whether the several representations of our Lord's Person and Life in them do not give in combination an image marked by unity and completeness. If we can trace in the Gospels such a harmony, we shall have herein the best guarantee that we could desire of their historical truth, and shall derive therefrom the noblest conception that could be formed of the common inspiration of their fourfold testimony.

LITERATURE.—In the following list an attempt is made to enumerate the works which are most important for the study of the problem of the Origin and Composition of the Gospels, in the form which it has now assumed. Works of which the interest is due mainly to their place in the history of past controversy are not here mentioned; some of them have been named in the preceding article. In addition to books which aim at thoroughness of treatment, a few of a more popular kind have been given. Foreign works which have been translated into English are referred to by English titles, but the dates are those of the originals. It must not be supposed that the books enumerated are in all cases devoted exclusively to the maintenance of the particular views under which they are classed; e.g. 'Introductions' contain reviews of the history of opinion. But it has not been thought worth while in most cases to mention the same work more than once.

GOTHIC VERSION.—See VERSION.

GOTHOLIAS (Γοθολίας), 1 Es 8^{33}.—Jesias son of Gotholias returned with Ezra. His name in Ezr 8^{7} is ATHALIAH, which was thus both a male and female name (2 K 11^{1}). The form is derived from the Heb., the Γ taking the place of the initial Ayin, and not through the Greek of Ezr (Ἀθελεί, Ἀθλιά). H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

GOTHONIEL (Γοθονιήλ).—The father of Chabris, one of the rulers of Bethulia (Jth 6^{15}).

GOURD (קִיקָיוֹן ḳîḳâyôn, κολοκύνθη, hedera).—There are three opinions in regard to the plant intended in Jon 4^{6-10}.

(a) That of Jerome, expressed in the Vulg. rendering hedera (ivy),—an opinion with no support, etymological or botanical, and denounced by Augustine as heresy.

(b) That of Celsius (Hierob. ii. 273), that it was the kharwa', Ricinus communis, L., the castor-oil tree. The grounds for this opinion are philological. Dioscorides (iv. 164) describes the κρότων, i.e. the castor-oil tree, under the name of κίκι, and the Talm. calls castor-oil שֶׁמֶן קִיק shemen ḳîḳ. The plant which God provided to overshadow Jonah, however, was a vine, which seems from the context to have trailed over his arbour, and not a small tree like the castor-oil plant, which could not, by any stretch of the imagination, be regarded as a vine.

(c) That of the LXX, κολόκυνθα (see Wild Gourds below), the bottle-gourd, Cucurbita lagenaria, L., the ḳar'ah of the Arabs. This has the advantage of answering the botanical conditions perfectly. Jonah had constructed a booth, such as the 'lodge in a garden of cucumbers' (see CUCUMBER), of poles and leaves. He sat in the shade of this booth. But the leaves soon withered, and he was exposed again to the blazing sun of Mesopotamia. It is quite customary to plant the bottle-gourd by such booths, or by the trellises near houses. It grows very rapidly, and its broad leaves form an excellent shade. Such a vine, growing over Jonah's booth, suits well the narrative. The rapidity with which the leaves of these gourd-vines die and wither and curl up is also eminently appropriate.

Wild Gourds (פַּקֻּעֹת paḳḳu'ôth, τολύπη, colocynthides). These are the fruits of a vine growing in the fields (2 K 4^{39}). The root of this word signifies to burst open. This etym. would suit the squirting cucumber, Ecballium Elaterium, L., in Arab. ḳiththâ el-ḥimâr. This plant is very common, and its juice is a drastic cathartic, and in large quantities an irritant poison. But it could not, with any propriety, be called a vine. It is a perennial erect herb, with a brittle stiff stem and branches, and is quite destitute of tendrils. This would make the term גֶּפֶן, gephen, wholly inappropriate to it.

Cucumis prophetarum, L., which grows in the deserts around the Dead Sea, and southward to Sinai, has been suggested. But the small size of its ovoid fruit, only an inch long, does not correspond to the colocynthides of the Vulgate.

The authority of the LXX and the Vulg. is in favour of the colocynth, Citrullus Colocynthis, L., the ḥondol of the Arabs. This plant is a cucurbitaceous vine, growing prostrate on the ground, or trailing by its spiral tendrils over shrubs and herbs. It has a lobed leaf, and a melon 3 to 3½ in. in diameter, which dries when ripe, and when opened discloses a fungous, intensely bitter pulp, containing smooth shining seeds. This pulp is also a drastic cathartic, and, in quantities, an irritant poison. The colocynth corresponds well to the requisites of the passage, that it should be a vine, bearing gourds (colocynthides) of a noxious quality. This plant, which is called in Greek κολοκυνθίς, must not be confounded with κολοκύνθη, which is the cultivated gourd. The knops (1 K 6^{18} marg. gourds, 7^{24} פְּקָעִים pĕḳâ'îm) may have been imitations of this fruit. G. E. POST.

GOVERNANCE.—This old form of 'government' occurs occasionally in the versions before AV, as Jer 23^{10} Cov. 'Yee the waye that men take, is wicked, and their governaunce is nothinge like the holy worde of the Lorde'; and it has been retained in AV and RV (from Cov.) in 2 Es 11^{32} 'it had the governance of the world' (potentatum habuit); and 1 Mac 9^{31} 'Jonathan took the governance upon him at that time' (ἐπεδέξατο τὴν ἥγησιν). The word occurs also in the Pr. Bk., as in Morn. Prayer, Third Collect, for Grace, 'That all our doings may be ordered by thy governance,' retained from 1549 in all editions. Sir T. Elyot in The Governour, ii. 109, says, 'Finally the Atheniensis, . . . toke to them a desperate corage, and in conclusion expelled out of the citie all the said tyrantes, and reduced it unto his pristinate governance.' And Chaucer, Hous of Fame, 958—

> 'Lo, is it not a greet mischaunce,
> To lete a fole han governaunce
> Of thing that he can not demeine?'

GOVERNMENT. — The forms of government among the Hebrews, though they developed with the course of their history, never became as strict or constitutional as among Western nations. It should therefore be kept in mind that the technical terms used in this article must be allowed some elasticity of meaning to suit Semitic institutions. These forms may be treated in the following order:—1. Those of the nomad period, extending from the Exodus out of Egypt to the settlement in Palestine. 2. The new organization due to the change from a nomad to a settled and agricultural life. 3. The institution and nature of the monarchy. 4. The semi-political independence of the Jewish communities among foreign nations. 5. The religious community of Judæa in post-exilic times.

1. When first the Hebrews appear in historical records as an organized body, their government is simple and in accordance with that of other Semitic nomads. During their wanderings in the peninsula of Sinai and East of the Jordan, there are two units of organization—the family and the tribe. A third factor is due to the temporary needs of their circumstances; it is the leadership of Moses. This chieftainship, however, was only for a special purpose, its power was personal rather than constitutional, and was controlled and modified by the claims of kinship in family and tribe. The suspicion of any attempt to make it more aroused rebellion at once (cf. the JE account of the revolt of Dathan and Abiram in Nu 16, especially $v.^{16}$). The officials appointed by Moses at the suggestion of his father-in-law were doubtless selected with due regard to tribal feelings (Ex $18^{21ff.}$). A thorough study of these two units of society is necessary for the understanding both of this and the succeeding periods of Hebrew history (cf. FAMILY, especially ii. c, TRIBE, and the literature given at the end of this article). The father as head (ראשׁ) of the family had full power of life and death over all its members (cf. Gn 22, Jg $11^{34ff.}$). The ruler of the tribe was probably, as among the Bedawîn of to-day, one of the heads of families who was distinguished for his courage or his hospitality. His authority, both in legal and in military matters, was personal, and his judgments were observed just in so far as his influence was powerful. This position of authority might continue in the same family for generations, but might be lost at any time, and pass to others owing to loss of prestige. The laws observed were those of custom only, and did not exist in a written form. Matters of strife between different families were referred to the tribal chief; and if his decisions were in accordance with the customs of the tribe, or otherwise commended themselves to the people, the person condemned submitted, or became an outcast from his own people. If there were no custom to guide the judge, or the case were very difficult, an appeal might be made to the god by means of the sacred lot or oracle. The leadership in time of war naturally fell to the head of the tribe; and a special duty of hospitality was laid upon him, but otherwise he lived like any other head of a family. There is no mention of any revenue being assigned to him as an official.

2. The second period extends from the entrance into Palestine to the institution of the monarchy, and includes the history related in the Books of Joshua, Judges, and the first part of the Book of Samuel. It was a time of unrest, change, and adjustment. It is marked by the decay of the tribal feeling as such, and the transference of its traditions to local organizations and forms of government. This was due to the fact that a man's neighbours became of much more interest to him than his fellow-tribesmen in his new settled life. The most important person at this time was the 'judge' (שֹׁפֵט). The Hebrew word denotes 'deliverer' or 'ruler' (on the different uses of the word שֹׁפֵט see Journal of Biblical Literature, viii. 130–136). The former meaning does not concern us here. With the latter compare the title sufetes used in Carthage (Livy, xxviii. 37, xxx. 7) and other cities of North Africa (CIL viii. Nos. 7, 765, 10,525). The 'judges' were thus men who by their prowess became influential, and so ruled over their tribes (cf. Moore, Judges, pp. xi–xiii). An attempt to continue this office in the same family failed (Gideon and Abimelech). With this attempt we are introduced to a new word for ruler, מֶלֶךְ 'king.' What the original sense of the word was (cf. McCurdy, HPM i. § 36) does not concern us, as it had probably lost its original force when it was adopted by the Hebrews. The chief difference between a local or tribal king (מֶלֶךְ) and a 'judge' (שֹׁפֵט) seems to have consisted in the idea of hereditary transmission of office involved in the former (Jg 8^{22}). This idea of continuity of office may have been derived from an application of the title 'king' to the god. This was a common practice among the Semitic peoples (cf. for Phœnicians and others, W. R. Smith, RS, 1st ed. p. 67 ff., 2nd ed. p. 66 ff.; for the Hebrews, G. B. Gray, Studies in Hebrew Proper Names, p. 115 ff.). Among the changes due to the new settled life, it may be noticed that the 'elders' (זְקֵנִים), who in the older tribal organization were the heads of the families, now became an upper class, corresponding to the 'elders' (זְקֵנִים) or 'princes' (שָׂרִים) of the Canaanitish communities (Jg 8^{14} 9, cf. Nowack, Heb. Archæol. i. 304). It was also probably in imitation of a Canaanitish custom that a city and its 'towns' (literally 'daughters' בָּנוֹת, i.e. suburbs) were sometimes united for purposes of common protection and government (Nu 21$^{25.32}$, Jos 17^{11}, cf. 2 S 20^{19}). Another prominent figure in the almost formless government of this time was the 'seer' (רֹאֶה), whose intimate relation to the deity was supposed to bestow on him a kind of second sight (cf. Saul's first visit to Samuel in 1 S 9$^{6ff.}$), and led men to appeal to him for decisions in matters of dispute. Samuel may be looked upon as both 'seer' and 'judge.'

3. The institution of the monarchy is generally regarded as marking a crisis in Hebrew history; and in the historical writings of OT it is looked at and judged from the standpoint of the later religious beliefs. But it did not mean a breaking from the earlier family and tribal customs—now transferred to local organization—which persisted to the end, and prevented the monarchy from ever corresponding exactly to the familiar Western type. As W. R. Smith says, 'With us the king or his government is armed with the fullest authority to enforce law and justice, and the limitations of his power lie in the independence of the legislature and the judicial courts. The old Semitic king, on the contrary, was supreme judge, and his decrees were laws; but neither his sentences nor his decrees could take effect unless they were supported by forces over which he had very imperfect control. He simply threw his weight into the scale,—a weight which was partly due to the moral effect of his sentence, and partly to the material resources which he commanded, not so much as king as in the character of a great noble, and the head of a powerful circle of kinsfolk and clients. An energetic sovereign, who had gained wealth and prestige by successful wars, or inherited the resources accumulated by a line of kingly ancestors, might wield almost despotic power; and in a stable dynasty the tendency was towards the gradual establishment of absolute monarchy, especially if the royal house was able to maintain a standing army devoted to its interests' (RS, 1st ed. p. 63, 2nd ed. p. 62). The chief object in the introduction of the monarchy among the Hebrews was 'to have a strong reliable chieftain perpetually guaranteed' (McCurdy, HPM i. p. 56).

(a) Mode of succession.—In the case of Saul the circumstances were extraordinary, therefore the form of his appointment was not regarded as creating a precedent for later times. The growing tendency towards unity had led to the desire among the people, and they turned naturally to the most influential man among them for advice. It was therefore on the nomination of Samuel, supported by the personal valour of his nominee, that Saul was chosen and confirmed in his office at some kind of popular gathering. In the ordinary course of events one of Saul's sons would have succeeded his father. But the fittest among them had perished on the battle-field. Ishbosheth did indeed succeed, thanks to the help of his friends, in securing for a short time the throne of the house of Joseph, but was soon eclipsed by the personal prowess of the king of Judah. The religious influence of the prophets was against him, and treason came to the help of his rival. David became king over all Israel. In the accession of Solomon the principle of hereditary succession takes its natural course, for the king had the right as the father and head of his family to appoint as his successor whichever son he pleased. The heads of the religious and military parties in the state assisted David in carrying his wishes into effect. After this time the succession was regularly observed in Judah, for the Southern kingdom consisted practically of one tribe only, and so was free from intertribal jealousies and feuds. In the Northern kingdom it was very different. Dynasty succeeded dynasty, and in the last twenty years of their existence no fewer than seven kings sat on the throne of Israel. In the rare times of internal quiet, however, the principle of hereditary succession seems to have been recognized as in Judah.

(b) The power of the king and constitution of his household.—The rule of Saul was characterized by its simplicity. 'The son of Kish ruled in peace at Gibea in the house of his father, leading the very simple life of the last of the judges. On leaving the harem in the morning he seated himself before the gate of the palace. There, surrounded by some attendants, under the protection of a small Benjaminite guard, he gave audience to every comer, inquired as to the news, questioned travellers, received the oral reports of his officers, appeased quarrels, administered justice (2 S 15^{2}, cf. 1 S 22^{17}). Then, when the sun went down, he withdrew into the apartments of the women. At the beginning of each month he gave a feast at which his officers had their assigned places, while he himself presided, his back prudently placed to the wall for fear of assassins (1 S 20^{25}). Finally, when he went out, he was preceded by runners

(1 S 22^{17}). Such alone were his privileges and his duties in time of peace' (Marcel Dieulafoy, Le Roi David, p. 72 f.). All this was changed with the ever-increasing prosperity of David. The king remained leader and father of his people only so long as they had no friendly intercourse with other nations. As soon as the Hebrew nation was recognized, and its friendship sought by other states, the Hebrew king began to imitate the luxury of his peers. A court was formed of the officials, whose common interests grouped them round the king and made access to him ever more and more difficult for the mass of the people. The officials of David's court were—(1) military; (2) household; (3) religious. The following are mentioned in his time—(1) The commander of 'the host' (2 S 8^{16}); the commander of the king's bodyguard of Cherethites and Pelethites (2 S 20^{23}, cf. 8^{18}). (2) The recorder or remembrancer (מַזְכִּיר 2 S 8^{16}); the scribe or secretary (סֹפֵר 8^{17}); the counsellor (יוֹעֵץ 2 S 15^{12}); the king's friend (רֵעֶה 2 S 15^{37} 16^{16}); the keeper of the king's audience (2 S 23^{23}, cf. 1 S 22^{14} LXX); the overseer of forced labour (2 S 20^{24}). (3) The priests (2 S 8^{17}). Prophets do not seem to have been attached to the court, but had free access to the king (cf. 2 S 7. 12).

Under Solomon the pomp and luxury of the court was greatly increased. New buildings and fortified cities (1 K 6. 7. 9) proclaimed the growing power of the monarch, and the separation of the court from the people is indicated by the tolerance of foreign religions and the personal nature of the treaties with foreign powers. Two new officials make their appearance—a chamberlain (עַל־הַבַּיִת 1 K 4^6) and a superintendent of taxes (1 K 4^5, and see below under 'Revenue'). After Solomon there was little change in the constitution of the court (but cf. EUNUCH).

(c) Revenue.—Even in Saul's reign there seems to have been a regular system of taxation of families (1 S 17^{25}, cf. 8^{17}, and Nowack, Heb. Archæol. p. 313). In addition to this the king received gifts (1 S 10^{27} 16^{20}), and doubtless his share of the booty in war. This last is specially mentioned in the time of David (2 S 8^{11} 12^{30}). Solomon's revenues were derived (in addition to the above mentioned) from the tribute of subject peoples (1 K 4^{21}); taxes on merchants (1 K 10^{15}); his sea-trade with Hiram (1 K 10^{11}); and a royal regulation of the horse-trade with Egypt (v.^{11}). But the king taxed his own subjects much more rigorously than his predecessors. He divided the kingdom into twelve parts, each being represented by an officer, who was compelled to provide for the king's household for one month in the year (1 K 4). Judah is not mentioned in this division of the land, and was probably exempted from this form of taxation by favour of the king. Nowack, however, thinks there were originally thirteen divisions, and that the number was reduced to twelve by a later writer to agree with the number of the tribes (Heb. Archæol. i. 313 note). Later, it seems that the goods of a condemned person might be forfeit to the king (1 K 21). But this may be merely an act of despotism. When reduced to great straits, the king took possession of the treasures, not only of his own treasury but also of the temple, in order to keep off an invading power (2 K 18^{15}).

(d) Administration of justice.—There seems to have been little development here during this period. The system mentioned above persisted, modified only by the personal authority of the king and the members of his court (see quotation from W. R. Smith, above). Until B.C. 621 there was no written law except the short religious code contained in the 'Book of the Covenant' (Ex 20–23); nor were there any special courts or officials for the administration of justice. The method for settling disputes was rather by arbitration than by law in the Western sense. At the same time, the king himself in his capital and its neighbourhood, and his officials in the chief towns, being the most important persons, were naturally appealed to for decisions, though there was no law necessitating appeal to them rather than to any other person. Even such acts in later times as the imprisonments of Jeremiah (Jer 37. 38) and the putting to death of Uriah (Jer 26), were acts of personal violence on the part of the king, and not due to the regular sentence of a court (cf. also the account of the charge against Naboth, and the way in which he was put to death (1 K $22^{13ff.}$)). After the destruction of the Northern kingdom, an attempt was made in Judah (in 621) to regulate the legal as well as the religious procedure on the lines of the teaching of the prophets by the proclamation of the Book of Deuteronomy (cf. DEUTERONOMY). But the realization of this scheme was prevented by the untimely death of Josiah at the battle of Megiddo, nor was it fully adopted in Judæa until nearly two centuries later.

4. A remarkable feature in Jewish life is the persistence of the religious and semi-political self-government of their communities in the different empires in which they were dispersed. Everywhere we find them submitting their disputes to the judgment of their own officials rather than to those of the state in which they live; everywhere they claim and are granted special exemption from certain civil laws (as those regarding military conscription) on the ground of religious scruple. Many examples of their peculiar privileges in Palestine are found in the NT (cf. Ac 9^2 18^{12-16} 22^{19} 26^{11}). But in Alexandria this is even more striking. Thanks to the favour of Alexander the Great, they early established themselves in the position of a favoured people in the new city. That favour was continued to them by the Ptolemies, and they had in addition equal rights with others as citizens (ἰσοτιμία). Their own governor (ἐθνάρχης) is mentioned by Strabo (cf. Jos. Ant. XIV. vii. 2). Some of the Roman decrees conferring privileges upon them are preserved by Josephus (Ant. XIV. x., XVI. vi.). Philo tells us that on the death of a γενάρχης Augustus appointed a γερουσία for the conduct of Jewish affairs (in Flaccum, sec. 10). In Rome there was not the same political organization as in Alexandria, but the different synagogues were organized separately, each with its own gerousia and officials. (See further Schürer, HJP II. ii. 244 ff.).

5. After the fall of Jerusalem in B.C. 586, the Jews became subject to foreign governments, and have remained so since, except for the short interval when the Maccabæan princes ruled, or more exactly from B.C. 142 when Simon ceased to pay tribute, or 139 when the right of coining money proclaimed the independence of Judæa. The civil government of this time is, however, no longer distinctively Jewish, but a mere modification of Western forms to suit the religious laws of the people. These laws had come into force at the time when Ezra had brought back from Babylon many of the devoutest Jewish exiles. At a solemn assembly a new community had been formed, which was to realize the idea of the 'remnant' of Isaiah and his successors, a spiritual Judah, subject to the civil government of the suzerain power, but in all matters pertaining to religion following as far as possible the precepts of Deuteronomy and the new law book (P) compiled and edited about this time (cf. Neh 9. 10). Since then the Jews have ever remained subject to this double form of government. The conflict of the two led to their perpetual strife with their civil rulers, and to the final fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. According to Jewish authorities, the chief representative of the religious governing power during this period was the 'Great Synagogue' (כְּנֶסֶת הַגְּדֹלָה), which existed from Ezra to Simon the Just. Some such body may have existed, but much of the literature concerning it contains legendary material (cf. SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT). At the time of Christ the Sanhedrin had taken its place (cf. SANHEDRIN). For the more strictly civil government of the time of Christ, see art. ROMAN EMPIRE. See also CHURCH GOVERNMENT and HELPS.

GOVERNOR.—This word occurs as the rendering of several Heb. and Gr. terms. In OT it is used most frequently for the Peḥah (פֶּחָה), a district ruler administering under a sovereign. The title is employed both for Persian satraps and for their subordinate magistrates. Thus it appears as a designation of Tattenai (Ezr $5^{3.6}$ 6^6), who seems to have been the satrap of a large province which extended from Posideium on the frontiers of Cilicia and Syria to Egypt, and which included Phœnicia, Palestine, and Cyprus (Herod. vi. 91). It is also applied to Zerubbabel, who was appointed under this satrap to the district of Judah (Ezr 6^7). The subordinate Peḥah, as well as his superior, was directly commissioned by the king (Ezr 5^{14}). The other Heb. words rendered 'governor' are of a less technical character, signifying leadership, אַלּוּף, אַלֻּף Zec 9^7 $12^{5.6}$, and נָגִיד 2 Ch 1^2; judicial and legislative functions, חוֹקֵק Jg 5^9; ruling authority, מֹשֵׁל Gn 45^{26}, שַׁלִּיט Gn 42^6, שַׂר 1 K 22^{26}; administrative oversight, פָּקִיד Jer 20^1; and social rank, נָשִׂיא 2 Ch 1^2.

In NT the word 'governor' most frequently occurs as a rendering of the Gr. ἡγεμών (Vulg. præses, Luth. Landpfleger), a term which is used in the plur. for rulers generally (e.g. Mk 13^9, 1 P 2^{14}), but which more often has a definite application to the Roman Procurators, referring in the Gospels to Pontius Pilate (e.g. Mt 27^2, Lk 20^{20}), who is designated Procurator by Tacitus—'Christus Tiberio imperante per procuratorem Pontium Pilatum supplicio adfectus erat' (Ann. xv. 44), and in Ac to Felix (Ac 23^{26}) and Festus (Ac 26^{30}). Judæa was not entirely incorporated in the province of Syria, but the Procurator was to a certain extent dependent on the Legate of Syria, the latter having a right to interfere when difficulties arose (Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 1, iv. 2; Bell. Jud. II. viii. 1). Thus Judæa belonged to the third class of provinces in Strabo's classification (Geog. xvii. 3. 25), one containing only a few provinces regarded either as semi-barbarous or as exceptionally insubordinate, e.g. Egypt. Augustus preferred the title Præfectus (ἔπαρχος) for the governors of such provinces, but by the time of Claudius Procurator (ἐπίτροπος) was the recognized name. Josephus employs both ἐπίτροπος and ἔπαρχος, and also the word used in NT, ἡγεμών, for the governor of Judæa. That Procurator is the correct title of this official is suggested by the passage from Tacitus quoted above, and by the use of the word ἐπίτροπος in a decree of Claudius as rendered by Josephus (Ant. XX. i. 2). Technically, the Procurator was a financial officer attached either to a proconsul or to a proprætor for the purpose of collecting the Imperial revenues. But he was always entrusted with magisterial powers for the decision of questions touching the revenues. In the provinces of the third class he was the general administrator and the supreme judge, with sole power of life and death (Dion Cass. liii. 15), an appeal to Cæsar being allowed in the case of Roman citizens (see CÆSAR). Although it was not necessary that the Procurator should be a person of high station where he was only appointed to financial duties, he was required to be a knight where the charge of government was committed to him. Therefore the appointment of Felix, who was a freedman, must have struck the Jews as an insulting innovation. The headquarters of the Procurator of Judæa was Cæsarea, which was made a garrison town.

In 2 Co 11^{32} (AV and RV) the word governor appears as tr^n of ἐθνάρχης for the ethnarch (RVm) of Damascus. See ARETAS, ETHNARCH. The word rendered 'governor' in Gal 4^2 AV (οἰκονόμος) is trd. 'steward' in RV, as it is elsewhere in NT, e.g. Lk 12^{42} 1 Co 4^2. It indicates a superior servant entrusted with the housekeeping of a family, the direction of the other domestics, and the care of children under age. The 'governor of the feast' (ἀρχιτρίκλινος, Jn 2^8 AV, RV 'ruler of the feast') was a man appointed to see that the couches and tables were in order, to arrange the courses, to taste the food and wine, etc. (Heliodorus, Aeth. vii. 27). In early times, if not later, he was a different person from the 'toast maker' (συμποσιάρχης, Sir 32^1), who was one of the guests chosen by lot to direct the drinking (Grimm-Thayer). 'Governor' in Ja 3^4 AV (a participle of εὐθύνω, straighten) means 'steersman' (RV).

GOZAN, גּוֹזָן, Γωζάν (B Γωζάρ 2 K 17^6, Χωζάρ 1 Ch 5^{26}).—The country on the river(s ?) of which the Israelites, deported from Samaria by the king of Assyria, had to settle, was identified correctly by Bochart (Phaleg, iii. 14) as the Gauzanitis of Ptolemy, v. 18 (Γαυζανῖτις). This region is described as situated between the Chaboras (see HABOR) and Saocoras. The latter river, flowing into the Euphrates from the Masius mountains, cannot be identified; it must have changed its course or have been dried up. At any rate, we can identify Gauzanitis as the eastern part of Osroëne of the classic writers west of Nisibis and the (later) country of Mygdonia (this name hardly = Gozan, but it is probably connected with the Mitanni of the Amarna tablets), almost in the centre of Northern Mesopotamia. This agrees too closely with the description in the Bible (2 K 17^6 18^{11} 19^{12} = Is 37^{12}, 1 Ch 5^{26}) to admit of any doubt. The modern name Kaushan seems to correspond, but not Zauzân (which means the mountains near the source of the Chaboras). Assyrian lists of provinces mentioning Guzana seem to show that the name referred originally to a city, the capital of the province of Guzan. Nisibis, being mentioned parallel to G. as Naṣibina, did not belong to this province. See on the Assyrian passages Schrader, *KAT*² 275; Delitzsch, Paradies, 184. On the question whether the biblical passages speak of several 'rivers of Gozan,' see HALAH. (The view of some scholars, which makes G. a river, was refuted even before the cuneiform texts were found). If the singular 'river' (Massoretic text) is to be kept, this 'river of G.' is the Habor. The plural (LXX) would point to the several brooks from the Masius which form the Habor, possibly also the Balîh. 2 K 2^{19} = Is 37^{12} seems to show that Gozan became an Assyrian province only in the 8th century. GRACE.—The words most commonly rendered 'grace,' 'be gracious,' etc., in AV are חֵן (verb חָנַן) in OT, and χάρις with its cognate forms in NT. The former appears in such proper names as Hannah, Hanan, Hanun, Hanani, Hananeel ('El is gracious'), Hananiah ('J″ hath been gracious'). Its force is 'to be favourable or kindly,' or 'to act in a favourable or kindly way.' Probably, however, חֶסֶד, LXX ἔλεος, corresponds more nearly with the distinctive idea of grace in its NT and general Christian use.* חֵן, for example, has no special connexion with redemptive grace, and the LXX use of χάρις, by which חֵן is usually rendered, must be to this extent distinguished from the NT use of the same word. On the other hand, ἔλεος in NT is rather pity than favour, and denotes God's relation to human misery rather than to human sin.

It is in the various applications of χάρις that the roots of the idea of grace and its specially Christian significance may in the first place be most usefully studied. Χάρις is that which bestows or occasions pleasure. It is applied to beauty, gracefulness, whether of person, act, or speech, cf. in LXX Ec 10^{12}, Sir 21^{16} 37^{21}, in NT Lk 4^{22}, Eph 4^{29}, Col 4^{6}. It thus denotes the favourable, friendly disposition or nature out of which the gracious act proceeds, or that which it creates in the recipient; it is the favour manifested, or the gratitude felt or acknowledged. It is loving-kindness, goodwill, in a wide acceptation, and is thus used of the kindness of a master towards his servants, and, by analogy, of the goodness of God to men; cf. Lk 1^{30}, Ac 7^{46}, 1 P $2^{19.\ 20}$. To be in favour with one is εὑρεῖν χάριν παρά τινι, ἔχειν χάριν πρός τινα, Lk 1^{30}, Ac 2^{47}, cf. Lk 2^{52}. An interesting instance of this general sense is at the beginning and end of the Apostolical Epistles, where the writers desire for their readers the grace of God or of Christ, to which grace or favour they recognize that all blessings are to be ascribed—Ro 1^{7} 16^{20}, 1 Co 1^{3} 16^{23}, 2 Co 1^{2} 13^{14}, Gal 1^{3} 6^{18}, Eph 1^{2} 6^{24}, Ph 1^{2} 4^{23}, Col 1^{2} 4^{18}, 1 Th 1^{1} 5^{28}, 2 Th 1^{2} 3^{18}, 1 Ti 1^{2} 6^{21}, 2 Ti 1^{2} 4^{22}, Tit 1^{4} 3^{15}, Philem $^{3.\ 25}$, He 13^{25}, 1 P 1^{2}, 2 P 1^{2} 3^{18}, 2 Jn ^{3}, also Rev 1^{4} 22^{21}.

The special use, however, of χάρις in NT is in reference to the mind of God as manifested towards sinners, His redemptive mercy, whereby He grants pardon to offences, and bids those who have gone astray return and accept His gift of salvation and everlasting life. It is χάρις τοῦ θεοῦ, Ro 5^{15}, 1 Co 15^{10}, 2 Co 6^{1} 8^{1}, and other passages; in Tit 2^{11} the phrase is expanded into ἡ χάρις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ σωτήριος; in 2 Ti 2^{1} into ἡ χάρις ἡ ἐν Χριστῷ as manifested in and through Christ, whence, by a natural transference, it becomes ἡ χάρις τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Χριστοῦ, as in the above-mentioned salutations, and finally establishes itself as a well-understood expression, able to stand alone without further explanation, as in the ἡ χάρις of Ro $5^{17.\ 20}$. It is in this connexion that the full meaning of χάρις is brought out as involving spontaneous favour. Its fundamental thought is that the benefit conferred is recognized by giver and receiver alike as not due; it is that to which the receiver has no right, which has not been earned, or perhaps deserved, but which the giver freely, out of pure goodness, bestows. This spontaneous character, along with the more or less direct reference to the pleasure or joy either designed or experienced,—which is indeed suggested by the connexion of the word with χαίρειν, 'to rejoice,'—is always implied, and, singularly enough, comes out more clearly in the scriptural than in the classical use of the term. It has been justly remarked that 'it depended upon Christianity to realize its full import, and to elevate it to its rightful sphere' (Cremer). Thus κατὰ χάριν is contrasted with κατὰ ὀφείλημα, Ro 4^{4}, while χάρις is contrasted with ἔργα, Ro 11^{6}, and with νόμος Jn 1^{17}, Ro 4^{16} $6^{14.\ 15}$, Gal $5^{3.\ 4}$.

From signifying the disposition and design to bring about the salvation of men, χάρις comes to be used of the power or influence by which this purpose is executed, Ac 18^{27}, 2 Co 4^{15} 6^{1}, 2 Th 1^{12}, and then further of the results, general and specific, of that action. Thus it stands for the spiritual state of those who have come under the power of divine grace, Ro 5^{2}, 2 Ti 2^{1}, 1 P 5^{12}, 2 P 3^{18}; and for the evidences or tokens of such experience, as when the alms contributed by the Christian Churches are so designated, 1 Co 16^{3}, 2 Co $8^{6.\ 19}$, or the sum of earthly blessings (πᾶσα χάρις, 2 Co 9^{8}), or the various powers and gifts manifested by Christians (in the striking phrase ποικίλη χάρις, 1 P 4^{10}), or the power and equipment for the exercise of the apostolic office, Ro 1^{5} $12^{3.\ 6}$ 15^{15}, 1 Co 3^{10}, Gal 2^{9}, Eph $3^{2.\ 7}$. At the same time χάρις does not appear to be employed in NT for the act or gift apart from that reference to the pleasure or benefit conveyed by it, which we have already noted. The word for gift in itself is δῶρον or δωρεά. Hence it has been pointed out that 'διδόναι χάριν in Scripture must not be confounded with the same expression in profane Greek, where it means to perform an act of kindness; in Scripture it signifies "to give grace," "to cause grace to be experienced"; see Eph 4^{7}, 1 P 5^{5}, Ja 4^{6}, Ro 12^{6}, 1 Co 1^{4}, 2 Co 6^{1} 8^{1} (cf. Ac 11^{23})'—Cremer. The gift which enables the recipient to be in his turn a source of pleasure or profit to others is more frequently χάρισμα; where χάρις and χάρισμα approximate in signification, it will usually be found that the former is more general,—as, e.g., when χάρις τοῦ θεοῦ is used by St. Paul in reference to his office, it applies to the whole of his ministry, rather than to specific equipments for it. Finally, the use of χάρις for 'thanks,' the correlative of favour,—the 'return favour,' as it were,—illustrates the process of growth and transference in the use of the word which we have so far traced.

The teaching of the Bible as to grace cannot, however, be exhausted by the analysis, however minute, of any one word or expression. Its fundamental implication of a kind and merciful disposition, manifesting itself in acts of unmerited goodness, especially towards the sinful and erring, brings grace as one of the divine attributes into close relation with others, and the revelation of it may, it is obvious, be even more frequent in act than in word, conveyed therefore rather by description than direct expression. Not in declarations merely, but in the whole series of the divine dealings with mankind, grace is exhibited. The whole biblical history might be claimed as a record of its manifestation. It thus takes different forms, and includes a wide area of operation. It is allied to the goodness which God shows to all His creatures, and which the Psalms so frequently celebrate —33^{5} 119^{64} 145, etc.; to the compassion which has as its objects the needy and unfortunate, Ps 25^{6} 103^{8}, Lk 1^{72}, 2 Co 1^{3}; to the long-suffering which bears with the unthankful and the evil, Ex 34^{6}, Ro 9^{22}; to the patience which defers as long as possible the punishment of sin, Ps 145^{8}, Ro 2^{4}. It belongs therefore to the circle of divine attributes, the keynote of which is Love. In all the phases of what we have already seen to be its highly complex significance,—whether as mercy and favour in general, or as the manifestations of God's goodwill in the form of temporal or spiritual advantages, or as His disposition to pardon the sinner, or His redemptive scheme as a whole, or the influences by which souls are turned to Christ, kept, strengthened, and increased in faith and love, and impelled to the exercise of Christian virtues,—in all of these, grace implies that God overcomes, not by necessity or force, but by the freeness of His love, Ro $5^{20.21}$. This is the reason why grace is not only one of the perfections of God, but one of the distinctive features of the Christian revelation. Revelation is marked by progress. The God who is at first hidden from men, so that they seek Him, if haply they may feel after Him and find Him, is at length made known, but first as a jealous God (ὀργὴ θεοῦ), only afterwards as a gracious God. And the revelation is completed when 'the LORD, the LORD, a God full of compassion and gracious, slow to anger and plenteous in mercy and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty' (Ex $34^{6.7}$ RV), which is the loftiest OT conception of God, becomes in the NT 'the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.' We proceed, therefore, to consider somewhat more minutely the elements which enter into the conception of grace and the forms which it assumes in OT and NT respectively.

i. OLD TESTAMENT.—'The law was given by Moses,' says St. John (1^{17}); 'grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.' Yet the relation of OT to NT is misconceived when it is apprehended as one of antithesis rather than development. There is no doubt that the religion of OT is ordinarily represented as founded upon law, and that the very considerable element of grace which enters into it is ignored. But OT piety recognizes that what righteousness it has is founded in divine grace and imparted through divine revelation. It is grace which gives the law itself (cf. Gal 3^{19-24}), and faith, which is that by which grace is received and made effective, is not overlooked—Gn 15^{6}, Ex 14^{31}, Nu 20^{12}, Dt 1^{32} 9^{23}, 2 Ch 20^{20}, Ps $106^{12.24}$, Is 7^{9} 28^{16}, Hab 2^{4}. It is true that as grace gives the law, so through the law it seems to give men a right or claim in virtue of their compliance with the law, which is inconsistent with the later revelation of faith as the principle of the new life. The favour (in the Psalmist and Prophets, the righteousness) of God gives to the obedient (or the repentant, cf. Ps 17 and 26, also Ps 7) a claim, as it were, against God, Ps 119^{132} etc. At the same time OT fully recognizes that it is the divine grace which forgives sin (Ps 32. 51. 130. 143). Grace, as an attribute of God, appears in OT in conjunction with truth, or faithfulness (Ps 85^{10} 89^{14} 98^{3} etc.), but also with righteousness and judgment (Hos 2^{19}). God is gracious as hearing prayer (Ex 22^{27}), as departing from His anger (Ex 32^{12}), and as exercising freely His choice of love (Ex 33^{19}); He lifts upon the pious the light of His countenance (Nu 6^{25}). It is by the divine acts that this attitude of forbearance and conciliation is more particularly manifested. Even in the midst of the ruin occasioned by the Fall, the purpose of mercy is represented as being declared and its work begun, words of promise mingle with words of condemnation, the divine solicitude shines amidst the clouds of divine anger (Gn $3^{15.21}$). Through the same tenderness Abel and Enoch find favour in the sight of God, Noah is warned and escapes the general doom (Gn 6^{8}), Abraham is selected to be the bearer of the new revelation (Gn 12. 15), and the promises made to him are repeated to his descendants (Gn 26. 28). Through it Moses is chosen and fitted for his work (Ex 33^{17}). In all that concerns Israel as a people the same free choice is exhibited and exercised. The promises freely made to the fathers are fulfilled when, through Moses, Israel is chosen from among all nations (Ex 19^{5}, cf. Dt 10^{14}) to be the people of God, and that from no merit of its own (Nu 11. 12. 14. 21, etc.; cf. Dt 9^{7} etc.). This choice is evidenced by the deliverance from Egypt (Ex $15^{13.16}$), and is a pure act of grace (Dt 7^{7} 8^{14-18} 9^{4-6}). In the Prophets we have a further development of this point of view. Their whole religious attitude is determined by it. That God had chosen Israel to be His people is their most sincere conviction, and the problems which perplexed them, and gave birth to some of their most profound and spiritual suggestions, arose out of the relation of the sins of the people and the consequent divine chastisements, to this firmly held conviction (cf. Is 55^{6} 63^{9} 65^{1}, Jon 4^{11}, Mic $7^{18.19}$). It is true that as, on the one hand, the unworthiness of the mass of the people led them to distinguish from the nation at large the true Israel, the faithful remnant; so, on the other hand, they were led to conceive the possibility of God's gracious purpose as embracing those who were not of Israel, and of the heathen being brought through Israel into the enjoyment of some of Israel's privileges. At the same time, all their wealth of metaphor is employed to depict God's loving care and guidance, His deliverances and compassions as illustrated in the history of the people, and to emphasize His continued patience, His touching appeals and generous offers, and the glory of His declared purposes. Even in His anger God remembers mercy (La 3^{31}, Jl 2^{13}, Hab 3^{2}), and yet all that He does is on behalf of those who are too often ungrateful and rebellious (Is 43^{21-25} 44^{1-5} 48^{8-11}, Jer 18^{8-11}, Ezk $16^{1ff.}$, cf. Ps 78). In the relation of the individual to the nation we find an important modification of the idea of grace. Grace is mediated to the individual through the nation. His imperfections are forgiven because he is a member of a chosen people; as belonging to an elect nation he is himself elect. The Pss express this assurance of the believer, which finds utterance in his prayers when afflicted and his thanksgivings after deliverance (Ps $3^{4.7}$ 4^{8} 7^{10} 11^{7} 16. 17^{7-9} 18. 32. 51. 103, etc.). If thus in the view of the Psalmists and Prophets there is no limit to God's willingness to be reconciled, if even His judgment has a core of mercy, and His love always proves itself stronger than human sin, the other side of OT religion is, in turn, not to be minimized. If God has a special love to Israel, it is through a covenant that this love finds expression, and the covenant takes the form of law. The people are bound to obedience, and the blessings of the covenant can be enjoyed only on this condition. So far from grace being ignored in OT, it permeates it, as we have seen, throughout. But grace is not yet fully revealed; it is still dominated by the ideas of righteousness and retribution. It speaks the language of law, and the law is, as already noted, its own greatest gift. Israel has reason to boast itself of its law; the possession of it is an honour and a privilege distinguishing Israel from other nations (Ex $19^{4.5}$, Dt 33^{2-5}). Thus, though by no means the sole element, law remains the distinctive element in OT. Obedience is pre-eminently the condition of blessing. God in giving the law is emphatically the God of Israel (Ex 20^{2}). In OT His anger against sin is declared, His mercy and long-suffering are proclaimed; but these rest side by side, an unsolved antinomy, waiting the fuller revelation.

ii. NEW TESTAMENT.—The new 'covenant' is the fulfilment of the old; the plan of grace which lay at the root of the former dispensation comes into full expression in the life and work of Christ (Ti 2^{11} 3^{4}), and in the declarations of the apostles—Ro $3^{24.25}$ RV, 'Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God set forth to be a propitiation (ἱλαστήριον, Heb. כַּפֹּרֶת, the place of expiation, "the central seat of the saving presence and gracious revelations of God," see Cremer, s.v., and, for another view, Sanday-Headlam, ad. loc.), through faith, by his blood, to show his righteousness, because of the passing over of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God.' Thus the great work of grace is redemption, which has its origin in God (1 Jn 4$^{10.19}$), in His eternal good pleasure (εὐδοκία), Eph 1$^{3-6}$, and is carried out by His will and power. Therefore, as we have seen, the Christian revelation is called 'the grace of God,' 'the grace of God our Saviour,' 'the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ,' or simply 'grace.' The love which it manifests is expressed, not only by word, but by the most unchallengeable of deeds, when God sends forth His Son and gives Him up as a sacrifice for the sins of men (Jn 3^{16}, Eph 1^{7}, Ro 5$^{6-8}$ etc.). This love is not called forth by any merit or worthiness on the part of man (2 Ti 1^{9}, Tit 3^{5}), but is the free spontaneous outflowing of divine compassion—'it is the gift of God' (Eph 2$^{4-9}$, Ro 3^{24} 11^{6}, cf. 4^{4} 5^{8}). We may compare the representations contained in the parables of Jesus generally, especially those of Lk 15, and note how He seeks the lost, would shelter Jerusalem as a hen gathereth her chickens together, and calls the weary and heavy laden to Himself. But it is not only this great central act of love, upon which the whole plan of redemption is built up and without which it would be impossible, which is ascribed to divine grace and is its outcome; every step in the subsequent process, all that is embraced in the work of the Holy Spirit, is regarded as due to grace. It is through it that the call comes to men (Gal 1^{15}, 1 Th 2^{13}), and that men are made willing to answer to it (Jn 6$^{44.45}$). It is the grace of God which opens the heart (Ac 16^{14}), which gives repentance (Ac 5^{31} 11^{18}, 2 Ti 2^{25}, He 6^{6}), by which faith is imparted (Eph 1^{19}, Ph 1^{29}, cf. Lk 17^{5}), also assurance of God's love (Ro 5^{5} 8$^{15.16}$), hope (2 Th 2^{16}, 1 P 1$^{3-5}$), love towards God (2 Th 3^{5}) and towards the brethren (1 Th 4^{9}). By means of it we become God's children, righteous and holy (Ac 15^{11}, Ro 3^{24} 4^{16}, Tit 3^{7}), and receive strength to do good and to avoid evil (2 Th 2^{17} 3^{3}). The position of the redeemed is one of grace (Ro 5^{2}, 1 P 2^{10}), and by it sanctification is completed (1 Th 5$^{23.24}$). On the one hand, grace may be received in vain (2 Co 6^{1}); on the other, men may grow in grace (2 P 3^{18}). This grace of the Holy Spirit was promised by Christ Himself (Jn 7^{39} 14^{26} 15^{26} 16^{7}, Ac 1^{5}), is exercised in His service (Jn 14^{26} 16$^{13-15}$), and becomes the principle of the new life. The grace of God, in fact, bestows joy and peace and every good work (Ro 15^{13}, 2 Co 9^{8}). It has been remarked that as one cannot be the cause of one's own birth or resurrection, as in such events man must be purely passive, the employment of metaphors like the 'new birth' (Jn 3$^{3-7}$), or the 'new creature' (2 Co 5^{17}, Eph 2^{10}), or the new, the 'resurrection' life (Eph 2^{5}, Col 2^{13} 3^{1}), emphasizes the fact that renewal of heart and life is accomplished only by the power, the grace of God. Thus the Christian is what he is by divine grace (1 Co 4^{7} 15^{10}); and as he ought at all times to pray (1 Th 5^{17}, cf. 1 Ti 2^{8}, Mt 7$^{7-11}$, Lk 18^{1}) to the Source of all good for that of which he feels the need, so, for every benefit which he receives, he ought to give thanks and praise to God (Ro 6^{17}, 1 Co 1^{4}, 1 Th 1^{2} 2^{13} 3^{9}).

This positive and direct statement of the teaching of OT and NT with reference to the necessity and value of grace and its range of action might be supplemented and confirmed by a corresponding statement of the corruption and powerlessness of man due to sin as set forth in the same sacred pages. The more helpless man is seen to be, the greater is the need for the intervention of a Power above him and independent of him. This consideration brings us within sight of a problem which has much divided the Church in all ages, but which it does not fall within the province of this article to discuss in these its later developments. The problem is the relation of the divine to the human in the work of redemption, how far the initiative lies with God and man respectively, or how far they co-operate, and what, indeed, is meant by co-operation in such a case. It has driven Augustine and Pelagius, Calvin and Arminius, into opposite camps. All that can be done here is to inquire how far the roots of the doctrinal views identified with the names of these great teachers can be traced in the Bible. The passages which have been already cited tend on the whole to illustrate one side of this great controversy—that, namely, which grounds salvation on the free loving will and purpose of God. But, no doubt, many others may be, and have been, adduced which set forth no less distinctly the human side of salvation with its responsibilities and activities. This is especially the case with those which contain exhortations to repentance and faith. From the time of the Prophets μετάνοια was a condition of being saved. If men were commanded to repent, the implication was that it is in their power to do so. In some cases, it is true, we cannot argue from an injunction to the possibility of fulfilling it, but in this we cannot dispute that it is, in some sense, possible for man to repent, without taking away all meaning and reality from God's design of saving them. Such references to repentance are found in Ps 95$^{7\text{f.}}$ (cf. He 4$^{7\text{ff.}}$), Ac 2^{38} 8^{22}, Rev 2$^{5.16.21}$ 3^{3} etc., cf. Mt 21^{32}. Similarly with faith: μετανοεῖτε and πιστεύετε are usually conjoined, and belief must be as personal as repentance. It is intended to be, not the result of momentary impression, but a spontaneous moral act. In Ro 1^{5} faith is spoken of as 'obedience,' a moral attitude which men are expected to assume. Exhortations to faith are found in Mk 1^{15} 5^{36}, Jn 6^{29} 10^{38} 12^{36} 14$^{1.11}$ 20^{27}, Ac 16^{31}. Repentance and faith are the chief elements in conversion. In Jer 31^{18} Ephraim cries, 'Turn thou me, and I shall be turned,' where the latter clause ought to be 'I shall return,' or 'that I may turn,' implying the element of personal activity (see art. CONVERSION, vol. i. p. 478$^{\text{a}}$, footnote); and the image of the closed door in Rev 3^{20} indicates that it must be opened from within to Him that knocketh. Allusions to conversion are found in Ac 3^{19} 14^{15} 26^{20}, cf. 2 Co 3^{16}. While, on the one hand, the work of God begins with the calling, κλῆσις, Ro 8^{30}, whence Christians are known as κλητοί, Ro 1^{7}, the hearing must be a willing hearing, not like that of Jerusalem (Mt 23^{37}) or of the Jews (Jn 5^{40}), but like that of the disciples (Jn 17$^{6.8}$). The same element of human activity is implied in exhortations to perseverance (Ac 14^{22}, 1 Co 16^{13}, 1 Th 3^{2}), to watchfulness (Mt 24^{42}, Mk 13^{35}, 1 Co 16^{13}, 1 P 5^{8}, Rev 3^{3} 16^{15}), to struggle and endeavour (1 Co 9$^{24-27}$, 2 Ti 2^{5} 4^{7}), to labours on behalf of the brethren (Ro 14^{19} 15$^{2.14}$, Gal 6^{1}), and, in general, to the exercise of all the virtues, as well as to the performance of all the duties, of the Christian life. In every case language is used which, if it stood alone, would be taken as indicating that these things lie fully within the power of men to observe and do. Repentance, faith, etc., are regarded as works of men as well as gifts of God. Victory in that new life to which they are summoned can be achieved only by the zealous application of every energy of the soul. The promises which are held out to the faithful, and the threatenings which are denounced against the disobedient, all show the responsibility under which we act, the momentous results of choice.

But though later analysis, and the theories which figure in doctrinal history, have brought to light and emphasized this duality in the scriptural representations of human experience in salvation, though some thinkers and teachers have been willing to sacrifice the one side to the other, abolishing human liberty in order to exalt divine grace, or ignoring divine grace in order to safeguard human liberty,—it is noteworthy that the biblical writers betray little consciousness of the antagonism. St. Paul is clear and emphatic in his declarations as to grace—it is absolute, gratuitous—'by grace ye are saved'; but he is no less ready and willing to make his appeal to human liberty (Ro 2^{3-10}, Ph 3^{15-17}): 'Work out your own salvation,' he cries, 'with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to work for his good pleasure' (Ph $2^{12.13}$ RV), where both elements appear together as indefeasible portions of the same Christian experience. If OT closed with an antinomy of wrath and mercy, law and grace, side by side, equally real, but so far from being mutually destructive that in the experience of the devout they were equally necessary and illustrated one another, so NT closes with its own unsolved antinomy,—human individuality, free, responsible, but sinful and degraded, owing its salvation to the love of Him who is rich in mercy, who first loved us, who despite human weakness and wickedness makes that mercy effectual, and the evil that is overcome redound to the praise of the glory of His grace.

LITERATURE.—Among sources of suggestion and material for an exhibition of the biblical doctrine of grace, special mention should be made, in regard to the word χάρις, of Cremer's Bib. Theol. Lex. of NT^{2}, and Grimm's Greek-English Lex. of NT, J. H. Thayer's edition; and in regard to the classification of passages, of C. Bois's article 'Grace Divine' in Lichtenberger's Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses; see also the Biblical Theologies of Oehler, Schultz, Weiss, Schmid, and the Historical Theology (Index, s.v.) of Cunningham.

A. STEWART.

GRACIOUS.—This adj. is found with three distinct meanings. 1. Favourable, merciful, the most frequent use of the word, as Ex 33^{19} 'And [I] will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will show mercy on whom I will show mercy' (וְחַנֹּתִי אֶת־אֲשֶׁר אָחֹן, LXX καὶ ἐλεήσω ὃν ἂν ἐλεῶ, quoted in Ro 9^{15}). 2. Favoured, accepted (for the word 'gracious' has the distinction of being used actively of the person bestowing, and passively of the person receiving favour). There are two examples in AV, 1 Es 8^{80} 'Yea, when we were in bondage, we were not forsaken of our Lord; but he made us gracious before (ἐποίησεν ἡμᾶς ἐν χάριτι ἐνώπιον) the kings of Persia, so that they gave us food'; Sir 18^{17} 'Lo, is not a word better than a gift? But both are with a gracious man'; Gr. παρὰ ἀνδρὶ κεχαριτωμένῳ; Vulg. 'cum homine iustificato,' whence Wyc. and Dou. 'with a iustefied man'; Cov. 'but a gracious man geveth them both,' so Gen. and Bishops. The same form (perf. ptcp. pass. of χαριτόω 'to bestow favour on,' 'bless') is found in Lk 1^{28} Χαῖρε, κεχαριτωμένη; EV 'Hail, thou that art highly favoured,' AVm 'graciously accepted' or 'much graced'; the previous VSS follow the Vulg. ('Ave gratiæ plena') 'Hail full of grace,' except Gen. 'Hayle thou that art freely beloved,' and Bish. 'in high favour.' Shaks. has this meaning of 'gracious' in As You Like It, I. ii. 200—'If I be foiled, there is but one shamed that was never gracious'; and III Henry VI. III. iii. 117—

> 'But is he gracious in the people's eye?'

3. Attractive, winning.—There are four examples: (1) Pr 11^{16} 'a gracious woman retaineth honour' (אֵשֶׁת חֵן), lit. 'a woman of grace'; LXX γυνὴ εὐχάριστος; Vulg. 'mulier gratiosa': 'a gracious woman' is Wyclif's tr$^{\text{n}}$, and all the versions agree with him. The meaning is 'a woman of grace of appearance.' (2) Ec 10^{12} 'The words of a wise man's mouth are gracious' (חֵן, lit. 'are grace,' as AVm; cf. Lk 4^{22} below). (3) Jer 22^{23} 'how gracious shalt thou be when pangs come upon thee.' The Mass. text gives מַה־נֵּחַנְתְּ (Kethîbh נחנתי), which can only be Niph. of חָנַן to be gracious. Luther understood it in the sense of 'be beautiful,' 'winning,' and tr$^{\text{d}}$ 'wie schön wirst du sehen'; after whom the Gen. gave 'how beautiful shalt thou be,' and AV 'how gracious shalt thou be.' The passive meaning 'favoured' or 'pitied' gives a better sense, however, and hence RV 'How greatly to be pitied shalt thou be,' and the Bishops, 'O howe litle shalt thou be regarded.' But the versions imply another reading, נֶאֱנַחַתְּ from [אנח], found only in Niph. 'to groan.' Thus LXX καταστενάξεις; Vulg. 'quomodo congemuisti.' This meaning is clearly most suitable, and is adopted by nearly all mod. editors. Wyc. follows Vulg. 'Hou togidere weiledist thou,' and so Dou. 'how hast thou mourned together.' Similarly, Cov. 'O how greate shall thy mourning be.' Rothstein (in Kautzsch) 'wie wirst du ächzen.' (4) Lk 4^{22} 'And all bare him witness and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth' (ἐπὶ τοῖς λόγοις τῆς χάριτος, RV 'words of grace'). The meaning here, says Plummer, is 'winning words.' He adds, 'The very first meaning of χάρις (χαίρω) is "comeliness," "winsomeness"'—Hom. Od. viii. 175; Ec 10^{12}, Ps 44^{3}, Sir 21^{16} 37^{21}, Col 4^{6}—'and in all these passages it is the winsomeness of language that is specially signified.' Vulg. translates 'mirabantur in verbis gratiæ,' whence Wyc. 'wondriden in the wordis of grace,' and Rhem. 'they marveled in the wordes of grace.' All the rest of the versions, beginning with Tindale, have 'wondered at the gracious words'; and it is doubtful if RV should have returned to 'words of grace'; to have changed the adj. to 'winning' would have prevented misunderstanding and been more in accordance with the Eng. idiom. In illustration of this use of the word we find Bacon, Essays ('Of Beauty,' p. 176), 'In Beauty, that of Favour is more then that of Colour, and that of Decent and Gratious Motion, more then that of Favour.' So Shaks. Twelfth Night, I. v. 281—

> 'And in dimension and the shape of nature
> A gracious person: but yet I cannot love him.'

And Chapman, Homer's Iliads, xviii. 23—

> 'Himself he threw upon the shore,
> Lay, as laid out for funeral, then tumbled round, and tore
> His gracious curls.'

J. HASTINGS.

GRAFF.—From γράφειν, to write, was formed γραφεῖον, a style or pencil for writing with: this was adopted into Lat. graphium; and passed into old Fr. graffe, which gave Eng. 'graff,' a slip of a cultivated tree inserted into a wild one, so named because it resembled a pencil in shape. From this substantive was formed the verb 'to graff,' which then yielded another substantive 'graft' (like 'weight' from 'weigh'); and by and by this subst. 'graft' attracted the verb to its own form. So that, whereas both subst. and vb. were once 'graff,' now both are 'graft.' The change from 'graff' to 'graft' was in process in Shakespeare's day. As subst. he uses only 'graff,' Pericles, V. i. 60—

> 'The most just gods
> For every graff would send a caterpillar.'

But as vb. he has both 'graff' (with past ptcp. 'graft') and 'graft' (with past ptcp. 'grafted'). Thus II Henry IV. V. iii. 3, 'Nay you shall see mine orchard, where, in an arbour, we will eat a last year's pippin of my own graffing'; Rich. II. III. iv. 101—

> 'Pray God the plants thou graft'st may never grow.'

In the Pr. Bk. of 1549 (Collect for 7th Sun. after Trinity, Keiling, p. 129) is the prayer 'Graff in our hearts the love of thy name': this runs through the edd. of 1552 and 1559, but in ed. 1604 is changed into 'graft.' Again in the Com. Service (Keiling, p. 228), 'Grant . . . that the words which we have heard this day with our outward ears, may through thy grace be so graffed inwardly in our hearts,' continues through all the edd. till that of 1662, when it becomes 'grafted.' The word is rare in the Eng. versions. It occurs as a var. reading in Wyclif's NT of 1380 at 1 Ti 6^{10}. Then in Ro 11^{17} Wyc. (1388) has 'art graffid among them' as tr^{n} of ἐνεκεντρίσθης ἐν αὐτοῖς (or rather of the Vulg. 'insertus es in illis'), and at v.^{19} 'the braunchis ben brokun, that y be graffid in.' Tindale, however, tr^{d} ἐνκεντρίζω by 'graff' in all its occurrences (Ro $11^{17. 19. 23 bis. 24 bis.}$),* and he was followed by all the versions except Coverdale. Tind. used 'grafte' and 'graffed' as the past tense or past ptcp., and in this also he was strictly followed, except that Rhem. (which tr^{d} independently from the Vulg.) used 'graffed' always, and was followed by AV. Cov. has 'grafte' in v.^{17}, which must be the ptcp. of 'graff,' but in all the remaining occurrences he uses the form 'graft' for the pres. tense and 'grafted' for the past. RV uses 'graft' and 'grafted' throughout.

The subject of grafting will be spoken of under Olive. We may illustrate it and the word here by quoting Gosson, Schoole of Abuse (Arber's ed. p. 63), 'Though the Mariner have skill to governe his vessel, it lieth not in his cunning to calme the seas: though the countriman know how to graffe an ympe [ἔμφυτος, shoot, scion], his toile will not alter the taste of the Crab.' Holland, Plinie, xvii. 14, 'The first is to set the graffe or sion betweene the barke and the wood: for in old time truly, men were afraid at first to cleave the stocke, but soon after they ventured to bore a hole into the very heart of the wood: and then they set fast into the pith just in the mids thereof, but one sion or graffe, for by this kind of graffing, impossible it was that the said pith should receive or bear any more.' Evelyn, Pomona, iii.—'Make choice of your graffs from a constant and well-bearing branch. As to the success of graffing, the main skill is, to joyn the inward part of the cion to the sappy part of the stock, closely, but not too forceably; that being the best and most infallible way, by which most of the quick and juicy parts are mutually united, especially toward the bottom.' Bp. Hall (Works, ii. 1) uses the form 'griffe': 'Elizabeth was just, as well as Zachary, that the fore-runner of a Saviour might be holy on both sides: if the stock and the griffe be not both good, there is much danger of the fruit.' J. HASTINGS.

GRANARY.—See GARNER.

GRAPES. — See VINE. Wild Grapes. — See COCKLE.

GRASS.—Four words are tr^{d} grass in OT:—1. יֶרֶק yereḳ, χλωρός. This word signifies green or greenness. Once it is tr^{d} 'grass' (Nu 22^{4}); twice 'green thing' (Ex 10^{15}, Is 15^{6}); thrice it is followed by other words, דֶּשֶׁא (Ps 37^{2}, Is 37^{27}) and עֵשֶׂב (Gn 1^{30}), and in these cases it is used as an adj. signifying 'green.'

2. חָצִיר ḥâẓîr.—This word is from a root (unused in Heb.) signifying to be green (Arab. khaḍira), from which is derived the noun khadrah, signifying primarily greenness, secondarily purslain, cucumbers, melons, and the like. It is now used for vegetables or herbage in general. In OT ḥâẓîr is used once for leeks, LXX πράσα (Nu 11^{5}). Twice it is tr^{d} 'hay' (Pr 27^{25} RVm 'grass,' LXX χλωρός; Is 15^{6} RV 'grass,' LXX χόρτος). In all the remaining passages in which it is used in both AV and RV it is tr^{d} 'grass.' LXX, however, renders it once (Is 35^{7}) by ἐπαύλεις, AV and RVm 'a court'; twice (2 K 19^{26}, Ps 90^{5}) by χλόη; twice (1 K 18^{5}, Job 8^{12}) by βοτάνη; once (Is 37^{27}) by χόρτος ξηρός; and in the ten other places where it occurs (Job 40^{15}, Ps 37^{2} 103^{15} 104^{14} 129^{6} 147^{8}, Is $40^{6. 7}$ 44^{4} 51^{12}) by χόρτος.

3. דֶּשֶׁא deshe' (root uncertain; the vb. דשא, Jl 2^{22}, Gn 1^{11}, is probably a denominative. Like ḥâẓîr, it is variously rendered in both EV and LXX. It is tr^{d} four times 'herb' (2 K 19^{26}, Is 66^{14} LXX βοτάνη; Ps 37^{2} LXX χλόη, Is 37^{27} where it is dropped out of the LXX); twice 'tender herb' (Dt 32^{2} LXX ἄγρωστις, Job 38^{27} RV 'tender grass,' marg. 'greensward,' LXX χλόη); once 'green' as an adj. to pastures (Ps 23^{2} LXX τόπου χλόης); twice 'tender grass' (2 S 23^{4} LXX χλόη, Pr 27^{25} LXX πόα); and four times 'grass' (Gn 1^{11}, Jer 14^{5} LXX βοτάνη, Job 6^{5} LXX σῖτα, Is 15^{6} RV 'tender grass,' LXX χόρτος).

4. עֵשֶׂב 'êsebh. This word (of uncertain root) is tr^{d} in ten places 'herb' or 'herbs' (Gn $1^{11. 30}$ 3^{18}, Pr 27^{25}, Is 42^{15} LXX χόρτος, Gn 2^{5} LXX χλωρός, Ex 9^{22} $10^{12. 15}$ LXX βοτάνη, Ps 104^{14} LXX χλόη); and in eleven 'grass' (Dt 11^{15} LXX χορτάσματα, Dt 32^{2} RV herb, 2 K 19^{26}, Ps 72^{16} $102^{4. 11}$ 106^{20}, Jer 14^{6} RV herbage, Am 7^{2} LXX χόρτος; Job 5^{25} LXX παμβότανον; Is 37^{27} left out by LXX altogether).

It will appear from the above analysis—

(a) That all the above terms are indefinite, applying to herbage in general.

(b) It is improbable that the Hebrews discriminated rigidly between the true grasses, i.e. the modern botanical order Gramineæ (or even the group of grass-like plants, including sedges and rushes), and other herbage. If they did, it does not appear from their nomenclature. The Arabic does not contain any such distinction. With all the general culture and knowledge of natural history of our age, grasses, in popular language, include some plants other than those of the order Gramineæ, as pepper-grass, Lepidium sativum, L.; orange-grass, Hypericum Sarothra, L., etc.

(c) It is quite plain that neither the LXX nor our own translators have been at any pains to render these words always by the same Gr. or Eng. equivalent. Thus in Is 15^{6} both חָצִיר and דֶּשֶׁא are rendered χόρτος, the first being tr^{d} AV hay, RV grass, and the second AV grass, RV tender grass. In Is 37^{27} חָצִיר is rendered χόρτος ξηρός, AV and RV grass, while עֵשֶׂב and דֶּשֶׁא are left out in the LXX, and rendered in AV and RV respectively grass and herb. In Gn 1^{11} דֶּשֶׁא עֵשֶׂב is rendered βοτάνην χόρτου. The reader will detect numerous other illustrations of this point. Much as it is to be regretted that the translators, ancient and modern, have not rendered these words uniformly, we must accept the fact. The nearest we can approach to a specialization of the term is to regard עֵשֶׂב as referring to herbage in general, including vegetables suitable for human food; חָצִיר to grasses; דֶּשֶׁא to forage plants; and יֶרֶק to verdure. They might be then rendered as follows: 'êsebh=herbs, ḥâẓîr =grass, deshe'=pasture grass or tender grass, and yereḳ=green thing.

Grasses are very numerous in Bible lands. In Pal. and Syria they are represented by 90 genera and 243 species. Few of them grow in masses. Turf is almost unknown. With the exception of the cereals, none of the grasses are cultivated in this land. See HAY.

In NT grass is always the tr^{n} of χόρτος. But χόρτος is also tr^{d} by blade (Mt 13^{26}, Mk 4^{28}) and hay (1 Co 3^{12}). In Mk, l.c., the χλωρὸς χόρτος is the first evidence of early spring (cf. Jn $6^{4. 10}$).

GRATE, GRATING (מִכְבָּר).—Half-way up the altar of burnt-offering was attached a projecting ledge—such, at least, is the now generally accepted interpretation of the obscure word כַּרְכֹּב (Ex 27^{5} 38^{4}), regarding which the author of the Priests' Code gives us no further information—which appears to have run right round the altar. Underneath this projection was attached 'a grating (AV grate) of network of brass' (Ex 27^{4} RV, 35^{16} $38^{4. 30}$ 39^{39}), which completely covered the lower half of the altar. It was probably, as the etymology suggests (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. sub כבר), a strong netting made of bronze (נְחֹשֶׁת) wire, with meshes sufficiently open to allow the sacrificial blood to be dashed against the lower part of the altar. For other conjectures regarding the nature and purpose of the mikbār, see the art. TABERNACLE (section dealing with the Altar of Burnt-offering).

---

* Besides this passage in Ro, the verb occurs in biblical Gr. only Wis 16^{11} in the sense of 'prick' (so AVm and RVm, but RV 'bite'). It comes from κέντρον, a goad.

A. R. S. KENNEDY.

GRATITUDE.—See THANKFULNESS.

GRAVE.—The usual OT word tr^d 'grave' is קֶבֶר ḳeber (also fem. form קְבוּרָה); and the usual NT word is μνημεῖον (with the occasional μνῆμα). See BURIAL, SEPULCHRE. But in AV שְׁאוֹל shĕ'ôl is often so tr^d, and ᾅδης once (1 Co 15^{55}). See HADES and SHEOL.

GRAVE.—In Sir 39^3 (and in the 1st Prologue) occurs the expression 'grave sentences' as tr^n of παροιμίαι, RV 'proverbs.' The meaning of the adj. is 'weighty,' as in Knox, Hist. 406, 'Thus the Queen's Majesty being informed of the truth by her said Advocate, sent again and stayed the said meeting, and sent to the Town a grave Letter'; and Shaks. Macbeth, III. i. 21—

'We should have else desired your good advice,
Which still hath been both grave and prosperous.'

In this use 'grave' is but one step removed from the lit. sense of 'heavy' (as Lat. gravis), which we find in Chapman, Homer's Odysseys, viii. 257—

'This said, with robe and all, he grasp'd a stone,
A little graver than was ever thrown
By these Phæacians in their wrastling rout.

One step farther removed is the use of the word in NT as tr^n of σεμνός, 1 Ti 3$^{8.\ 11}$, Tit 2^2, applied to deacons, their wives, and aged men, in the sense of 'serious.' Cf. T. Fuller, Holy and Profane State, iii. 19 (p. 202), 'He is a good Time-server that complyes his manners to the severall ages of this life: pleasant in youth, without wantonnesse; grave in old age, without frowardnesse. Frost is as proper for winter, as flowers for spring. Gravity becomes the ancient; and a green Christmas is neither handsome nor healthfull.' J. HASTINGS.

GRAVE.—The verb to 'grave' is used in earlier versions in the sense of 'dig,' as Is 37^{25} Cov. 'Yf there be no water, I wil grave and drynke' (EV 'I have digged, and drunk water'). But the only meaning in EV is 'carve,' modern 'engrave.' So Tindale has the word in Gn 4^{22} 'Tubalcain a worker in metall and a father of all that grave in brasse and yeron'; and in Ex 39^6 'And they wrought onix stones cloosed in ouches of golde and graved as sygnettes are graven with the names of the children of Israel.' He also has 'stonegraver' Ex 28^{11} (EV 'engraver in stone'), and 'graver' as the tool, 32^4 (EV 'graving tool'). For Graven Image see IDOLATRY, IMAGE. J. HASTINGS.

GRAVEL.—Wyclif used 'gravel' as a synonym for 'sand.' Thus Gn 22^{17} 'I shal multiply thi seed as sterris of hevene, and as gravel that is in the brenk of the see'; Mt 7^{26} 'And every man that herith these my wordis, and doth hem nat, is liche to a man fool, that hath bildid his hous on gravel, or soond'; Ac 27^{41} 'And whanne we felden into a place of gravel gon al aboute with the see, thei hurtliden the schipp.'[*]

In the last passage Rhem. has 'And when we were fallen into a place betwene two seas, they graveled the ship.' This use of 'gravel' as a verb led to the fig. phrase 'to gravel one,' that is, 'bring one to a standstill in argument,' a phrase used by Thomas Fuller in Holy and Profane State, ii. 4 (p. 63), 'When Eunomius the Heretick vaunted that he knew God and his divinity, S. Basil gravells him in 21 questions about the body of an ant or pismire: so dark is man's understanding.'

In AV also there is practically no distinction between 'gravel' and 'sand,' unless it is made by the addition of 'stones.' The word occurs (1) Is 48^{19} 'Thy seed also had been as the sand, and the offspring of thy bowels like the gravel thereof' (כִּמְעֹתָיו, RV 'like the grains thereof,' after LXX, Jerome, Targ., Ewald, Del., Orelli, and others; but RVm 'like that of the bowels thereof' [referring to the fish], after Ges., Hitzig, Knobel, Keil, Nägelsbach, and others [Cheyne, 'as the entrails thereof']. The word, which occurs only here, is of uncertain derivation and meaning); (2) Pr 20^{17} 'Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel,' and (3) La 3^{16} 'He hath also broken my teeth with gravel stones' (both חָצָץ, from [חָצַץ] to divide, therefore 'broken small'); (4) Sir 18^{10} 'As a drop of water unto the sea, and a gravelstone in comparison of the sand' (ψῆφος, RV 'a pebble'). J. HASTINGS.

GRAY.—The epithet 'gray' occurs only in reference to hair, and is the tr^n either of שִׂיב sîbh, to be gray-headed (1 S 12^2, Job 15^{10}), or of שֵׂיבָה sêbhâh, hoariness, old age (Gn 42^{38} 44$^{29.\ 31}$, Dt 32^{25}, Ps 71^{18}, Pr 20^{29}, Hos 7^9). RV prefers 'hoary' in Pr 20^{29}.

The word has been spelt both 'gray' and 'grey' from earliest times. Shaks. has in Hamlet (II. ii. 199), 'The satirical rogue says here that old men have grey beards,' but in Lear (II. ii. 72), 'Spare my gray beard, you wagtail?' In AV 1611 the spelling is uniformly 'gray,' but in Ps 71^{18}, Pr 20^{29} the word is usually spelt 'grey' in modern editions.

GREAT SEA (הַיָּם הַגָּדוֹל Nu 34$^{6.\ 7}$, Jos 15$^{12.\ 47}$, Ezk 47$^{19.\ 20}$ 48^{28}), called also הַיָּם הָאַחֲרוֹן the hinder, i.e. western sea, Dt 11^{24} 34^2, Zec 14^8, Jl 2^{20}; יָם פְּלִשְׁתִּים Sea of the Philistines, Ex 23^{31}; הַיָּם The Sea, Gn 49^{13}, Nu 13^{29} 34^5, Dt 1^7 etc. Lat. Mare Internum.[*]

The Mediterranean was essentially the 'Great Sea' and 'Hinder Sea' to the writers of the Bible; being the western boundary of the Holy Land, beyond which their geographical knowledge did not far extend. Maritime adventure and commerce was not the direction in which Israelitish ambition extended, except perhaps for a short period during the reign of Solomon; and although the lands allotted to the tribes of Judah, Dan, Ephraim, Manasseh, Zebulun, and Asher touched the coast of the Mediterranean at various points, the waters of the Great Sea were seldom traversed by their ships. This was due to several causes: first, the history of the Israelites previous to the Exodus was essentially of an inland character; secondly, during and after the invasion of Palestine their efforts were too much directed towards dispossessing the inhabitants and retaining their hold on the countries they had conquered, to give them time and opportunity for extending their sway beyond the coast; thirdly, the absence of natural commodious harbours on the Mediterranean seaboard; and lastly, the presence of the Phœnicians on the north, and of the Philistines on the south, along the coast-line. These nations, especially the former, had command of the sea, and rendered adventure in that direction either useless or impracticable to the children of Israel. From a period as far back as the Exodus the Phœnician settlers had established themselves at various points along the coast, and in course of time formed a confederation, essentially maritime, extending from beyond the Orontes on the north to Joppa (Japho) on the south, a length of 300 English miles.[†] To the south of Joppa the country of the Philistines commenced and extended to 'the River of Egypt,'* thus effectually excluding the Israelites from the command of the sea. The only port, in fact, to which in the time of the monarchy this nation had full access seems to have been Joppa, which, from its position as the nearest to Jerusalem, became the chief centre of the import and export trade. Thither in the time of Solomon the timber required for the construction of the temple and the royal palace, which had been cut in the Lebanon, was transported; and thither, doubtless, were conveyed the wheat, the barley, the oil, and the wine, which the Phœnicians received in exchange for their firs and cedars (2 Ch $2^{10.\,16}$). In the time of the Maccabees, however, this port became the property of the Jews (1 Mac 10^{76}). Another port, Acco,—now known as Acre,—situated on the northern shore of the bay of that name, was assigned to Zebulun ('a haven of ships,' Gn 49^{13}), but it is doubtful if it was ever occupied by that tribe for any considerable time. It is the best natural roadstead on the Syrian coast, and was conquered and retained by the Assyrians in their wars with Palestine and Egypt. In later times it played an important part in the wars of the Crusades, and has become celebrated in recent times for its successful resistance to Napoleon, when held by a Turkish garrison and supported by a British fleet under the command of Admiral Sir Sidney Smith (1799). The port under the name of Ptolemais is mentioned as having been visited by St. Paul on his third missionary journey (Ac 21^{7}).

[*] Wyc. even uses 'gravel' in the plu., Dt 33^{19} (1380) 'hid tresours of graveils' (after Vulg. 'thesauros absconditos arenarum'), Dou. 'sandes.'

Mediterranean Coast.—From the Bay of Iskenderun on the north to el-'Arîsh on the south, a distance of 450 miles, the coast of the Levant (the eastern part of the Mediterranean) is remarkably straight, with few deep bays or prominent headlands. All along the Syrian coast as far as Beirût, the land rises with a rocky and bold front from the waters. At Acre the coast recedes and the land gently slopes upwards along the banks of the Kishon, forming the plain of Esdraelon. South of this valley, the long ridge of Mount Carmel protrudes into the waters and terminates in a bold headland; and from its southern slopes the Vale of Sharon gradually expands in breadth and ultimately merges into that of Philistia; and the coast-line follows an almost unbroken semicircular curve towards the Delta of the Nile.

Sandhills.—When the early settlers, coming from the head of the Persian Gulf to the shores of the Mediterranean (about B.C. 1500), first surveyed its blue waters they beheld groves of palms lining the coast, in consequence of which the Greeks called the land 'Phœnicia.'† These palms have long since disappeared, and their place is generally occupied by enormous banks of sand gradually moving inwards from the coast as they are impelled by the westerly winds. Most of the ancient coast towns, both of Phœnicia and Philistia, are buried to a greater or less extent beneath these sandhills, which, when not prevented by artificial means, are still moving inland, and have become a source of danger and loss to the inhabitants. These sandhills, according to Sir H. Kitchener, cover a large tract of country between southern Philistia and Ismailia.

New Testament Notices.—Once in the history of our Lord did He with His disciples visit the coast of the Great Sea; this was on the memorable occasion when, endeavouring to obtain a brief period of repose, He visited the borders of Tyre and passed through (ἦλθεν διὰ Σιδῶνος) Sidon,‡ and performed a miracle of healing on a Gentile, the daughter of a Syro-phœnician woman. But in the missionary journeys of St. Paul, and especially in the incidents connected with his final voyage to Rome (Ac 27. 28), we are brought into contact with numerous seaports, headlands, islands, and bays, commencing with Cæsarea on the coast of Phœnicia and terminating with the port of Puteoli (Puzzuoli) on the western coast of Italy. In following the narrative of this voyage we can trace its course from point to point on the map, and we gain some insight into the dangers of navigation at a time when the mariner's compass was unknown, when nautical charts were rude, or were perhaps unused by the commanders of ships, and when the heavenly bodies alone were guides to the ship's course when out of sight of land. [For the description of St. Paul's voyages in the Mediterranean, consult Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul^{2}, 1856; the works on St. Paul's Life, as Conybeare and Howson, Lewin, Farrar, Stalker, Iverach; the Commentaries on the Acts; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller; and the various Bible Appendixes, 'Aids' (Queen's Printers), 'Helps' (Oxford), 'Companion' (Cambridge), 'Manual' (Collins)]. GREAVES (1 S 17^{6}) in the phrase מִצְחַת נְחֹשֶׁת miẓḥath nĕḥôsheth, 'greave of bronze.' The singular rendering is perhaps to be preferred (not so Wellh. and Driver, in loco). The Roman legionary in later times wore one greave, and that on his right leg. Cf. passage quoted from Polybius (e) under ARMOUR.

GRECIANS, GREEKS.—Both these terms are used indifferently in AV of OT Apocr. to designate persons of Gr. extraction (1 Mac 1^{10} 6^{2} 8^{9}, 2 Mac 4^{36} etc.). In Jl 3^{6} AV has 'Grecians,' RV and AVm 'sons of the Grecians,' as the tr. of בְּנֵי הַיְּוָנִים. This is the only passage in OT where either Grecians or Greeks are named, although Greece (under the name JAVAN, which see) is several times mentioned (Dn 8^{21} 10^{20} 11^{2}, Zec 9^{13}). In NT the linguistic usage of EV makes a distinction between the terms Greeks and Grecians. Greeks uniformly represents the word Ἕλληνες, which may denote persons of Gr. descent in the narrowest sense (Ac 16^{1} 18^{4}, Ro 1^{14}), or may be a general designation for all who are not of Jewish extraction (Jn 12^{20}, Ro 1^{16} 10^{12}, Gal 3^{28}. See GENTILES). It is remarkable that in Is 9^{12} even פְּלִשְׁתִּים (Philistines) is reproduced in LXX by Ἕλληνες. Grecians, on the other hand (Ac 6^{1} 9^{29}), is AV tr. of Ἑλληνισταί (see following art.), which means Gr.-speaking Jews (RV Grecian Jews). An interesting question is that of the correct reading of Ac 11^{20}. Were those to whom the men of Cyprus and Cyrene preached, Grecians or Greeks? in other words, were they Jews or Gentiles? The weight of MS authority is in favour of Ἑλληνιστάς (the reading in TR, and adopted in AV and RVm), which has the support of B and indirectly of ℵ* (εὐαγγελιστάς) D^{2} L and almost all cursives. It is retained in the text of WH. Internal evidence, on the other hand (see, however, WH's Introd. to Gr. NT, App. 93 f.), is generally supposed to necessitate the reading Ἕλληνας which is found in ℵ^{3} A D, and is accepted by Scrivener, Lachm. Tisch. Treg. and text of RV (see Scrivener's Introd. to Crit. of NT^{4}, ii. 370 f.).

GREECE, HELLENISM.—The names Greek and Greece do not occur in the Gr. or Heb. Bible, being designations under which the Italian races came to know Hellas and its inhabitants. In Gn 10^{2} Javan (Ἰωύαν) is correctly used to denote the Gr. stock in general. So in Æsch. Pers. 178, 563 the Persian interlocutors speak of Greeks as the Iâones.

The old Armenians used the same word; and at a very remote date the Yevana are mentioned in the ancient Egyptian epic of Ramses II. among the allies of the Hittites.

As early as the 7th cent. B.C. the names Hellas and Hellenes were used by the Greeks to distinguish themselves from the Barbari. And the same are used in the LXX (Jl 3^6, Is 66^{19}, Ezk 27^{13}, Zec 9^{13}) and in NT.

It has been lately conjectured on archæological grounds that the Philistines were the same race with the Pelasgians, who built the pre-historic city of Mycenæ, and used the primitive alphabet discovered recently by Mr. Arthur Evans in Crete and the Peloponnese. If this be so, the Jews from their first entry into Canaan were in conflict with the forerunners of the historical Greeks. 'That among the various elements,' says Mr. Evans, 'from the Ægean coastlands, who took part in the Philistine confederation, men of Greek stock may already have found a place as early as the 12th or 11th cent. B.C. can at least no longer be regarded as an improbable hypothesis. It is, perhaps, not without some actual warrant in fact that in the LXX of Is 9^{12} the Philistines themselves are translated by Ἕλληνες.'* Renan (Hist. of People of Israel, Eng. tr. ii. 15) adopts the same view.

However this may be, the hist. relations of Jews with Greeks begin mainly about the age of Alexander of Macedon, and as the result of his conquests. He, and the Diadochi kings who succeeded him, deliberately set about the Hellenization of Asia, Syria, and Egypt. If Alexander did not found all the 70 new cities in Asia ascribed to him by Plutarch, he was at least the founder of Alexandria.

But the bloom of Gr. civilization could not be transferred to Asia and Egypt, for it had passed away. The old independent city life was crushed, partly by the previous internecine conflicts of the Greeks, partly by the all-engulfing conquests of Philip and Alexander. Under the Diadochi, who became despots of an Oriental type, there was none of the old Gr. freedom. The new Gr. settlers themselves, brought into close contact with Asiatics, became half orientalized. Something of the old subtlety in speculation remained, something of the plastic skill of the older art. But the combined strength, simplicity, and lovely symmetry of Gr. genius was lost. Moral philosophy alone, in the hands of the Stoics, remained a vigorous activity; but now that the free state was a thing of the past, it was rather the life and duties of the individual than the collective life and needs of the organized community that formed the matter for criticism and theory.

Alexander and his successors invited the Jews to join in this work of colonization, and they responded freely. In Egypt, indeed, there were already Jews serving in the army of Psammitichus I. as early as B.C. 650; and under Jeremiah went many others. But of these was left a mere remnant, when, on the occasion of the foundation of Alexandria, a fresh mass of Jewish colonists was introduced. Here they had an ethnarch of their own, and privileges from the first; and they increased so much that Philo (in Flac. ii. 523) before A.D. 40 estimated their number at a million. From Egypt they spread westward, and already, in Sulla's time, were an important class in Cyrene. In the East the bulk of the Jewish race still remained, of course, in the old lands of the Captivity, beyond the Euphrates, there contracting Persian and Assyrian beliefs and culture rather than Greek. But in the Gr. cities of Syria they were, from the time of the Diadochi, very numerous. In Damascus Jos. (BJ VII. viii. 7) says there were 18,000 slain in the war of A.D. 66–70 alone. Antioch was full of them, as were all the coast cities, from Sidon southwards. In Asia Minor, as early as the middle of the 4th cent. B.C., Aristotle met an educated Jew who was Greek not only in speech, but in spirit (Jos. c. Ap. i. 22). In Phrygia and Lydia, Antiochus the Great planted 2000 families of Mesopotamian Jews (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 4)—a proof that it was not from the small district of Judæa alone and from the remnant restored by Cyrus that the new Jewish colonists were drawn by the Seleucid kings. However, since Ptol. Lagos transferred 100,000 from Judæa to Egypt (Aristeæ Epist.), there must have been a great surplus of population in the Holy Land itself at the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. Philo (de Legat. ii. 587) has preserved a letter of Herod Agrippa to Caligula, testifying to the extent of the Greek diaspora in the year A.D. 38. 'Jerusalem,' wrote Agrippa, 'is the capital city, not of a single country, but of most, because of its colonies in Egypt, Phœnicia, Syria in general, and Hollow Syria, as also in Pamphylia, Cilicia, most districts of Asia (Minor), as far as Bithynia and the extreme parts of Pontus.' In the same way, he continues, Europe was full of Jews: Thessaly, Bœotia, Macedonia, Ætolia, Attica, Argos, Corinth, the best and larger part of Peloponnese. And not the mainland only. For Eubœa, Cyprus, Crete, and the islands generally, were full of Jews.

Many of these Jewish colonists adopted Gr. speech, habits, and culture. They wrote and thought in Greek. They read the Gr. poets and orators; admired and were spectators of Gr. plays; joined Gr. philosophic sects, Pythagoræan, Peripatetic, Stoic or Epicurean. On the other hand, distinctively Jewish sects, like that of the Alexandrian Therapeutæ, ramified, according to Philo (ii. 474), in many parts of the inhabited world, esp. in Greece. Of the interpenetration of the Jewish by the Hellenic genius which resulted, we have left in religious literature three great monuments, the LXX, the NT, and the works of Philo; not to mention numerous extra-canonical apocrypha, some originally written in Aram. or Heb., but mostly surviving in a Gr. form alone. Foremost among the latter in religious interest are the surviving fragments of Enoch and the Jewish Sibylline poems.

The copious works of Philo have probably survived by mere accident; but that they are a mere remnant of a larger Jewish-Gr. literature is evident from the anonymous references to other writers with which his pages abound. Christian writers, especially Eusebius, have preserved the names of, as well as extracts from, several Hellenistic writers of early date: e.g. of a Philo who wrote an epic on Jerus., of a poet Theodotus, and of Ezekiel who wrote a drama about Moses. Among the philosophic writers Aristobulus is remarkable as the first to use, so far as we know, the allegorical method of expounding the Mosaic law, about B.C. 170–150.

These writers were Alexandrine, but there are many more Gr. authors who were probably Pal. Jews or even Samaritans. Among these, Alex. Polyhistor (B.C. 80–40) has preserved to us in his works, as cited by Eusebius, fragments of the chronicler Demetrius (B.C. 222–205), of Eupolemus (B.C. 158–157), and Artapanus, Aristeas, and Cleodemus, all four Jewish historians. Jason of Cyrene (c. B.C. 160) wrote a history of the Maccabæan wars, of which 2 Mac is an abridgment made before Philo's age. The Wisdom of Sol. was probably written in Alexandria before Philo's day. Numenius and Longinus, in the 2nd and 3rd cents. A.D., wrote to some extent under Jewish influence, but were not Jews.

It is of peculiar interest to know how far Hellenism had, in the 300 years preceding Jesus of Nazareth, invaded Judæa itself. The circumstance that the strictly Jewish territory of Judæa, Galilee, and Peræa was wedged in between large and affluent Gr. cities on the E. and W., would in itself suggest considerable inroads of Hellenism. Nor must it be forgotten that at least at every passover thousands of Gr.-speaking Jews were present in Jerus., and that many of them were domiciled there, as is clear from their having synagogues.

In Ac 2^{9} we read that on the day of Pentecost there were present in Jerus. Jews not merely from Parthia, Media, Elam, and Mesopotamia, but from Cappadocia, Pontus, Asia, Phrygia, Pamphylia, Egypt, Libya about Cyrene; also sojourners from Rome, Cretans, and Arabians. Not all of these would speak Gr., but many the vernaculars of their districts. But the enumeration shows how polyglot a multitude was to be met with in Jerus. on any feast day. There is no reason to doubt the tradition that the bilingual Jewish doctors who, perhaps, by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, translated the Law and the Prophets some time early in the 3rd cent. B.C., were sent from Jerus. itself by the high priest Eleasar. For the Jews of Jerus. made, as early as B.C. 300, alliance with Sparta, which was renewed a century and a half later (1 Mac 12$^{7.8.19-22}$, cf. 14$^{18ff.}$). They also made treaties with Gr. cities in Asia; and under the Seleucids, prior to the Maccab. revolt, rapid strides had been made towards their Hellenization. Nor was this revolt directed against the Gr. language, philosophy, and architecture; but was rather excited by the despotic attempt of Antiochus to enforce idolatry. Still it is probable that the success of the revolt was a check to Hellenizing influences, and stimulated the use, not, indeed, of Hebrew, which was already a dead language, and unintelligible to the masses, but of the local Aramaic. If the returned Jews of an earlier generation had not been so gratuitously intolerant of their old Samaritan coreligionists, there would have been a more compact mass of Sem.-speaking people to oppose the inroads of Gr. language and habits. As it was, the very metropolis of Galilee was a Gr. city.

Whatever reaction against Hellenism the Maccab. uprising may have called into being, it is yet certain that Judæa contained during the 1st cent. B.C. a powerful minority of Gr. Jews. The rulers, even of the patriotic Hasmonæan house, bore Gr. names, and the entire influence of the Idumæan usurpers, Herod and Archelaus, who succeeded, was cast on the side of Hellenism. The temple of Herod was a Gr. building; so were all the other monuments and tombs of that epoch. There was a Gr. circus and hippodrome in Jerus., and Herod was surrounded by Gr. philosophers and writers.

The NT itself bears witness to the strength of the Gr. element in the very cradle of the new religion. Of the apostolic writings there is not a single one—with the dubious exception of the Heb. Matthew—which was not from the first written in Gr.; and the Gr. style of Paul, of Peter, of Jude, of James, and of the authors of the two Gospels which claim apost. authorship, is not the style of writers who were tyros or late learners, but of men who had read and spoken Greek from childhood. They were certainly bilingual Jews; and if it is probable that Jesus habitually taught in Aram., it is not less probable that He, like most of His disciples, knew Greek. Philip, who certainly spoke Gr. (Jn 12^{21}, Ac 8^{35}), besides having a Gr. name, came from Bethsaida Julias, a grecized town; whence also came another apostle with a Gr. name, Andrew, and Peter himself (Jn 1^{44}). We hear of believing Greeks (not Gr. Jews) in the entourage of Jesus (Jn 12^{21}); and the cry of anguish, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani, could only have been misunderstood by a Gr.-speaking crowd. How strong was the Hellenistic party in the Church from the first, is clear from the fact that it was their grievances which led to the appointment of the seven, all of whom bore Gr. names, while one, at least, was a proselyte of Antioch (Ac 6^{5}). The mention of the widows of the Hellenists proves that this party in the earliest Church was composed of settled residents in Jerus., and not of mere birds of passage, like the Libyan, Cyrenian, Alexandrine, Cilician, and Asiatic Jews mentioned in the same context. Stephen, who argued with all these, and was also one of the new deacons, must have talked Greek to them; and his speech, which is full of LXX citations, was no doubt delivered in Greek. Later on, in Ac 21^{40}, St. Paul, indeed, addresses the mob in Jerus. in the Heb. dialect, that is, in Aramaic. But that is far from warranting Schürer's inference (HJP II. i. 48), that this mob knew no Greek. For the context (Ac 22^{2}) proves that St. Paul did so only to conciliate them, and therefore as an exception. It is clear that they did not expect it, and were surprised to hear him whom they had just accused of introducing a Gr. into the temple, address them freely in Aramaic. They expected him to speak to them in the same Gr. tongue in which he had been conversing with the chief captain. And it is noticeable that on this occasion, as at Stephen's martyrdom, it was Gr.-speaking Jews (of Asia, Ac 21^{27}) who had stirred up ill-feeling against the followers of the new Messiah.

Many other facts point to the diffusion of a knowledge of Greek in Judæa. The coins of the Hasmonæan epoch bore Greek as well as Aram. legends; those of the Herodean dynasty and of the Romans, Greek alone. The Mishna, which represents the Judæa of that age, is full of Gr. loanwords, even for the commonest objects of life.* In the temple the notices warning Gentiles off from the inner precincts were in Gr. and Latin. It is probable even that the poor and despised in the cities of Judæa were more familiar with Gr. than were the rich Sadducees or the legalistic Pharisees. Thus Jos. at the end of his work (Ant. XX. xi. 2) writes as follows: 'With Gr. letters I was careful to acquire an adequate grammatical acquaintance; though my country's custom was an obstacle to my talking Gr. accurately. For with us they do not approve of those who learn thoroughly the language of many races, because they esteem this accomplishment as one common, not only to the inferior class of free men, but to such servants as care to learn. They allow real wisdom to belong only to those who clearly understand the law and can interpret the meaning of the Holy Scripture.' From the above it is clear that though the Jewish aristocracy disdained to talk Gr., they did not equally disdain to read and write it; and that a command of the spoken idiom looked at askance by Pharisees, scribes, and Sadducees, was yet diffused among the humbler classes. It was just of these humbler people, the 'am-hāārez, who knew not the law (Jn 7^{49}), but who could often talk Gr., that the teaching of Jesus took hold. They composed the earliest Church, and were the lost sheep of the House of Israel.

The crushing reverses which the Jews experienced at the hands of the Rom. power from 70 till 150 A.D., first in Judæa and later in Cyprus, Alexandria, Cyrene, and elsewhere, drove the race in upon itself and soon established a prejudice against any Jewish books not written in Hebrew. A little before A.D. 70, when the final agony was at hand, it was forbidden by the Rabbis to Jewish fathers to have their sons any more instructed in Greek,* which proves that till then it had been a common practice. The writing of divorcement might, according to the Mishna, be in Greek (Gittin, ix. 8); and the LXX was recognized by official Judaism (Megilla, i. 8). In spite of the prejudice aroused against Gr. by the events of A.D. 70, two or three new Gr. translations of OT were made for the use of Gr. Jews in the hundred years which ensued. But the prejudice continued to grow, and the cruelties perpetrated upon Jews by the Christians, so soon as they got the upper hand, must have intensified it. And the result is seen to-day in the circumstance that of all the voluminous Jewish-Greek literature which once existed, nothing survives except what the Christian Church has kept. No doubt the vigilant censorship of the Cath. Church is, in part, responsible for this deprivation, which we of to-day feel so keenly. For the fanaticism which destroyed all heretical works so-called was not likely to spare Jewish books. Still, the prejudices of the Jews themselves must be largely to blame.

The tendencies and characteristics of Greek Judaism will be further dealt with under the articles ISRAEL and RELIGION.

It is enough here to point out that the Gr. Jews were not alien, as is often supposed, from the Messianic hope. The Jewish Sibylline poems know of it; and Philo, in spite of all his Hel. training, held it with intense fervour, as is clear to any one who will read his two tracts de Prœmiis et Poenis and de Exsecrationibus.

The relations of the Jews to their Gr. fellow-townsmen were invariably hostile on both sides. They were constantly ready to massacre each other. This hatred was due to the fact that in each city the Jews formed a community apart, often under archons or ethnarchs, or an assembly of their own. They could join in no heathen festivals, nor eat any meats, nor even use oil for anointing which they had not themselves prepared. How much the Gentiles resented this Jewish exclusiveness is clear from hints in Juvenal, Tacitus, and other ancient writers. The Jews, in fact, held the same position in a pagan community as do the Mohammedans of India among the Hindoos who surround them. Add to this that the Gr. Jews lost no opportunity of making converts among the pagans, and were especially successful in winning over the women. These converts were, of course, obliged to cut themselves adrift from their old friends and families—a circumstance which intensified the hatred of the Greeks for a religion and race at once exclusive and usurping. The propagandism of the Christians had from the first the same result. The new religion, like the old, spread among Gentiles at the expense of family ties and affections; and on their ruin ultimately consecrated the principles and edifice of monasticism. In the Jewish sects of Essenes and Therapeutæ, esp. of the latter, we may trace similar results arising out of similar conditions within Gr. Judaism itself. The Rom. Government, however, always recognized Judaism as the religion of a race, and therefore as something respectable and deserving of protection from Gentile assaults. For Christianity, which was not a national cult, and for that reason a more rapid solvent of family and citizen ties, the Government had less solicitude; and was less anxious, as a rule, to protect it from the storms of popular hatred which it everywhere excited. For further information on such points, see art. on PROSELYTE; and on the whole subject of Greek Judaism, see Schürer, HJP (esp. II. i. 11–51, and II. iii. 156–381), before each chapter of which is given an array of the chief authorities on every part of the subject. F. C. CONYBEARE.

GREEK VERSIONS. — See SEPTUAGINT and VERSIONS.

GREEN.—See COLOURS (vol. i. p. 457^{a}).

GREET, GREETING.—In OT 'greet' occurs only once, 1 S 25^{5} 'Go to Nabal, and greet him in my name' (וּשְׁאֶלְתֶּם־לוֹ בִשְׁמִי לְשָׁלוֹם, lit., as AVm, 'and ask him in my name of peace'). The AV is from Wyc. 1388 (through Bish.); the 1382 ed. has 'salute,' which is the word in Cov. and Dou.; Gen. 'aske him in my name how he doeth.'

In Apocr. the usual Gr. formula of salutation, χαίρειν, is tr^{d} 'greeting' in 1 Es 6^{7}, Ad. Est 16^{1}, 1 Mac 12^{20} 15$^{2.\ 16}$; and 'sendeth' or 'send greeting' in 1 Es 8^{9}, 1 Mac 10$^{18.\ 25}$ 11^{32} 13^{36} 14^{20}, 2 Mac 11$^{16.\ 22.\ 27.\ 34}$. RV omits 'sendeth' or 'send.' In 2 Mac 1^{10} χαίρειν καὶ ὑγιαίνειν is tr^{d} 'sent (RV send) greeting, and health.' In Sir 6^{5} we have 'a fair-speaking tongue will increase kind greetings' (εὐπροσήγορα, RV 'courtesies').

As a simple formula of salutation χαίρειν occurs but thrice in NT, Ac 15^{23} AV 'The apostles and elders and brethren send greeting unto the brethren which are of the Gentiles,' RV omits 'send'; 23^{26} AV 'Claudias Lysias unto the most excellent governor Felix sendeth greeting,' RV omits 'sendeth'; Ja 1^{1} AV 'James . . . to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, greeting,' RVm 'wisheth joy.' And in 2 Jn $^{10.\ 11}$ λέγειν χαίρειν, which in AV is tr^{d} 'bid one God speed,' is in RV rendered 'give one greeting.' But the most frequent use of 'greet' in AV is as a variation for 'salute' in the rendering of ἀσπάζομαι (Ro 16$^{3.\ 5.\ 6.\ 8.\ 11}$, 1 Co 16^{20}, 2 Co 13^{12}, Ph 4^{21}, Col 4^{14}, 1 Th 5^{26}, 2 Ti 4^{21}, Tit 3^{15}, 1 P 5^{14}, 2 Jn ^{13}, 3 Jn ^{14}). Elsewhere, with two exceptions, this verb is tr^{d} 'salute'; and there is little doubt that the Revisers have done wisely in giving 'salute' also in the passages where AV has 'greet.' For the unwary reader is sure to imagine a difference of Greek and of meaning when he finds, e.g. in Ph 4^{21} 'Salute every saint in Christ Jesus. The brethren which are with me greet you'; or in 3 Jn ^{14} 'Our friends salute thee. Greet the friends by name.'

The two exceptions are (1) Ac 20^{1} ἀσπασάμενος ἐξῆλθε πορευθῆναι [edd. πορεύεσθαι] εἰς τὴν Μακεδονίαν, AV 'embraced them and departed for to go into Macedonia,' RV 'took leave of them and departed,' Ramsay 'bade them farewell'; (2) He 11^{13} ἀλλὰ πόρρωθεν αὐτὰς ἰδόντες, καὶ πεισθέντες [edd. omit κ. π.], καὶ ἀσπασάμενοι; AV 'but having seen them [the promises] afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them'; RV 'but having seen them and greeted them from afar,' which Schaff (Companion to Gr. Test. and Eng. Version, 1883, p. 454) quotes in his 'Select List of Improved Readings.'

In like manner the subst. ἀσπασμός is tr^{d} 'greeting' in Mt 23^{7}, Lk 11^{43} 20^{46}, and elsewhere (Mk 12^{38}, Lk 1$^{29.\ 41.\ 44}$, 1 Co 16^{21}, Col 4^{18}, 2 Th 3^{17}) 'salutation.' RV gives 'salutation' everywhere.

J. HASTINGS.

GREYHOUND (זַרְזִיר מָתְנַיִם zarzîr mothnayim, Pr 30^{31}).—These Heb. words signify 'one girt in the loins' (AV and RV 'greyhound,' AVm 'horse,' RVm 'war-horse'). Some have supposed that the intention is to describe a wrestler, owing to his commanding figure. The LXX has 'a cock walking proudly among the hens' (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.). G. E. POST.

GRIEF.—Grief comes from Lat. gravis, heavy, sad, through Fr. grief or gref. And although it is now used to denote mental anguish only, it formerly covered bodily pain as well. In its use (as in some of the Heb. or Gr. words of which it is the tr^{n} in AV) the distinction between bodily and mental pain is not very sharp. Still, its application may be expressed as follows :—

* Talmud, Sota, ix. 14.

1. Bodily pain or disease. (1) Heb. כְּאֵב kĕ'êb, Job 2^{13} 'they saw that his grief was very great' (RVm 'his pain'); so $16^{5.6}$. (2) מַכְאוֹב mak'ôb, 2 Ch 6^{29} 'when every one shall know his own sore and his own grief' (RV 'sorrow,' Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'pain'—clearly the meaning here); Ps 69^{26} 'they talk to the grief of those whom thou hast wounded' (RV 'they tell of the sorrow'; RVm 'pain'—so Perowne, Del., Cheyne, de Witt, and others; LXX τὸ ἄλγος). (3) חָלָה ḥâlâh, to be sick, used in the Niph. ptcp. as an adj. (qualifying מַכָּה 'wound'), and tr^{d} in EV 'grievous,' Jer 10^{19} 14^{17} 30^{12}, Nah 3^{19}, but as a subst. in Is 17^{11} and tr^{d} 'grief.' The Hiphil of the same vb. is tr^{d} in Is 53^{10} 'Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief' (RVm 'made him sick,' i.e. by bruising him so sorely [see Dillm. in loc.], LXX καθαρίσαι αὐτὸν τῆς πληγῆς, Vulg. 'conterere eum in infirmitate,' Orelli 'to crush him by heavy sickness'). (4) חֳלִי ḥŏlî, Is $53^{3.4}$ (RVm 'sickness'); Jer 6^{7} (RV 'sickness'; the parallel is מַכָּה 'wound'), 10^{19} (RVm 'sickness'). (5) ὀδύνη, Sus ^{10} 'And albeit they were both wounded with her love, yet durst not one show another his grief.' This meaning of 'grief' is clearly seen in Shaks. I Henry IV. V. i. 134—'Can honour set to a leg? No. Or an arm? No. Or take away the grief of a wound? No. Honour hath no skill in surgery then?'; or in Parkinson, Theatre of Plants (1640), p. 1489—'The oyle which is made of the berries [of the bay] is very comfortable in all cold griefes of the joynts.'

2. Mental affliction. (1) יָגָה yâgâh, in Hiph. to cause sorrow, La 3^{32}, and the subst. יָגוֹן yâgôn, sorrow, Ps 31^{10}, Jer 45^{3} (RV 'sorrow' in both places). (2) כַּעַס ka'aṣ, vexation, 1 S 1^{16}, Ps 6^{7} 31^{9}, Pr 17^{25}, Ec 1^{18} 2^{23}; and its dialectic variety כַּעַשׂ ka'as, Job 6^{2}. (3) λυπέω, to cause grief, 2 Co 2^{5} 'If any have caused grief, he hath not grieved me' (RV 'have caused sorrow'); and the subst. λύπη, Wis 8^{9} 11^{12}, Sir 37^{2}, 1 Mac $6^{8.9.13}$. (4) ἀκηδία, Sir 29^{5} 'But when he should repay, he will prolong the time, and return words of grief' (λόγους ἀκηδίας, RV 'words of heaviness,' so the word is tr^{d} by EV in its two remaining occurrences in LXX, Ps 119^{28}, Is 61^{3}). (5) Once the vb. στενάζω, to groan, He 13^{17} 'they watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief' (καὶ μὴ στενάζοντες, RVm 'and not with groaning,' Vaughan 'with lamentations over lost souls'). Shaks. uses the word in both the foregoing senses in one line, II Henry IV. I. i. 144—

> 'Even so my limbs,
> Weakened with grief, being now enrag'd with grief,
> Are thrice themselves. Hence, therefore, thou nice crutch!'

3. In one of the passages referred to above, Pr 17^{25}, the word has evidently an active meaning, though the Hebrew is כַּעַס ka'aṣ, which expresses usually the feeling of vexation: 'A foolish son is a grief to his father.' This meaning is seen also in Gn 26^{35} 'Which were a grief of mind unto Isaac and to Rebekah' (מֹרַת רוּחַ, RVm 'bitterness of spirit'); 1 S 25^{31} 'And it shall come to pass . . . that this shall be no grief unto thee, nor offence of heart unto my lord, . . . that thou hast shed blood causeless' (לְפוּקָה, RVm 'cause of staggering'; LXX βδελυγμός [possibly, says Driver, a corruption of the unusual λυγμός, the word in Aq. and Symm.] καὶ σκάνδαλον; Vulg. 'in singultum et scrupulum cordis'; Dou. 'an occasion of sobbing to thee, and a scruple of heart to my lord'); Jon 4^{6} 'And the Lord God prepared a gourd, and made it to come up over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head, to deliver him from his grief' (מֵרָעָתוֹ, RV 'from his evil case'); Sir 26^{6} 'But a grief of heart and sorrow is a woman that is jealous over another woman' (ἄλγος); 1 P 2^{19} 'For this is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully' (λύπας, RV 'griefs'; Vulg. 'tristitias,' hence Wyc. 'sorews or hevynesses,' and Rhem. 'sorowes.' But the meaning is clearly 'things that cause sorrow,' 'grievances,' and no doubt this was Tindale's meaning in introducing 'grief,' followed by all the rest of the versions). For 'grief' was frequently used in the sense of 'grievance,' as Shaks. Pericles, I. ii. 66—

> 'Bear with patience
> Such griefs as you yourself do lay upon yourself.'

Grievance occurs but once, Hab 1^{3} 'Why dost thou show me iniquity, and cause me to behold grievance?' (עָמָל, RV 'perverseness' as the word is tr^{d} by AV in Nu 23^{21}). The Heb. is a common word for 'toil,' but also has the double sense of misery and mischief—see Davidson, in loc. Wyclif's word is 'traveile' after Vulg. 'laborem,' Dou. 'labour'; other VSS 'sorrow.' 'Grievance' seems to be original to AV, and it is used in the sense of affliction, grief, as Shaks. Two Gent. of Verona, IV. iii. 37—

> 'Madam, I pity much your grievances.'

Grieve. The verb to grieve, now almost entirely intrans., is so in AV only once, Jer 5^{3} 'thou hast stricken them, but they have not grieved' (וְלֹא־חָלוּ, either from חול to writhe in pain, or [with most edd.] from חָלָה to be sick [wrongly accented]; RV 'they were not grieved'). The trans. vb. occurs often, and with the following meanings :—

1. To make sorry, Dt 15^{10} 'Thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him;' (יֵרַע, lit. 'be evil,' that is 'sad,' the opposite of the 'good' [טוֹב] or 'cheerful heart' of Jg $19^{6.9}$ etc. So 1 S 1^{8}, Neh 2^{10} 13^{8}); 1 S 2^{33} 'and to grieve thine heart' (וְלַאֲדִיב, prob. a corrupt reading for וּלְהָדִיב, from דוב to pine away—Driver); 15^{11} 'And it grieved Samuel' (וַיִּחַר לִשְׁמוּאֵל, which must mean 'was wroth,' as RV. But LXX [ἠθύμησε, 'was despondent'] must have read וַיֵּמַר. Weir suggests וַיֵּצֶר, which is accepted by Driver. Vulg. gives 'conturbatus est,' Wyc. 'was sory,' Dou. 'was strooken sadde,' Gen. 'was moved': but Cov. 'Therefore was Samuel angrye,' which Rog. changed to 'was evell apayd' [=was ill content], and he was followed by the Bishops); Job 30^{25} 'was not my soul grieved for the poor?' (עָגְמָה); Ps 73^{21} 'Thus my heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins' (יִתְחַמֵּץ; RVm 'was in a ferment,' a change for which, says Cheyne [Expos. 3rd ser. vi. 44], we may be thankful, adding, 'Fancy a sufferer, of the school of the author of Job, saying that "his heart was grieved"'; he also refers to Segond's bold and happy rendering, 'Lorsque mon cœur s'aigrissait, et que je me sentais percé dans les entrailles.' Oxf. Heb. Lex. tr. 'my heart was soured or embittered'); Is 54^{6} 'as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit' (עֲזוּבָה וַעֲצוּבַת רוּחַ; Cheyne, 'as an outcast and downcast woman'; La 3^{33} 'For he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men' (וַיַּגֶּה); Dn 7^{15} 'I Daniel was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body' (אֶתְכְּרִיַּת רוּחִי); 2 Es 10^{8} 'seeing we all mourn and are sad . . . art thou grieved for one son?' ('tu autem contristaris in uno filio'); Mk 3^{5} 'being grieved for the hardness of their hearts' (συνλυπούμενος, the prep., says Gould, probably denoting the sympathetic character of the grief; He was grieved because they hurt themselves).

2. To be heavy on, weary, harass: Gn 49^{23} 'The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him' (וַיְמָרְרֻהוּ); Dillm. 'became bitter against him' [lit. 'treated him bitterly']; Spurrell, 'harassed him'; Job 4^{2} 'If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved?' (תִּלְאֶה, lit. 'wilt thou be wearied?') So Pr 26^{15} 'The slothful man hideth his hand in his bosom; it grieveth him to bring it again to his mouth' (AVm 'he is weary'); Ps 78^{40} 'How oft did they . . . grieve him in the desert' (יַעֲצִיבוּהוּ); 112^{10}

'The wicked shall see it and be grieved' (וְכָעָס, Oxf. Lex. 'be vexed or indignant,' as in Neh 3^{33}, Ec 5^{16}); Ac 4^{2} 16^{18} (both διαπονέω). For this meaning of 'grieve' cf. 2 S 3^{34} Wyc. 'Thin hondis ben not boundun, and thi feet ben not greved with fettris'; Is 7^{13} Cov. 'Is it not ynough for you, that ye be grevous unto men, but ye must greve my God also?'; and Child, Ballads, iv. 150—

> 'Yet in suche fere yf that ye were,
> Amonge enemys day and nyght;
> I wolde withstonde, with bowe in hande,
> To greeve them as I myght.'

3. To cause loathing, to disgust: Ex 1^{12} 'They were grieved because of the children of Israel' (יָקֻצוּ, RVm 'abhorred'); Ps 95^{10} 'Forty years long was I grieved with this generation' (אָקוּט; LXX προσώχθισα; Vulg. 'offensus fui,' Wyc. 'offended i was'; Del. 'had I a loathing at'; Kay 'loathed' or 'rejected with abhorrence'). The same vb. (in Hithp.) is tr^{d} 'grieve' in Ps 119^{158} 139^{21}, where RVm gives 'loathe'; He 3$^{10.\,17}$ (quot^{n} of Ps 95^{10}, and the only occurrences in NT of προσοχθίζω, which is the tr^{n} in LXX of גָּעַל to loathe, קוֹא to spue out, קוּץ to be disgusted with, etc.: see Thayer, s.v.). Cf. Ex 17^{18} Tind. 'And the fishe that is in the river shall dye, and the river shall stinke; so that it shall greve the Egyptians to drinke of the water of the ryver.'

4. To give pain, to hurt: Est 4^{4} 'Then was the queen exceedingly grieved' (וַתִּתְחַלְחַל, Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'and she writhed [in anxiety]'); Is 57^{10}, Am 6^{6} (both חָלָה to be sick, one in Piel 'to become sick,' other in Niph. 'to be made sick'); Ro 14^{15} 'If thy brother be grieved with thy meat' (λυπεῖται). This meaning, being always fig. in AV, is scarcely distinguishable from (2) above, but it was once quite distinct, and is used literally by Spenser, FQ I. viii. 17—

> 'Thereat he rored for exceeding paine,
> That to have heard great horror would have bred;
> And scourging th' emptie ayre with his long trayne,
> Through great impatience of his grieved head.'

Grievous follows grieve pretty closely in meaning. 1. Burdensome, as Gn 12^{10} 'the famine was grievous in the land'; 1 K 12^{4} 'Thy father made our yoke grievous'; Is 15^{4} 'His life shall be grievous unto him'; Ph 3^{1} 'To write the same things unto you, to me, indeed, is not grievous'; 1 Jn 5^{3} 'His commandments are not grievous.' Cf. Ex 18^{18} Tind. 'The thinge is too grevous for the, and thou art not able to do it thi selfe alone.' 2. Distressing, irritating, Ex 8^{24} 'a grievous swarm of flies'; Ps 10^{5} 'His ways are always grievous'; Pr 15^{1} 'grievous words stir up anger'; 15^{10} 'Correction is grievous unto him that forsaketh the way'; Ac 20^{29} 'after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you.' So Is 19^{4} Cov. 'I wil delyver Egipte also in to the hondes of grievous rulers, and a cruel king shal have the rule of them.' 3. Threatening, alarming: Ps 31^{18} 'Let the lying lips be put to silence which speak grievous things.' Cf. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 150, 'At these wordes all they that were present began to murmure, and to cast a disdaynous and grevous loke upon Gysippus'; and Bunyan, PP (Clar. Press ed. p. 105), 'So when he arose, he getteth him a grievous Crab-tree Cudgel, and goes down into the Dungeon to them.' 4. Heinous, severe: Gn 18^{20} 'their sin is very grievous'; Jer 16^{4} 'They shall die of grievous deaths.' So Shaks. Jul. Cæs. III. ii. 84—

> 'If it were so, it was a grievous fault,
> And grievously hath Cæsar answered it.'

5. Sorrowful: Gn 50^{11} 'This is a grievous mourning to the Egyptians.' Cf. Hakluyt, Voyages, i. 159, 'The grievous complaynts of our liege subjects concerning traffique.'

Grievously is either severely, Is 9^{1}, Jer 23^{19}, Wis 19^{16}, 2 Mac 9^{28}, Mt 8^{6} 15^{22}; heinously, La 1$^{8.\,20}$, Ezk 14^{3}; or painfully, 2 Mac 7^{39} 14^{28}. Cf. Taverner's Bible, 3 Mac 4 $^{\text{Heading}}$ 'The people had pyty to se them so grevouslye handled'; Udal, Erasmus' Paraphrase on Mk 5 'The common sort are wont to take the deathe of yong folkes much grievouslyer then of old.'

Grievousness occurs but twice, Is 10^{1} 'Woe unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write grievousness which they have prescribed' (עָמָל, i.e. burdensomeness, oppression; RV 'perverseness' as the same word is tr^{d} by EV in Nu 23^{21}. In Hab 1^{3} it is 'grievance' in AV [as above]); Is 21^{15} 'They fled . . . from the grievousness of war' (מִפְּנֵי כֹּבֶד מִלְחָמָה, lit. 'from the face of the weight of war,' Vulg. 'a facie gravis prœlii,' Wyc. 'fro the face of the grevous bataile'). Udal uses the word in the sense of heinousness (Erasmus' Paraphrase on Mk 5), 'Consider not the multitude and grievousnes of thyne offences; onelye regarde that Jesus is he that came to save all men, and is able to doe all thinges with a beck.'

GRINDER.—The 'grinders' of Ec 12^{3} are the grinding women at the mill (see MILL). But in the margin of Job 29^{17} the 'grinders' are the molar teeth. Cf. Holland, Pliny, xi. 37, 'The great grinders which stand beyond the eye-teeth, in no creature whatsoever do fall out of themselves,' and Fuller, Worthies (Ches-shire), 'How necessary these are for man's sustenance, is proved by the painfull experience of such aged persons, who wanting their molare teeth, must make use of their gums for grinders.'

GRISLED (modern 'grizzled') is the tr^{n} of [בָּרֹד] bârôd, 'spotted' (perhaps as with בָּרָד 'hail') in Gn 31$^{10.\,12}$ of rams, and in Zec 6$^{3.\,6}$ of horses. Shaks. uses both spellings, Pericles, iii., Gower—

> 'The grisled north
> Disgorges such a tempest forth.'

Hamlet, I. ii. 240—

> 'Ham. His beard was grizzled? No?
> Hor. It was, as I have seen it in his life,
> A sable silvered.'

The word means 'grey,' and in middle Eng. a 'grisel' was a grey-haired man, as Gower, Conf. Amantis, iii. 356, 'That olde grisel is no fole.' It has no connexion with grisly = hideous. See COLOURS.

GROSS is used in AV of darkness (Is 60^{2}, Jer 13^{16}), and of man's heart (Mt 13^{15}, Ac 28^{27}). In the first case 'gross darkness' is tr^{n} of עֲרָפֶל, which is tr^{d} simply 'darkness' everywhere except in those two places and in Job 22^{13} (AV 'dark cloud,' RV 'thick darkness'), Dt 5^{22} (EV 'thick darkness'), Ezk 34^{12} (יוֹם ע״ EV 'dark day,' RVm 'day of thick darkness'). The meaning of 'gross' is thus simply 'thick,' 'impenetrable.' In the second case 'make gross' is tr^{n} of παχύνω, which means lit. 'make thick or fat,' and fig. 'make stupid,' and occurs in NT only in those two places, where it is an exact quotation from LXX of Is 6^{10} (EV 'Make the heart of this people fat'). Gross has thus the metaphorical sense of dull, stupid, crass.

Gross means properly 'large,' 'bulky,' as Shaks. Lear, IV. vi. 14—

> 'The crows and choughs that wing the midway air
> Show scarce so gross as beetles.'

Then it expresses that which is big and plain, as Tindale, Works, i. 97, 'Scripture speaketh after the most gross manner'; and Udal, Erasmus' Paraphrase on 1 Jn 1 (fol. 271), 'In dede the unbelief of mans heart required, that the trueth should be credited by grosse outward experimentes.' And, yet more figuratively, it was used to express density of mind, as Knox, Hist. 424, 'The Earle of Athole, who was thought to be a man of grosse judgement.' In NT it expresses more than mental dulness, which involves moral culpability only as it is the result of wilful rejection of light.

GROUND (אֲדָמָה, אֶרֶץ, γῆ) is used in AV indifferently with 'earth' as the tr. of the Heb. and Gr. words enumerated under EARTH. In RV, on the contrary, there appears to be an attempt (although it has not been carried out with uniformity) to retain 'ground' as the tr. of אֲדָמָה, and 'earth' as that of אֶרֶץ. The following examples of the word deserve notice—

1. In older English 'ground' was used where we should now prefer either 'earth' or 'land,' as Jer 27^5 'I have made the earth, the man and the beast that are upon the ground' (עַל־פְּנֵי הָאָרֶץ, RV 'upon the face of the earth'); Ezk 19^{13} 'in a dry and thirsty ground' (אֶרֶץ, RV 'land'). Cf. Is 53^8 Cov. 'Whose generacion yet no man maye nombre, when he shalbe cut of from the grounde of the lyvinge.' 2. In Sir 18^6 'ground' is used figuratively for the bottom of a thing, 'As for the wondrous works of the Lord, there may nothing be taken from them, neither may anything be put to them, neither can the ground of them be found out.' This is Coverdale's tr^n, and it has been adopted by all the VSS after him, except the Douay, though the Gr. is merely οὐκ ἔστιν ἐξιχνιάσαι. The Vulg. has simply 'nec est invenire,' whence Wyc. 'nethir it is to fynde,' and Dou. 'neither is it possible to finde.' RV gives 'Neither is it possible to track them out.' Ground is used in the Preface to AV 1611, with the same meaning, 'Therefore let no mans eye be evill, because his Maiesties is good . . . but let us rather blesse God from the ground of our heart, for working this religious care in him, to have the translations of the Bible maturely considered of and examined.' 3. In 1 Ti 3^{15} 'ground' means basis or 'foundation,' 'the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth'; Gr. ἑδραίωμα, AVm and RVm 'stay.' This is the only occurrence of the word in classical or biblical Greek. The Vulg. renders by 'firmamentum,' whence Wyc. 'sadnesse' [=strength], all other VSS having 'ground.' So in Preface to AV, 1611, 'The Edition of the Seventy . . . was used by the Greek Fathers for the ground and Foundation of their Commentaries.' Cf. T. Fuller, Holy Warre, iii. 2, p. 112, 'But well did one in the Council of Trent give these titular Bishops the title of figmenta humana, mans devices; because they have as little ground in Gods word and the ancient Canons for their making, as ground in Palestine for their maintenance.' The same meaning is expressed by the verb 'to ground,' which is found in AV as a ptcp. only, Is 30^{32} 'And in every place where the grounded staff shall pass, which the LORD shall lay upon him, it shall be with tabrets and harps' (וְהָיָה כֹּל מַעֲבַר מַטֵּה מוּסָדָה, AVm 'every passing of the rod founded'; RV 'every stroke of the appointed staff,' RVm 'every passing of the staff of doom' *); Eph 3^{17} 'being rooted and grounded in love'; Col 1^{23} 'If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled' (both τεθεμελιωμένοι). Cf. Mt 7^{25} ‖ Lk 6^{48}, Tind. 'the wyndes blewe and bet upon that same housse, and it fell not, because it was grounded on the rocke.' In Ex 9^{18} Tind. uses the word in the slightly different sense of established, 'Tomorow this tyme I will send doune a mightie great hayle; even soch one as was not in Egipte sence it was grounded.'

* The passage is difficult. Most of the Eng. VSS, like the LXX, paraphrase rather than translate. The rendering of AV, which is nearly that of Vulg. ('Et erit transitus virgæ fundatus') is barely intelligible, even after it is improved by Kay, 'And every passing of the staff of sure foundation.' An easy emendation of the Heb. is שֵׁבֶט מוּסָר 'rod of correction,' of Pr 22^{15}, but Skinner thinks it too easy to be worth much, besides that it only replaces one singular expression by another. Modern edd. as a rule prefer something like RVm. Thus Del. 'every stroke of the rod of destiny'; Plumptre, 'wherever shall pass the destined rod'; Cheyne, 'whenever the destined staff passeth over,' referring to Hab 1^{12} 'O Jehovah, thou hast appointed them [same verb] for judgment.'

GROVE.—1. אֲשֵׁרָה, אֲשֵׁירָה 'ăshêrâh, ἄλσος, lucus. Wherever the word grove occurs as the tr^n of 'ăshērâh it should be transliterated as in RV. See ASHERAH.

2. אֵשֶׁל 'êshel, ἄρουρα. Abraham is said to have planted a 'grove' (AV Gn 21^{33} marg. 'tree'). Saul abode 'under a tree' (AV 1 S 22^6 marg. 'grove in a high place'). The bodies of Saul and his sons were buried 'under a tree' (1 S 31^{13} AV). In all these passages RV correctly renders 'êshel, which is the same as the Arab. 'athl, by 'tamarisk tree.' See TAMARISK.

G. E. POST.

GRUDGE.—Skeat (Etymol. Dict.^{2} s.v.) derives 'grudge' originally from the imitative sound kru or gru, seen in Gr. γρῦ, the grunt of a pig; 'grunt' and 'growl' coming from the same root. Hence its primary meaning is to express audible discontent, murmur, as Paston Letters, 138, 'I here a gruggyng.' In this sense 'grudge' is of frequent occurrence in the earlier versions. Thus Lk 15^2 Wyc. (1380), 'And Farisees and Scribis grucchiden, seyinge, For this man receyveth synful men, and etith with hem' (Tind. and all others 'murmured'); 19^7 Wyc. (1380), 'And whanne alle men sayen, thei grucchiden, seyinge, For he hadde turned to a synful man' (Tind. 'And when they sawe that, they all groudged'; Rhem. 'they murmured,' and so AV); Ac 6^1 Wyc. (1388), 'the Grekis grutchiden [1380, 'grucchinge'] agens the Ebrews' (Tind. 'ther arose a grudge amonge the Grekes agaynste the Ebrues,' Rhem. and AV 'a murmuring'); 1 Co 10^{10} Wyc. (1380), 'Neither grucche [1388, 'grutche'] ye, as summe of hem grucchiden [1388, 'grutchiden'], and thei perisheden of a wastour, or destrier' (Tind. 'Nether murmur ye as some of them murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer'); Mk 14^5 Tind. 'And they grudged agaynste hir' (Wyc. [both VSS] 'thei groyneded in to hir'; Rhem. and AV 'they murmured against her'); Ps 2^1 Pr. Bk. 'Why do the heathen grudge together?' (changed in 1662 into 'so furiously rage together'). About 1611, says Trench (On AV of NT, p. 48), 'to grudge' was ceasing to have the sense of 'murmur openly,' and was already signifying 'to repine inwardly'; and a 'grudge' was no longer an open utterance of discontent and displeasure at the dealings of another, but a secret resentment thereupon entertained. Accordingly 'grudge' of the earlier VSS was sometimes displaced in AV by 'murmur' (a change, however, which had in every such case except Nu 17^5 been made already by Dou.-Rhem.); but it was retained in a few places,—'by an oversight,' says Trench. These places are: Ps 59^{15} 'Let them ['the pack of hounds with which Saul is hunting David'—Del.] wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied' (וַיָּלִינוּ; AVm 'If they be not satisfied then will they stay all night,' so RV 'and tarry all night if they be not satisfied');* Wis 12^{27} 'For look for what things they grudged, when they were punished' (ἠγανάκτουν, Vulg. 'indignabantur,' RV 'whereat they were indignant'); Sir 10^{25} 'And he that hath knowledge will not grudge when he is reformed' (οὐ γογγύσει; Vulg. 'non murmurabit,' RV 'will not murmur thereat'); Ja 5^9 'Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned' (μὴ στενάζετε, Vulg. 'Nolite ingemiscere,' RV 'murmur not').

---

* AVm and RV give the only possible tr^n of the Mass. text, and they are in agreement with most mod. edd. (Del., Per., de Witt, Kirkp. etc.), as well as with the Gen. version 'and surely they shal not be satisfied, thogh thei tarie all night.' The AV is the rendering of וַיָּלִינוּ or וַיָּלִנוּ, and is after LXX (γογγύσουσιν), Aq., Vulg. ('murmurabunt'), Jer., Wyc. 'thei shal grucche' (1388, 'grutche'), Luth., Cov. ('grudge,' so Rog., Cran., Bish.), Dou. ('murmur'); and it is preferred by Burgess and Cheyne. Wellh. (PB) gives 'They shall be sated, forsooth, and be quieted.'

This meaning of the word may be illustrated by Elyot, The Governour, ii. 183, 'Semblably there be some that by dissimulation can ostent or shewe a highe gravitie, mixte with a sturdy entretaynement and facion, exilinge them selves from all pleasure and recreation, frowninge and grutchinge at every thinge wherein is any myrthe or solace, all though it be honeste'; so Sir John Maundevile, Voiage, p. 69 (ed. 1727), 'Thanne passe men be the welle that Moyses made with his honde in the Desertes, whan the people grucched, for thei found no thinge to drynke.'

In the same sense the subst. 'grudging' has been retained in AV in 1 P 4^{9} 'Use hospitality one to another without grudging' (TR ἄνευ γογγυσμῶν, edd. γογγυσμοῦ, RV 'without murmuring'). Cf. Ex 16^{7} Wyc. 'I have herd forsothe youre grucchynge agens the Lord; what forsoth ben we, that ye grucchen agens us?' (Tind. 'because he hath herde youre grudgynges agaynst the Lorde: for what are we that ye should murmure against us?'); Nu 17^{5} Tind. 'So I wyll make cease from me the grudgynges of the children of Israel which they grudge agenst you.' So Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 150, 'Leave youre grudgynges and menasinge countenaunce towarde Gysippus'; and Chaucer, Persones Tale, 499, 'After bakbyting cometh grucching or murmuracion; and somtyme it springeth of impacience agayns God, and somtyme agayns man.'

The modern meaning of the word is found twice in AV, in the phrase 'bear a grudge against,' and in the adv. 'grudgingly': Lv 19^{18} 'Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people'; 2 Co 9^{7} 'Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity: for God loveth a cheerful giver' (ἐκ λύπης, lit. 'out of sorrow,' as RVm).

GUARD.—1. The guards of a foreign ruler (king of Egypt, Gn 37^{36} al.; king of Babylon, 2 K 25^{8} al., Jer 39^{10} al., Dn 2^{14}) are called הַטַּבָּחִים haṭṭabbâḥîm (Aram. טַבָּחַיָּא ṭabbâḥayyâ), 'the slayers.' The singular טַבָּח ṭabbâḥ (1 S 9$^{23.\,24}$) is translated 'cook,' but the literal meaning is 'slayer [of animals],' for in the East the cook has a double duty ('slay and make ready,' Gn 43^{16}). In RVm (Gn 37^{36} al.) ṭabbâḥîm is translated 'executioners'; but though the guards carried out executions, it may be doubted if this work gave them their name. In the Apocrypha the guards of a Persian king (1 Es 3^{4}) and of Holofernes (Jth 12^{7}) are called οἱ σωματοφύλακες.

2. An Israelite king had רָצִים râẓîm, lit. 'runners' (1 S 22^{17} RV [also in 21^{7}, if we adopt, with Driver, Grätz's doubtful conjecture רָצִים 'runners,' instead of MT רֹעִים 'herdsmen'], 2 K 11^{6}) who ran before his chariot (1 K 1^{5}), and kept watch at his door (1 K 14$^{27.\,28}$=2 Ch 12$^{10.\,11}$). In 1 S 31^{6} they are called his 'men' (his 'house,' 1Ch 10^{6}). David had also foreign guards, CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES (which see). At a later time the Carites, הַכָּרִי hakkârî (2 K 11^{4} RV), were probably foreign guards. On the other hand, מִשְׁמַעַת mishma'ath, 'guard' (2 S 23^{23} =1 Ch 11^{25}) probably means 'council' (as 1 S 22^{14} RV), the body which heard (fr. שָׁמַע shâma', 'to hear') the king's affairs (but see Driver, ad loc.). The guard had an armoury or guardroom, תָּא הָרָצִים tâ' hârâẓîm (1 K 14^{28}), perhaps in the house of the forest of Lebanon (1 K 10^{17}). In the fallen state of Judah after the Return, Nehemiah's guards (if regular guards they were) are called (not râẓîm, 'runners,' for the word suggests 'pomp,' but) אַנְשֵׁי הַמִּשְׁמָר 'anshê hammishmâr, 'men of the watch' (Neh 4^{23}).

3. The well-known Prætorian Guard is mentioned in two places of the NT, in Ac 28^{16} (a passage absent from WH and from RV text) τῷ στρατοπεδάρχῃ (-χῳ), 'the captain of the guard' ('of the prætorian guard,' RVm), and in Ph 1^{13} ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ, 'throughout the whole prætorian guard,' RV.

4. There is mention in Mt 27$^{65.\,66}$ (ἔχετε κουστωδίαν, 'ye have a guard,' RV) of the Temple Guard, which, under a Roman officer, was stationed in the Tower of Antonia, and had charge of the high-priestly vestments (Jos. Ant. XV. xi. 4).

5. In Mk 6^{27} σπεκουλάτωρ (Lat. speculator, 'a soldier of his guard,' RV) properly means 'a look-out officer.' Ten such officers were attached to each legion. They were used for bearing despatches (Suet. Calig. 44), and for executions (Senec. De Ira, i. 16). See Wordsworth on Mk 6^{27}, and Benson, Cyprian, p. 505 note.

GUDGODAH (הַגֻּדְגֹּדָה).—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites, mentioned only Dt 10^{7}, whence they proceeded to Jotbathah. There can be little doubt that Hor-haggidgad in the itinerary of Nu 33^{33} indicates the same place. The general considerations which suggest a site for it in or near the Arabah are given in § iv. of the art. EXODUS, and the position of Wady Ghudaghid (which runs into the Wady Jerafeh, see maps of Robinson and Palmer) is suitable, but the identity of name is exceedingly doubtful (see Driver on Dt 10^{7}). It should be noted that Gudgodah has the def. art. in Heb., and that the LXX translates Γαδγάδ, as it does in the case of Horhaggidgad (wh. see).

A. T. CHAPMAN.

GUESS is used intrans. (followed by 'at') in the sense of 'divine,' 'find out,' Wis 9^{16} 'Hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon earth' (μόλις εἰκάζομεν, Vulg. 'difficile æstimamus,' RV 'divine,' RVm 'conjecture'); Sir 9^{14} 'As near as thou canst, guess at thy neighbour, and consult with the wise' (στόχασαι τοὺς πλησίον; Vulg. 'cave te a proximo tuo'; RV 'guess at thy neighbours'; Edersheim, 'seek to make out,' or 'search out'). Shaks., who uses the word chiefly transitively, has it in this sense also, as Ant. and Cleop. III. iii. 29—

> 'Guess at her years, I pr'ythee';

and Lucrece, 1238—

> 'Their gentle sex to weep are often willing;
> Grieving themselves to guess at others' smarts.'

GUEST occurs three times in EV of OT, and in every instance it is the tr^{n} of a Heb. term (קְרֻאִים) which means simply 'called.' A similar term is used in Arabic. Thus we have the 'guests' at Adonijah's feast, 1 K 1$^{41.\,49}$; the 'guests' of the 'foolish woman,' Pr 9^{18}; the 'guests' whom J″ consecrates to partake of the sacrifice consisting of Israel, Zeph 1^{7} (see Davidson and Nowack, ad loc.). In NT we read of the 'guests' (ἀνακείμενοι, lit. 'those reclining') at the wedding feast. In Lk 19^{7} RV more exactly substitutes 'gone in to lodge' for AV 'gone to be guest.' The Gr. is καταλῦσαι, which occurs in the same sense in Gn 19^{2} 24$^{23.\,25}$ (both לִין), Sir 14$^{25.\,27}$ 36^{31} [Eng.^{26}].

Guest-chamber (κατάλυμα) occurs in Mk 14^{14}, Lk 22^{11}, and in RV is substituted for 'parlour' of AV in 1 S 9^{22}. The Heb. is לִשְׁכָּה, which here means 'sacrificial dining-room.' See INN.

The Heb. term (קָרוּא) may suggest a wayfarer who is hailed and urged to come in, and is suggestive at once of the infrequency of travel and the simplicity of the ancient life. It is still the universal custom for those who are sitting at meat in the open air to invite any passers-by to join them. Masons sitting at their mid-day meal by the roadside invite any passer-by who happens to look at them. In the house, the master or mistress passing through the kitchen where the servants are taking food, will be courteously invited to partake. Usually such invitations are a mere expression of courtesy, and it is not expected that they will be acted upon; but the custom, now largely artificial, explains what the reality must have been.

Job mentions, as an item in his self-defence, that he did not eat his morsel alone (Job 31^{17}).

In the East, no figure is more invested with chivalry than the guest. In his own right he cannot cross the threshold, but, when once he is invited within, all do him honour and unite in rendering service (Gn 18. 19, Jg 19; cf. Trumbull, Oriental Social Life, 73 ff.). For this relationship of host and guest, see further under HOSPITALITY.

GUILT.—See SIN. GUILT-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

GUILTY.—The adj. ἔνοχος (=ἐνεχόμενος, 'held in,' 'in the grip of') is tr^{d} 'in danger of' in Mt $5^{21.\ 22\ ter}$, Mk 3^{29} (RV 'guilty of'); and in He 2^{15} 'subject to'; but in its remaining occurrences it is rendered in AV 'guilty of,' Mt 26^{66} 'He is guilty of death,' RV 'worthy of,' RVm 'liable to'; Mk 14^{64}; 1 Co 11^{27} 'guilty of the body and blood of the Lord,' so RV; Ja 2^{10} 'For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all,' RV 'is become guilty of all.' The phrase is quite un-English, and, although it is found elsewhere, as in the translation of the First Article of the Judgement of the Synode of Dort (1619), 'Forasmuchas all men have sinned in Adam, and are become guiltie of the curse, and eternall death,' it is used, no doubt, in imitation of the Eng. versions.* The expression is introduced by Wyclif after the Vulg. 'reus est mortis'; Tind. in Mt 26^{66}, Mk 14^{64} used 'worthy of,' and was followed by all the versions, except the Rhem., which again tr^{d} the Vulg. 'guilty of,' and the Rhem. tr^{n} was accepted by AV; in 1 Co 11^{27}, Ja 2^{10} all the VSS have 'guilty of.' J. HASTINGS.

GULF.—Aldis Wright (in Shaks. Macbeth, on IV. i. 23), following Wedgwood, says that 'gulf' in the sense of arm of the sea is derived from Fr. golfe, It. golfo, and connected with Gr. κόλπος; but in the sense of whirlpool or swallowing eddy it is connected with Dutch gulpen, our 'gulp,' to swallow, and with the old Dutch golpe, a whirlpool. There are certainly the two distinct meanings, at any rate. Thus Hakluyt, Voyages, iii. 206, 'among which high and low lands there is a gulfe or breach in some places about 55 fadome deepe, and 15 leagues in bredth'; and Shaks. Henry V. II. iv. 10—

> 'England his approaches makes as fierce
> As waters to the sucking of a gulf.'

In the latter sense the word is used figuratively, as T. Fuller, Holy and Profane State, ii. 16—'Nor do I honour the memory of Mulcaster for anything so much, as for his Scholar, that gulf of learning, Bishop Andrews.' But it is in the former sense that the word is used in AV. It is found only in Lk 16^{26} 'Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed.' The Gr. is χάσμα, which occurs only here in NT, and in LXX only 2 S 18^{17} where it translates פַּחַת the great 'pit' (EV) in the forest into which they cast the body of Absalom. The Gr. χάσμα gives our word 'chasm,' but that word was scarcely in use* before 1611, and is not found in any of the versions. Wyc. (after Vulg. 'chaos† magnum') has 'a greet derke place,' and Rhem. more literally 'a great chaos'; Tind. chose 'a great space,' and was followed by Cov., Rog., Cran.; the Gen. introduced 'a great gulfe' (with 'swallowing pit' in the margin), and the Bishops, AV, RV have accepted that rendering.

The Rabbinical conception of the separation between the two parts of Hades was a thin wall, a mere hand- or finger-breadth (Weber, Lehre des Talmud, 326 f.). J. HASTINGS.

GUNI (גּוּנִי).—1. The eponym of a Naphtalite family, Gn 46^{24}=1 Ch 7^{13} (cf. Nu 26^{48} where the gentilic Gunites occurs). 2. A Gadite chief, 1 Ch 5^{15}. See GENEALOGY. According to Klostermann, Driver, and Budde, we should also read 'the Gunite' (הַגּוּנִי) for 'Jonathan' in 2 S 23^{32}; and for 'the Gizonite' in 1 Ch 11^{34}. Luc. has in the first passage ὁ Γουνύ and in the second ὁ Γουνί.

GUR (גּוּר 'dwelling,' 'sojourning').—An 'ascent' by Ibleam and Beth-haggan, 2 K 9^{27}. Possibly, these two are the modern Yebla and Beit Jenn. But see IBLEAM.

GUR-BAAL (גּוּר־בַּעַל, 'dwelling of Baal').—An unknown locality named in 2 Ch 26^{7}. The LXX has οἱ κατοικοῦντες ἐπὶ τῆς Πέτρας, as though Petra were intended, which is possible, as the inhabitants were Arabs.

GUTTER (צִנּוֹר; RV 'watercourse').—The meaning of this word, and indeed of the whole passage (2 S 5^{8}), is very uncertain (cf. Driver, in loc.), but the rendering of the RV is supported by its use in later Hebrew. The same word occurs in the plural at Ps 42^{7}, where it is usually rendered 'cataracts.'

H

HA.—The Heb. interjection הֶאָח he'âh is once tr^{d} 'ha, ha,' Job 39^{25} 'He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha,' of the neighing of the war-horse. The Revisers have changed this into 'Aha!' and have been taken to task for giving the horse a human cry. The older versions were still more 'human,' as Wyc. (1382) 'Fy!' or (1388) 'Joie!' Cov. 'tush,' Dou. 'Vah.' 'Ha, ha' comes from the Gen. Bible. See AH, AHA.

HAAHASHTARI (הָאֲחַשְׁתָּרִי, perhaps 'royal,' from Pers. khshâtra, 'lordship' or 'realm'; cf. the similar adjective in Est $8^{10.14}$).—A descendant of Judah, 1 Ch 4^{6}. See GENEALOGY.

HABAIAH (חֲבַיָּה 'J″ hath hidden').—The head of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel. On account of their being unable to trace their genealogy they were not allowed to serve (Ezr 2^{61}). In the parallel passage Neh 7^{63} the name is written Hobaiah (חֳבַיָּה, cf. Baer on Ezr 2^{61}). In 1 Es 5^{38} he is called Obdia. See GENEALOGY.

HABAKKUK (חֲבַקּוּק, 'Αμβακούμ, Habacuc).[*]—The eighth of the minor prophets. Of Habakkuk's personal life nothing is known with certainty, though it has been inferred, from the fact that he is termed specifically (1^{1} 3^{1}) 'the prophet,' that he held a recognized position as prophet, and, from the expression 'on my stringed instruments' in 3^{19}, that he was a member of the temple choir, and belonged, consequently, to the tribe of Levi. The first of these inferences is a possible one,[†] though it does not add much to our knowledge of Habakkuk. The second is doubtful, both on account of the uncertainty attaching to the pron. my, which is against the analogy of other similar notices (Ps 4, etc.), and also on account of the doubt (supposing the pron. to be correct) whether at this time the 'singers' were necessarily Levites.

CONTENTS OF H.'S BOOK.—The book opens with a dialogue between the prophet and his God. He contemplates with dismay the reign of lawlessness and violence in Judah,—'The wicked doth compass about the righteous; therefore judgment goeth forth perverted,'—and expostulates with God for permitting it to continue unchecked (1^{2-4}). 1^{5-11} J″ answers that the instrument of punishment is near at hand—the Chaldæans, that bitter and hasty nation, which march through the breadth of the earth to possess dwelling-places that are not theirs, whose advance is swift and terrible, whose sole law is their own imperious will (v.^{7b}), who mock at the strongest barriers set to oppose their march, and who, as their victorious arms subjugate one country after another, impiously deify their own might—'this his power becometh his god.' But the answer raises only a fresh difficulty in the prophet's mind; as he contemplates the Chaldæans, and thinks of their rapacity, their inhumanity, their savage and contemptuous treatment of the nations falling into their hands, the thought forces itself upon him, Can this be God's method of rectifying injustice? if He has 'ordained' the power of the Chaldæans 'for judgment,' can it be part of His pure and holy purpose that they should to such a degree exceed the terms of their commission, and trample recklessly and indiscriminately upon all the nations of the known world? Is not this the prevalence of wrong upon a larger scale? In 2^{1-4} Habakkuk places himself in imagination upon his prophetic watch-tower (cf. Is 21^{6}), and 'looks out' to see what answer the Almighty will vouchsafe to his 'complaint,' or impeachment of the justice of God's government of the world. J″'s answer, the significance of which is betokened by the terms in which it is introduced—it is to be written, namely, on tablets, that all may read it easily—is this: The soul of the Chaldæan is elated with pride: but the righteous shall live by his faithfulness.[*] The answer expresses a moral distinction; and the distinction carries with it the different destinies of the Chaldæan and of the righteous,—destruction (it is implied), sooner or later, for the one, and life for the other. After dwelling for a moment more particularly—in a verse (v.^{5}), of which the first words are desperately corrupt—upon the ambitious aims of the Chaldæans, the prophet develops at length the ruin destined in the end to overtake him, in the form of a taunting poem (מָשָׁל), which he imagines, with dramatic vividness and propriety, to be pronounced against him by the nations whom he has outraged. The מָשָׁל consists of five 'woes' (cf. Is $5^{8ff.}$), denouncing in succession the insatiable lust of conquest displayed by the Chaldæans, the suicidal policy pursued by them in establishing their dominion, the dishonesty and cruelty by which the magnificence of their cities was maintained, their wild and barbarous triumph over the nations which fell under their sway, their irrational idolatry (vv.$^{6-19}$). At the close of the last 'woe,' the prophet passes by contrast from the contemplation of the dumb and helpless idol to the thought of the living God, enthroned in His heavenly palace, before whom the earth must hold reverential silence (v.^{20}).

Ch. 3 is very different in character from chs. 1. 2. Though called in the title a 'prayer,' the prayer, strictly so called, is limited to v.^{2}, the main part of the chapter consisting of a lyric ode, of remarkable sublimity and poetic force, in which the prophet develops the thought of J″ coming to judgment, and executing vengeance on His people's foes. The prayer is that J″ would 'revive' His 'work in the midst of years,' i.e. renew or repeat, in the midst of the centuries that have passed since the exodus, the great 'work' (Ps 44^{1}) of deliverance wrought by Him of old. The ode which follows is the amplification of the thought thus expressed. The prophet pictures a theophany (vv.$^{3-15}$) in which J″ appears for the deliverance of His people and the discomfiture of His foes. The theophany is manifestly delineated in colours suggested by the thought of the exodus, and in part (as v.^{3}) even borrowed from old poetic descriptions of it. The tenses (as sometimes is the case in [*] The form of the name is peculiar. It is, in appearance, an irregular reduplicated form for what would more normally be חֲבַקְבּוּק (cf. פְּתַלְתֹּל, אֲדַמְדָּם, אֲסַפְסֻף, חֲבַרְבֻּרוֹת), from חָבַק to embrace (Gn 29^{13} etc.; of a child, 2 K 4^{16}), whence Jerome, in the Pref. to his Commentary on the prophet, explains it as περίληψις, or amplexatio. Frd. Delitzsch (Proleg. 84; Assyr. Handwörterb. 281) derives it from the Assyr. ḫambakûku, the name of some garden plant. The LXX form 'Αμβακούμ presupposes the pronunciation חַבָּקוּק, or חַבְּקוּק, with the double b resolved into mb (cf. König, Lehrgeb. ii. 473), and the final ḳ of the last syllable assimilated to the final m of the first syllable (cf. ΒεελζεβουΛ).

[†] The title, 'the prophet,' is applied in the superscriptions of their books to none of the other canonical prophets except Haggai and Zechariah. It is, however, very common in the historical books when a prophet is mentioned (as 2 K 14^{25} 19^{2}); and it is also appended very often to Jeremiah's name in certain sections of his book (20^{2} $28^{5.15}$ etc.).

[*] Not faith: but moral steadfastness and integrity; see the use of אֱמוּנָה in 2 K $12^{16(15)}$ 22^{7}, Jer 5^{1} $9^{3(2)}$, Pr 12^{22} 28^{20}.

Hebrew poetry) are ambiguous; and it may be doubtful whether in vv.$^{3-15}$ the poet is describing, in ideal colours, the past which he desires to see renewed, or the renewed work itself, which his imagination pictures as resembling the past. In either case, he describes (vv.$^{5-7}$) J″ as approaching from His ancient seat in Edom (Paran, cf. Dt 33^{2}; Teman [in N.W. Edom], cf. Seir and Edom, Jg 5^{4}); the light of His appearing illumines the heavens; the earth quakes, and nations flee in consternation. In vv.$^{8-11}$ the poet asks, What is the purpose of J″'s manifestation? Is He wroth with seas or rivers that He thus comes forth, causing the mountains to tremble, the sea to toss and roar, the sun and moon to hide themselves in terror? No; He comes forth for the salvation of His people, to annihilate those who sought to scatter it, and who delighted in the prospect of being able to ruin the people of God (vv.$^{12-15}$). The description of the theophany ended, the poet, speaking in the people's name, reverts to the thought of v.^{2a}. The prospect of J″'s manifestation cannot be contemplated without alarm, even by Israel; the poet's heart palpitates with fear (v.$^{16d.\,e}$ is very obscure, and in parts evidently corrupt); on the other hand, even when scarcity and barrenness prevail in the land, he still cherishes a calm and joyous confidence in his God, who, he is persuaded, will yet ensure His people's salvation, and equip them (v.^{19}) with fresh life and strength.

DATE OF THE BOOK.—It is clear from internal evidence that H. prophesied towards the beginning of the Chaldæan supremacy; but the precise date of his prophecy is difficult to fix. It depends in fact, at least in part, upon the answer given to a difficult question connected with ch. 1, which must therefore be considered first. The explanation of this chapter adopted above is the usual one; but it must be admitted that there are difficulties connected with it, and that it has failed to satisfy many recent scholars. In the first place, whereas the establishment of the power of the Chaldæans appears, in 1^{5} (where it is represented as incredible to those who hear of it) and in 1^{6} (where the phrase used is 'Behold, I am raising up'), to lie in the future; elsewhere, and especially in 1$^{13-16}$ 2$^{8a.\,10.\,17}$, the prophet describes their treatment of conquered nations, and reflects upon the moral problems to which this gave rise, in a manner which seems to imply that he and his countrymen were perfectly familiar with it. Secondly, if 1$^{2-4}$ be the prophet's complaint respecting the injustice prevalent in Israel itself, which (1$^{5-11}$) is to be avenged by the Chaldæans, how can he consistently complain of the Chaldæans' treatment of his people, and pronounce judgment upon them on account of it? Thirdly, the subject of the complaint in 2^{1} is naturally, it is urged, the same as that of 1$^{2-4}$; whereas, in the explanation adopted above, it is different. Fourthly, the 'wicked' and the 'righteous' in 1^{13} are naturally the same, respectively, as the 'wicked' and the 'righteous' in 1^{4}; whereas, upon the same explanation, they are different (the wicked and the righteous in Israel itself in 1^{4}, the Chaldæans and Israel in 1^{13}). Upon these grounds it was argued by Giesebrecht (Beiträge zur Jesaiakritik, 1890, p. 197 f.) that the true sequel to 1^{4} was 1^{12}; that 1$^{5-11}$ (announcing the advent of the Chaldæans) was a complete, independent prophecy, written before the rest of chs. 1–2, and not now in its original place, and that 1$^{2-4}$ describes the tyranny of the Chaldæans (v.^{3b}), and its consequences as shown in the relaxation of law and religion (vv.$^{3c.\,4a}$) in Judah. Wellhausen and Nowack (in their Commentaries) agree. It is true, 1$^{5-11}$ does seem to presuppose a different historical situation from 1$^{12-17}$, and, with 1$^{2-4}$ (as ordinarily understood), may well have been written down by H. at an earlier date: the book as a whole, as Kirkpatrick observes (Doctrine of the Prophets^{1}, 268), 'is the fruit of religious reflection; it exhibits the communing and questioning of the prophet's soul with God,' which doubtless was 'spread over some considerable time,' and presents conclusions which were no doubt reached only after 'a prolonged mental struggle.' Hence there is nothing unreasonable in the supposition that 1$^{2-11}$ reflects the impression left upon the prophet's mind when he first thought of the Chaldæans as the instrument appointed for the punishment of Judah's sin, and that 1$^{12\text{ff.}}$ expresses the perplexity which he became conscious of afterwards, when the character of the Chaldæans had become more fully known to him. For the other inferences mentioned above there does not seem to be a sufficient foundation. The explanation which refers 1$^{2-4}$ to the tyranny of the Chaldæans, and its effects in Judah, is unnatural and forced. Nor is there any intrinsic reason why 'righteous' and 'wicked' should refer to the same persons, respectively, in 1^{4} and 1^{13}; that would be necessary only if it were the case that the prophet had the same individuals in view in the two passages—which is just what here has to be shown, even if the terms of 1$^{2-4}$ are not opposed to it.

A very original view of chs. 1–2 has been propounded by Budde (Stud. u. Krit. 1893, p. 383 ff.; Expositor, May 1895, p. 372 ff.). According to this scholar 1$^{2-4.\,12-17}$ refers not to the Chaldæans but to the Assyrians; 1$^{6-11}$ stood originally after 2^{4} as a description of the power (the Chaldæans) which would shortly bring the rule of the Assyrians to an end, and 2$^{6-20}$ gives expression to the joy with which the nations would greet their fall. In the original prophecy the Chaldæans thus appeared as the liberators of Israel from the yoke of Assyria; but events so cruelly belied the rôle thus given to them, that it was believed incredible that a prophet could ever have ascribed it to them; accordingly a later editor transferred 1$^{6-11}$ to its present place, adding 1^{5} as an introductory verse, and by the transposition so altering the original sense of the prophecy that 1$^{12-17}$ 2$^{4\text{ff.}}$ could now be read only as referring to the Chaldæans, who thus, from being the power destroying the Assyrians, became the power to be destroyed. The explanation is ingenious; but of a kind that could be deemed probable only if it rested upon exceptionally strong grounds, which, however, in the present instance, cannot be said to be the case; cf. more fully Davidson, pp. 50–55.

The most probable date for the prophecy of H. is shortly before B.C. 600—1$^{2-11}$, if the view adopted above be correct, being written somewhat earlier than the rest of the prophecy. Nabopolassar had made Babylon the seat of an independent monarchy in 625; in 607, with the help (as recently discovered inscriptions inform us *) of the Umman-manda, Nineveh had been destroyed; in 604, Nabopolassar's son, Nebuchadrezzar, had inflicted a defeat upon Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish (Jer 46^{2}), the natural result of which, as Jeremiah at once saw (ch. 25, etc.), could only be that the whole of Western Asia would fall into the hands of the Chaldæans. The Chaldæans invaded Judah for the first time in 601 or 600 (2 K 24^{1}). Our knowledge of the progress of the Chaldæan arms, and of the effects which the news of it produced in Judah, is not minute enough to enable us to fix dates with precision; but while 1$^{2-11}$ may belong to the earlier or middle part of the period which has been here referred to, when (v.^{6}) the power of the Chaldæans was being consolidated, but (v.^{5}) the formidable character which it would ere long ('in your days') attain was still not realized in Judah, the familiarity shown in such passages as 1$^{14-17}$ 2$^{5b.\,8.\,17}$ etc. with their treatment of subject nations, and the reflections which their threatened interference in Judah arouses in the prophet's mind, point to the close of the same period as that to which the main part of the prophecy belongs.

CRITICAL QUESTIONS CONNECTED WITH THE BOOK.—Those connected with ch. 1 have been sufficiently discussed above; it remains to consider those arising in connexion with ch. 2 and ch. 3. As regards ch. 2, Stade (ZATW, 1884, p. 154 ff.) and Kuenen (Einl. § 76. 4–7 ; 77. 9) argue that the 'Woes' in vv.$^{9-20}$ are partly unsuitable if supposed to be addressed to the Chaldæan king, and partly, especially in vv.$^{12-14}$, that they consist largely of citations and reminiscences of other passages, including some late ones (e.g. v.^{12} from Mic 3^{10} ; v.^{13} from Jer 51^{58} ; v.^{14} from Is 11^{9} ; cf. also v.^{16b} with Jer $25^{15f.}$, and vv.$^{18-20}$ with Is $44^{9ff.}$ $46^{6f.}$, Jer 10^{1-16}), and hence they infer that the original close of H.'s prophecy, 2^{6b-8}, was expanded in the post-exilic age by the addition of a series of Woes, directed against 'some heathen or heathenly-disposed enemy of the congregation,' or (vv.$^{13f.\ 18-20}$ Kuenen) the heathen generally. It is difficult to think that the grounds for this conclusion are sufficient. Though some of the passages referred to may not suit the Chaldæan king, there is no adequate reason for holding them inapplicable to the personified Chaldæan nation ; while as regards vv.$^{12-14}$, H. may naturally himself have quoted Isaiah and Micah : v.^{13} may well be the original of Jer 51^{58} (especially when the very dependent character of the prophecy in Jer 50^{2}–51^{58} is borne in mind), and there is nothing to prevent 2^{18-20} being a satire on the vanities of idolatry, quite independent of II Is or Jer 10. Budde (l.c. p. 391 f.) sees no ground for questioning vv.$^{[12].\ 9-11.\ 15-17}$; Wellhausen (p. 164) considers it indubitable that the whole of vv.$^{9-20}$ is directed against the Chaldæan (though he thinks that vv.$^{8b.\ 17b}$, where they stand, are unsuitable, and that vv.$^{12-14.\ 15-17}$ contain indications of belonging to a later age than that of H.) ; Nowack questions only vv.$^{8b.\ 12-14.\ 17b-20}$. See, further, Davidson, pp. 56–58.

* See Davidson, p. 137 f., with the references.

Whether the ode in ch. 3 is really the work of H. may be more doubtful. The title and the musical notes (vv.$^{3.\ 9.\ 13.\ 19}$), both resembling closely those in the Psalter, suggest the inference that it was excerpted from a liturgical collection, and placed here by a compiler (Kuenen, § 76. 8 ; Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, p. 157 ; Wellh. ; Nowack ; and others). The same scholars (following Stade, l.c. p. 157 f.) argue further that the ode was originally an independent poem, unconnected with the prophecy of H. : to the circumstances of H.'s age, so clearly reflected in chs. 1–2, there are here no allusions ; the community is the speaker (vv.$^{14.\ 18.\ 19}$, and no doubt also in vv.$^{2.\ 16}$) ; it trusts that J″ will interfere in its behalf ; but the description of the foe (vv.$^{13.\ 14}$) is quite general, there are no features pointing specifically to the Chaldæans ; and the comparison to a murderer delighting 'to devour the afflicted in a secret place' (cf. Ps $10^{8.\ 9}$) suggests attacks made insidiously against the theocracy, rather than the open warfare of the Chaldæans ; while, at least in v.^{17}, the calamities referred to (failure of crops and flocks) are altogether different from those which were the burden of Hab 1–2. Conversely, the promise in 2^{4}, which is the prophet's consolation, does not at all suggest a theophany as its complement ; and whereas in $2^{7ff.}$ the Chaldæans are overthrown by the natural retribution which overtakes a despot, when his power has become effete, the foe, in ch. 3, is overthrown by the direct interposition of J″. It is true the calamities mentioned in 3^{17} might, in the abstract, be regarded as results of the Chaldæan invasion of Judah ; but, as Davidson remarks, 'the verse does not suggest a condition of scarcity and barrenness arising from' such a cause, 'but rather one due to the incidence of severe natural calamities' ; and had the poet been writing under the pressure of a hostile invasion, the invasion itself would naturally have been expected to form the prominent feature in this picture, rather than the misfortunes following in its train. So, again, it is no doubt true that the downfall of the Chaldæan, though brought about (ch. 2) by natural causes, might in ch. 3 be represented as the result of J″'s interposition (cf. Is 13) ; but even after making every allowance for the fact that chs. 1–2 are only elevated prose, while ch. 3 is written in a lyric strain, it remains that the thoughts most characteristic of chs. 1–2 are not developed further in ch. 3, but replaced by different ones. Kirkpatrick (Smith's DB^{2} s.v., Doctrine of the Prophets, p. 276–283) seeks to show that the ode in ch. 3 forms an integral element in the prophet's book ; but his arguments show, not so much that it is natural or necessary, as that it is possible so to explain it ; the destined fall of the Chaldæan tyrant is sufficiently declared in 2^{5-20}, and ch. 3 is not needed to render the announcement more explicit. Nor again, though 2^{20} would lead on naturally to the theophany in ch. 3, can it be said, in view of the contrast to vv.$^{18.\ 19}$ which the verse expresses, to require it, or to be incomplete without it. Wellh. (p. 166) insists strongly that vv.$^{17-19}$ is not the original close of the poem, and that it cannot be used for determining the real aim of vv.$^{2-16}$. If vv.$^{17-19}$ might be regarded as an appendix attached to vv.$^{2-16}$ by a later hand, one ground for doubting H.'s authorship of the latter would be certainly removed. There would remain the other differences between 3^{2-16} and chs. 1–2, alluded to above ; it is also felt by many to be doubtful whether the nation — which seems to be what is intended by the term—would, in the age of H., be described as J″'s 'anointed' (3^{13}), and whether this usage does not presuppose a period in which the attributes and position belonging originally to David and his descendants were transferred to the people (cf. Davidson's note). On the whole, while reluctant to conclude that the ode of ch. 3 is not the work of H., and while readily allowing that the reasons adduced do not demonstrate that it is not his, the present writer must own that it contains features which seem to him to make it difficult to affirm his authorship confidently.

TEACHING OF THE BOOK. — Theologically, the different point of view of H. as compared with Jeremiah is observable. Jeremiah is so deeply impressed by the spectacle of his people's sin, that he regards the Chaldæans almost exclusively as the instruments of judgment ; their destruction is seen by him only in the distant future, and is viewed rather as involved in God's purpose to restore His people, than as a retribution for their own tyranny and excesses. H., on the other hand, though not unmindful of Judah's faults (1^{2-4}), is engrossed chiefly by the thought of the cruelties and inhumanities of the oppressor ; it is these which, in his eyes, call for judgment, and the outraged nations of the earth execute it upon their tyrant. Further, H. is conscious of a problem, a moral difficulty, which is not the case with Jeremiah.* The wrong-doing of the Chaldæans is more unbearable than the evil it was meant to punish ; hence their continued successes seem to the prophet to be inconsistent with J″'s righteousness, and it is the existence of this inconsistency which forms the motive of his book. Thus while Jeremiah bewailed the sins and coming misfortunes of his people, for their own sake, H. brooded over the moral problems which the contemplation of them raised in his mind. The age, we may be sure, was to all the faithful servants of God one of trial and perplexity ; but, in virtue of their different temperaments and mental habits, the two contemporary prophets were impressed by different aspects of it.

The central and distinctive teaching of the book lies in the declaration of 2^4; and, as indicated above, the true sense of this is, that while the wild excesses of the tyrant carry in them the germ of certain ruin, the 'faithfulness' of the righteous (not his faith) will be to him a principle of life. It is evident that this declaration is no solution of the moral anomaly which the prophet discerns. The Chaldæan might indeed, in virtue of his very nature, be doomed ultimately to perish, but his empire survived for 70 years; and meanwhile H.'s compatriots, so far from abiding in peace and security, experienced the indescribable hardships of siege and exile. But 'live' is here used in the full and pregnant sense which it sometimes has in the OT (e.g. Ezk 18), of living in the light and consciousness of the divine favour; and what H. thus promises is not mere material prosperity, but the moral security—of course often not unaccompanied by material benefits—which righteousness brings with it even in the midst of external calamities (cf. Is 33^{14-16}), and the sense of divine approval which even then does not desert it. It is enough for the prophet if he can mitigate the difficulty which pressed upon him, as it pressed no doubt upon many of his contemporaries, by recalling to them these two truths of God's providence, the doom which, at least ultimately, overtakes the tyrant, and the moral security enjoyed by the righteous.

* Jeremiah, it is true, is vexed by the problem of the prosperity of the wicked (12^{1-6}), but only in so far as it is exemplified by his own personal opponents.

With regard to the use made of 2^4 in the NT, 'another man,' writes Wellhausen quaintly, 'has made the antithesis in this verse famous, by breathing into it another spirit.' Its second clause is quoted, namely, twice by St. Paul (Ro 1^{17}, Gal 3^{11}; cf. also He 10^{38}), in the sense, 'The just shall live by faith,' in support of his doctrine of justification by faith. This sense, whether it was intended or not by the LXX translators, whose version the apostle used, was at any rate one which the Greek word used by them permitted; and it was accordingly adopted by St. Paul in his argument. But it is not the sense belonging to the Heb. אֱמוּנָה.[*] The NT gives us here what is in reality a development of the prophet's thought. The apostle, familiar with the verse as it read in the LXX version, amplifies and spiritualizes the words of H., interpreting them in a sense which does not properly belong to them, but which, as it was suggested, or permitted, by the Greek, fitted them in that form for use in his argument.[†]

LITERARY AND TEXTUAL CHARACTERISTICS.—The literary power of H. is considerable. Though his book is a brief one, it is full of force; his descriptions are graphic and powerful; thought and expression are alike poetic; he is still a master of the old classical style, terse, parallelistic, and pregnant; there is no trace of the often prosaic diffuseness which manifests itself in the writings of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. And if ch. 3 be his, he is, moreover, a lyric poet of high order; the grand imagery and rhythmic flow of this ode will bear comparison with some of the finest productions of the Hebrew muse.

The text of H. is manifestly, in many places, more or less corrupt,—in some places, unfortunately, even beyond hope of restoration.

LEGENDS RELATING TO HABAKKUK.—Although, as said above, the prophet's personal life is in the OT a blank, Jewish haggādāh found much to tell of him,—often, indeed, in defiance of chronology and historical probability. Thus, according to one legend,—based, no doubt, upon a connexion fancifully established between the command, 'Go, set a watchman,' in Is 21^6 and the words of Hab 2^1 'I will stand upon my watch,'—H. was supposed to have been the sentinel set by Isaiah to watch for the fall of Babylon! Some of the later Rabbis, connecting his name with the words in 2 K 4^{16} 'Thou shalt embrace a son,' imagined him even to be the son of the Shunammite woman, whom Elisha restored to life. In the LXX text of Bel and the Dragon, as given in the Cod. Chisianus (Swete, vol. iii. pp. xii, 586), this story is prefaced by the words ἐκ προφητείας Ἀμβακοὺμ υἱοῦ Ἰησοῦ, ἐκ τῆς φυλῆς Λευί, showing both that this story was taken from an apocryphal work attributed to Habakkuk, and also that the prophet was described in it as the son of Jesus (Joshua, or Jeshua), and of the tribe of Levi. What authority there may have been for the statement that his father was Ἰησοῦς, we do not know: the description of him as belonging to the tribe of Levi may be merely an inference from the expression in 3^{19}, quoted above.[*] According to the 'Lives' of the prophets, which, in two recensions, are attributed respectively to Dorotheus (in the Chron. Pasch., under Ol. 70, ed. Dind. 1832, i. 282) and Epiphanius (Opp. 1622 or 1682, ii. 247 f.), he was of the tribe of Simeon, ἐξ ἀγροῦ Βῆθι τοῦ Χάρ (Epiph. ἐξ ἀγροῦ Βηθζοχήρ), which Delitzsch thinks may be the Βαιθζαχαρία where Antiochus Eupator defeated Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac $6^{32.33}$),—though this was not in Simeon, but in Judah, 70 stadia from Bethzur (Jos. Ant. XII. ix. 4), and the modern Beit-Sakariyeh, about 10 miles S.W. of Jerusalem (Rob. BRP iii. 284). The same writers relate further, that when Nebuchadrezzar advanced against Jerusalem H. fled to Ostrakine (now Straki), a city on the Egyptian coast, 26 miles from the Rhinocorura, but that, after the Chaldæans had withdrawn, he returned to his own lands, where he died and was buried, two years before the return of the Jews from Babylon (B.C. 538). Eusebius states in one place (Onom. 246, 68) that his tomb was shown at Gabatha (Gibeah), elsewhere (256, 3; 270, 35), that it was shown at Echelah or Keeila (Keilah),—12 and 18 miles, respectively, S.W. of Jerusalem; and, according to Sozomen (HE vii. 29), the site of his grave, at or near Keilah, was revealed in a dream to Zebennus, bishop of Eleutheropolis. In the Middle Ages, however, it was said by Jewish writers that H. was buried at Ḥukkok (Jos 19^{34}), in the tribe of Naphtali, a little N.E. of Tabor. The most widely diffused tradition about H. is that found in Bel and the Dragon $^{33ff.}$, according to which H., while carrying pottage to his reapers, was suddenly directed by an angel to carry it to Daniel, who had been cast a second time, by Cyrus, into the lions' den in Babylon: upon protesting that he had never seen Babylon, and did not know where the den was, he was lifted up miraculously by a lock of his hair (cf. Ezk 8^3) and carried through the air to Babylon; having there provided Daniel with his repast, he was immediately taken back by the angel to his own place. Later Jewish writers, and many of the Fathers, allude to the same legend.[†]

[*] A word expressing the idea of steadfastness or faithfulness, might, no doubt, if limited to a relation towards a particular person, pass readily into that of fidelity, or loyalty, towards him; and this, again, might pass on into that of belief, or faith, in him; but there is no evidence that this Heb. word passed actually through these possible changes of meaning.

HABOR (חָבוֹר; A Ἀβώρ, B Ἀβώρ and Ἀβιώρ, Habor), still called Khabour. Strabo (xvii. § 27) and Procopius (Bell. Pers. ii. 5) call it Aborrhas (Ἀβόῤῥας), Isidore of Charax (p. 248) Aburas (Ἀβούρας), Zosimus (iii. 12) Aboras (Ἀβώρας), Pliny Chaboras, Ptolemy (v. 18) Chaboras (Χαβώρας). According to the Bible (2 K 17^{6} 18^{11}, 1 Ch 5^{26}), it flows through Gozan. The Habor is an important tributary of the Euphrates, rising in Mons Masius (now called Karej Dagh), to the N. of the celebrated city Râs el-'Ain (Resaina), and flowing S.S.W., through a circuitous channel with fertile banks, into the Euphrates at Karkeseea = Abou-psera (Layard), after a course, to a great extent navigable, of nearly 200 miles. Sir H. Layard, standing on the conical hill of Koukab (about lat. 36° 20′ long. 41°), saw the main stream running from the N.W. and receiving (on the N.) the waters of the Mygdonius (Jerujer), which entered it after passing Nisibis and other cities. Both banks are covered with mounds, doubtless remains of Assyrian cities. The name of the Habor is found in the Assyrian inscriptions.

Tiglath-pileser I. (about B.C. 1120) boasts of having killed ten mighty elephants in the land of Haran and 'on the banks of the Habor.' Assur-naẓir-apli (B.C. 885–860) crossed the Tigris, conquered the district of the Ḫarmiš (or Ḫar-rit or Ḫaršit), then marched to the Euphrates after subjugating the district around the mouth of the Habor (piāte ša nâr Ḫabur, 'the mouths of the river Habor,' from which it would seem that the river flowed into the Euphrates through several outlets). According to 2 K 17^{6} 18^{11} and 1 Ch 5^{26} it was to the banks of this river that Shalmaneser and Sargon transported the exiled Israelites. It is now well known that this river has nothing to do with the 'Chebar' of Ezekiel (1^{3} etc.). The name Habor is perhaps of non-Semitic origin, and may mean 'fish-river' (g'a 'fish' + bur 'river,' Frd. Delitzsch). I. A. PINCHES.

HACALIAH (חֲכַלְיָה, Χελκ(ε)ιά, Χελκιάς (Luc.), Ἀχαλιά A‌ℵ, Ἀχελιά (10^{1}), Neh 1^{1} 10^{1}, AV Hachaliah).—The father of Nehemiah. The meaning of the name is doubtful; Wellhausen would read it as Hakkêlejah (חַכֵּלְיָה), i.e. 'wait for J″'; cf. Is 8^{17} 64^{3}.

HACHILAH (חֲכִילָה 'dark').—A hiding-place of David which was discovered to Saul by the Ziphites, 1 S 23^{19} 26^{1-3}. It was a hill (גִּבְעָה) in S. Judah, on the edge of the wilderness of Ziph; lying on the 'right' (i.e. to the south) of the desert (yĕshîmôn), according to the first of the above passages, or, according to the second, 'before' (עַל־פְּנֵי) the desert. It may be the hill Dahr el-kôlâ, N. of Wady el-W'ar (PEF Mem. ii. 313; Buhl, GAP 97). Glaser (Skizze, ii. 326) would read Hachilah also in 1 S 15^{7} instead of Havilah (חֲוִילָה).

C. R. CONDER.

HACHMONI, HACHMONITE.—Both represent one and the same Heb. word חַכְמוֹנִי, but in 1 Ch 27^{32} the latter is translated as a pr. name, 'Jehiel the son of Hachmoni,' whereas in 1 Ch 11^{11} Jashobeam is called 'a Hachmonite.' We should probably render it in both cases as a gentilic name. In 2 S 23^{8}, which is parallel to 1 Ch 11^{11}, we have 'the Tahchemonite' תַּחְכְּמֹנִי, which is probably a textual error for הַחַכְמֹנִי. (Cf. Klosterm., Driver, Wellhausen, Budde, Kittel, ad ll. cit., and see ADINO, JASHOBEAM). J. A. SELBIE.

HADAD (הדד, הֲדַר, Ἀδάδ, Ἀδάρ).—1. Hadad was the supreme Baal or god of Syria (Macrob. Saturn. i. 23. 18). The Assyr. inscriptions, however, identify him with the air-god Ramman or Rimmon, and accordingly in Zec 12^{11} we find Hadad-Rimmon, 'Hadad is Rimmon.' But it is probable that Rimmon in certain parts of Syria represented the sun-god, and not, as in Assyria, the god of the atmosphere. Besides Adad or Hadad, the cuneiform texts give the abbreviated Dadu and Dadda as in use among the Syrians, and from certain Bab. contract-tablets it would appear that Ben-Hadad, 'the son of Hadad,' was another Syrian deity, who, with his father Hadad and mother Atargatis (Athtar-'Athi), made up the usual Semitic trinity. In the religions of Asia Minor the place of Ben-Hadad is taken by Attys, a name which may perhaps be the same as Hadad.

2. (חֲדַד) A son of Ishmael (Gn 25^{15} = 1 Ch 1^{30}, AV Hadar). The MT is supported by the LXX (Χοδδάν, Χαλδά, Χοδδάδ, Χονδάν). The Samar. Pent. has הדד, some MSS and the Pesh. have חדר, Targ. Onk. has הדר.

3. A king of Edom, son of Bedad (perhaps for Ben-Dadi; Bu-Dadi is the name of the Can. governor of Yurza [now Yerzeh], S.W. of Taanach in the Tel el-Amarna tablets). He came from the city of Avith, and 'smote Midian in the field of Moab' (Gn 36^{35} = 1 Ch 1^{46}). See further, Hommel, AHT, 221 f.

4. Another king of Edom (1 Ch 1^{50}), whose name is miswritten Hadar in Gn 36^{39}. His capital city was Pau. See AHT 264.

5. A member of the royal house of Edom (1 K $11^{14\text{ff.}}$) who escaped while 'yet a little child' from the massacre of his family by Joab after David's conquest of Edom. He was carried first to Paran and then to Egypt, where the Pharaoh received him hospitably, and assigned him lands and food. He married the Pharaoh's sister-in-law, and his son Genubath was brought up as an Egyptian prince. After the death of David and Joab, Hadad returned to Edom, and there worked 'mischief' to Solomon. Edom, however, continued to be dependent on Judah, as we learn from 1 K 9^{26}, 2 K 3^{9} 8^{20}. A. H. SAYCE.

HADADEZER (הֲדַדְעֶזֶר), 'Hadad is a help' (2 S $8^{3.\,12}$, 1 K 11^{23}), wrongly written Hadarezer in 2 S $10^{16.\,19}$, 1 Ch $18^{3.\,5.\,7.\,8}$ $19^{16.\,19}$. The name is the Heb. equivalent of the Aram. Hadadidri, which is given in the Assyr. inscriptions as the name of the king of Damascus, who is called Ben-Hadad II. in the OT. Bricks have been found in Babylonia stamped with the name of Hadad-nadinakh[ês] (Hadad-nadin-akhi) in Gr. and Aram. letters, which makes the reading of the divine name quite certain.

Hadadezer was son of Rehob and king of Zobah (Assyr. Zubitê), on the eastern frontier of Hamath. His dominions included Damascus in the south, and extended to the Euphrates in the north. He was defeated by David 'as he went to recover his border (or rather the pillar which marked the limits of conquest) at the river Euphrates.' The Syrians of Damascus who thereupon came to his assistance were also defeated, and Damascus itself was occupied by the Israelites. The gilded shields of H. were sent to Jerusalem, and large quantities of bronze were obtained by David in the cities of Berothai and Tibhath (the Tubikhi of the Tel el-Amarna tablets and the Egyp. geographical lists). Toi king of Hamath, who had been at war with H., now sent an embassy to congratulate the Isr. monarch on his victories. At a later date, when war had broken out between David and the Ammonites, H. despatched 20,000 footmen from Zobah and Beth-rehob to the help of the Ammonites, other troops being also furnished by the Syrian princes of Maacah and Tob. The combined host, however, was annihilated by Joab, who proceeded to overrun Ammon. H. now obtained the help of the Aramæans on the eastern side of the Euphrates; but the Syrian army, under the command of Shobach (called Shophach 1 Ch 19^{16}), was utterly defeated by David at Helam, which is probably the Khalman of the Assyr. inscriptions, usually identified with Aleppo. Josephus (Ant. VII. vi. 3) transforms Helam into a Syrian general, Khalaman, and tells us that Hadadezer, under the name of Hadad, was mentioned by Nicolaus Damascenus in his history of Damascus. The battle of Helam completely broke the power of Zobah.

HADADRIMMON (הֲדַדְרִמּוֹן), mentioned in Zec 12^{11} along with the valley of Megiddon. It is commonly supposed to have been the place of national lamentation over the slaughter, by Necoh of Egypt (2 K 23^{29}, 2 Ch 35^{22-24}), of Josiah, the last promising king of Judah. Hitzig suggested (Commentar über den Jesaja, 1833, on 17^{8}) that the mourning was for Adonis, as in Phœnicia; and he was followed by Movers, Kneucker, Leyrer, W. R. Smith, and Merx. Baudissin (in Studien zur Sem. Relig.-geschichte), however, concludes to stand by the former position. LXX reads κοπετὸς ῥοῶνος, and the Vulg. Adadremmon. The usual identification is with Rummaneh, a small village S. of Megiddo, and N.W. of Jenîn (cf. G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 389, n. 2).

HADES (Ἅιδης, ᾅδης).—The term used in the LXX and NT for the abode of the departed, the unseen world into which men pass at death. It is a word of very frequent occurrence in the OT, of very rare occurrence in the NT. In the AV of the OT it is unhappily rendered by 'hell' (Dt 32^{22}, 2 S 22^{6}, Ps 16^{10} 18^{5} 116^{3} 139^{8}, and often), 'the pit' (Nu $16^{30.33}$), and 'the grave' (Gn 37^{35}, 1 S 2^{6}, Job 7^{9} 14^{13}, Ps 30^{3} $49^{14.15}$ etc.). The original sense of the English word 'hell' appears to have been simply that of the hidden, unseen place, and in the general sense of the 'realm of the dead' it occurs in the statements of the Creeds on the article of Christ's Descent to Hell, as well as in old English ('The Harrowing of Hell' in the Exeter Book; Chaucer, The Milleres Tale, v. 3572; Spenser, Son. 68). Its use in the AV, therefore, has been defended, e.g. by Bp. Horsley, on the ground that 'in its primary and natural sense it signifies nothing more than the unseen and covered place' (Sermons, ii. 20). But the English Revisers, recognizing the difficulty of disconnecting the word from its usual associations, have displaced 'hell' by 'Hades' in the NT. In the OT they have adopted a less uniform practice. In the historical books they have left the rendering 'the grave' or 'the pit' in the text, and have placed on the margin the note 'Heb. Sheol,' to 'indicate that it does not signify the place of burial,' as they explain in their Preface. In the poetical books they usually give Sheol in the text, and put 'the grave' in the margin. In Is 14 they retain 'hell' in the text and give 'Sheol' in the margin, on the ground that in that paragraph the word 'hell' has 'more of its usual sense, and is less liable to be misunderstood,' while 'any change in so familiar a passage which was not distinctly an improvement would be a decided loss.' The American Revisers, however, have followed the more consistent course of giving 'Sheol' in the text of the OT, and dispensing with the variant renderings 'the grave,' 'the pit,' 'hell'; as 'Hades' is given by both English and American Revisers in the text of the NT. (See also the article on HELL.)

The word Hades is a familiar term in classical Greek. It is usually supposed to be derived from α privative and ἰδεῖν, videre, 'see,' and hence it is rendered Nelucus by Hermann. This etymology is thought to be rendered extremely doubtful by the presence of the aspiration, and so Voss (Hymn Dem. 348) would derive the word from ἅδω, χάδω, in the sense of πολυδέκτης, der Umfasser, the 'all-receiving,' 'all-devouring.' Though the Attic form, however, was Ἅιδης, ᾅδης, the more ancient form, as generally in Homer, was Ἀΐδης, -αο and -εω, which form, except in the Epic genitive Ἀΐδεω, occurs also in the Tragic poets. So in Milton (PL ii. 963, 964)—

> 'and by them stood
> Orcus and Ades, and the dreaded name
> Of Demogorgon.'

In Homer, the word (also in the form Ἀϊδωνεύς there, in Hesiod, and, though rarely, in the Tragedians) occurs only as a proper name, the name of the god of the nether world, Pluto; in Hesiod (Th. 455), the son of Kronos and Rheia, and older brother of Zeus. Hence, in Homer, the forms εἰς Ἀΐδαο, εἰν Ἀΐδαο with or without δόμους, δόμοις, in the sense of 'into' or 'in the lower world'; in Attic the forms ἐν and εἰς Ἅιδου; and in the NT the ἐν ᾅδου of the TR, and the later MSS in Ac $2^{27.31}$ displaced by the εἰς ᾅδην of the RV and the older MSS. Later the word became an appellative, denoting the underworld itself, the habitation of the dead, corresponding to the Latin Orcus, Inferi, Infernum, Inferna.

In the LXX and the OT Apocr. the word represents the Heb. שְׁאוֹל, and sometimes other Heb. terms, as בּוֹר (Is 14^{19} 38^{18}), דּוּמָה (Ps 93 $[94]^{17}$ 113^{15} $[115^{17}]$), מָוֶת (Pr 14^{12} 16^{25}, Is 28^{15}), מות (Job 33^{22}), צַלְמָוֶת (Job 38^{17}). These latter, however, are only occasional occurrences. In the vast majority of cases (some 59 in the canonical books alone, and often in the Apocr.) 'Hades' is the equivalent of שְׁאוֹל, and it carries with it the sense which that term has as a designation of the world beyond the grave.

The conceptions formed of that world by different peoples have been very various. They have been largely affected by racial, geographical, and climatic circumstances, and have not been altogether constant in the history of the beliefs of the progressive peoples. By far the more prevalent, however, has been the idea that would most naturally occur to men as they looked down into the grave which hid their departed kinsfolk from their gaze—that of an underworld, the opposite in all respects of the open, visible, sunlit world of activity. In various forms this general conception has held the mind of races as different as the lusty Teutonic tribes, the Zulus of Africa, the savages of North and South America, the Samoan islanders, the Asiatic Karens, the Italmen of Kamschatka, the Egyptians, the Babylonians and Assyrians, the Greeks and Romans. It was also the popular conception of the ancient Hebrews, and the Hebrew form of the idea had special affinity with that of the Babylonians and Greeks. In the OT, therefore, Hades expresses the general view of the world of the departed as a dark, deep underworld, in which the deceased continue to exist, but in a state of being devoid of the joy, the activity, the fulness, and the substantiality of real life. For the most part, too, in the OT it is an abode from which there is no return, and in which there are no moral distinctions; a condition involving separation at once from living men and from the living God; one in which rich and poor, king and slave, good and evil, subsist together in the same inane, shadowy, cheerless condition, without positive reward for the righteous or penalty for the wicked. Though not without occasional hints and suggestions of better things, the OT, reflecting the popular Hebrew modes of thought on the subject, presents Hades neither as a distinct stadium between death and a larger future, nor as a scene of moral issues, but as the common gathering-place for the departed, into which all alike go down, beyond which there is nothing to be clearly seen or certainly looked for, and from which there is no open way of restoration to the old strength of life, far less any elevation to a new and higher life, near or afar.

The idea of Hades and the existence after death, however, did not continue to stand at this level. In course of time, by the experience of faith, the teaching of the prophets, and the operation of other influences which we less clearly understand, it changed in more than one direction. The process is seen in the OT itself, especially in the poetical books and in the writings of the prophets, yet in different ways. In the former, faith is seen overleaping the dark domain of Hades, negativing the thought of a perpetual existence in its dreary and futile depths, having visions and forecasts of a more satisfying future (e.g. Ps 16. 17. 49. 73, Job 14^{13-17} 16^{18}–17^{9} 19^{23-27} etc.). In the latter we find not merely surmises and anticipations, but definite teaching, which grows from less to more till it declares the hope of a resurrection of Israel's dead, and an awakening from the sleep of death to everlasting life or to everlasting contempt (Is 26^{19}, Dn $12^{2.\ 3}$). But that is the most that the OT books give.

The process of change, however, went farther. It is reflected in the apocryphal, the rabbinical, and especially the apocalyptic literature. New ideas became connected with Hades and the future, yet without settling into a uniform faith or obtaining general acceptance in any one mode. In some of the books the old conception of Hades is continued with little or no change (Sir $17^{27.\ 28}$ 41^{4}, Bar 2^{17}, To $3^{6.\ 10}$ 13^{2}, 1 Mac 2^{69} 14^{30}). In these there is little or nothing beyond a simple acquiescence in the fact of man's mortality (Sir 41^{1-4}). In others there is the hope of an immortality for the soul, but no certain hope of a resurrection of the body (Wis 2^{23} 3^{1-4} $4^{13.\ 14}$ 15^{3}). In others there is the definite statement of the completer belief in a future life with moral issues, the doctrine of the bodily resurrection being in some cases less prominent and less distinct than that of a general continuance of life or return to life (Enoch $22^{12.\ 13}$ 51^{1-5} 61^{5} 91^{10} 92^{3}, Ps-Sol 3^{16} 13^{9} etc.), in others more so (2 Mac $7^{9.\ 14.\ 23}$ $12^{43.\ 44}$; cf. Sibyll. 1^{440} $2^{274.\ 275}$ $4^{228.\ 229}$, Apoc. Bar 30^{1-5} 50^{1} 51^{6}, 2 Es 7^{32}). In others the idea that Hades is a place of relative moral awards appears, though in no very definite or pronounced form (Wis 3^{1-10} 5^{1-14} 6^{18-20} $17^{14\ \text{etc.}}$ as compared with $3^{17.\ 18}$ etc., 2 Mac $7^{9.\ 11.\ 14.\ 29}$ 12^{43-45} 14^{46} etc.); while in the apocalyptic books the prevailing conception has come to be that of an intermediate state, with relative rewards for the good and penalties for the evil (Enoch 10^{12} 22. 100^{5} 103^{7} etc., Book of Jub. 5^{243} 7^{248} 22^{21} 24^{27} 36; cf. 2 Es $7^{31-35.\ 36*-38.\ 61.\ 75*-101*}$ etc. (James, T. and S. iii. 2); Apoc. Bar 52^{1-3} etc.). In the rabbinical literature further developments of opinion are seen, especially in the direction of regarding Hades as an intermediate state with purgatorial processes for those of Israel and (at a later stage) with two distinct compartments or divisions within it—one of preliminary blessedness, and another of preliminary woe. Our Lord and His apostles spoke to the ideas which the Jews of their time had on these subjects as on others. Regard must be had to this in interpreting the occurrences of the word Hades in NT. The question is, how far these modifications of the prevalent OT idea of Hades are reflected in the NT; what precise sense is to be attached to the term there; and to what extent it has a doctrinal significance or suggests doctrinal conclusions.

The small place which is given to the term itself, or to any equivalent for it, in the NT is the first thing that calls for attention. The word occurs only ten times in all, including parallels, according to the best text. It is found nowhere in John's Gospel, the Epistles of Paul, the Epistle to the Hebrews, or the Catholic Epistles. Three of its occurrences are on Christ's lips, viz. Mt 11^{23} (with its parallel Lk 10^{15}) 16^{18}, Lk 16^{23}. In two of these the word is obviously used in a figurative sense: in the one to express, in the case of Capernaum, an absolute overthrow, a humiliation as deep as the former loftiness and pride had been great; in the other, to express, in the case of the Church, a security which shall be proof against death and destruction. The third occurrence, in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, is of a different kind, and has even been taken to put our Lord's imprimatur on the Jewish idea of two compartments in Hades, distinct from, yet near, one another. The point of the parable, however, is the broad moral lesson of the penalty of a selfish life. Everything else is secondary and ancillary to this. That being so, the use of the word here is ethical rather than doctrinal. It does not take us beyond the broad fact that there is a state of being into which men pass at death, and that the divine righteousness follows them thither with moral decisions affecting their conditions there and reversing antecedent estimates and circumstances. In the second chapter of Acts the word occurs in a quotation from the 16th Psalm, and with an application of that utterance of OT faith to the case of Christ, His death and His resurrection; in which, therefore, it has again the broad sense of the world of the departed into which Christ passed like other men, though only to be raised from it. Neither do the passages in the Apocalypse of St. John carry us beyond this. In the first (1^{18}), where Christ claims to have 'the keys of death and Hades,' we have simply the declaration of His power over death and the habitation that receives the dead, His ability to deliver or bring up from these. In the second (6^{8}) we have a personification of Hades as a demon following Death, the rider on the pale horse, to devour those slain by him. In the third and fourth ($20^{13.\ 14}$) Death and Hades appear again as demon figures, striking down and swallowing men, but compelled at last to render up their victims, and doomed themselves to be destroyed by Christ. In the passage in 1 Co (15^{55}) the reading ᾅδη in the second clause must give place to θάνατε.

We gather, in the second place, that in all the NT passages (except Mt 11^{23}, Lk 10^{15}) Hades is associated with death; that it expresses the general conception of the invisible world or abode into which death ushers men; and that it presents this habitation of the future, not as a final state, but as an intermediate scene of existence with relative moral distinctions. It appears, further, that the prevalent ideas connected with it, in its association with death, are those of privation, detention, and righteous recompense, the thought of the relative reward of good being subordinate, if expressed at all, to that of the retribution of evil and to that of the penal character pertaining to Hades as the minister of death. Otherwise the NT Hades shows little or nothing of the change which had come upon the old conception of Sheol, or the world of the dead, in the course of the history of Jewish thought and belief. In none of the passages in which the word itself occurs have we any disclosures or even hints of purgatorial fires, purifying processes, or extended operations of grace. In none of them have we anything approaching the Virgilian picture of the underworld, with its schooling in punishment, its washing out or burning out of guilt, its boon of forgetfulness (Æn. vi. 723–731, Mackail's trans.; cf. Conington's Virgil, ii. 418, 419). They are silent as regards all such things as the Limbus Patrum, the Limbus Infantum, etc., of the Roman Catholic theology, the division of Hades into distinct sections for different classes of the dead, the topographical definitions of the underworld in which both poetry and theology have indulged. Nor is there anything in them like the precise and developed doctrine of later times on the condition of men in the space between death and resurrection, or like those theories of a sleep of the soul, a ministry of Christ in Hades, a continuance of disciplinary processes, an extension of converting and restoring agencies, and other similar ideas, which have been connected with the general idea of a Status Medius in the theologies of various Churches and in the systems of divines of different schools, Roman Catholic, Greek Catholic, and Protestant. In its ideas and in its definite teaching the NT turns for the most part on the present life, with its moral choices and spiritual responsibilities, and on the state of being that follows the judgment, with its final decisions. It makes little of the mysterious space that comes between the two.

HADID (חָדִיד).—Named along with Lod and Ono, Ezr 2^{33} = Neh 7^{37}, peopled by Benjamites after the Captivity, Neh 11^{34}, probably to be identified also with Adida of 1 Mac 12^{38} 13^{13}. It is the modern Hadîtheh in the low hills, about 3¼ miles N.E. of Lydda. See SWP vol. ii. sh. xiv.; Robinson, BRP iii. 143; Guérin, Judée, i. 320; Buhl, GAP 197.

HADLAI (חַדְלָי).—An Ephraimite, 2 Ch 28^{12}. See GENEALOGY.

HADORAM (הֲדוֹרָם).—1. The fifth son of Joktan (Gn 10^{27} B Ὀδορρά, 1 Ch 1^{21} A Κεδουράν), and so presumably the name of a Yemenite district or tribe not otherwise known. It has been conjectured that the Ἀδραμῖται (Ptol. vi. 7. 10) or the Atramitæ (Plin. vi. 32, xii. 30) are here referred to, but the latter are probably to be identified with the people of Hadramaut (see Dillm. ad loc., and art. HAZAR-MAVETH).

2. The son of Tou king of Hamath, who was sent by his father on an embassy to David after the latter's victory over Hadadezer king of Zobah (1 Ch 18^{10}). In the parallel passage 2 S $8^{9f.}$ Tou is less correctly given as Toi (תֹּעִי for תֹּעוּ), while Hadoram wrongly appears as Joram (יוֹרָם): the LXX, however, gives Ἰεδδουράν, and in 1 Ch 18^{10} Ἰδουραάμ.

3. In 2 Ch 10^{18} Hadoram (הֲדֹרָם) is given as the name of the superintendent of the levies in the reign of Rehoboam. The parallel passage 1 K 12^{18} has preserved the more correct form Adoram (אֲדֹרָם), while the LXX (to 1 Ch) has the fuller form Adoniram (Ἀδωνειράμ). See ADONIRAM, and cf. Driver, Text of Sam. 267. J. F. STENNING.

HADRACH (חַדְרָךְ, Assyr. Ḫatarikka).—The capital of a region in Syria, and a place of importance in the times of Uzziah and his successors. The name occurs but once in the Bible, namely, in Zec 9^{1}; but in that one place it is made emphatic. The 'land of Hadrach' is there mentioned as having the same interest with Damascus, and as in relations with 'all the tribes of Israel,' and with Hamath, Tyre, Zidon, the several Philistine peoples, the sons of Javan, Egypt, and especially Assyria.

The Assyr. records for a certain period prominently mention Hadrach in connexion with Damascus, Arpad, Hamath, Samaria, Judah, though they give no details. Assur-dan III. made an expedition thither in his first year, B.C. 772, another in his eighth, and another in his eighteenth year. Hadrach is mentioned in inscriptions that bear the name of Tiglath-pileser (B.C. 745–727), and in others which Assyriologists attribute to Tiglath-pileser, though the fragments of them now known do not bear his name. The period is that in which the 'shepherds' of Israel were Zechariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, Pekah, and Hoshea; when the realm of Jeroboam II., including the peoples from the Mediter. to the Euphrates, was falling to pieces before the Assyrian. The Assyr. kings speak of themselves as overthrowing a confederacy, headed by Uzziah of Judah, and extending as far as Hamath. At different times in this period they deported Israelites from the northern tribes, and from east of Jordan (1 Ch $5^{6.26}$, 2 K 15^{29}).

Apparently, the identification of Hadrach with Ḫatarikka is beyond doubt, and the writer of this prophecy had this period in mind, whatever bearing these facts may have on the various critical and historical questions that arise (see Schrader, KAT^{2} 453, and Del. Paradies, 279).

HAFT.—'The haft of a knife, that whereby you have or hold it,' says Trench (Study of Words, 303); and the two words are no doubt etymol. connected, but the connexion is not quite so immediate. Haft occurs once in AV, Jg 3^{22} 'And the haft also went in after the blade' (נִצָּב, the hilt of a sword, or handle of a knife). Wyc. (who has 'pommel' here, [1388, ether hilte]) uses 'haft' in Dt 19^{5} 'the yren, slipt of fro the haft, smytith his freend, and sleeth' (1388, 'helve'). Cf. also Gower, Confessio Amantis, iv.—

> 'But yet ne fond I nought the haft,
> Which might unto the blade accorde.'

HAGAB (חָגָב, Ἀγάβ), Ezr 2^{46}.—His descendants were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. The name, with that preceding it in Ezr, is absent from the parallel list in Neh 7, the loss being apparently due to the similarity between the names Hagabah and Hagab. It appears in 1 Es 5^{30} as Accaba.

HAGABA (חֲגָבָא, Ἀγαβά B, Ἀγγαβά A), Neh 7^{48}.—The head of another family of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel.

HAGABAH (חֲגָבָה, Ἀγαβά).—The slightly different form in which the last-mentioned name appears in the parallel list in Ezr 2^{45}. In 1 Es 5^{29} it becomes Aggaba (AV Graba, B* om., A Ἀγγαβά).

HAGAR (הָגָר 'flight,' 'emigration'). —i. THE NARRATIVES.—Hagar was the name of an Egyptian woman (Gn 16^{1} 21^{9}) in the service of Sarai. The fact that she is expressly called an Egyptian has given rise to the conjecture that she was one of the 'maidservants' who were presented by Pharaoh at the time when the Egyptian king 'entreated Abraham well' for Sarai's sake (12^{16}). It would appear that Hagar stood in that intimate relation with Sarai which we find occupied by the maidservants of Rebekah (24^{59}) and of Leah and Rachel ($29^{24\text{-}29}$). She was the property of her mistress, not of her master; and Sarai finding that in the course of nature she could herself have no hope of having children, proposed that Abraham should take Hagar as his concubine. Hagar being Sarai's property, Sarai would claim Hagar's children as her own (cf. Rachel and Leah in $30^{3.9}$). Accordingly, Hagar became Abraham's concubine; and, finding herself with child, appears to have suffered herself to indulge in expressions of exultation, as if of triumph over a defeated rival. The true wife and the servant concubine, in their jealousy and hatred, present a picture of Bedawîn tent-life, true enough to facts, however repugnant to Western ideas. Sarai bitterly resented the insult, and complained to Abraham. The patriarch resigned all claim over his concubine; he refused to interfere himself, and handed Hagar over to the tender mercies of Sarai. Sarai's harshness enraged Hagar; and the latter, goaded to desperation, fled from her mistress into the wilderness. The wilderness of Shur 'before (i.e. E. of) Egypt' represents probably the desert region of Jifar between Philistia and the E. borders of Egypt proper (cf. Ex 15^{22}). Presumably, Hagar bethought herself of fleeing to her native country; for through this desert passed the usual caravan route to Egypt. While she was resting by a spring in the desert the Angel of J″ appeared to her (v.^{7}); bade her return to her mistress and be submissive to her; he also encouraged her by telling her of the son that should be born to her; his name was to be Ishmael; he would be as untameable as a wild ass; he would be at war with all men; 'in the sight of all his brethren' should he live (not merely, 'to the E. of them,' עַל־פְּנֵי) his wild, independent, defiant life. Hagar, according to the Hebrew tradition, gave the name Beer-lahai-ro'i to the spring, because as the angel departed she realized who he was; and she looked after him who had seen her in her affliction and had comforted her. 'The well of the living one who sees me'; this was the popular interpretation of the name of the well in after-times associated with the vision granted to Hagar [see BEER-LAHAI-ROI]. 'The Bedawîn even yet associate with Hagar's name a well a considerable distance south of Beersheba in Muweilih, one of the principal stations on the caravan road, and also a rock dwelling, Bait Hagar, in the neighbourhood' (Dillmann, in loc.). Hagar was obedient to the vision, and returned to her mistress. The birth of Ishmael is recorded in the brief extract from P (16^{15}), which also mentions that Abram was then eighty-six years old. Eleven years had passed since the call of Abram.

Nothing more is related of Hagar until the 21st chapter, where we are told of the birth of Isaac (vv.$^{1\text{-}7}$). On the occasion of the festival which was held perhaps two or three years later (see Delitzsch and Dillmann, in loc.), Sarah saw Hagar's son 'playing' (מְצַחֵק, not 'mocking' or 'persecuting,' as no object is expressed); and her maternal jealousy took fire. She was seized probably with a dread lest the inheritance should pass to the son of the concubine. She demanded from Abraham the expulsion of Hagar and her boy. The demand, to Abraham's credit, displeased him sorely. But God spake to him, apparently at night; bade him sacrifice his fatherly feelings, and obey Sarah's word. Abraham the next morning took bread and a skin of water, and gave them over, with the lad, to Hagar, who was thus sent forth a homeless wanderer into the wilderness of Beersheba, in the neighbourhood of which Abraham presumably was encamped ($21^{14.32}$ 22^{19}). According to this tradition Ishmael was still a child, and was soon worn out. The water-skin was quickly emptied; Hagar laid the child down under a bush (v.^{15}); she saw there was no hope for his life unless she could find water: in despair, and so that she might not witness his dying agonies, she retired a bowshot's distance. It was then that God heard the voice of the lad (not of his mother); and the angel of God called to Hagar, and encouraged her. The boy was not to die, but to live. 'Arise, lift up the boy, take fast hold of him by thy hand; for I will make of him a great nation.' Then God opened her eyes; she saw, what before she had not perceived, a well of water close at hand; she filled the empty skin with water, and gave her boy to drink. He revived, and grew to be a strong man, a famous archer. He dwelt in the desert of Paran; and his mother, herself an Egyptian, took for him an Egyptian wife (v.^{21}).

The purpose which was served by the preservation of these two narratives was probably a different one in each case. In ch. 16 we have a tradition the preservation of which in the Book of Genesis seems to be due to the fact that (1) it illustrated the varied trials to which Abraham's faith and patience were subjected before the fulfilment of the divine promise was granted; (2) it proclaimed the futility of the human endeavours to compass by human means that which could only be accomplished in accordance with the divine purpose. To every Israelite it also emphasized the fact that the chosen family had been providentially watched over from its very beginnings; the humblest members of the household received the blessing of the divine Vision. In ch. 21 we have a similar thought; but here the separation of Hagar from the tent of Abraham is due, not to a voluntary flight, but to an express divine oracle. Undoubtedly, too, this story reflects the pride of the people in the purity of their descent. The nations around Palestine were, according to the popular Hebrew belief, all of them offshoots from the family of Abraham; but the stock of typical patriarchal Israel had no contamination from Canaan or from Egypt.

There was, however, another side to the narratives. It cannot but have struck the Israelite reader that the first mention of 'the Angel of J″' (16^{7}) is in connexion with the manifestation to Hagar, this despised Egyptian concubine. The light 'ad revelationem gentium' had begun to shine; and the story of Hagar is the first of a remarkable series in which appear Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Naaman. Thus the story of Hagar is a striking instance, on the very threshold of the history of the Covenant People, of that wider and more generous view of divine mercy which was ordinarily ignored by popular Hebrew particularism.

The name Hagar in Arabic denotes a 'fugitive.' The word is familiar to us in Hegira, the 'epoch-making' flight of Mohammed. Some have thought that the biblical narratives of Hagar ('flight') and Ishmael ('God heareth') have been expanded out of a mere play upon the words; others have thought that the original names may have been adapted so as to correspond with the distinctive incidents of well-known primitive narratives, and that thus the tradition of actual facts has been made to serve the additional purpose of accounting for the origin of neighbouring tribes. It cannot be doubted that the narratives represent an early Israelite belief that the mountain tribes and clans on the south and south-east frontier of Palestine were descended from the same Hebrew stock, from the same Semitic group, as Israel. The Ishmaelite Bedawîn were regarded as sons of Abraham, but as of inferior caste; and Hagar supplied the recollection of a tradition that they were also connected with Egypt. Renan (Hist. of Isr. i. 81 n., Eng. tr.) would derive the name Hagar from the Arabic ḥagar (=a rock), 'by the primitive equivalence of ה and ח'; he regards Hagar as the personification of the tribes of Arabia Petræa, and apparently derives the story of Hagar from the resemblance of the two words meaning 'rock' and 'fugitive.'

ii. SOURCES OF THE NARRATIVES.—The story of Hagar is to be found in two passages in Genesis, the one ch. 16, the other ch. 21$^{8-21}$. The former passage is almost entirely derived from J (the Jahwist narrative), the only exceptions being vv.$^{1a. 3. 15. 16}$, which are from P (the Priestly Narrative, so also 25^{12}), and vv.$^{9. 10}$, which are probably from the Redactor. The latter passage is entirely from E (the Elohist narrative). The two passages furnish material for instructive comparison. In both cases we have a tradition respecting Hagar, a concubine of Abraham. In the earlier chapter she flies from her mistress; in the later she is expelled by Abraham at Sarah's demand. In both traditions a divine manifestation is granted to her in the wilderness. In ch. 16 (J) it is 'the Angel of JHVH' who appears to her 'in the wilderness, by the fountain (עַיִן) in the way to Shur' (16^{6}). In ch. 21 (E) it is God (Elohim) who hears her child weeping, and 'the Angel of God' (Elohim) who speaks to her, and she sees 'a well of water' (בְּאֵר מַיִם). In ch. 16 (J) Hagar is the 'handmaid' (שִׁפְחָה) of Sarai; in ch. 21 (E) she is the 'bondwoman' (אָמָה). In ch. 16^{11} (J) Hagar's son is to be called Ishmael because J″ had heard her 'affliction'; in ch. 21^{17} (E) 'God heard the voice of the lad.'

It is possible, if 16$^{9. 10}$ be an addition by R, that the J tradition regarded Ishmael 'as born and bred in the desert,' and did not record the return of Hagar to the tent of Abraham (Kittel). It was, however, necessary to introduce the mention of her return in order to account for the E tradition of ch. 21.

It will be observed that, according to P, Ishmael was fourteen years old when Isaac was born (Gn 16$^{1. 3. 15. 16}$ 21$^{1. 2-5}$); but in E the language used of Hagar (21$^{9-21}$) would imply that Ishmael was still a child.

iii. REFERENCES TO HAGAR BY ST. PAUL AND PHILO.—St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians (4^{25}), makes an allegorical use of the story of Hagar. 'Hagar, the bondwoman,' is set over-against 'Sarah, the freewoman'; 'Ishmael, the child after the flesh,' against 'Isaac, the child of the promise.' St. Paul is presenting the antithesis of 'the old covenant' and 'the new,' 'the earthly Jerusalem' and 'the heavenly.' Sinai, the mountain of the law, which was in Arabia, the dwelling-place of 'the son of Hagar' (Bar 3$^{2. 3}$), is set over-against Mount Sion, the mountain of gracious promise, the home of the true Israel (see Lightfoot on Gal 4^{25}).

This allegorical treatment of the story of Hagar corresponded to the rabbinic method of teaching in the apostle's time. St. Paul's expansion of the story (ἐδίωκεν τὸν κατὰ πνεῦμα) reproduced the traditional Jewish feeling (cf. Bereshith Rabba, 53. 15) of hostility towards the Arab tribes, whose constant inroads upon the southern frontier of Judæa seemed to repeat the conduct of Ishmael towards Isaac. The Hagarenes mentioned in Ps 83^{6}, 1 Ch 5$^{10. 19. 20}$, were regarded as typical members of this group of hostile clans. (These tribes were possibly the same as the Ἀγραῖοι, who are mentioned by Eratosthenes in Strabo, XVI. iv. 2, p. 767, as dwelling in the northern part of Arabia). St. Paul, in his reference to the Hagar narrative, frankly uses it as an allegory (Gal 4^{24}); and, as in at least one other instance (1 Co 10^{4}), he does not shrink from employing for his purpose the 'Haggadic' expansion of the original version.

Philo allegorizes the narrative in various passages, notably in De Cherubim, I. i. 139; De Congr. Erud. grat. II. i. 500. Abraham represents the human soul searching after true wisdom and divine knowledge. He is united first to Sarai, the sovereign virtue (ἡ ἄρχουσα ἀρετή), but from her he has no offspring; he has not progressed sufficiently to win spiritual advantage. At her bidding he next unites himself to Hagar the Egyptian—who represents secular learning, the necessary training of the intellect (τὰ ἐπώνυμα τῆς Ἄγαρ προπαιδεύματα). This union is at once fruitful; and its issue is Ishmael, who represents sophistry—Hagar (ἡ μέσος καὶ ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία) and Ishmael (ὁ σοφιστής) must both be driven forth to make way for the reunion with the true virtue which abides forever in the home of the human soul. The name Hagar he interprets by παροίκησις (='sojourning'), as if it were connected with gêr (De Congr. Erud. grat. i. 520), 'a sojourner'; cf. παροικεῖ σοφίᾳ οὐ κατοικεῖ (De sacrific. Abelis et Caini, § 10. i. 170).

iv. LATER TRADITIONS.—Jewish tradition expanded and embellished the story in a variety of ways. In ch. 16 'the desert of Shur' appears as 'the desert of Ḥagra' in the Targum of Onkelos and Jerusalem. In ch. 21 the Targum of Jerusalem adds that Abraham dismissed Hagar 'with a letter of divorce.' The Targums of Jonathan and Jerus. in 25^{1} identify Keturah with Hagar, 'who had been bound (rt. ktr, קְטוּרָה) to him from the beginning'; so also Rashi. Rashi, in his commentary on 6^{1}, records the belief that Hagar was a daughter of Pharaoh, who, after seeing the wonders that had been done for Sarah, declared that it was better for his daughter to be a bondservant in the house of Abraham than a mistress in the palace of another. Commenting on 21^{9}, he records the Jewish interpretation mentioned by Jerome in his Quæst. ad Genesim, according to which Ishmael's 'playing' was a form of 'idolatry' (cf. Ex 32^{6}). Again, on v.^{14}, he says, 'Abraham put Ishmael on Hagar's shoulder; for Sarah had overlooked him with an evil eye, and he had been seized with fever so that he could not walk.'

One of the Jewish derivations of Hagar's name is based upon a play on the words הא אגרך 'here is thy wage.'

'The Moslems naturally modify the biblical account in favour of their own nation; they contend that Hagar was Abraham's lawful wife, and that Ishmael obtained, therefore, as his eldest son, the extensive tracts of Arabia, whilst the younger son, Isaac, received only the limited territory of Canaan; that Hagar was born at Farma, then the capital of Egypt and the residence of the Pharaohs, but that she died at Mecca, and was buried in the precincts of the temple of the Caaba' (Kalisch on Gn 16$^{1-3}$, quoting D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. p. 420).

Buxtorf (in his Lexicon Chald. Talmud. et Rabbin., Basle, 1639, s.v. הַגְרִי) says, 'Judæi hodie Ungaros sic vocant, quasi Hagrios vel Hagarios Turcas autem Ismælitas vocant. Hinc Psal. 83 pro הַגְרִים in Targum est הוּנְגְרָאֵי Ungari.'

HAGGAI (חַגַּי 'festal,' LXX Ἀγγαῖος, cf. חַגִּית 2 S 3^4; Phœn. חגי, חגת, CIS lxvii. 1; Palmyr. חגגו, Vogüé, 61*a*).—The prophet whose prophecies are contained in the book which bears his name. His first prophecy is dated the 2nd year of Darius, i.e. B.C. 520; his main purpose was to rouse the community of the returned exiles to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem.

A. HISTORICAL INTRODUCTION.—The high hopes with which the Jewish exiles started home from Babylon in 536 were not destined to be fulfilled in the early years of the Return. Instead of proceeding at once to restore the ruined temple to its former glory, the Benê hag-Golah ('sons of the Captivity') were obliged to content themselves with setting up the altar of burnt-offering (Ezr $3^{2f.}$, confirmed by Hag 2^{14}). It is possible that the foundations of the temple were formally laid;[] but the great work of restoration remained unaccomplished for the next sixteen years. Various causes contributed to this state of inaction. During the fifty years of the Captivity the Judæan exiles had lived without temple and altar, and no doubt many felt that delay in restoring them need not involve serious damage to religion. The more enthusiastic party would probably have made some effort but for the series of disasters which fell upon the Jewish community. There was, first of all, the active hostility of the neighbouring Samaritans; the firm refusal of whose plausible offer to assist in the building turned them into the implacable foes of Jerusalem (Ezr 4^{1-5}). Then the invasion of Egypt by Cambyses in 527 must have brought with it great suffering for the Jewish colonists; no peace or security was possible while Palestine was being overrun by the vast hordes of the Persian army on their way to Egypt (see Zec 8^{10}, Hag 1^6). A succession of bad seasons followed; the land suffered from prolonged drought; harvest and vintage failed; the fortunes of the colony sank to their lowest ebb (Hag $1^{6.\ 9-11}$ $2^{16.\ 17}$). In Jerusalem itself some of the old social abuses made their appearance; luxury and self-seeking among the wealthier classes took the place of zeal for the cause of religion (Hag $1^{4.\ 9}$). The leaders of the community did nothing, the first enthusiasm had cooled down, and the great object of the Return remained unaccomplished. Meanwhile important events were taking place in the Persian empire. During the early years of his reign (521–515) Darius was engaged in a desperate struggle to secure the kingdom he had won. Province after province revolted; rebellions broke out everywhere, now in the very heart of the empire, now in its farthest extremities. While Darius was suppressing the Babylonian usurper Nidintubel, Elam and the neighbouring countries attempted to throw off the Persian yoke. At the beginning of 520 Darius subdued Babylon, and then marched against the Median pretender Phraortes; but before this campaign was over, Babylon revolted a second time.[] It seemed like a vast upheaval of the heathen world, a shaking of the heavens and earth. There were still prophets in Jerusalem who could read the signs of the times, and they were not slow to grasp the bearing of these vast movements upon the interests which they had at heart. The central authority was weakened, the original permit of Cyrus had not been repealed: now was the opportunity for a religious and patriotic enterprise. Haggai came forward in 520—and Zechariah was soon by his side—with the divine command to start at once upon the rebuilding of the temple. The neglect of this first duty, so the prophet insists, has been the cause of all the recent misfortunes; but when once it has been discharged the divine blessing will descend, and the glorious promises of the great prophet of the Restoration (e.g. Is 60) will be fulfilled at last. There will be a shaking of heaven and earth; the powers of the heathen kingdoms will be overthrown; and Zerubbabel, the treasured and chosen of J", will be preserved for the great hereafter. The prophet's appeal was addressed primarily to Zerubbabel and Joshua, the civil and religious leaders of the community, and it produced the desired effect. The work of rebuilding was taken vigorously in hand; and four years later (516) the temple was solemnly dedicated (Hag $1^{14f.}$ $2^{3.\ 18}$, Zec 4^{6-10} 6^{12-15} 8^9, Ezr $5^{1f.}$ 6^{14-18}, 1 Es 6^1 7^3).

B. THE PROPHECIES.—The prophecies of Haggai are arranged in four groups, each one headed by the date on which it was delivered. They cover a period of four months, from September to December of the year 520.[†]

i. First prophecy: September; 1^{1-15}, Haggai comes forward on the 1st of the month, perhaps because there would then be a gathering of the people to celebrate the festival of the new moon. He addresses Zerubbabel by his Babylonian title of Peḥah ('governor'), and Joshua by his new title of High Priest (lit. 'great priest'; before the Exile it was 'chief,' lit. 'head priest,' or 'the priest'), because as official leaders of the community they were principally to blame for the neglect of religious and patriotic duty. He denounces the popular excuse that the time had not yet come[‡] for the temple to be built. 'The fact is, you have thought more of your own comfort than of God's glory, and built your own houses in a fashion which recalls the luxury of your forefathers (1 K 6^9 7^3, Jer 22^{14}), while you have allowed the temple to lie in ruins. Consider your ways! look back at the experiences of the past sixteen years, and learn the lesson of the disappointment, misery, and insecurity you have suffered. Consider your ways! think of your present state of inaction. If you would regain the favour of God,[§] go up to the mountains and fetch timber, and begin at once to build the House. The drought, the bad harvests, the diseases of the past seasons, are nothing but a punishment[*] for the selfish neglect of your foremost duty.' The prophet's earnest and direct appeal stirred the slumbering energies of both leaders and people, and they proceeded to do work in the House of J″.[†] This was on the 24th day of the sixth month, i.e. little more than three weeks after Haggai first came forward.

[*] All contemporary authorities give the 2nd year of Darius, the 16th of the Return, 520, as the date of the foundation of the temple, Hag $2^{15.\ 18}$, Zec 8^9, Ezr $5^{2.\ 16}$. The account of the laying of the foundations in the 2nd year of the Return, 536, contained in Ezr 3^{8-13}, belongs to a later document, written about 200 years after the events narrated. It is possible that this later account may bave some historical basis; there may have been a purely formal foundation, such as Haggai and Zechariah could entirely disregard. See Driver, LOT^{6} 547.

[*] See the great Behistun inscription of Darius, Records of the Past, i. 107–130.

[†] In the pre-exilic period the year was reckoned from autumn to autumn; but during the Exile a change of reckoning occurred, prob. due to Babylonian influence, and the year ran from spring to spring (see Ex 12^2), i.e. April–April. The old Heb. names of the months were dropped, and at first the months were known by numbers, as in Hag, Zec; then the Bab. names of the months were gradually introduced as in Zec, Ezr, Neh. See Wellh. Proleg.^{3} 110; Benzinger, Hebr. Arch. 201; Nowack, Lehrb. Hebr. Arch. i. 218 f.; and art. TIME.

[‡] In 1^2 the text must be corrected to make sense; see VSS and RVm. The first עֵת 'time,' is not given by VSS; it must either be struck out, or pointed עַתָּה 'now,' or corrected to עֹד 'yet.'

[§] In commenting on the form of the word 'and I will be glorified,' v.^{8} (אכבר for אכבדה), the Talm. says, 'There are five points in which the first temple differed from the second; they are the ark and the mercy-seat and the cherubim, the fire, and the Shechinah, and the Holy Spirit, and the Urim and Tummim.' Talm. B. Yoma 21*b*.

ii. Second prophecy: October; 2^{1-9}. In spite of the enthusiasm aroused by the prophet's first address, and before the work could have advanced much beyond the repairing of the foundations, a feeling of despair began to damp the ardour of the workers, both leaders and people. Those who were old enough to recollect the former temple circulated depressing comparisons: 'This new temple will never be like the old one.'[‡] To arrest the spread of this despondent spirit Haggai promptly brought a message, this time of strong encouragement. It was useless to spend vain regrets upon the past, when all their energies were needed for the present. J″ was still present with His people;[§] and the time was fast approaching for Israel to enter upon its glorious career. The completion of the temple was to be the signal for a convulsion of the universe and a revolution in the Gentile world. Then this very temple, which now appeared too great for their resources and too mean for their desire, would be filled with the treasures of the Gentiles.[‖] That day would see the long-delayed fulfilment of the great promises;[¶] and then there would be no comparison between the first temple and the second, for the glory of the latter House would far excel the glory of the former.

iii. Third prophecy: December; 2^{10-19}. On this occasion Haggai came before the people with a parable, a warning, and a promise. There was much still to depress the spirit of the builders besides the discouraging comparisons of those who could not look beyond the glories of the past. Nothing as yet had taken place to correspond with the inspiring hopes of the prophet. The general state was one of misery, not far from famine. The drought lasted so long that it seemed hopeless to expect any produce from the land. The seed lay useless in the barns; it was impossible to sow it in the sun-parched earth; the vines and fig-trees had borne no fruit (v.^{19}). And yet, said the people, is not the land holy, the favoured soil of J″? Has He not pledged His promise to it? Is not His altar here?

To show the falseness of this reasoning, which argued that because the land was holy therefore it must be fruitful, Haggai asks the priests for instruction (torah) on a ceremonial point; their reply suggests the true principle. The contagion of holiness is transmitted only slightly, if at all (Lv 6^{27}), while uncleanness has a far-reaching effect (Lv 7^{21}, Nu 19^{22}). Altar[*] and sacrifices avail nothing while the people neglect their first duty. To allow the temple to lie in ruins is the guilt which taints everything; the blight which rests upon the land is a proof and punishment of their uncleanness.[†] But now that they have set to work in earnest, and laid the foundation of the temple (v.^{18}),[‡] better days will follow. The seed is in the barns—it shall yield a harvest; the vines and the fig-trees, as yet unfruitful, shall yield their wine and oil; and God's blessing shall descend upon His land (v.^{19}).

iv. Fourth prophecy: same date as iii. The prophet turns from the people to the prince, and addresses Zerubbabel alone. In the vast upheaval which is to accompany the approaching judgement,[§] Zerubbabel will remain unshaken. As the representative of the Davidic dynasty, and therefore the object of patriotic hopes,[‖] he receives an assurance of the divine protection and the perpetuity of his race.[¶] Under Persian domination the prophet dare not promise more.

There can be little doubt that the prophecies of Haggai have come down to us in a very abbreviated form. It is the main heads of his discourses, rather than the discourses themselves, that have been preserved. Compared with Amos and Hosea, the style of Haggai is monotonous and prosaic. He is fond of repetitions, e.g. the reiterated 'Consider your ways,' 'saith J″ of hosts' ($2^{7-9.\,23}$), and the repeated address to Zerubbabel and Joshua by their full titles. At the same time he is capable of finer writing, e.g. $1^{6.\,11}$ $2^{6.\,7.\,21.\,22}$. Compared with his colleague Zechariah, Haggai shows less freedom and variety in his description of the Messianic age. Both prophets belong to the period of the decline of prophecy. They seem to be conscious that their prophetic gift does not possess the direct and copious inspiration of the earlier prophets; for they are careful to assert repeatedly that their word is the word of J″. In one respect they belong to the pre-exilic type, inasmuch as, like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, their names and personalities, and the historical circumstances of their ministry, are well known. Otherwise, they belong to the new school of religious thought which was the product of the Exile. Before the Exile, prophecy was mainly concerned with denunciation of national sins and threats of impending judgment, with summons to repentance and moral reformation; the prophets had to resist the semi-idolatrous worship of a corrupt society. But after the Exile the conditions were altered; tendencies towards apostasy and idolatry had disappeared; and we find that the main interest of Haggai is centred in the temple, and his prophetic gift is exercised in urging the restoration of a material fabric. This change in the subject-matter of prophecy 'is not to be attributed to the inferior religious capacity of the post-exilic period.'* Different circumstances called for a different form of religious expression. New problems had arisen; it was the work of Haggai, and of the religious teachers who followed him, to meet these problems, and to interpret the religion of Israel in accordance with the needs of a new age.

[*] In v.^{10} the second word עֲלֵיכֶם 'for your sake,' is prob. an erroneous repetition of the first עַל־כֵּן. In v.^{12} the second אֱלֹהֵיהֶם 'their God,' is rendered by LXX, Syr. Vulg. 'unto them,' אֲלֵיהֶם, which is to be preferred.

[†] V.^{13} is suspicious; it interrupts the connexion between v.^{12} and v.^{14}; and it is not in Haggai's style, e.g. for מַלְאַךְ י׳ H. writes הַנָּבִיא, for בְּמַלְאֲכוּת י׳ he writes כַּאֲשֶׁר שְׁלָחוֹ v.^{12}. See Böhme, ZATW vii. 215; Stade, GVI ii. 114 n.; Wellh. Skiz. u. Vorarb. v. 169; Nowack, Kl. Proph. 305. The last part of the verse may have been taken from 2^4. On this verse was based the curious tradition that Haggai, like John the Baptist and Malachi, was really an angel in human form. See Jerome, Opera, ed. Bened. 1704, tom. iii. p. 1691, and Cyril Alex. Opera, ed. 1638, tom. iii. p. 637, commenting on this verse.

[‡] The parallel account in Ezr 3^{12} refers to the second year of the Return. But as Ezr 3^{8-13} was written long after the events recorded (see above), it is not impossible that the 'weeping of the old men' really belongs to this occasion (so the contemporary authorities, Hag 2^3, Zec 4^{10}), and has been transferred to the earlier date under a misapprehension.

[§] The first part of v.^{5} down to 'Egypt' scarcely makes grammar (RVm has to insert 'Remember'), and interrupts the context. LXX omits. Prob. a marginal gloss, which has crept into the text. 'My spirit abideth in the midst of you' (Zec 4^6) will thus follow 'I am with you.'

[‖] In v.^{7} translate 'and the desirable things of all the nations shall come.' The word חֶמְדַּת is sing., but collective in meaning, and so construed with a plur. vb.; cf. Is 60^5. The construction is rightly understood by LXX καὶ ἥξει τὰ ἐκλεκτά, Pesh. Targ. Ital. Old interpreters referred the verse directly to the Messiah, e.g. Vulg. et veniet desideratus cunctis gentibus, and Jerome, Comment. in loc. This tr^n is not correct, but the verse is Messianic, in the same sense as Is 60.

[¶] Such as Mic $4^{1.2}$, Is $2^{2.3}$ $60^{5-7.11.13.17}$ 61^6, Jer 3^{17}; cf. Zec 2^{11} 8^{22}, To 14^5. Apparently, Haggai's idea is that the Messianic era will begin immediately after the great upheaval which is to follow the completion of the temple. In v.^{9} LXX begins a new sentence with 'And in this place . . .,' adding καὶ εἰρήνην ψυχῆς εἰς περιποίησιν παντὶ τῷ κτίζοντι τοῦ ἀναστῆσαι τὸν ναὸν τοῦτον, which Wellh. (Sk. u. Vorarb. v. 169) ingeniously reproduces by וְשַׁלְוַת נפש לְחַיּוֹת כל הַיְסוֹד לקוֹמֵם ההיכל הזה (cf. 1 Ch 11^8, Ex 9^{18}, Ps 122^7), 'and rest of soul, to repair all the foundation, to raise up this temple.' The sentence is so peculiar that it is difficult to regard it as a mere addition of LXX; at the same time it is not easy to see why it should have dropped out of the MT. It is not required to complete the sense of the passage.

[*] In v.^{14} 'there' points to the altar erected immediately after the Return (Ezr 3^3). LXX adds at the end of the verse ἕνεκεν τῶν λημμάτων αὐτῶν τῶν ὀρθρινῶν, ὀδυνηθήσονται ἀπὸ προσώπου πόνων αὐτῶν, καὶ ἐμισεῖτε ἐν πύλαις ἐλέγχοντας. So Ital. But first clause is a corrupt reading of יען לְקָחֲתֶם שֹׁחַד as יען לְקֹחָם שַׁחַר, and does not belong to this place; the second clause is a gloss adapted to the context; the third is taken from Am 5^{10} (Wellh. in loc.).

[†] V.^{15} 'From this day and upwards'; the latter word points to the future (cf. 1 S 16^{13} etc.); but before giving a promise for the future (v.^{19}) the prophet recalls, in a parenthesis, the sufferings of the past 16 years (vv.$^{16.17}$) as a warning. In v.^{17} the words אֵין אֶתְכֶם אֵלַי are untranslatable and corrupt. Read וְלֹא שַׁבְתֶּם אֵלַי 'and ye did not turn unto me' (Am 4^9, from which other expressions in this verse are taken).

[‡] V.^{18} the meaning is, 'Consider, from this day and onwards, nay, start from the day when the foundations were laid four months ago; J″'s blessing will date from the time when the work began.' The date in v.^{18} is awkward and unnecessary; perhaps inserted by a reader from v.^{10}.

[§] Some verb seems to have fallen out at the end of v.^{22}; Wellh. suggests יִפֹּלוּ 'shall fall.'

[‖] What Haggai hints, Zechariah makes more explicit; Zerubbabel is to be the Messianic king of the future (Zec 3^8 $6^{9ff.}$).

[¶] 'For the signet,' cf. Jer 22^{29}, Ca 8^6, Sir 49^{11}. The authenticity of vv.$^{20-23}$ has been questioned by Böhme (ZATW vii. 215 ff.) on the ground of (α) certain differences of style, e.g. v.^{20} 'the word of J″ came unto H.' instead of the usual 'the word of J″ came by the hand of H. the prophet,' and (β) the repetition of the prophecy in 2^{6b} ^{7a}. With regard to (α) cf. v.^{10} and Jer 46^{13}, MT and LXX; no great weight can be laid upon the form in which such sentences have been handed down. With regard to (β), the prophecy does not go beyond prophetic thought in Haggai's time; and as it is addressed to Zerub. alone (hence שֵׁנִית v.^{20}) the repetition is natural, and forms a fitting conclusion to the book.

According to Jewish tradition, Haggai (with Zechariah, Malachi, etc.) was a member of the Great Synagogue: see Talm. Baba Bathra, fol. 15*a*, with Rashi's comment. In Aboth R. Nathan, fol. 23*b*, Haggai, Zech., and Mal. are said to have received the tradition from the prophets who were before them, and to have handed it on to the men of the Great Synagogue.

The versions mention Haggai (and Zechariah) in the headings of the following psalms:—LXX Ps 137. (Tischend.) 145. 146. 147. 148. Vulg. Ps 111 'Alleluia, reversionis, Aggæi et Zachariæ,' 145. Itala (Jerome) Ps 6 'canticum Hieremiæ et Aggæi de verbo peregrinationis, quando incipiebant proficisci,' 111 (Nestle). Pesh. Ps 125. 126. 145. 146. 147. 148 (Lee). With these cf. Epiphanius (De vitis prophetarum, ed. 1682, tom. ii. p. 248), who says of Haggai, καὶ αὐτὸς ἔψαλλε ἐκεῖ (ἐν Ἰερουσαλήμ) πρῶτος ἀλληλουιά. Epiphan. also tells us that Haggai the prophet, while still young, went up from Babylon, and prophesied openly about the return (ἐπιστροφῆς) of the people, and saw the building of the temple of Jerusalem, where he died and was buried honourably near the priests. This tradition of Epiphan. is copied by Dorotheus (Synopsis de vita et morte prophetarum, Max. biblioth. vet. patr., Lugd., tom. iii. p. 422), and by Hesychius of Jerus. (ed. Migne, 1865, p. 1362), who says that Haggai was born in Babylon and was of the tribe of Levi, and was buried near the priests because he was of priestly race.

HAGGITH (חַגִּית 'festal').—One of David's wives, known to us only as the mother of Adonijah, David's fourth son, whom she bare to him at Hebron, i.e. before he became king over all Israel (2 S 3^4, 1 Ch 3^2). Adonijah is usually introduced as 'the son of Haggith' (1 K $1^{5.\,11}$ 2^{13}).

HAGRI (הַגְרִי, AV Haggeri).—Father of Mibhar, one of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{38}. Instead of מִבְחָר בֶּן־הַגְרִי, the parallel passage 2 S 23^{36} reads מִצֹּבָה בָּנִי הַגָּדִי 'of Zobah, Bani the Gadite,' which is probably the correct text. (Cf. Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. ad loc., and Kittel on 1 Ch 11^{38}).

HAGRITE (הַהַגְרִי).—Jaziz the Hagrite (AV Hagerite) was 'over the flocks' of king David, 1 Ch 27^{31}. See next article.

HAGRITES (1 Ch $5^{10.\,19.\,20}$, AV Hagarites).—Hagarenes (AV and RV Ps 83^6, but RVm has Hagrites), הַהַגְרָאִים, הַהַגְרִיאִים, הַגְרִים (LXX Ἀγαρηνοί, Ἀγγαρηνοί, Ἀγαραῖοι, Ἀγεραῖοι). Whether the tribe was of Aramæan or Arabian origin is uncertain. The name first appears in history in 1 Ch 5^{10} in the story of the campaign of the Reubenites in the days of Saul, in which the H. are described as driven out of the district lying to the east of Gilead. They are also named along with the two Ishmaelitish tribes, Jetur and Naphish (1 Ch 1^{31}, Gn 25^{15}), and an otherwise unknown tribe, Nodab, as the chief object of attack on the part of the three Israelitish tribes east of the Jordan, on which occasion, according to our present text, the H. and their allies lost 100,000 men (1 Ch 5^{19-22}). That their wealth consisted in cattle is indicated in the same passage by the statement that no less than 50,000 camels, 250,000 sheep, and 2000 asses fell into the hands of the conquerors. The question has been often raised as to whether the name H. designates a particular tribe. Bertheau on 1 Ch 5^{10} assumes that the name is a late designation of the Bedawîn tribes of Arabia generally current in the times of the Chronicler. It does indeed so happen that the name occurs only in very late writings, only in Ch and in Ps 83. Yet even there, at least in the psalm just referred to, it occurs alongside of the names of other Arabian and even Ishmaelitish tribes, which would have been included under it had it been used in this general sense. Many of the Jewish writers assumed that the H. were simply the descendants of Hagar. Dillmann and others think it extremely doubtful whether the name has any connexion with that of Ishmael's mother. It is not even quite certain that they were Ishmaelites. It is, however, quite evidently the intention of the Chronicler to represent the H. as including several other Ishmaelite tribes, without perhaps regarding them as coextensive with the Ishmaelites. That he associated their name with that of Hagar is also highly probable. Their name occurs in the midst of a group of Aramæan tribes (Schrader, COT, ii. 32) in the list of Tiglath-pileser III. (c. B.C. 727). In all probability they are the same as the Ἀγραῖοι of the Greek geographers, described as neighbours of the Nabatæans in Northern Arabia (Strabo, XVI. iv. 2; Pliny, vi. 32; Ptolem. v. xix. 2). They are certainly not to be identified with the Gerrhæans, a rich commercial people on the Persian Gulf, of peaceable habits, quite unlike the restless combative Hagrites. Whether or not the οἱ υἱοὶ Ἄγαρ of Bar 3^{23} are to be identified with the H. is a matter of little consequence. Perhaps this late writer, belonging to the later years of the apostolic age, intended only a vague reference to children of the East famous for their wisdom. The strange fancy that reads a reference to this people in St. Paul's allegory of Hagar and Sinai (Gal 4^{24}) need only be mentioned as a curiosity in exegesis. On the use and probable meaning of the word Hagar in that passage, see an admirable and extremely interesting note in Lightfoot's Galatians^{10} (1890), pp. 192–200. If, as some believe, we have a reminiscence of the H. in the name Hedjâz, applied to the northern part of the strip of land to the east of the Red Sea, we must suppose them to have been driven gradually southward from their earlier home. Individual Hagrites appear in the history of David—one, named Jaziz, as the king's chief shepherd (1 Ch 27^{31}), another, named Mibhar, as one of the heroes about the king (1 Ch 11^{38}). But see preceding two articles.

HAIL.—The interjection Hail! was originally an adj. meaning 'healthy,' 'in good health,' and came from the Scand. heill, 'hale,' 'whole.' It appears as a salutation in the oldest English, but always joined to the verb 'to be' in the imperat. and retaining its adj. force. Thus in Anglo-Sax. Gospels, Lk 1^{28} 'Hâl wes thu' = 'Hale be thou!' Mt 28^{9} 'Hâle wese ge' = 'Hale be ye.' So 'All hail' meant originally 'altogether whole,' hail being still an adj. But the verb being omitted, 'hail' and 'all hail' came to be used purely as an interjection. And so Shaks. is able to use 'all hail!' apart from the construction of the sentence, Rich. II. IV. i. 169—

> 'Did they not sometime cry "all hail" to me?
> So Judas did to Christ.'

And in Macbeth, I. v. 6, he turns 'all hail' into a verb, 'Whiles I stood rapt in the wonder of it, came missives from the king, who all-hailed me, "Thane of Cawdor."'

Hail! is found in the Gospels only, and always as tr. of Χαῖρε (the imperat. of χαίρειν, to rejoice), a common salutation in Greek writers, and represented in Lat. by Ave! or Salve! The Vulg. uses 'Ave!' in all the passages, Mt 26^{49} 27^{29}, Mk 15^{18}, Lk 1^{28}, Jn 19^{3}. The Eng. 'hail' is as old as Wyc.; it was introduced again by Tind. and accepted by all the VSS except Gen. in Mt 26^{49} 27^{29} 'God save thee.' In Mt 28^{9} the plu. χαίρετε occurs, where Wyc. gave 'Heil ye'; but Tind. 'All hayle,' whom the rest of the VSS followed, except Gen. 'God save you.' J. HASTINGS.

HAIL (בָּרָד bārād, ἡ χάλαζα) is mentioned in Scripture 31 times, and always as an instrument of divine judgment. A grievous hail was the seventh plague in Egypt (Ex 9$^{18\text{ff.}}$); and as in that country hail, like rain, falls rarely, and when it occurs is generally slight (the annual rainfall in Cairo being under an inch), the catastrophe was the more remarkable, and was the first of the plagues which were directly fatal to men (vv.$^{19.\ 25}$). Hail is, however, not unknown in Egypt. On Aug. 13, 1832, a brief and local but severe hailshower fell, and some of the stones are said to have weighed several ounces.

The ancient Egyptian word for hail, ār, is also applied to a driving shower of sand and stones: in the contest between Horus and Set, Isis is described as sending upon the latter ār n šā, 'a hail of sand.' In Coptic hail is named ⲁⲗ ⲛⲧⲉ ⲧⲫⲉ, 'stones from heaven.'

Lightning being also comparatively infrequent, this feature of the plague is emphasized in the narrative, 'flashing continually amidst the hail' (RVm v.^{24}; see also Wis 16$^{16\text{ff.}}$, Sir 46^{6}, Ps 18$^{12.\ 13}$ 78^{48} 105^{32}).

Hail accompanies electrical disturbances, and is commonest at the earlier part of the day, before the ascending current from the heated land is established, and when there is the greatest variation of temperature and amount of vapour in successive strata of the atmosphere. The vapour, carried aloft by whirling currents, condenses as it ascends through colder strata into waterdrops which at higher levels become frozen, and, when carried laterally out of the ascending current, fall as hail. Often in their descent they are again caught by the ascending vortices and become nuclei of additional condensation, becoming coated with fresh lamellæ of ice. (For forms of hailstones see Buchan's Meteorology, 2nd ed. p. 106). In the act of falling, hailstones often cohere, forming by the process of regelation solid masses, which do immense damage to vegetation, and notably to vines (Ps 78^{48}). Prof. Joannis of Bordeaux records the fall of stones of 200 grammes weight.

The localization of the plague (Ex 9^{26}) is in accord with common experience. The great hailstorm of 13th July 1788, which destroyed property valued at £1,000,000, crossed Europe in two belts about 12 miles apart, each belt being from 7 to 10 miles wide and about 400 miles long. The hailshower of 18th April 1850, which destroyed £27,000 worth of property in Dublin, left a whole district of the city untouched.

The season of the plague was probably the end of Jan., when the flax was in bloom and the barley (which ripens 6 months after sowing, and is harvested about the end of Feb.) was in the ear (v.^{31}). Wheat, which does not come into ear until about a month later, escaped (v.^{32}), to become afterwards the prey of the locusts (10^{15}). At this season hailstorms are most frequent in Levantine lands. The storm in the Haurân, recorded by Mohammed el-Chateb el-Bosrawi, which destroyed many men and an immense number of cattle, occurred in Feb. 1860.

Hail falls most commonly by day, at the time when men are at their work (Ex 9$^{19.\ 20}$). Out of 440 consecutive hailstorms registered, only 18 occurred at night. This was noticed long ago by Venerable Bede, 'interdiu sæpius quam noctu decidunt' (De Nat. Rer. xxxiv.).

In Ps 78^{48} חֲנָמַל is used as a parallel with bārād. This is a hapax legomenon, and is tr. 'frost' (AV and RV), but Kimchi and Ibn Ezra regard it as meaning 'hail.' It is rendered in AVm and RVm 'great hailstones,' which is probably correct. Rashi and the Targumists suppose that the word refers to locusts (see also Lee's Lexicon, p. 211). LXX has πάχνη, hoar frost. Michaelis and Ges. conjecture 'ants,' but these guesses are groundless.

By hailstones the Amorites were smitten at Bethhoron, Jos 10^{11}, and the size of the stones is here emphasized, as in Sir 46^{6}. There are many authentic records of large stones formed by regelation. In a storm at Kazorla in Spain, 15th June 1829, stones fell which weighed 2 kilos., and in the great storm of 24th July 1818 in Orkney the stones were as large as goose eggs, and in 9 minutes 9 inches of ice had fallen. In a similar shower on 7th May 1865 at Câtalet the hailstorms are said in the official report to have made heaps 16 feet high. One great concreted mass of stones which fell in Hungary, 8th May 1832, was 3 feet in diameter, and another was measured in Ross-shire in Aug. 1849 which was 20 feet in circumference. Such stones do immense damage. In the Indian and Colonial Exhibition there was a corrugated iron roof exhibited which was pierced in several places by hailstones, and a similar occurrence is reported by an eye-witness in Notes and Queries, Nov. 19, 1887. (For other examples of destructive hailstorms see Thomson's Meteorology, 1849). Hailstorms of great severity are recorded from Bible lands by Kitto and Thomson (Land and Book, i. 86). The discomfiture of armies by hail is not confined to this instance. Sennacherib's advance in his 7th campaign, as recorded on the Taylor Cylinder, was stopped by hail, and Esarhaddon's army encountered such another storm in the land of Khani Rabbi (WAI iii. 15). In 1339 the army of Edward III. was stopped in its march to Chartres by hail (Holinshed); and, later, a violent hailshower completed the defeat of the Austrian army at Solferino (1859).

In Job 38^{22} God speaks of the treasuries of hail reserved against the day of battle and war, and in Rev 8^{7} 11^{19} 16^{21} hail is the type of God's judgment on sin. In the latter passage stones of the weight of a talent, i.e. about 2 cubic feet in bulk, are mentioned. In Is 28^{2-17} the Assyrian invasion is figuratively described as זֶרֶם בָּרָד zerem bārād, a flowing of hail, called in v.^{15} the overflowing scourge, which is to sweep away the Egyptian alliance, called in the passage 'the refuge of lies.' In Is 30^{30} it is the power which, in turn, is to overthrow the Assyrian. The 'hail in the downfall of the forest' of Is 32^{19} may be an interjected allusion to the Assyrian invasion, but the passage with its shifting figures and assonances is peculiarly obscure. Kimchi conjectures that it may mean that it will only hail in the forest, not on the cultivated land. In Hag 2^{17} hail also means divine chastisement.

In Ezk 13^{11-13} hail represents the judgment of God defeating the hypocrisy which would conceal corruption; 'comminatio Dei qua contumaces verberat' (Rabanus, de Universo, xxii. 18). The word used here and in Ezk 38^{22} אֶלְגָּבִישׁ 'elgâbish is peculiar, and possibly connected with the gâbish of Job 28^{18}, rendered 'pearls' in AV, 'crystal' in RV. In the rabbinical comment on Berachoth (54*b*) the stones of 'elgâbish are, by a false etymology, explained as hail which was sent at the prayer of a man (Jos 10^{11}), and stopped by the prayer of a man (Ex 9^{29}). St. Agobard, Bp. of Lyons, wrote a treatise, de Grandine, etc., to disprove the notion of human instrumentality in the procuring of hail (A.D. 835).

HAIR (שֵׂעָר, once שְׂעַר Is 7^{20}; שַׂעֲרָה; θρίξ, κόμη).—A luxuriant growth of hair on head and chin was regarded by the Hebrews and other Semitic peoples as an important constituent of manly grace. Absalom's long hair is noted as an element in his much prized beauty (2 S 14^{26}). Solomon's youthful horsemen, 'in the most delightful flower of their age . . . had long heads of hair' (Jos. Ant. VIII. vii. 3). It was an admired distinction to have bushy (RVm 'curled') locks, 'black as a raven' (Ca 5^{11}). The phrase גָּלָה אֹזֶן 'he uncovereth the ear' (1 S $20^{2.12}$ 22^{8}), may possibly refer to long locks, covering the ear, pushed aside to whisper a secret. Among women, long dark tresses were held most captivating (Ca 7^{5}), and they have always worn the hair long (Jn 11^{2}, 1 Co $11^{5.6}$); but in NT times long hair was a dishonour to a man (1 Co 11^{14}). Men dreaded baldness, as suggesting a suspicion of leprosy (Lv 13^{40}), and this possibly explains the youths' disrespectful conduct to Elisha (2 K 2^{23}).

Other Asiatics, and the Greeks, observed similar customs. The Babylonians wore their hair long, 'binding their heads with turbans' (Herod. i. 195). The Greeks loved rich waving hair; the youthful gods, Bacchus and Apollo, were figured with plenteous locks. The Egyptians, on the other hand, shaved both head and face. To be unshaven marked the sloven; if, however, this was due to hardships of war, it was honourable (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii. 330). Enslaved foreigners were forced to shave (Gn 41^{14}). The long-haired Asiatics and Greeks excited among the Egyptians both ridicule and disgust (Herod. ii. 37, 49, 91). Boys' heads were shaven very early. Herodotus accounts for the strength of Egyptian skulls by their exposure, clean-shaven, to the full glare of the sun (Herod. iii. 12). The locks in front of the ears were preserved, as the sign of immaturity, and removed when manhood was reached. These locks are represented on the statues of Harpocrates and other younger deities (Wilk. iii. 130). Adult princes wore a badge at the side of the head, which perhaps contained the youthful lock in earlier days, and continued to indicate that while the father lived they had not attained the dignity of kinghood (ib. iii. 326). Large use was made of false hair, in wigs (ib. ii. 229) and in beards, to the forms of which special significance attached (see BEARD). Women wore their own hair, plentiful growth being highly esteemed. A woman's head was never shaved; but the locks, when long and beautiful, were sometimes cut off and preserved, to be laid in her tomb after death (ib. ii. 21 n.). The slave-woman's hair was differently dressed from that of her mistress (ib. ii. 338, 339). Moslem influence has modified Egyptian customs. In shaving the heads of men and boys a tuft is left on the crown; the cheek above the under jaw is shaven, and the part under the chin. The moustache is left unshaven. Female infants are never shaved; and women wear their hair long, usually in plaits and ringlets.

Of the terms used for dressing the hair, and the fashions of wearing it among the Hebrews, we may note the following:—מַחְלְפוֹת, LXX σειραί (Jg $16^{13.19}$), of Samson's 'seven locks,' which probably resembled the long 'plaits' affected now by the young Arab warriors. Jezebel 'tired her head,' וַתֵּיטֶב (2 K 9^{30}), which means simply that she set her hair in order. צַמָּה 'locks' (Ca $4^{1.3}$ 6^{7}, Is 47^{2} AV, following Kimchi; RV, following LXX [in Ca σιώπησις, in Is κατακάλυμμα], tr. 'veil'). עֲנָק (Ca 4^{9}), literally 'collar' or 'necklace,' may have been a lock falling round the neck—Vulg. in uno crine colli tui. תַּלְתַּלִּים (Ca 5^{11}), LXX ἐλάται, Vulg. elathæ palmarum, tresses hanging gracefully like the pendulous palm branches. דַּלָּה (Ca 7^{5}; compare Is 38^{12}), is a figure supplied by the thrum, or slender threads binding the web to the weaver's beam. רְהָטִים (Ca 7^{5}; compare Gn $30^{38.41}$), probably 'gutters,' or channels conveying water to the flocks, their orderly arrangement suggesting flowing tresses. מַעֲשֶׂה מִקְשָׁה (Is 3^{24}), literally 'turned work,' applied to curls, or artificially twisted hair. צִיצִת 'a lock,' probably the forelock, from the curve resembling that of a flower or wing. Judith 'braided,' διέταξε, 'the hairs of her head' (10^{3}). For other references to modes of wearing the hair, see 1 Ti 2^{9}, 1 P 3^{3}, Jos. Ant. XIV. ix. 4, and BJ IV. ix. 10.

That the barber's trade was practised we know from Ezk 5^{1}. The hairdresser and the instruments of his art figure in the Mishna (Shabbath, § 6). The Egyptians used wooden combs, with large teeth on one side and small on the other, ornamented as if for wearing in the hair (Wilk. ii. 349). Ointment was commonly used by the Hebrews in dressing the hair (Ru 3^{3}, 2 S 14^{2}, Ps 92^{10} 133^{2}, Ec 9^{8}, Mt 6^{17}, Jos. Ant. XIX. iv. 1). Anointing the hair was a sign of festivity (Ps 45^{7}) and a mark of hospitality (Ps 23^{5}, Lk 7^{46}). Solomon's young horsemen produced striking effects by sprinkling their heads with gold dust every day (Jos. Ant. VIII. vii. 3). Herod the Great dyed his hair to conceal his great age (Ant. XVI. viii. 1); but the practice was unusual (Mt 5^{36}). Wigs were not unknown (Jos. Vita, 11). Orientals have from of old worn ornaments in the hair. It is doubtful if שְׁבִיסִים (Is 3^{18}), LXX ἐμπλόκια, were 'networks' (RVm) or sun-shaped ornaments, distinguished from the crescent or moon-shaped, mentioned in the same verse (Schrœder, De Vest. Mul. Heb. cap. 2). To-day coins are most used by women: the long plaits often worn have frequently one or more gold pieces dangling at the end. A blue bead knotted into the hair of children is a potent charm against the evil eye.

The Hebrews were forbidden to cut off the corners of their hair (Lv 19^{27}). They may have adopted the Egyptian practice of wearing the front locks in youth, removing them on the threshold of manhood. But neighbouring peoples attached a religious significance to this act. The Arabians cut their hair in imitation of Orotal—the Arabian Bacchus—'in a circular form, shaving it round the temples' (Herod. iii. 8). This usage is referred to in Jer 9^{26} 25^{23} 49^{32}. The young man wore his front locks untouched; their removal marked his entrance into man's estate, and his initiation into the worship of Orotal. Among the Bedawîn to-day the front locks are found only on growing lads. The Greek ephebi offered the long hair of their childhood at Delphi; the cut adopted was called θησηΐς, as the god was said to have cut only his front locks here. The Hebrews were thus distinguished from the idolatrous peoples around them. A curious evidence of this ancient prohibition is seen among the Palestinian Jews, who closely crop the whole head, leaving only the two locks in front of the ears, which hang down in long ringlets by either cheek.

The first hair has often been held sacred. In Arabia, in Mohammed's time, when a child was born its head was shaved, and the scalp daubed with the blood of a slaughtered sheep. Lane noted that at the first shaving of a boy's head the Egyptian peasants slew a goat, and all who cared partook of the feast provided. These were 'the more recent settlers, whose pagan Arabian ancestors . . . gave as alms to the poor the weight of the hair in silver or gold' (Lane, Mod. Egyp. 573). Burckhardt observes that 'among the Maazy Arabs . . . it is a festival in the family when the son's head is shaved for the first time.' Lucian says the Syrian boys and girls of his time, on growing up, cut off and dedicated their first hair at some sanctuary. Phœnician maidens, as a preliminary to marriage, had to sacrifice either their hair or their chastity at the feast of Byblus. Lv 19^{27} is rendered in the Syriac 'ye shall not let your hair grow long,' and it is explained that the custom of the heathen was 'to let the hair grow for a certain time, and on a fixed date to shave the head in a temple or beside a fountain.'

Herodotus mentions the Egyptian custom of dedicating the weight in silver of the hair taken from a child's head (ii. 65). A similar custom among the Arabs is traced to the example of Fâtima. Absalom's abundant tresses, cut, collected, and weighed 'at every year's end,' the sacred season of pilgrimage, may suggest some similar religious observance. The one clear biblical instance of hair in an offering is in connexion with the Nazirite vow. The hair must grow and be kept from all pollution during the period of consecration: the bushy locks were the visible sign of the Nazirite's condition. Contact with impurity necessitated the shaving and sanctifying of the head, and the period of consecration began afresh. When the vow was accomplished, the head was shaved at the door of the Tent of Meeting, and the hair burned in the fire under the sacrifice of peace-offerings (Nu 6^{1-21}). In Mohammedan law, the resolve to visit a distant shrine is reckoned a vow; and the hair must be neither cut nor even washed, until the purpose is accomplished. Then by cutting the hair the pilgrim passes back from the consecrated to the common condition (Wellhausen, Skizzen, iii. 117). Examples are found in St. Paul's vow (Ac 18^{18}), and that of Bernice (Jos. BJ II. xv. 1). A parallel may be traced between this latter and the Greek custom of vowing to offer the hair to the gods in return for help or protection. Achilles dedicated his hair to the river-god Spercheus, on condition of his safe return from Troy. At the great feasts of Byblus and Bambyce offerings of hair were made (Dea Syria, VI. lv.). The painted inscription at Citium (CIS 86) mentions גלבים 'barbers' among the regular ministers of the sanctuary. The idea more or less consciously underlying these practices probably was, that by means of his hair, part of himself, instinct with his life, the devotee formed a stable link of connexion with the sanctuary and the deity there worshipped.

If an important part of life was conceived as residing in the hair, we can see why that of consecrated persons was so cared for. From Ezk 44^{20} we gather that certain priesthoods, like those of Egypt, shaved their heads; others, like Samuel, let the hair grow long. Profanation was avoided on the one hand by preventing its growth, on the other by keeping it untouched. Princes were also consecrated persons. נֵזֶר 'a crown' (Jer 7^{29} RVm) is in origin simply the fillet binding the prince's long hair.

Among the Hebrews, Arabs, and other peoples, cutting the flesh was often associated with shaving the head in mourning, or taking part of the hair to lay in the tomb, or on the funeral pyre. Both practices are prohibited in Lv $19^{27.\ 28}$ (see also Dt 14^{1}, Lv $21^{5.\ 10}$, Am 8^{10} etc.). See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH, and W. R. Smith, RS 305 ff. Arab women, in accordance with immemorial customs, sometimes shave their heads and wrap the hair in cloths stained with their own blood. The habit of tearing the hair in mourning, which still persists among the Jews and other Oriental peoples, may probably be traced to this ancient custom. It was also a sign of mourning to let the hair fall untended and dishevelled (Ezk 24^{17}, Jth 10^{3}). The Egyptians in mourning let all their hair grow (Herod. ii. 36). The hair of an attached relative was sometimes buried with the mummy (Wilk. ii. 339). Cutting or tearing the hair was common as an expression of violent emotion, as of fear and distress (Est 14^{2}), of sorrow for national sin (Ezr 9^{3}, 1 Es 8^{71}, 2 Es 1^{8}), and of grief over national calamities (Is 3^{24} 15^{2}, Jer 7^{29} 48^{37}, Ezk 7^{18} etc.).

The hair and nails of the dead have often been regarded as charms, making it possible to maintain connexion with the departed. Possession of a man's hair in primitive magic was esteemed a potent means of getting and retaining a hold upon him. Mohammed's hair was preserved, and worn on their persons by his followers. The Arab was accustomed to cut off the hair of his prisoner before setting him free. Perhaps more than insult was intended by shaving David's messengers (2 S 10^{4}).

The almond blossom turning white before it falls is the symbol of the hoary hair (Ec 12^{5}). The sprinkling of grey hairs unknown to a man indicates the stealthy approach of life's winter (Hos 7^{9}). Grey hairs have always been revered in the East. Irreverence to grey hairs marks the ungodly (Wis 2^{10}). Evil was accentuated if it brought harm on grey hairs (Gn 42^{38}). Wisdom was reckoned as the grey hair to a man (Wis 4^{10}), and the hoary head as a crown of glory, the reward of a life of righteousness (Pr 16^{31} 20^{29}). For grey hairs to come down to the grave in peace was a token of God's favour (1 K 2$^{6.9}$). Grey hairs laid on men obligations of honourable and chivalrous conduct (2 Mac 6^{23}). White hair was an element in a glorious appearance (2 Mac 15^{13}), especially that of divine majesty (Dt 7^{8}, Rev 1^{14}).

The hair of Samson was regarded as the seat of his strength (Jg 16^{22}). The hairs of the head are taken as representing the extremely numerous (Ps 40^{12} 69^{4}), and the exceedingly minute (1 S 14^{45}, 2 S 14^{11}, 1 K 1^{52}, Mt 10^{30}, Lk 21^{18}, Ac 27^{34}). Fineness of aim is described as slinging stones at an hairbreadth (Jg 20^{16}). The Jews swore by the hair (Mt 5^{36}). One of the most binding oaths in the East now is by the beard. The colour of the hair assisted the priest to discriminate leprosy from other ailments (Lv 13). Pollution clung strongly to hair (Lv 14$^{8.9}$). On the meaning of the regulation in Dt 21^{12}, see Driver's note.

Goats' hair (עִזִּים) is named among acceptable offerings for the sanctuary (Ex 25^{4} 35^{6}); it was not used for the interior work, but only for the outer covering of the tabernacle (Ex 26^{7} 36^{14}). The preparation of the cloth required special skill and dexterity (Ex 35^{26}). Work of goats' hair is directed to be purified after ceremonial pollution (Nu 31^{20}). From the connexion here, it seems to have been employed then, as now, for articles of clothing. The large overall, or 'abâ', commonly worn, is almost invariably of goats' hair. It serves, among other purposes, as waterproof in rain, as greatcoat in cold, and as blanket at night: it possibly corresponds to the 'garment' of Ex 22^{27} (RV). Pillows or cushions are sometimes stuffed with goats' hair (1 S 19^{13}). Goats' hair formed the material with which St. Paul was occupied as a tent-maker (Ac 18^{3}), the haircloth for which his native province of Cilicia was noted being known to commerce as cilicium. Of this dark-brown stuff the tents of the nomads have been made from of old (Ca 1^{5}), and employment is still found for great numbers in preparing materials for the 'hair houses' of the Bedawîn.

Camels' hair (θρὶξ καμήλου) is mentioned only as forming the raiment of John the Baptist (Mt 3^{4}, Mk 1^{6}). This was possibly the softer wool of the camel, the Arab. wabr, of which a more closely fitting garment is made, with sleeves, worn under the 'abâ' described above (but cf. Jerome, 'non de lana cameli, sed de asperioribus setis').

HAJEHUDIJAH occurs in RVm of 1 Ch 4^{18} in an obscure genealogical list. It is the transliteration of the Heb. הַיְהֻדִיָּה, which, however, probably is not a proper name, but means 'the Jewess' (so RV and RVm). AV reads Jehudijah. LXX has αὕτη Ἀδειά. See GENEALOGY.

HAKKATAN (הַקָּטָן 'the smallest').—The head of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 8^{12}), called in 1 Es 8^{38} Akatan. See GENEALOGY.

HAKKOZ (הַקּוֹץ).—1. A Judahite, 1 Ch 4^{8}; AV Coz. 2. The eponym of a priestly family, 1 Ch 24^{10}, Ezr 2^{61} 7^{63}, Neh 3$^{4.21}$. In Ezr and Neh the first part of the word is taken to be the definite art. by AV, which reads Koz. In 1 Es 5^{38} the name appears as Akkos. See GENEALOGY.

HAKUPHA (חֲקוּפָא).—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2^{51}, Neh 7^{53}), called in 1 Es 5^{31} Achipha. See GENEALOGY.

HALACHA.—See TALMUD.

HALAH (חֲלַח) is mentioned 2 K 17^{6} 18^{11}, 1 Ch 5^{26} as one of the places whither the king of Assyria deported the captives from Samaria. LXX Ἀλάε B (once Ἀλλάε A), in Ch Χαάχ (! for Χαλά), A Χαλά, Vulg. Hala, in Ch Lahela (!). The description indicates plainly that it is to be sought in Northern Mesopotamia, not far from Nineveh; but the location of the name has always been disputed. The various views are: 1. That Halah is a large city of Assyria, the Calah (כֶּלַח) of Gn 10^{11}, Kalkhu of the cuneiform texts, modern Nimrûd between the Tigris and the Upper Zâb, S. of Nineveh (see CALAH). This identification is quite inadmissible on phonetic grounds, as is likewise 2., Halévy's comparison with Cilicia, חלך Khilakku. The latter has also the context against it. 3. The region Chalkitis (Χαλκῖτις) in Mesopotamia (Ptol. v. 18. 4), bordering upon Gauzanitis (Gozan) and the country Anthemusia, near the rivers Chabōras (Habor) and Saokoras (or Mygdonius), would suit (so Schrader in Riehm, Handwörterbuch), if we were sure that the Greek form represents the same consonants as Halah. Of course, the modern village Gla, on the Upper Chaboras (Smith, Bible Dict.), cannot represent the name nor the modern Ḥolwan (see below). 4. Bochart (Phaleg iii. 4) compared the Calachene (Καλαχήνη) of Strabo (736, comp. Καλακινή, Ptol. vi. 1), a plain of Northern Assyria at the side of Adiabene and Armenia, E. of the Tigris. 5. This name is not to be confounded with the Chalonitis S.E. of Assyria on the Zagrus mountain (Strabo, 529, 736; Plin. vi. 30, i. 27, 31, etc.; Dion. Perieg. 1015; Polyb. v. 54). Isidorus of Charax describes the Parthian province of Χαλωνῖτις, called thus from 'the Greek city Χάλα.' This is evidently the same as Κελῶναι, Diod. xvii. 110, Albania, Tab. Pent., the modern Ḥolwan حُلْوَان. It is claimed that this city appears in Syriac literature as Ḥalaḥ (=חלח, Assem. Bibl. Or. iii. 418), and the Καλχάς, Chron. Pasc. i. 730, would confirm this. But there are various difficulties attached to this complicated identification, and the Assyrians seem to call Holwan Ḫalwan; see Delitzsch, Paradies, 205. 6. More probability is attached to the view of Winckler (Alttestamentliche Untersuchungen, 108). The LXX understood Halah as a river, ἐν Ἀλάε καὶ ἐν Ἀβώρ, ποταμοῖς (!) Γωζάν, so that the original text may have had the plural 'rivers of Gozan.' Consequently, Winckler proposed the easy emendation בלח for חלח, i.e. the modern Balîkh river (already called Balikhi in Assyrian times, Βάλιχα, Βήλιχος, Βίληχα, Belias of the classical writers), flowing into the Euphrates not far from Rakka. This view has been accepted by most modern scholars. 7. Lately, however, Winckler himself has retracted it (Altorientalische Forschungen, 292). Two cuneiform documents mention a country Khalakhkha, Ḫalaḫḫa, i.e. חלח near Haran, in the very same region where the biblical description would place Halah. The exact position cannot yet be determined, owing to the fragmentary state of those documents; but it seems that this last explanation is the best solution of the problem. Possibly, also, the 6th explanation still deserves some attention.

W. MAX MÜLLER.

HALAK (הָהָר הֶחָלָק, Ἀλάκ A, Ἀχέλ B), or 'the smooth mountain,' Jos 11^{17} 12^{7} (only).—This eminence has not been identified, but its approximate locality is indicated by the words 'that goeth up to Seir': and it formed the southern limit of Joshua's conquests. We may infer, therefore, that it was the summit of a smooth ascent in the valley of the Arabah to the south of the Ghôr, or Dead Sea basin; and some have supposed that it was the line of cliffs which form the margin of the Ghôr itself, about 6 miles S. of the shore of that lake. This view is, however, probably erroneous, as the expression 'smooth mountain' would not apply to an abrupt range of cliffs formed of alluvial materials, which we have elsewhere (see DEAD SEA, vol. i. p. 575^a) identified as 'the ascent of Akrabbim' (Nu 34^4). But from the margin of the Ghôr the Arabah Valley gradually rises towards the summit level, which it reaches immediately in front of Mount Hor on the borders of Seir; and to this line of elevation the term 'smooth' would not be inapplicable, while at the same time it would be on the line of communication between southern Palestine and Petra, the capital of Seir.

E. HULL.

HALE.—The verbs 'hale' and 'haul,' meaning to drag, are, says Skeat, dialectical varieties of the same word. They are found in all the Teut. languages (as Dutch halen, Dan. hale), and are etymol. connected with Gr. καλεῖν and Lat. calare, to summon. Hale is the older form, and it alone occurs in AV and in Shaks.,[*] though 'haul' was already in use. The passages are Ac 8^3 'As for Saul, he made havoc of the church, entering into every house, and haling men and women committed them to prison' (σύρων, Amer. RV 'dragging'); Lk 12^{58} 'lest he hale thee to the judge' (μήποτε κατασύρῃ, Amer. RV 'drag'). In both places 'hale' is original to AV, the earlier VSS having 'draw.' For the word cf. T. Lever, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 23), 'This Realme is devyded in it selfe . . . by covetouse ambicion, euerye manne pullynge and halynge towardes them selves, one from another'; T. Fuller, Holy State, ii. 7, 'It [the Greek language] is full and stately in sound: onely it pities our Artist to see the vowels therein rackt in pronouncing them, hanging oftentimes one way by their native force, and haled another by their accents which countermand them'; and Milton, PL ii. 596—

> 'Thither by harpy-footed furies hal'd,
> At certain revolutions all the damn'd
> Are brought.'

J. HASTINGS.

HALHUL (חַלְחוּל).—A city of Judah mentioned (Jos 15^{58}) in the list of the inheritance of the tribe of Judah along with five others, all of which have been identified except Eltekon. Jerome places it near to Hebron (Onomast. s. 'Elul'). It is the modern Ḥalḥul, a large village 4 miles north of Hebron, which lies in the mountains of Judah, on a hill about a mile to the east of the road to Jerusalem. On the opposite side of the road is Beit-sur (Beth-zūr), a rocky fastness built by Rehoboam for the defence of his kingdom (2 Ch 11^7), and used in the wars of the Maccabees as a defence against Idumæa (1 Mac 4^{61}). Between these two places, lower down, is the fountain Dhirweh, the traditional site of the baptism of the eunuch by Philip. Not far to the north is the head of Pilate's great aqueduct leading to Jerusalem, 41⅓ miles by the aqueduct (13 miles as the crow flies), the fall being 365 ft. in that distance (Tent Work in Palestine, 'Halhul'). A mile to the east of Ḥalḥul is Beit 'Ainûn, identified by Robinson as Beth-anoth, where are extensive ruins and large drafted stones. Farther to the north is Jedûr (Gedor), a small ruin. About the site of Ḥalḥul are ruins and rock-cut tombs, including a Byzantine ruin and an ancient church (ruined). The mosque Neby Yunâs (Jonah) is a modern building on a platform of rock, which appears to have been artificially levelled (BRP i. 216, iii. 282; SWP iii. 329). Ishak Chelo in 1334 (Carmoly, p. 242) speaks of Ḥalḥul as containing the sepulchre of Gad, David's seer (1 S 22^5, 2 S 24^{11}; Benj. of Tud. by Asher, ii. 437). See, further, Dillm. on Jos 15^{58}, and Guérin, Judée, iii. 284 ff.

HALI (חֲלִי).—A city belonging to the tribe of Asher, Jos 19^{25}. The site is doubtful. It may be the ruin 'Alia on the hills N.E. of Achzib, about 13 miles N.E. of Acre. See SWP vol. i. sh. iii., and Guérin, Galilée, ii. 62. Buhl (GAP 231) doubts this identification.

C. R. CONDER.

HALICARNASSUS (Ἁλικαρνασσός) was one of the six Dorian colonies on the coast of Caria (see COS). Trœzen was its mother city. Though excluded from the Dorian confederacy (Hexapolis) on account of some ancient dispute (Herod. i. 144), it was a very important city in respect of politics, commerce, literature, and art. During the Persian domination it prospered greatly under a dynasty of tyrannoi established by Lygdamis. His widow, Artemisia, dynast in 480, possessed great influence with Xerxes. Maussollos (377–353) made the city supreme over most of Caria and part of Lycia, under the suzerainty of the Persian king. The monument built in his honour by Artemisia, his sister-wife, who survived him, was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world: scanty remains of it are now in the British Museum. Halicarnassus, having faithfully adhered to the Persian cause, endured a long siege by Alexander the Great, B.C. 334, and was burned by the conqueror. A number of the inhabitants were safe in the acropolis (called Salmakis), which Alexander did not succeed in capturing. They rebuilt the city; but it never again became a great city, though always[*] an important one till it was ruined by the Turks. Its prosperity benefited much from the measures of Q. Cicero when he was governor of Asia in B.C. 61. Its silver coinage ceased after B.C. 168; but it continued to coin in bronze as late as the 3rd cent. after Christ, and appears in all the lists of bishoprics. In literature its greatness is shown by Herodotus, Dionysius the historian, Dionysius the writer on music, Pigres, Panyasis, etc.

Halicarnassus was one of the states to which the Roman Senate sent letters in favour of the Jews in B.C. 139, 1 Mac 15^{23} (see CARIA). It must therefore have been a free and self-governing city at that time. The decree of the city passed in the 1st cent. B.C., granting to the Jews religious liberty and the right to build their Proseuchai beside the sea (Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 23), attests the existence of an early Jewish colony in the city; and this was natural, as H. was a considerable centre of trade, owing to its favourable position on a bay opposite Cos, on the north-west side of the Ceramic Gulf. The city extended round the bay from promontory to promontory, and contained, among other buildings, a famous temple of Aphrodite.

The site of Halicarnassus is now called Bodrum (i.e. 'fortress'), from the Castle of St. Peter which was built by the Knights of St. John (whose headquarters were in Rhodes) under their Grand Master de Naillac, A.D. 1404. The castle stands on the point of a lofty rocky promontory, which projects southwards, and divides the bay of Halicarnassus into two harbours; in ancient times it was probably an island (Zephyria). A Turkish village occupies part of the site of the city. In the castle were found many remains of the Mausoleum, which were sent to London in 1846 by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. A very full account of the city, with plans, etc., is to be found in the works of Sir C. Newton, who excavated there in 1857. Inseln Griech.*; Hamilton's Researches in Asia Minor). W. M. RAMSAY.

[*] Pope gives 'hauld' in his Shaks. at II Henry IV. v. v. 37, and it is approved by some editors. In Ac 8^3 AV of 1611 spells the word 'hail.'

[*] The language of Cicero, ad Quint. Fr. I. i, 25 (pœne desertam urbem), must not be pressed; he is exaggerating his brother's services.

HALL.—In Mk 15^{16} AV renders ἔσω τῆς αὐλῆς ὅ ἐστιν πραιτώριον, 'into the hall called Prætorium'; and in Lk 22^{55} ἐν μέσῳ τῆς αὐλῆς, 'in the midst of the hall.' Elsewhere AV renders αὐλή either 'palace' (Mt $26^{3.58.69}$, Mk $14^{54.66}$, Lk 11^{21}, Jn 18^{15}), when the reference is to the place where a governor dispensed justice; or 'fold' (Jn $10^{1.16}$), referring to the place where the flocks were kept all night; or 'court' (Rev 11^{2}), in reference to the court of the temple. RV gives 'court' everywhere except in Jn $10^{1.16}$ (10^{1} ἡ αὐλὴ τῶν προβάτων, AV 'the sheepfold,' RV 'the fold of the sheep,' 10^{16} ἡ αὐλή, AV and RV 'the fold'). See PALACE.

The word πραιτώριον is once in AV tr^{d} 'Prætorium' (Mk 15^{16} as above), and once 'palace' (Ph 1^{13} ἐν ὅλῳ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ, AV 'in all the palace,' AVm 'Cæsar's court,' RV 'throughout the whole Prætorian guard,' RVm 'in the whole Prætorium'). Elsewhere it is rendered either 'common hall' (Mt 27^{27}, AVm 'governor's house'), or 'hall of judgment' (Jn 18^{28a}, AVm 'Pilate's house'), or 'judgment hall' (Jn $18^{28b.33}$ 19^{9}, Ac 23^{35}). RV gives 'palace' in the text of all those places, with 'Prætorium' in the marg., which Amer. RV prefers in the text. See PRÆTORIUM.

The RV word 'palace' for prœtorium comes from the Rhem. NT, which has 'Palace' everywhere, except Ph 1^{13} 'court.' Wyclif's word is always 'moot (or mote) halle.' Tind. introduced 'judgement hall.' J. HASTINGS.

HALLEL (הַלֵּל).—A name given to the group of psalms 113–118 inclusive, which the Jews from an early date have been in the habit of reciting at the three great feasts, at the feast of Dedication and at the new moons. The name 'great Hallel' is sometimes given to this group as a whole, but it is usually applied to Ps 136 (or Pss 120–136) with its twenty-six times repeated refrain of praise. Pss 113–118, or 115–118, are called the 'Egyptian' or the 'common' Hallel. During the continuance of the temple the Hallel was recited on eighteen days in the year, but on one night alone, that of the passover. On that occasion it was taken in parts, Pss 113 and 114 being sung before the meal, just before the drinking of the second cup, and Pss 115–118 after the filling of the fourth cup. It is to this sacred song that reference is made in the phrase ὑμνήσαντες, 'when they had sung an hymn,' used of our Saviour and His disciples in Mt 26^{30} and Mk 14^{26}. See Delitzsch on Ps 113; Talmud, Sopherim 18, § 2; and compare Edersheim, The Temple and its Services. W. T. DAVISON.

HALLELUJAH (הַלְלוּ־יָהּ 'praise ye J″,' Ἀλληλουιά).—The word occurs as a short doxology in the Psalms, usually at the beginning, as Ps 111. 112, or the end, as 104. 105, or both, as 135. 146–150; in 135^{3} use is different. Except 135, the H. psalms occur in three groups, 104–106; 111–113, 115, 117; 146–150; the 2nd being interrupted by Ps 114. 116. The consecutive occurrence of these psalms may be explained in two ways. (i.) H. was usually added to psalms only of a joyful character, and these might naturally be put together by the compiler, just as hymns of thanksgiving are often put together in our modern hymnbooks. But we see very little evidence in the Psalter of arrangement according to subject. It seems, therefore, more probable that they were taken as they stand from some previous collection or collections in which all the psalms were so marked; just as in a modern hymnary all the hymns taken from Hymns Ancient and Modern might be distinguished by Amen at the end. We have an even more complete example of taking the psalms en bloc from some other source without rearrangement in 'Songs of Ascents' (Ps 120–134). The occurrence of H. in Ps 106, after the doxology which closes Book iv., may be the insertion of a reviser, to make it agree with Ps 104. 105, which have the H. at the end, when the doxology had come to be regarded as part of the psalm. The H. psalms vary considerably in character. We find such different themes as the praises of the God of Nature (104), the God of Israel (105. 106), God who hears the prayer of the poor (113) and of the sufferer (116), the superiority of God to idols (115). That these psalms are late may be proved from (1) the fact that Jah is a contracted and later[*] form of Jahu, which occurs in the early forms Jesayahu, Jirmeyahu, as contrasted with the later forms which we know as Isaiah and Jeremiah; (2) the use of (generally) late grammatical forms as י for constr. state, as in $113^{5.7.9}$, שׁ for אֲשֶׁר, as a prefix in 135^{2} $146^{3.5}$; (3) the didactic character of 111^{10} 112, in the spirit of Ps 1, the Book of Job, and later parts of Proverbs; (4) the subject-matter of such a psalm as 147, which points back to the Restoration (147^{2}); (5) the fact that the historical psalms, 105. 106, presuppose PJE, and were therefore composed after the first compilation of the Hex. (see HEXATEUCH). Notice in 105^{31} the lice of P, as well as, in 105^{34}, the locusts of JE; in 106^{17} Dathan and Abiram of JE, as well as, in $106^{30.31}$, Phinehas, God's avenger of P.

The word passed from OT to NT. In Rev 19^{1-7} it is the keynote of the song sung by the great multitude in heaven, and from the Jewish it found its way into the Christian Church.

F. H. WOODS.

HALLOHESH (הַלּוֹחֵשׁ 'the speaker of charms').—An individual or a family mentioned in connexion with the repairing of the wall (Neh 3^{12}, AV Halohesh) and the sealing of the covenant (Neh 10^{24}). See GENEALOGY.

HALLOW.—'Who,' says Trench, 'would now affirm of the verb "to hallow" that it is even obsolescent? yet Wallis two hundred years ago observed—"it has almost gone out of use" (fere desuevit).' He is condemning (in English Past and Present, p. 139 f.) the American Bible Union for dismissing from their new version words that have a suspicion of age upon them. And it is still quite true that 'hallow' as a biblical word is in active use, so that the Revisers felt no necessity for excluding it from either the NT of 1881 or the OT of 1885. In AV and RV it is used as a synonym for 'sanctify,' translating in OT some part of קָדַשׁ ḳâdash, and in NT twice rendering the verb ἁγιάζω (Mt 6^{9}, Lk 11^{2}, both in the Lord's Prayer). In the Apocr. the same Gr. verb is rendered 'hallow' in 1 Es 1^{3}, Jth 9^{13}, Sir 33^{9}, 1 Mac 4^{48}; and the Lat. verb sanctificare in 2 Es 2^{41} 5^{25}.

In the older versions it is more common. It is Wyclif's only word; thus Jn 17^{19} 'And I halwe my silf for hem, that and [1388 also] thei be halwid in treuthe'; He 2^{11} 'Sothely he that halowith, and thei that ben halowid, of oon alle.' So Tind. in [*] See Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 149 ff., and Jastrow in Journal of Soc. of Bib. Lit. xiii. (1894), 101–127, and in ZAW, 1896, pp. 1–16. In these papers Jastrow further contends that the final יָה in many Heb. proper names is not a form of the Divine name at all, but simply an emphatic afformative.

Lv 27^{16} 'If a man halowe a pece of his enhereted londe unto the Lorde, it shalbe set accordynge to that it beareth'; and in a marg. note on Dt 20^{5} (where his text is, 'Yf any man have bylt a new housse and have not dedicate it'), he says, 'Dedicat: the levites, I suppose, halowed them as we doo oure shippes.' In a note to Lv 8^{2} he spells the word 'holow'—'Hence the pope fett holowenge of chirches, alters, font, belles, and so forth.' Cov. has 'unhallow' in Ezk 44^{19} 'they shal put of the clothes, wherein they have ministred . . . lest they onhalowe the people with their clothes.' In his Expositions (Parker Soc. p. 180) on 1 Jn 2^{18-21} Tind. uses 'sanctify' and 'hallow' together as quite synonymous: 'Christ in the Scripture is called The Holy, because He only sanctifieth and halloweth us.' This quotation shows the origin of the word also: from A.S. hálig, holy, came hálgian, to make holy, middle-Eng. halyien, later halwe.

The words of Mt 6^{9}, Lk 11^{2} are as old as Wyc. 'halowid be thi name,' and are found in all the versions except the Rhemish (1582), which has 'sanctified be thy name'; but the mod. editions of Rhem. (as 1898) have changed to 'hallowed be thy name.' J. HASTINGS.

HALT.—1. To be lame, to limp: Gn 32^{31} 'He halted upon his thigh' (צֹלֵעַ עַל־יְרֵכוֹ, Amer. RV 'went halting'). The same vb. is tr^{d} 'halt' in Mic $4^{6.7}$, Zeph 3^{19} (Amer. RV always 'is lame'). T. Fuller (Holy State, iii. 15) says, 'Wounds in warre are most honourable: Halting is the stateliest march of a Souldier; and 'tis a brave sight to see the flesh of an Ancient as torn as his Colours.' And Rutherford, with a reference to Mic $4^{6.7}$, speaks of 'God's kirk' (Letters, No. xli.): 'He will have her going through a thousand deaths, and through hell, as a cripple woman, halting, and wanting the power of her one side, that God may be her staff.' The adj. 'halt' is given as the tr. of χωλός in Mt 18^{8}, Mk 9^{45}, Lk 14^{21}, Jn 5^{3}, though everywhere else (except Ac 14^{8} 'a cripple' in AV and RV) the same adj. is rendered 'lame' (Mt 11^{5} $15^{30.31}$ 21^{14}, Lk 7^{22} 14^{13}, Ac 3^{2} 8^{7}, He 12^{13}). In Lk 14^{21} RV gives 'lame,' but keeps 'halt' in the other three places. Tind. has 'halt' in Mt 11^{5} 'The blynd se, the halt goo, the lepers are clensed.'

2. To stumble, to fail, Ps 38^{17} 'For I am ready to halt,* and my sorrow is continually before me' (לְצֶלַע נָכוֹן, AVm 'ready for halting,' Del. [so Amer. RV] 'ready to fall,' with note, 'if God does not graciously interpose, he will certainly fall headlong'; Wellh.-Furness [in PB] 'on the verge of falling'); Jer 20^{10} 'All my familiars watched for my halting' (שֹׁמְרֵי צַלְעִי, Streane, 'those who watch my side,' implying a reading צֵלָע, 'ribs,' 'side'; RV 'they that watch for my halting'; Cheyne, 'either laid traps for me, or waited for me to commit some error for them to take advantage of,' who points out that the phrase 'my halting' is taken[?] from Ps 35^{15} 38^{17}). To those two passages in AV the Eng. (not Amer.) RV adds Job 18^{12} 'Calamity shall be ready for his halting' (לְצַלְעוֹ, AV and RVm 'at his side'), and Ps 35^{15} 'But when I halted they rejoiced' (וּבְצַלְעִי, AV 'But in mine adversity'). Tindal in his exposition of Mt 5^{17-19} (Expositions, Parker Soc. p. 38) shows us this meaning of 'halt' arising from the meaning already illustrated, 'I come not to destroy the law, but to repair it only, and to make it go upright where it halteth.' Then cf. Glanvill (Ser. 5), 'We have many observers, whose malice makes them critical and curious; they lay in wait for our haltings, and are glad at heart when they have caught an opportunity to revile us.' In Preface to AV 1611 the translators say of Roman Catholic scholars that they 'doe either make new Translations themselves, or follow new ones of other mens making, or note the vulgar Interpretor for halting.'

3. To waver, 1 K 18^{21} 'How long halt ye between two opinions?' (אַתֶּם פֹּסְחִים; Amer. RV 'go ye halting'). The figure is the uncertain gait of one who is divided in mind between J″ and Baal. The same verb is used in v.^{26} of the irregular dance round the altar of Baal. Cf. Purchas, Pilgrimage, 343, 'Their religion halteth betwixt divers religions of the Turkes, Persians, and Christians of the Iacobite and Nestorian Sects.'

4. The mod. sense of come to a standstill, stop, does not occur in AV, but is introduced by RV into Is 10^{32} 'This very day shall he halt at Nob' (לַעֲמֹד, AV 'remain'). J. HASTINGS.

HAM (חָם, Χάμ).—The name of one of Noah's three sons (Gn 10^{1} etc.), and founder of one of the three great families into which the biblical ethnologists divide the world. There seems little doubt that this word is the Egyptian name of Egypt (Hier. Kem, sometimes p t' o-n-Kem, 'land of Egypt,' Demot. Kemi, Theb. Kēme, Bashm. Kēme, Memph. Khēme), and indeed in the poetical language of the Psalms the 'land of Ham' is a synonym for Miẓraim ($105^{23.27}$ 106^{22}, cf. 78^{51}; Brugsch, Geogr. Inschr. 73). The meaning of the word is 'black,' which appears in the Arab. aḥamm, fem. ḥammā, as well as in many Coptic derivatives (Peyron, Lex. Copt. 66). The origin of the appellation is to be found in the blackness of the soil of the Delta (Plutarch, de Is. et Osir. 33), since the Egyptians do not call themselves by this name, which corresponds with an epithet applied to rich soils generally (Ebers, Ægypten u. die Bücher Mose's, 55).

2. The narrative of Gn 9^{21-24} has been analyzed with great ingenuity by Budde (Urgeschichte, 290 ff.), partly after the suggestions of Wellhausen, whose results are in the main as follows. The narrative is based on a document in which the place of Ham was occupied by Canaan; this is rendered practically certain by vv.$^{24.25}$, in which Noah, perceiving what his youngest son had done unto him, proceeds to curse Canaan, who is mentioned no less than three times in Noah's speech (vv.$^{25-27}$). It is therefore probable that in v.^{22} 'Ham, the father of Canaan,' is a correction for 'Canaan' (cf. for the method 1 Ch 20^{5}), and indeed these words show very clear signs of alteration. The family of Noah, then, according to the earlier account, consisted of Shem, Japheth, Canaan; and the legend accounts for the subjugation of the third to the two others, implying a state of things in which the word 'Canaanite' was synonymous with 'slave.' The act imputed to Canaan is that of a little boy, and hence chronological difficulties arise if the Noah of the story be identified with the Noah of the Flood. The three sons, moreover, represent nations occupying the same country (probably Canaan), whose mutual relation is accounted for by the story, but who do not appear to have been intended to represent the progenitors of the nations of the earth. While the name 'Shem' lends itself readily to interpretation, if a caste be signified ('men of name' or 'note,' whence 'name' or 'note' became personified), only vague conjectures can be made about the original import of 'Japheth'; but l. 16 of the Marseilles inscription shows us that we possess only an imperfect tradition of the caste-system in Semitic peoples.

3. The same ethnologist who made Noah the second founder of the human race had to divide the nations of the earth among his sons; the names Shem and Japheth being unknown except in this tradition, could be employed without difficulty; but the name 'Canaan' had very distinct import, and yet was too insignificant to count as one of the three world-races. For this name, therefore, in the ethnological table another known name was substituted, and the native name of Egypt lent itself well to this purpose. That Cush and Mizraim should be included under the name of Kemi need occasion no surprise, as these two nations were known conjointly; that Cush is made the eldest son (Gn 10^6) is perhaps due to Ethiopia being farthest from Palestine, but it may have political significance. That Canaan should be reckoned as Hamite has been thought strange, some accounting for it on the ground of national antipathy on the part of the Israelites, while others (e.g. Dillmann, ad loc.) thought it due to a tradition current in antiquity which made the Canaanites immigrants from the South. The above account of the introduction of the name Ham really gets rid of the difficulty; for Canaan's place having been taken by Ham, a place had to be found for Canaan, and this could only be in Ham's family. Ham's name was not substituted for Canaan's in the speech of Noah, partly perhaps owing to its repeated recurrence, partly perhaps because the curse of slavery could not be made to fall on the powerful nations represented by Ham's elder children. The recension of Gn which we have, where the father is made to sin, and one of the sons to receive the curse, shows us the difficulty solved as far as it was capable of solution.

4. The classification of Canaan under Ham led to a serious result for the ethnological table: whereas Canaan in the older scheme represented a subject caste, the name now had to include all the non-Israelitic inhabitants of Palestine, among whom were many races decidedly 'Semitic' in character, such as the Phœnicians. Some further difficulty was introduced by confusion between the Cush and the Cossaei, but the ground for making all the tribes mentioned in v.[7] etc. Cushites will probably remain hidden long. The Put (which see) are probably included with the Egyptians and Nubians as being in any case a southern race. The Egyptian classification of mankind compared by M. Lefébure (PSBA, 1887, p. 167 ff.), while it offers some slight analogy to that with which we are dealing, does not seem to explain the name 'Ham,' or throw any real light on the problems.

5. The name 'Ham' occurs in 1 Ch 4^{40}, where certain settlers at Gerar found the land quiet and well cultivated, because the previous inhabitants were 'from Ham.' Some of the Rabbis compared the statement in Jg $18^{7.27}$, where very similar language is used about people who lived 'after the fashion of the Sidonians' (also, according to the tables, Hamites, through Canaan), and indeed the passage of Ch would seem to be modelled on that of Jg. It is not, however, easy to render the words in Ch satisfactorily, since 'from Ham' should mean from the country called Ham, which is not here very intelligible, and 'of the children of Ham,' or 'from the days of Ham,' would not naturally be thus abbreviated. There is therefore ground for supposing the text corrupt, and indeed the Pesh. substituted מֵהֶם 'of them' for the מִן חָם of the text. An easier alteration is מנחם, supposing that word to have the sense of the analogous Syriac form מנחין 'peaceful, easy-going,' of which examples are given in Thes. Syr. col. 2314.

HAM.—According to Gn 14^5 Chedorlaomer and his allies smote the Zuzim (who may be the same as the Zamzummim of Dt 2^{20}) בהם. This last is vocalized in MT בְּהָם, which is represented by AV, RV 'in Ham.' Jerome (Quæst. in libr. Gen.) reads בְּהֹם. Most of the VSS vocalize בָּהֶם, hence LXX ἅμα αὐτοῖς, 'with them.' Olshausen conjectures בַּחֲמָת 'in Hamath.' It is most probable that a proper name is intended. If 'Ham' be the correct reading, it is the name of a place that is otherwise unknown. Dillmann, following Tuch, suggests that it may have been the ancient name of the Ammonite capital Rabbath Ammon. The strange argument of Sayce (HCM 160 f.), that the form הָם points to a direct transcription of Gn 14 from a cuneiform document, is dealt with by Ball (SBOT, ad loc.).

J. A. SELBIE.

HAM (חָם), Land of.—A poetical designation of Egypt, used in the Psalms in reference to the sojourn there of the children of Isr. (Ps $105^{23.27}$ 106^{22}); so also 'the tabernacles (RV 'tents') of H.' (Ps 78^{51}) stands for 'the dwellings of the Egyptians.' Probably in Heb. thought H. was here used as the name of the son of Noah rather than as a name for Egypt. Two derivations have been proposed for it: (1) The native name for Egypt itself was Kmt, in Coptic times pronounced Kêmi (hardly Khêmi), and strictly signifying the 'black land' or alluvial soil of the cultivable part, as opposed to the Deshert or 'red land,' i.e. the sandy deserts which enclosed Kêmi on all sides except the N. (2) The chief Priapic god of the Egyptians was sometimes called Menu (in Greek Min), but at other times probably Khem. If the latter reading is correct, it is almost identical with the name of the progenitor of the Hamitic peoples, and it is very remarkable that the most primitive sculptures hitherto found in Egypt represent this god (see Petrie's Koptos). Menu was especially worshipped on the important route from the coast of the Red Sea to Koptos, and this would impress the fact of his worship on the E. neighbours of Egypt. The characteristics of Menu are in accord with the shamelessness recorded of H. in Gn $9^{20\text{ff.}}$. The derivation from Kmt is improbable, for phonetic reasons.

HAMAN (הָמָן, Ἀμάν), the son of Hammedatha, appears in the Bk of Est as the enemy of the Jews, and the chief minister of Ahasuerus. He is described as the Agagite (Est $3^{1.10}$ etc.), but in the LXX as a Bugean (Βουγαῖος, 3^1 12^6), or a Macedonian (9^{24} 16^{10}). The Heb. term we should probably understand of a descent from the Amalekite king Agag (so Jos. Ant. XI. vi. 5, and Targ.), in which case the author of the book perhaps meant to contrast the descendant of Israel's ancient enemy with Mordecai, the descendant of Kish, the Benjamite. Provoked by Mordecai's refusal to bow before him, H. procured from the king a decree authorizing the massacre of all the Jews in the Persian dominions on the 13th Adar. He also prepared a gallows 50 cubits high for Mordecai. But queen Esther, having heard of the plot, invited H. and the king to a banquet, and there denounced H., who was forthwith hanged on his own gallows. The queen also obtained permission for her countrymen to defend themselves, and among other victims of the Jews' vengeance the ten sons of H. were slain and their bodies gibbeted.

In later times, at the Feast of Purim, it seems to have been customary to hang an effigy of H.; but as the gibbet was sometimes made in the form of a cross, riots between Jews and Christians were the result, and a warning against insults to the Christian faith was issued by the emperor Theodosius II. (Cod. Theod. XVI. viii. 18; cf. 21). The origin of the name H. is uncertain; Jensen connects it with the name of an Elamite divinity, Humman or Humban (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.).

HAMATH (חֲמָת 'fortress,' 'citadel,' or perhaps 'sacred enclosure,' see W. R. Smith, RS^{1} 140 [ed.^{2} p. 150]; Ἡμάθ, Ἑμάθ, Αἱμάθ, Emath).—At the time of Amos, this was the chief city of a kingdom of the same name which surrounded the capital, extending to the S. of Riblah and even including that place (2 K 23^{33} etc.). Situated on the banks of the Orontes (now called el-'Âṣi), in a narrow valley with Jebel al-A'la on its north and south-east, and the Nusairîyeh mountains (the Mons Bargylus of the ancients) to the west, it lay on a very frequented and convenient trade-route. The opening between the Nusairîyeh mountains above Tripoli and the north point of the Lebanon chains is called in the OT 'the entrance of Hamath' (Nu 34^{8}, Jos 13^{5}, Ezk 47$^{13-21}$). N. of Homs the Orontes pass leads to Hamath, S. toward Baal-gad in Cœle-Syria, E. to the great plain of the Syrian desert, and W. to the Kal'at al-Hosn and the Mediterranean.

'The entrance' or 'the approach' to Hamath is often mentioned as a territorial limit (Nu 34^{8}, Jg 3^{3} etc.), and usually denotes the accepted northern boundary of Israelitish dominion (Jos 13^{5}). The province is called 'Great Hamath' (Am 6^{2}), and is mentioned with Damascus, Tyre, and Zidon (Zec 9^{2}), as well as with Arpad (Jer 49^{23}), in the prophecies against Hadrach.

Originally a Hamite colony (Gn 10^{18}), it flourished at the time of David (2 S 8^{10}) under a king named Toi (or Tou), who had friendly intercourse with the Israelitish ruler. Hamath (possibly identical with Hamath-Zobah [which see] of 2 Ch 8^{3}) came, however, afterwards under the dominion of Solomon (compare 1 K 9$^{21.24}$ with 2 Ch 8^{4}), and its king was no doubt among the many princes who 'brought presents and served Solomon all the days of his life.' Hamath was regarded as the granary of N. Syria, and there Solomon built store-cities (2 Ch 8^{4}). But, on the death of that king, Hamath seems to have regained her independence, as is shown by the inscriptions of Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 860), where we see that her king, Irḫulēni, made an alliance with the Hittites, Damascus (under Addu-idri=Ben-Hadad=Ben-Hadad-hidri), Ahab of Israel, and several other states. Jeroboam II. of Israel, about the year B.C. 810, 'recovered Hamath' (2 K 14^{28}) from Judah, and partly destroyed it, as well as Gath, which, in the prophecies of Amos, is spoken of along with it (Am 6^{2}). In the Assyrian inscriptions Eni-îlu (Eniel), king of Hamath, brings tribute to Tiglath-pileser III. (730), who had parcelled out the land of Hamath among his generals, annexing 19 districts to Assyria, and transported 1223 people of Hamath to the sources of the Tigris. Sargon boasts of having rooted out the land of Hamath and dyed the skin of the foolish (?) Ilu-bi'di (variant Yau-bi'di) like wool, colonizing Hamath with 4300 Assyrians. One of those exiled thither by this king was the Mede Deioces. After what seems to have been the capture of the place by Sennacherib's Rabshakeh, or 'chief of the captains,' Hamath lost much of its importance. It is spoken of in Is 11^{11} as one of the places containing Israelitish exiles, and is mentioned in 1 Mac 12^{25} in connexion with the movements of Jonathan and Demetrius.

The Greeks and Romans knew it under the name of Epiphaneia, which had been given to it by Antiochus Epiphanes (Jos. Ant. I. vi. 2), though the inhabitants still called it Hamath, and its present name, Ḥamāh, is but slightly changed from its old form. In 1310 Abulfeda, the eminent Arabian scholar, a descendant of the family of Saladin, was appointed governor of the district, which had been under the Moslem power since A.D. 639, and with his death (1331) Hamath's prosperity declined.

In 1812 Burckhardt visited Hamath, saw the 'Hamath-stones' (so-called Hittite inscriptions in relief on black close-grained basalt); and the enormous water-wheels, used for bringing the waters of the Orontes to the houses and gardens situated on the hill above the river. He does not, however, mention the catacombs, said to have existed high up on the right bank. The town, which is divided into four quarters, Hadher, el-Jisr, el-Aleyat, and el-Medine (the quarter of the Christians), contained at Burckhardt's visit about 4446 houses and nearly 11,000 male inhabitants.

HAMATHITE (חֲמָתִי).—The gentilic name from HAMATH (which see), Gn 10^{18}=1 Ch 1^{16}.

HAMATH-ZOBAH (חֲמַת־צוֹבָה, B Βαισωβά, A Αἰμάθ Σωβά, Luc. Ἑμαθσουβά).—The identity of this city is still doubtful. By some scholars it is even regarded as the same as Hamath, but the Greek form Βαισωβά would seem to indicate that it was distinct from that place. It is mentioned only once in the Scriptures (2 Ch 8^{3}), when Solomon is said to have 'prevailed against it,' and, being spoken of in connexion with Tadmor and Hamath, we may conclude that it was in the same neighbourhood. That it was another Hamath to which Zobah was added to distinguish it from the better-known city of Hamath is possible, but at present unprovable. It has not yet been found in the cuneiform inscriptions, consequently no light is thrown on it from that source. I. A. PINCHES.

HAMMATH (חַמַּת 'hot spring').—'Father of the house of Rechab,' 1 Ch 2^{55}. See GENEALOGY.

HAMMATH (חַמַּת 'hot spring').—One of the 'fenced' cities of Naphtali, Jos 19^{35}, probably the same as Hammon of 1 Ch 6^{76} [Heb. ^{61}] and Hammoth-dor of Jos 21^{32}. It is doubtless the Ḥamata of the Talmud (Erubin, v. 5; Megillah, 2*b*), the Emmaus or Ammathus of Jos. (Ant. XVIII. ii. 3) and the modern Hammâm, 35 minutes' walk S. of Tiberias, so famous for its hot baths. There are four springs, the water of which reaches a temperature of 144° Fahr. The taste is described by Robinson as excessively salt and bitter, like that of heated sea-water; there is also a strong smell of sulphur, but no taste of it. The neighbourhood is crowded, especially in the month of July, with patients from all parts of Syria. The baths are considered to be very efficacious in rheumatic complaints.

HAMMEAH, THE TOWER OF, AV The tower of Meah (מִגְדַּל הַמֵּאָה, πύργος τῶν ἑκατὸν, turris centum cubitorum, turris Emath), Neh 3^{1} 12^{39}.—A tower on the walls of Jerus. which stood near the tower of Hananel (which see), between the Sheep gate on the east and the Fish gate on the west. These two towers, which apparently had not been pulled down when the walls were dismantled in the time of Ezra, were probably situated near the north-eastern corner of the city (cf. Jer 31^{38}, Zec 14^{10}). Perhaps they were both defences of the fortress (bîrah) which commanded the temple area. The origin of the name 'tower of Hammeah,' or 'tower of the hundred' (RVm), is obscure. It has been suggested in explanation that the tower was 100 cubits high, or that it was approached by 100 steps, or that it required a garrison of 100 men (see Ryssel, ad loc., pp. 153, 201 f.). H. A. White.

HAMMEDATHA (הַמְּדָתָא, Ἀμάδαθος [?, -ης]), Est $3^{1.10}$ 8^5 $9^{10.24}$).—The father of Haman. The name is probably Persian; for the termination compare Aridatha; possibly the etymology is mâh=moon+data=given (Oxf. Heb. Lex.).

HAMMELECH (הַמֶּלֶךְ) occurs as a proper name in AV and RVm of Jer 36^{26} 38^6, but there is little doubt that the rendering ought to be 'the king,' as in RV and AVm (LXX τοῦ βασιλέως).

HAMMER.—The Heb. word מַקָּבָה makḳâbâh (in Jg 4^{21} מַקֶּבֶת) is tr. in Arab. by two words, mîtadat, a wooden mallet, and maṭraḳat, the ordinary Arabic word for a hammer. It was a mîtadat, a mallet used by the Bedawîn and others for driving tent pegs into the ground, which Jael used to kill Sisera, Jg 4^{21}. By many, makḳâbâh is considered to be the source of the name Maccabæus, which would thus mean 'the hammerer.' פַּטִּישׁ paṭṭîsh (Is 41^7, used fig. in Jer 23^{29} of the word of the Lord, and in 50^{23} of Babylon, 'the hammer of the whole earth') is evidently the same as the Arab. faṭîs, a large heavy hammer.

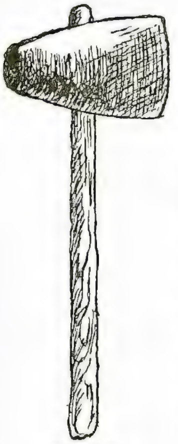
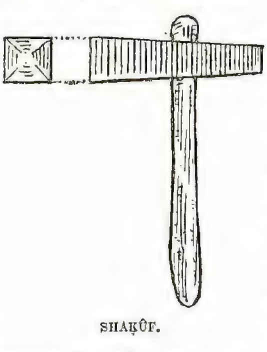
The hammer is probably the most ancient of all tools. In its original form, a stone held in the hand, it is often used at the present day. The form soon changed; a stick fastened to the stone gave the blow more precision and greater force. Metals superseded stones, and great variety was given to the shape of the hammer head, so as to produce a more exact effect. The hammer is a most important and valuable tool; the permanent effect produced by a blow of the lightest hammer is greater than that obtained by the steady pressure of a mass of iron many hundred times its weight.



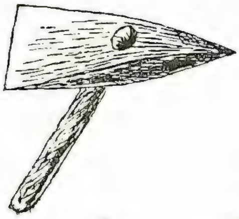
MAHADDI.

Different handicrafts require hammers of different shapes and weights, and, in Syria, each kind has a distinctive name. The hammers used in carpentry and smith work are much the same as those used in the same occupations in Europe. But in masonry the variety of hammers is great. In the quarry the rock is split by a large hammer, weighing from 18 to 22 lb., called the mahaddi. The head of this hammer is round at one end, being used for driving wedges into the rock. The other end is flattened from side to side, so as to confine the impact to a narrow line. This end of the hammer is used to strike the rock between the wedges, and the constant beating causes a vibration in the rock, which increases till it splits in the line of the wedges.

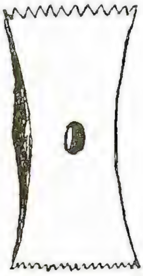


SHAḲÛF.

When the stone comes from the quarry, it is roughly shaped by the mahaddi, and the mason takes another kind of hammer to square it and give it a shape to fit it for building. This hammer is called the shaḳûf. Both ends of the head of this hammer are square, but the one is 1 in. square and flat, the other is nearly 2 in. square, but sunk in the centre to the depth of half an inch, so that the edges are sharp. The flat end is used for striking off projections, while the end with sharpened edges is used for squaring and trimming the stone. The stone is often used for building after being trimmed by the shaḳûf, but sometimes a border is made round the face of the stone, leaving the middle rough.



BÎK.



HEAD OF SHAḤÛTAH OR MINḤAT.

This is done by the bîk, which is a hammer with one end pointed, and the other flat and chisel-shaped.

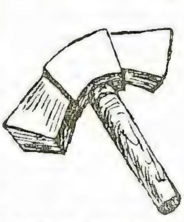
When the stone is to be made smooth it is first made quite flat with the pointed end of the bîk, and is then worked over with a hammer called the shaḥûtah or minḥat.

The shaḥûtah has two very broad chisel-shaped ends, about 4 in. broad, cut into a number of teeth like a saw. The teeth at one end are coarse and about 12 in number, and at the other end smaller and about 24 in number.

When the stone has been carefully gone over with the shaḥûtah it is sometimes polished. This is done by rubbing it with another stone, sand and water being put between.

All these tools are of very ancient date. In the oldest part of the temple of Baalbek marks of all of these tools are found. Even the three immense stones in the west wall have their upper and under surfaces smoothed with the shaḥûtah, only the tool seems to have been much smaller than the one used in Lebanon at the present time, being only about 2 or 2½ in. broad.

The hammer and chisel are used for very fine work, such as carving, or when a very sharp fine edge is to be given to a stone, seldom for any other purpose. The chisel is made of file steel. The hammer, called a maṭraḳat, is so shaped that lines drawn along the faces of the hammer would meet nearly at the end of the handle. Wooden mallets are never used.



MASON'S MAṬRAḲAT.

The stone of Lebanon is very hard limestone, which explains why hammers are preferred to chisels in hewing it. W. Carslaw.

HAMMOLECHETH (הַמֹּלֶכֶת 'the queen'?).—Acc. to the genealogy in 1 Ch $7^{17.18}$ II. was the daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead. The correctness of the text is not beyond suspicion. LXX reads Μαλέχεθ. See Genealogy.

HAMMON (חַמּוֹן 'hot spring').—1. A town in Naphtali, 1 Ch 6^{76} [Heb. ^{61}], prob. identical with Hammath (which see). 2. A town in Asher, Jos 19^{28}. Its site is uncertain. Schultz suggested 'Ain Hamûl, some 10 miles south of Tyre, but Robinson (BRP^{2} iii. 66 note) lays no great stress upon this identification. Renan (Mission de Phénicie, 708 ff.) found at Khurbet Umm el-'Amud, near the coast immediately N. of the Ladder of Tyre, two Phœnician inscriptions (CIS vol. i. pt. i.) in honour of Baal Hammon. In the valley to the E. is 'Ain Hamûl. Umm el-'Amûd, 'mother of the pillar,' includes the ruins of a building which is probably a temple of Baal. On the hill side lies a great sarcophagus with a rudely carved eagle. The texts belong to the Ptolemaic period (3rd cent. B.C.). The name may be that of the Egyptian God Amanu or Amen. See SWP vol. i. sh. iii., and vol. iii. Appendix. The identification of Hammon with Umm el-'Amûd is also considered by Guérin (Galilée, ii. 141) and Buhl (GAP 229) to be the most probable.

C. R. CONDER.

HAMMOTH-DOR (חַמֹּת דֹּאר).—A Levitical city in Naphtali, Jos 21^{32}, probably identical with HAMMATH (which see).

HAMMUEL (חַמּוּאֵל, AV Hamuel).—A Simeonite of the family of Shaul, 1 Ch 4^{26}. See GENEALOGY.

HAMONAH (הֲמוֹנָה 'multitude,' LXX Πολυάνδριον).—The name of a city to be built in commemoration of the defeat (?) of Gog (Ezk 39^{16}). The passage is obscure, and the originality as well as the precise reading of the MT doubtful. Instead of וְגַם שֶׁם־עִיר הֲמוֹנָה, Cornill would read וְגָמַר הֲמוֹנָה 'and it is all over with this multitude.' If the words are an interpolation, the allusion may be to the city of Bethshean, which may have derived its name Scythopolis from the Scythian invasion in the 7th cent. B.C. (See Bertholet, Das Buch Hesekiel, 193).

J. A. SELBIE.

HAMON-GOG (הֲמוֹן גּוֹג 'Gog's multitude,' LXX τὸ πολυάνδριον τοῦ Γώγ).—The name to be given to the valley (outside the Holy Land) where Gog and all his multitude are to be buried (Ezk $39^{11.\ 15}$). This valley, according to the MT, was the 'Valley of the Travellers' (הָעֹבְרִים), a designation which is not found elsewhere. Hence J. D. Michaelis, followed by Bertholet and many others, reads עֲבָרִים (Abarim, Nu 27^{12} 33^{47}). From the mountain of this name a valley may well have been called Abarim, and the locality suits the context. See further the Comm. of Hitzig, Smend, Cornill, Davidson, and Bertholet.

J. A. SELBIE.

HAMOR (חֲמוֹר 'he-ass') appears in Gn 33^{19} 34, Jos 24^{32}, Jg 9^{28} as 'the father of Shechem,' a Hivite by race, and 'the prince (נָשִׂיא) of the land' (Gn 34^2). Jacob bought 'the parcel of ground, where he had spread his tent,' from the Hamorites, the Benê Hamor (Gn 33^{19} (J), cf. Jos 24^{32}). A different tradition is preserved in Gn 48^{22} (E), where Jacob gives Shechem to Joseph, and speaks of having won it by force of arms from the Amorite.

Dinah, Jacob's daughter, having been wronged by Shechem, Shechem makes an offer to take her as his wife; and is supported in his claim by his father, Hamor, who proposes also that there should be freedom of marriage between the families of Jacob and Hamor ($34^{14\text{-}17}$). To this the sons of Jacob give their consent on condition that the Shechemites accept the rite of circumcision. The Shechemites agree to the terms, and are circumcised (v.^{24}). On the third day, when the Shechemites were unable through illness to defend themselves, Simeon and Levi and their followers fell upon them, murdered Hamor and Shechem, and carried away Dinah to their own home.

In this narrative the narrator has combined two variant traditions. 'In the one, Hamor conducts the negotiations with Jacob regarding Dinah for his son (vv.$^{4.\ 6.\ 8\text{-}10}$); he receives a reply (vv.$^{15\text{-}17}$), and in due course lays it before the assembled citizens of the town for their approval (vv.$^{20\text{-}24}$). In the other, Shechem himself asks Dinah from her father and brothers, and after their reply (v.$^{11\text{f.}}$) immediately submits to the conditions they require (v.^{19}).' The former is probably the narrative of P, the latter that of J.

That, under the imagery of events occurring in the history of a single family, the story preserves the recollection of important episodes in an early phase of the Israelite community, is a view which has been maintained, in recent years, by many scholars, and most ably, perhaps, by Wellhausen in his Composition des Hexateuchs (see especially pp. 312–319, 353–355). According to this view, Hamor and Shechem personify Canaanite clans in central Palestine; and Dinah a branch of the Israelite race, which settling in that region became rapidly merged with the native population. The attack by Simeon and Levi would then represent the recollection of some treacherous violation by these tribes of the terms upon which the new settlers had been welcomed and acknowledged.

The fact that Hamor means 'an ass,' and Shechem 'a shoulder' or 'a mountain-ridge,' makes it probable that we have in these names the appellatives of clans and families rather than of individuals. Mr. G. Buchanan Gray (Studies in Hebrew Proper Names, pp. 90, 99–115) has shown, as the result of investigating animal names, that 'before the amalgamation of the Hebrew tribes into a nation, totem worship and totem organization existed among some of the peoples of Canaan' (p. 115); and it is not unreasonable to connect such names as 'ass' (Hamor), 'wild ass' (Piram Jos 10^3, Anah Gn 36^2, Arad Jg 1^{16}), 'mouse' (Achbor Gn 36^{38}), with the 'totem-clans' among the early inhabitants of Canaan (cf. Jacobs, Biblical Archæology, pp. 64–103, on 'Totem-Clans in the Bible').

HAMRAN (חַמְרָן), 1 Ch 1^{41} (AV Amram). — An Edomite. In Gn 36^{26} the name is more correctly given as Hemdan (cf. Kittel in Haupt's SBOT on 1 Ch 1^{41}).

HAMUL (חָמוּל 'spared'; on the form see Wellh. Sam. 19).—A son of Perez and grandson of Judah, Gn 46^{12}=1 Ch 2^5, Nu 26^1. The gentilic Hamulites (הֶחָמוּלִי) occurs in Nu 26^{11}.

HAMUTAL (חֲמוּטַל 2 K 23^{31} and 24^{18}, Jer 52^1 according to MT vocalization. In these last two occurrences the consonants give the form Hamital חמיטל, and this is supported by LXX in all three cases: 'Αμειταl, Μιτάτ, 'Αμειταάλ B, 'Αμιτάλ, 'Αμιτάθ, 'Αμιταάλ A, 'Αμιτάλ Luc., meaning possibly 'kin to the dew' or 'my kinsman (lit. husband's father) is the dew').—Mother of the kings Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, sons of Josiah. (See on the meaning of the name, Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 63; Hommel, Anc. Heb. Trad. 322).

C. F. BURNEY.

HANAMEL (חֲנַמְאֵל, perhaps for חֲנַנְאֵל 'El is gracious'; but see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 307, n. 2).—Jeremiah's cousin, the son of his uncle Shallum. It was from H. that Jeremiah, having the right of redemption, bought a field at Anathoth. Although Jerus. was besieged at the time, the purchase was readily made by the prophet because of his assurance that the time would come when property would once more be secure (Jer $32^{7.\ 8.\ 9.\ 12.\ 44}$).

HANAN (חָנָן, 'Ανάν).—1. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in reading and explaining the Law to the people (Neh 8^7). He is probably the same as the Levite Hanan who signed the covenant (Neh 10^{10} [Heb. ^{11}]), as several of the Levit. names in this passage are found also in 8^{7}. The name is wanting in the LXX of 8^{7} and of 10^{10} (Bא*); but in 1 Es 9^{48} we find Ananias (Ἀνανίας A, Ἄννας B). 2. The son of Zaccur the son of Mattaniah, one of the four treasurers appointed by Neh. over the storehouses in which the tithes were kept (Neh 13^{13}). He was probably a Levite, and perhaps represented the singers and porters; for in 11^{17} $12^{8.25.35}$ Mattaniah is named as a Levit. house representing the sons of Asaph. Others, however, regard H. as a layman. 3. A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8^{23}). 4. The youngest son of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8^{38} = 9^{44}). 5. One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11^{43}). 6. The son of Igdaliah. The sons of H. had a chamber in the temple (Jer 35^{4}). 7. The head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2^{46}, Neh 7^{49}). Called Anan in 1 Es 5^{30}. 8. 9. Two of 'the chiefs of the people' who sealed the covenant bore this name (Neh $10^{22.26}$). See GENEALOGY. H. A. WHITE.

HANANEL (חֲנַנְאֵל 'El is gracious'). — The name of a tower on the wall of Jerusalem. It is four times mentioned in OT: in Neh 3^{1} in connexion with the repairing, and in 12^{39} in connexion with the dedication of the walls; in Jer 31^{38} and Zec 14^{10} as a boundary of the restored and glorified Jerusalem. In both the passages in Neh it is coupled with the tower of Hammeah (which see), and some have supposed it to be identical with the latter. From Neh 12^{39} we gather that these two (?) towers lay between the Sheep gate and the Fish gate, and from Jer and Zec that the tower of Hananel was at the N.E. corner of the city. Conder thinks that Hananel and Hammeah belonged to the 'castle' or 'fortress' (bîrah Neh 2^{8}, in Gr. βᾶρις, Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 3; BJ I. iii. 3, v. 4) of the temple. See JERUSALEM. Ryle (Ezr. and Neh. 173) also suggests that Hananel may have been 'an outwork of the great fortress at the point where the city wall ran into it.' A similar opinion is expressed by Buhl (GAP 141). J. A. SELBIE.

HANANI (חֲנָנִי, Ἀνανί, Ἀνανίας Neh 7^{2}).—1. A brother, or more prob. near kinsman, of Neh., who brought tidings to Susa of the distressed condition of the Jews in Pal. (Neh 1^{2}). Under Neh. he was made one of the governors of Jerus. (7^{2}). The name is perhaps a shortened form of Hananiah. 2. A son of Heman (1 Ch 25^{4}). 3. The father of Jehu the seer (1 K 16^{1}). It was H. who, according to the Chronicler, reproved Asa for entering into alliance with Syria, and whom the angry king cast into prison (2 Ch 16^{7}). 4. A priest of the sons of Immer who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10^{20}). Called Ananias in 1 Es 9^{21}. 5. A chief musician mentioned in connexion with the dedication of the walls of Jerus. (Neh 12^{36}). H. A. WHITE.

HANANIAH (חֲנַנְיָה חֲנַנְיָהוּ 'J" hath been gracious').—1. One of the prophets of the anti-Chaldæan party (LXX calls him ψευδοπροφήτης) in the reign of Zedekiah. His encounter with Jeremiah is related in Jer 28. A native of Gibeon, he was probably a priest (Jos 21^{17}), like Jeremiah himself, whose characteristic style he seems to imitate in his attack. He, too, stands in the temple (cf. 26^{2}), and, using Jeremiah's constant title for God, he prophesies the return from Babylon within two years (contrast Jeremiah's seventy, 25^{12}) of the temple vessels, Jeconiah, and the captives (contrast 22^{27} 27^{22}), and then, pointing to the yoke on Jeremiah's neck (27^{2}), he concludes as he had begun: 'I will break the yoke of the king of Babylon.' With sad irony Jeremiah replied: 'Amen; the Lord do so,' and then pointed out that, as the general tone of former true prophecy had been minatory, a prophecy of peace would need an accurate fulfilment to vindicate its divine origin. H. then repeated his oracle in symbolic form (cf. 19^{10}), breaking Jeremiah's yoke. Jeremiah retired in silence, but soon returned to tell H. that his breaking the wooden bar merely signified that Nebuchadnezzar's yoke would be of iron, and to announce H.'s death—the punishment of a lying prophet (Dt 18^{20}), who had spoken also rebellion against the Lord (Dt 13^{5}). Within two months H. died (Jer 28^{17}).

2. The first of Daniel's three companions (Dn 1^{6}). He received the name of Shadrach (whose meaning is much disputed; see Bevan, Comm. on Dan., p. 61). They joined Daniel in his ascetic resolve, and shared his triumph (1^{19}) and subsequent peril (2^{13}). Through their prayers (2^{17-19}) the king's dream was revealed to Daniel, and at his request (2^{49}) they were appointed 'over the affairs of the province of Babylon,' and still further promoted (3^{30}) after their miraculous deliverance from the fiery furnace. In the Gr. interpolation after Dn 3^{23} Azariah is most prominent (Song of the three Children vv. $^{2.26}$, contrast ^{66}). Their deliverance is alluded to 1 Mac 2^{59}, He $11^{33.34}$. 3. See No. 2 in next article. 4. 1 Ch $3^{19.21}$ a son of Zerub., identified by Lord A. Hervey with Joanan (Lk 3^{27}), Rhesa being a title of Zerub. which has crept into the text (Smith, DB s. GENEALOGY OF CHRIST). Bertheau conjectures that the six names in 1 Ch 3^{21} are all sons of H. 5. 1 Ch 8^{24} a Benjamite. 6. 1 Ch $25^{4.23}$ a 'son' of Heman, leader of the 16th course of temple musicians. 7. 2 Ch 26^{11} one of Uzziah's captains who superintended the organization of the army. 8. Ezr 10^{28}, 1 Es 9^{29} Ananias, one of those 'that had married strange women.' 9. See No. 1 in next article. 10. Neh 3^{30} son of Shelemiah; one of those who repaired the wall, possibly = No. 9, and descendant of No. 13. 11. Neh 12^{12} a priest, chief of the course of Jeremiah, when Joiakim was high priest, possibly mentioned 12^{41} as present at the dedication of the walls. 12. Jer 36^{12} father of Zedekiah, who was one of the princes of Judah in the reign of Jehoiakim. 13. Jer 37^{13} grandfather of Irijah, 'a captain of the ward,' who apprehended Jeremiah on the charge of desertion to the Chaldæans. N. J. D. WHITE.

HANANIAH (חֲנַנְיָה, Ἀνανιά, Ἀνανίας, 'J" has been gracious').—1. One of the guild of perfumers (AV apothecaries) who in the days of Neh. repaired a portion of the wall of Jerus., near the 'broad wall' (Neh 3^{8}). He is perhaps the same as H. the son of Shelemiah, who is mentioned as repairing another portion of the wall, near the E. gate (3^{30}). 2. The governor of the castle, i.e. of the bîrah, or fortress on the N. side of the temple. Neh., who describes him as 'a faithful man, and one that feared God above many,' appointed him one of the two officers in command of Jerus. (Neh 7^{2}). H. A. WHITE.

HAND.—The word 'hand' is used in the Eng. versions of the Bible with a variety of meaning which can be but partially illustrated from other literature. This is due to the remarkable freedom with which the Heb. word יָד yâd is employed—a freedom which does not belong to χείρ to the same extent (though even in NT, chiefly through the influence of LXX, χείρ is found in some specially biblical meanings), so that the variety of usage is chiefly characteristic of OT.

It will conduce to clearness if, first of all, a résumé is given of the use of yâd in Heb., following Oxf. Heb. Lex.

1. The hand of man (Gn 3^{22} etc.), or anthropopathically of God (Ezk 8^{3}); including the wrist (Gn $24^{22.30.47}$ $38^{28\,bis.\,29.30}$, Jg 15^{14}); standing for the finger alone (Gn 41^{42}, Est 3^{10}).

2. The hand as in use, as Gn 49^{24} 'arms of his hands,' i.e. arms which make his hands serviceable; 2 K 9^{24} 'he filled his hand with the bow,' i.e. seized it; and 'fill the hand' of the priest

=consecrate, install (perhaps from the idea of giving him the selected portions of the sacrifice : see FILL) ; a 'hand weapon' (lit. 'weapon of the hand') Nu 35^{18} ; and idols the work of man's hand (Is 2^{8}), as man is the work of God's hand (Job 14^{15}). Special ways in which the hand is used are (1) to kiss the mouth (Job 31^{27}) ; (2) to be laid on the mouth to express silence (Job 40^{4}, Mic 7^{16}) ; (3) the debt is 'the lending of the hand' (Neh 10^{31}), and the creditor 'the master of the lending of the hand' (Dt 15^{2}) ; (4) the lifting of the hand (to heaven) is the taking of an oath (Dt 32^{40}) or the sign of prayer (Ps 28^{2}) ; (5) to shake (lit. 'brandish') the hand is to defy (Is 10^{32}) ; (6) to give the hand is to pledge (Ezr 10^{19}) or to submit (1 Ch 29^{24}).

3. The hand as strong, helpful, (a) of man : Israel went out of Egypt 'with an high hand' (Ex 14^{8}), i.e. boldly, defiantly ; and to act 'with an high hand' against J″, is to act presumptuously (Nu 15^{30}) ; so, to be 'short of hand' (2 K 19^{26}) is to be of small power ; to strengthen one's hands is to help (Jg 9^{24}) ; and the dropping down of the hands is the failure of strength (2 S 4^{1}). (b) Of God : His hands are stretched forth to smite (Ex 9^{15}) ; or to deliver (Ex $13^{3.4.16}$, Dt 4^{24}), the opposite being the 'shortened' hand (Is 50^{2} 59^{1}) ; it is a 'good' hand when it blesses (Ezr 7^{9} 8^{18}, Neh $2^{8.18}$), as protection is in the shadow of the hand of J″ (Is 49^{2}) ; and under inspiration the prophet is in the grasp of God's hand (2 K 3^{15}, Is 8^{11}, Ezk 1^{3} $3^{14.22}$ 37^{1} 40^{1}).

4. The hand is used figuratively to express strength or power (cf. Assyr. idu 'strength') : Jos 8^{20} 'there was not in them strength (lit. 'hands') to flee' ; Ps 76^{5} 'None of the men of might have found their hands,' i.e. their powers are paralyzed in death. Of him who cannot bring a lamb or two turtle doves for sacrifice it is said, 'his hand cannot reach to them' (Lv $5^{7.11}$ 14^{21}). A display of power is 'a mighty hand' (Dt 34^{12} ; cf. Job 27^{11}, Ps 78^{42}) ; and a grand achievement 'a great hand' (Ex 14^{31}).

5. (1) The 'hand' is used for the side, 1 S 4^{13} 'the wayside,' lit. 'the hand of the way' (but see Driver, ad loc.) ; Dt 2^{37} 'all the side of the river Jabbok' (RV), lit. 'all the hand' ; Gn 34^{21} 'the land is wide of both hands,' i.e. in both directions ; Jer 6^{3} 'every one in his place,' lit. 'in his hand.' (2) Other technical senses are : a sign (1 S 15^{12}, 2 S 18^{18}) ; a part or share (Gn 47^{24}, 2 S 19^{43}, 2 K 11^{7}, Neh 11^{1}) ; time, repetition (Gn 43^{34}, Dn 1^{20}). And in the plu. supports (1 K $7^{35.36}$ 10^{19} bis ‖ 2 Ch 9^{18} bis), tenons (Ex $26^{17.19}$ bis $36^{22.24}$ bis).

6. There are also many peculiar prepositional phrases, but these will be best understood in their Eng. equivalents.

1. The hand is a figure for the action, influence, or power of God or man ; Jg 1^{35} 'the hand of the house of Joseph prevailed' ; 1 S 22^{17} 'Turn, and slay the priests of the Lord ; because their hand also is with David' ; 2 K 3^{15} 'And it came to pass, as the minstrel played, that the hand of the LORD came upon him' ; Ezr 7^{6} 'according to the hand of the LORD his God upon him' (so 7^{9} 8^{18}, Neh $2^{8.18}$, sometimes with 'good' as epithet of 'hand,' the meaning being always the favour of God actively bestowed and proved by its results) ; Job 6^{9} 'Even that it would please God to destroy me ; that he would let loose his hand, and cut me off !' Ps 78^{42} 'They remembered not his hand, nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy' ; 89^{48} 'Shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave ?' (RV 'power of Sheol') ; 109^{27} 'That they may know that this is thy hand, that thou, LORD, hast done it' ; Pr 21^{1} 'The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water ; he turneth it whithersoever he will' ; Ec 9^{10} 'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might' ; Jer 15^{17} 'I sat alone because of thy hand' ('The Hand of J″ is a fig. expression for the self-revealing and irresistible power of J″ ; it is therefore equivalent to the Arm of J″ [Is 53^{1}], but is used in preference with regard to the divinely-ordained actions and words of the prophets'—Cheyne).

In this connexion the foll. passages deserve attention : 1. Dt 33^{8} 'Let his hands be sufficient for him' ; Heb. יָדָיו רָב לוֹ ; RV 'With his hands he contended for himself,' RVm 'Let his hands be sufficient for him,' or 'for them.' Driver mentions Stade's 'plausible conjecture' יָדֶיךָ רִיב לוֹ (addressed to God) 'with thy hands contend for it' ; but his own tr. is 'with his hands he hath contended for it.' The verse contains Moses' blessing on Judah ; and as Judah's desire for the reunion of the people is given in the previous clause, these words are understood by Driver as expressing Judah's services for the common weal ; LXX καὶ αἱ χεῖρες αὐτοῦ διακρινοῦσιν αὐτῷ ; Vulg. 'manus ejus pugnabunt pro eo' ; Wyc. 1382 'his hoondis shulen fight for it,' 1388 'hise hondis schulen fighte for hym' ; Tind. 'let his handes fyght for him' ; Cov. 'Let his handes multiplye him' (taking רָב from רָבַב 'to increase,' not from רִיב 'to strive') ; similarly Calvin (Sermons upon Deut.), Golding's trans. 'Let his handes suffise him, because thou wilt bee his helpe against his enemies' ; whence Gen. 'His hands shalbe sufficient for him, if thou help him against his enemies' ; Bish. 'His hands shalbe good ynough for him,' whence AV ; but Dou. (after Vulg.) 'his handes shal fight for him.'

2. Ps 17^{14} 'Deliver my soul from the wicked, which is thy sword : from men which are thy hand, O LORD' (מִמְתִים יָדְךָ יהוה) ; RV 'From men, by thy hand,' RVm as AV. Nearly all mod. expositors* take the 'sword' and the 'hand' as the instruments by which J″ is to rescue the soul of His servant, as RV. But King still accepts the AV tr., which makes wicked men God's sword, and worldly men His 'hand' or instrument (cf. Is 10^{5} 'Ho Assyrian, the rod of mine anger !'). The passage is, however, suspected, and its opening words rejected as a gloss by Cheyne, Kautzsch, Wellhausen, et al. See Expos. Times, v. 431.

3. Ps 80^{17} 'Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand' (תְּהִי־יָדְךָ עַל־אִישׁ יְמִינֶךָ), i.e. 'put forth thy power to protect the people which thy right hand made into a nation and delivered from Egypt'—Kirkpatrick. Wellh.-Furness tr. יָדְךָ 'thine arm.'

4. Ps 89^{25} 'I will set his hand also in the sea, and his right hand in the rivers,' RV 'on the sea . . . on the rivers.' The ref. is to the extent of the King's dominion—from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates.

2. It follows that the hand is often a figure for the person, especially the person acting :† Lv 14^{32} 'This is the law of him in whom is the plague of leprosy, whose hand is not able to get that which pertaineth to his cleansing' (RV 'who is not able') ; so Nu 6^{21} ; 1 S 23^{16} 'And Jonathan, Saul's son, arose, and went to David into the wood, and strengthened his hand in God' (cf. Is 35^{3} 'strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees'). Shaks. occasionally uses 'hand' in the same way, as Meas. for Meas. V. i. 491—

> 'Friar, advise him :
> I leave him to your hand.'

3. The above and other idioms are found in the foll. phrases :—

1. At hand. To be at hand is to be near, whether of time or of place. When the ref. is to an event, as 'the day of the LORD' (Is 13^{6}, Jl 1^{15}, Zeph 1^{7}), there is no ambiguity ; but when a person is referred to, it is sometimes a question whether place or time is spoken of. In OT 'at hand' is the tr. of קָרַב to be near (Gn 27^{41}, Dt 15^{9}, Ezk 12^{23}, and [in Piel] Ezk 36^{8} 'for they are at hand to come' (כִּי קֵרְבוּ לָבוֹא), or the adj. קָרוֹב 'near' (Dt 32^{35}, Is 13^{6}, Jer 23^{23}, Jl 1^{15}, Zeph 1^{7}), of which the most luminous passage is Jer 23^{23} 'Am I a God at hand, saith the LORD, and not a God afar off ?' In NT 'at hand' is mostly the tr. of the vb. ἐγγίζω, to come near (Mt 3^{2} 4^{17} 10^{7} $26^{45.46}$, Mk 1^{15} 14^{42}, Ro 13^{12} 1 P 4^{7}), or of the adj. ἐγγύς, 'near' (Mt 26^{18}, Jn 2^{13} 7^{2}, Ph 4^{5}, Rev 1^{3} 22^{10}), both of which are used of place and of time ; once also of ἐνίστημι (2 Th 2^{2} 'Be not . . . troubled . . . by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand,' ὡς ὅτι ἐνέστηκεν ἡ ἡμέρα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, edd. Κυρίου for Χριστοῦ, RV 'as that the day of the Lord is now present' ;‡ Ellicott, 'to the effect that the day of the Lord is now come') ; and once of ἐφίσταμαι (2 Ti 4^{6} 'the time of my departure is at hand,' ἐφέστηκε, RV 'is come').

The only doubtful passage is Ph 4^{5} 'The Lord is at hand,' ὁ Κύριος ἐγγύς. Most ancient and nearly all mod. expositors understand the reference to be to the Second Advent, the words being a translation of the Aram. Μαρὰν ἀθά of 1 Co 16^{22}, which some think may have been a set form of warning in the apostolic Church. But a few take the ἐγγύς to be local, 'The Lord is near us,' either referring to the perpetual presence of Christ (cf. Mt 28^{20}), or (taking Κύριος as God) to God's helpful providence in time of need. See Vincent, ad loc. (who accepts the ref. to the Second Coming) ; Manning, Sermons, iii. 241 ; Harden, Ch. of Eng. Eccles. Rev., Aug. 30, 1890 ; Moule, Thoughts on the Spiritual Life (who refer to Christ's constant presence : Moule compares Ps 119^{151} 'Thou art near [ἐγγύς], O Lord') ; and Expos. Times, ii. 2 f. The chief argument for the Second Coming is the apostle's use of Κύριος, on which see Winer, Gram. p. 154.

2. At no hand. This phrase occurs only in Preface to AV 1611. Its meaning is 'by no means.'

* Including Davidson, Syntax, § 109. 3, p. 154.

† This does not spoil Trench's contrast between the mod. custom of describing working men as so many 'hands' and the biblical idiom 'souls' (Ac 2^{41}). See Study of Words, 95 f.

‡ The AV tr. of this passage brings it into conflict with Ro 13^{12} 'The night is far spent, the day is at hand,' making the apostle deny here what he there affirms. RV removes the discrepancy.

Cf. T. Fuller, Holy Warre, ii. 36 (p. 92), 'The Caliph demurred hereat, as counting such a gesture a diminution to his State; and at no hand would give him his hand bare, but gave it in his glove.' Cf. Sir John Harington's version of Ps 137^{3}—

> 'Come, sing us now a song, say they,
> As once you song at anie hand.'

3. At the hand of=from: Gn 9^{5} 'And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man' (מִיַּד, lit. 'from the hand of'; LXX ἐκ χειρός,* Vulg. 'de manu,' Wyc. 'of the hoond'); 33^{10} 'Receive my present at my hand'; 2 S $13^{5.\,6.\,10}$, 2 K 9^{7} 'And thou shalt smite the house of Ahab thy master, that I may avenge the blood of my servants the prophets, and the blood of all the servants of the Lord, at the hand of Jezebel'; Is 1^{12} 'When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hand, to tread my courts?'; Rev 19^{2} 'He hath judged the great whore . . . and hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand' (ἐκ τῆς [edd. omit τῆς] χειρὸς αὐτῆς, Vulg. 'de manibus ejus': the meaning, which is 'from her' or 'upon her,' as 'upon Jezebel' in 2 K 9^{7}, is missed by Gen. NT, 'and hath advenged the blood of his servants shed by her hand.' The phrase is frequently used by Shaks., as Merry Wives, II. ii. 218, 'Have you received no promise of satisfaction at her hands?' In Neh 11^{24} occurs the phrase 'at the king's hand,' —'And Pethahiah . . . was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people' (לְיַד הַמֶּלֶךְ). The meaning of the phrase is clear, but the scope of Pethahiah's office is not so clear. See Ryle (Ezra and Neh. in Camb. Bible), and art. PETHAHIAH.

4. By the hand of='by,' or 'by means of': Ex 4^{13} 'And he said, O my Lord, send, I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send' (בְּיַד); Lv 8^{36} 'So Aaron and his sons did all things which the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses.'

5. By strength of hand: Ex $13^{4.\,14.\,16}$, as 13^{14} 'By strength of hand the LORD brought us out from Egypt.' See 'With a strong hand' below.

6. To come to one's hand: Gn 32^{13} 'And he lodged there that same night; and took of that which came to his hand a present for Esau his brother' (וַיִּקַּח מִן-הַבָּא בְיָדוֹ, LXX καὶ ἔλαβεν ὧν ἔφερεν δῶρα, Vulg. 'separavit de his quæ habebat,' RV 'took of that which he had with him'); Jg 20^{48} 'And the men of Israel turned again upon the children of Benjamin, and smote them with the edge of the sword, as well the men of every city, as the beast, and all that came to hand' (עַד כָּל־הַנִּמְצָא, AVm 'all that was found,' RV 'all that they found'); 1 S 25^{8} 'Give, I pray thee, whatsoever cometh to thine hand unto thy servants' (אֵת אֲשֶׁר תִּמְצָא יָדְךָ, LXX ὃ ἐὰν εὕρῃ ἡ χείρ σου).

7. Fall in hand with: Only in Preface to AV, 'For not long after Christ, Aquila fell in hand with a new Translation, and after him Theodotion, and after him Symmachus'; and 'Neither, to be short, were we the first that fell in hand with translating the Scripture into English.' The meaning is 'set about,' 'undertake,' mod. 'take in hand to.'

8. From one's hand=from oneself: Gn 4^{11} 'And now art thou cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand'; 38^{20}, cf. Ps 71^{4} Wyc. 'My God, tac me awey fro the hond of the synnere; and fro the hond of the doere agen the lawe.'

9. In hand. This phrase has different meanings: (1) 'In progress,' 1 S 20^{19} 'when the business was in hand' (בְּיוֹם הַמַּעֲשֶׂה, AVm 'in the day of the business,' LXX ἐν τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ ἐργασίμῃ, Vulg. 'in die quando operari licet'). Cf. Shaks. Venus, 912—

> 'Full of respects, yet nought at all respecting,
> In hand with all things, nought at all effecting.'

(2) In one's hand='with one,' or 'in one's possession,' Gn 35^{4} 'And they gave unto Jacob all the strange gods that were in their hand'; 39^{3} 'And his master saw . . . that the LORD made all that he did to prosper in his hand'; Dt 24^{1} 'let him write a bill of divorcement and give in her hand'; 1 S 17^{22} 'And David left his carriage [RV 'baggage'] in the hand (עַל־יַד) of the keeper of the carriage'; Is 44^{20} 'Is there not a lie in my right hand?'; 1 Ch 29^{12} 'In thine hand is power and might; and in thine hand it is to make great, and to give strength unto all.' Sometimes, as in the last passage, the meaning is rather 'in one's power,' or 'under one's control.' So Gn 24^{10} 'all the goods of his master were in his hand'; Job 12^{10} 'In whose hand is the soul of every living thing'; Jer 26^{14} 'As for me, behold I am in your hand: do with me as seemeth good and meet unto you'; Sir 15^{14} 'He himself made man from the beginning, and left him in the hand of his counsel' (ἐν χειρὶ διαβουλίου αὐτοῦ, RV 'in the hand of his own counsel').

(3) To 'put one's life in one's hand' is to expose it, risk it, in making a venture. The phrase occurs in Jg 12^{3}, 1 S 19^{5} 28^{21}, Job 13^{14}; and in a slightly different form in Ps 119^{109} 'My soul is continually in my hand'; cf. also Ad. Est 14^{4} 'For my danger is in mine hand' (ὅτι κίνδυνός μου ἐν χειρί μου).

(4) In Gal 3^{19} occurs the expression 'in the hand of,' meaning 'by means of': 'the law . . . was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator,' Gr. ἐν χειρί, a frequent trⁿ in LXX of Heb. בְּיַד. Both the Gr. and the Eng. have accepted the Heb. phrase, regardless of their own proper idiom, and that not only in the use of 'hand,' but also by using 'in'. RV prefers 'by the hand of.'

10. Lay hand on. See LAY.

11. Of one's hand='from one,' as Gn 21^{30} 'these seven ewe lambs shalt thou take of my hand'; 39^{1} 'And Joseph was brought down to Egypt; and Potiphar . . . bought him of the hands [ed. 1611 'hand,' so RV] of the Ishmaelites'; or=simply 'my,' as Gn 31^{29} 'It is in the power of my hand [=it is in my power] to do you hurt.'

12. On this, that hand. The phrase 'on this (that, etc.) hand' for 'on this side' is now biblical and archaic. Wright (*Bible Word-Book*², 303) quotes Holland, Pliny, xxxvi. 5 (ed. 1637), 'The fierie goddesse Vesta, sitting in a chaire, accompanied with two hand-maidens set upon the ground of each hand of her.' Shaks., however, uses the expression quite freely, as Merry Wives, II. ii. 24—'I, I, I myself sometimes, leaving the fear of Heaven on the left hand, and hiding mine honour in my necessity, am fain to shuffle, to hedge, and to lurch.' In AV we find Gn 14^{15} 'Hobah, which is on the left hand of Damascus'; Ex 38^{15} 'and for the other side (פְּאַת) of the court gate, on this hand and that hand (מִזֶּה וּמִזֶּה) were hangings'; 2 K 23^{13} 'And the high places that were before Jerusalem, which were on the right hand of the mount of corruption' (מִימִין לְ).

13. Out of hand. The phrase 'out of the hand of' for 'out of the power of,' especially after the verb to deliver, occurs frequently. But twice we find 'out of hand,' meaning 'at once,' Nu 11^{15} 'Kill me, I pray thee, out of hand' (הָרְגֵנִי נָא הָרֹג, LXX ἀπόκτεινόν με ἀναιρέσει); To 4^{14} 'Give him it out of hand' (παραυτίκα). So North, Plutarch (Demosthenes, p. 853), 'Thereupon he went with a chearefull countenance into the assembly of the councell, and told them there, that he had a certaine dreame that promised great good hap, and that out of hand, unto the Athenians'; Golding, Calvin's Sermons upon Deuteronomie (No. 192, on Dt 33$^{3-7}$), 'Wee see then that things shall not [alwayes] come to passe out of hande, immediatly after that God hath promised them'; Golding, Calvin's Sermons upon Job (No. 119, on Job 32$^{1-3}$), 'We knowe that the world did out of hand fall away from God'; and (in same sermon) 'Why doth he not kill me out of hande?'

14. Put one's hand. Ex 23^{1} 'Put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness'—a lit. tr. of the Heb., which means to 'go hand in hand with.'

15. Under the hand of: Gn 41^{35} 'And let them . . . lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh' (תחת יַד־פַּרְעֹה); Ex 21^{20} 'And if a man smite his servant . . . and he die under his hand'; Nu 4^{28} 'their charge shall be under the hand of Ithamar'; Jg 9^{29} 'And would to God this people were under my hand!'; 1 S 21^{3} 'Now therefore what is under thine hand? Give me five loaves of bread in mine hand.'

16. With a strong (high, etc.) hand is a phrase which is very often used of God's deliverances, Ex 6^{1} 13^{9} 14^{8} 32^{11}, Dt 5^{15} 7^{19} etc.

For the theological significance of the word see next article. J. HASTINGS.

HAND.—The appearance of this word in the Bible is in some cases due to Eng. idiom. Thus the expressions 'at hand' (though Heb. had a corresponding idiom, Job 15^{23}), and 'handful' are used where the original idea was simply that of 'nearness' or 'fulness.' So, too, in the term of measurement, 'a palm' or 'handbreadth' טֶפַח, the root idea seems to be that of extension only.

For the hand proper two words are employed—one of them יָד yâdh, denoting it open or flat, the other כַּף kaph, closed or curved. A third word, חָפְנַיִם ḥophnaim, was sometimes used of the two hands clenched or grasping an object. To these must be added יָמִין yâmîn, and שְׂמֹאל sĕmô'l, right and left, which, as in other languages, came to stand by themselves for right and left hand.

It is only idiomatic phrases derived from the various functions of the hand that call for notice here. These functions are to mark position, exert power, and express emotion, and the idioms may be conveniently arranged in three corresponding classes.

1. So usual was it to employ the hand to describe situation, that יָד from its sense of side, which is 11 times used to tr. it, came to carry that of place, and is so rendered 8 times. Cf. coast 6 times, border twice.

In three of these instances (1 S 15^{12}, 2 S 18^{18}, Is 56^{5}) place evidently stands for a monument of some kind, possibly a pillar with a hand sculptured on it as an emblem of power or success. Such monuments appear to have been common in Phœnicia, and the hand has in many countries served as an emblem of good fortune.

'On the right hand,' 'on the left hand,' are, of course, common phrases, while the custom of facing the E. when denoting geographical position made these phrases in Pal. equivalent to S. and N. respectively.

The right hand was the place of an accuser in a court of justice (Ps 109^{6}, Zec 3^{1}), but, from the sense of security given by the presence of a comrade in battle on the unshielded side, the right came to be the place of a protector (Ps 16^{8} 109^{31}, Ac 2^{25}).

Religion had also its use for these phrases. To turn from the law of God neither to the right hand nor the left is a frequent scriptural expression for loyalty to the divine King. To sit down at His right hand was the glory reserved for the exalted Son (Ps 110^{1}, Mk 14^{62}).

2. As used to work with or to fight with, the hand became a synonym for strength (Jos 8^{20}), and supplied innumerable metaphorical expressions, many of which, from their religious use, have become as universal as they are sacred. When he wished to denote God's power, the Israelite spoke of God's hand. See ARM. He saw it outstretched to perform wonders of mercy for himself, or wonders of judgment for his enemies. It was a good hand and a mighty hand, and it was watched 'as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress' (Ps 123^{2}). It became, indeed, an emblem not only of might, exerted to defend or destroy, not only of help and guidance, but of Providence (Ps 77^{10}). Prophetic inspiration, too, was often indicated by the phrase 'the hand of the Lord was upon' (1 K 18^{46}), while God was said to speak 'by the hand of,' i.e. by means of, a prophet.

It is not always easy to determine whether the mention of the hand has passed out of the region of anthropomorphic representation into that of pure metaphor. At all events the imagery is fearlessly bold in expressions like those of Ps 74^{11}, Is 49^{16}.

3. The use of the hands to express emotion gave rise to many familiar biblical expressions. They were lifted in prayer (Ps 134^{2}), extended in expostulation (Is 65^{2}), clasped in a bargain (Pr 6^{1}), folded in sleep (Pr 6^{10}). By their movement a blessing was conveyed (Lv 9^{22}), an oath was registered (Dt 32^{40}), or a defiance offered (2 S 20^{21}). As a religious symbol, the imposition of hands in ordination to a sacred office grew out of the natural gesture that accompanied the patriarchal blessing. See LAYING ON OF HANDS.

The act of cleansing the hands was fruitful in phrases. To wash one's own hands was a protestation of innocence (Dt 21$^{6.7}$, Mt 27^{24}); to pour water on the hands of another, of dependence or discipleship (2 K 3^{11}). The idea of ceremonial purity or impurity enters into the expressions 'clean hands' of the Psalms and 'unwashen hands' of the Gospels.

There is one phrase which, from the obscurity of its origin, causes a little difficulty. 'To fill the hand' (AVm where the text has 'consecrate,' Ex 28^{41} etc.) was a regular term for the investiture of a priest. Some explain by the supposition that part of the sacrifice was placed in the neophyte's hand as a symbol of his office. Others think of the presentation of the priestly tithe. Another, and perhaps better explanation, makes the expression entirely metaphorical for the bestowal of office, as we might say 'the priesthood was put into his hands' (cf. Moore's Judges, p. 380, and see art. FILL). A. S. AGLEN.

HANDLE.—The 'handles of the lock' (properly, as RV, 'the handles of the bolt') of the door are referred to in Ca 5^{5}, the word being כַּף, kaph, usually the palm of the hand or sole of the foot. See KEY, and Lock under art. HOUSE.

The verb to 'handle' occurs frequently. Its primary meaning, to seize or use with the hand, is seen in Ps 115^{7} 'They have hands, but they handle not'; and Wis 15^{15} 'gods, which neither have the use of eyes to see . . . nor fingers of hands to handle' (εἰς ψηλάφησιν). So we handle the sword (Ezk 38^{4}), the oar (27^{29}), the pen (Jg 5^{14}), the harp (Gn 4^{21}), etc. In NT the meaning is touch, or feel with the hand. There are two Gr. verbs:

(1) θιγγάνω, Col 2[21] 'Touch not; taste not; handle not' (Μὴ ἅψῃ μηδὲ γεύσῃ μηδὲ θίγῃς). RV, after Lightfoot, renders 'Handle not, nor taste, nor touch,' for ἅπτεσθαι is stronger than θιγεῖν, and is best tr^d by handle if that word is to be used at all, which is somewhat strong for both. (2) ψηλαφάω, Lk 24[39] 'Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see'; 1 Jn 1[1] 'That which was from the beginning, which we have heard . . . and our hands have handled, of the Word of life.' If 'handle' was too strong for θιγγάνω, it is scarcely strong enough for ψηλαφάω, which expresses the movement of the hands over a surface, so as to feel it and fix it, or mentally the groping after something, as the Athenians 'felt after' God (Ac 17[27], same verb). In He 12[18] (only remaining occurrence in NT) it is used of the 'mount that might be touched,' i.e. as Davidson 'palpable and materially sensible.'

But the verb to 'handle' is found in other senses that are less familiar, as: Be conversant with, have to do with, Jer 2[8] 'The priests said not, Where is the Lord? and they that handle the law (תֹּפְשֵׂי הַתּוֹרָה) knew me not'. Almost in the sense intended by Jeremiah, but somewhat more narrowly, this word 'handle' was used about 1611 of the expounding of Scripture, as in James Melvill's Diary (Wodrow, p. 182) in reference to the order of worship at Newcastle under Melvill's ministry: 'Ther salbe daylie Comoun Prayers twyse everie day, befor noone at ten houres, and efter at foure, at quhilk tyme a Psalme salbe read and handlit, sa that the soum thairof be schortlie gathered, the partes sett doun in ordour, and some schort notes of doctrine, with exhortation; bot in sic schortnes that the haill tyme occupied exceid nocht the space of ane halff houre.' And so Wodrow, Select Biog. i. 312, 'I have heard him [Mr. John Dykes of Kilrinnie] goe through a long chapter in less than an hour, and pertinently handle every purpose thereof.' This is the very meaning, however, of 2 Mac 2[28] 'Leaving to the author the exact handling of every particular' (τὸ μὲν διακριβοῦν). In 2 Co 4[2] we find the expression, 'handling the word of God deceitfully,' where the meaning is different. The Gr., tr^d 'handle deceitfully,' is the simple verb δολόω, to ensnare, corrupt; Vulg. 'adulterantes,' which Wyc. translates 'avoutrynge the word of God,' (1388) 'doynge avoutrye bi'; Rhem. 'adulterating': Tind. has 'corrupte'; Cran. introduced 'handle deceitfully,' which was adopted by Gen., Bish., AV, RV. Tindale's 'corrupt' is probably as near the meaning as one can go. But in the AV tr^n 'handle' means to deal with, treat. So Pr 16[20] 'He that handleth a matter wisely shall find good' (מַשְׂכִּיל עַל־דָּבָר, AVm 'he that understandeth a matter,' RV 'he that giveth heed unto the word,' RVm as AV). In this sense the word is used also in 2 Mac 7[39] 'Then the king, being in a rage, handled him worse than all the rest' (ἀπήντησεν); 8[17] 'the cruel handling of the city' (αἰκισμός, RV 'shameful handling'); and Mk 12[4] 'sent him away shamefully handled' (ἀπέστειλαν ἠτιμωμένον, WH ἠτίμησαν, RV 'him they . . . handled shamefully,' Gould 'insulted'; the verb is lit. 'dishonoured'). Cf. Ezk 18[8] Cov. 'he handleth faithfully betwixte man and man'; Golding, Calvin's Job (Ser. cxix. on 32[1-3]), 'The opinion and imaginacion of Jobs three freends, was that Job was a castaway before God, bycause he was handled so roughly.' J. HASTINGS.

HANDSOMELY.—In Wis 13[11] the adv. εὐπρεπῶς is translated in AV 'handsomely,' which seems a very appropriate translation. The Bishops' Bible has 'comely' (as adv.), and RV 'in comely form.' But it is very doubtful if that can be the meaning of 'handsomely' in AV. Coming from 'hand' it is equivalent in all early examples to 'handy,' i.e. dexterously, cleverly. Bishop Keith says of Hamilton's Catechism, 'It is a judicious commentary upon the Commands, the Belief, Lord's Prayer, Magnificat, Ave Maria; and the author shows both his wisdom and moderation in handsomely eviting to enter upon the controverted topics,' and the latest edition of the Catechism (Mitchell, ed. 1882) is right in saying that 'handsomely eviting must mean artfully eluding.' Bp. Davenant in 1640 writes regarding his Animadversions to Dr. Ward, and says, 'For this uce I would have a doozen at the least sent bound: some fairly for the Bishops, all handsomely' (Fuller's Life of Bp. Davenant, 1897, p. 447), where 'fairly' means what we now express by 'handsomely,' while 'handsomely' refers to the workmanship, deftly. This is no doubt the meaning of 'handsomely' in AV. The Vulg. gives 'diligenter,' after which Wyc. and Dou. 'diligently,' and it is to be observed that the reading in ℵ is not εὐπρεπῶς, but εὐτρεπῶς. Rutherford (Letters, No. lxv.) says, 'Christ hath so handsomely [i.e. dexterously] fitted for my shoulders this rough tree of the cross, as that it hurteth me no ways.' The adj. 'handsome' is in constant use in the same sense, as Tind. Pent. (Prol. to Lv), 'Fynallye beware of allegoryes, for there is not a moare handsome or apte a thinge to be gile withall then an allegorye, nor a more sotle and pestilent thinge in the world to persuade a false matter then an allegorye.' J. HASTINGS.

HANES (חָנֵס).—Is 30[4] in a difficult context: 'Woe to the rebellious children . . . that walk to go down into Egypt and have not asked at my mouth, to strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and to trust in the shadow of Egypt! Therefore shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame, and the trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion. For his princes are at Zoan, and his ambassadors are come to Hanes.' There seems to be no antecedent to 'his' but Pharaoh, so some have thought that the last sentence refers to the movements of Pharaoh's advanced guard towards the frontier; but it is usually considered that the princes and ambassadors were those of the king of Judah. Zoan is well known to be Tanis. Hanes might well represent the ancient Hunenseten in its passage to the much abbreviated Coptic form Hnês. This was the name of the great city of Heracleopolis Magna in Middle Egypt. About this time, corresponding to that of the 23rd to 25th dynasty in Egypt, that country was in a feeble state, there being seldom if ever a central authority of sufficient power to keep local princes in check. Two invaders, the Eth. Piankhi and the Assyr. Esarhaddon, have given us lists of numerous independent princelings in different cities of Egypt. In the inscription of Piankhi one of these petty rulers is named as of Heracleopolis Magna, but there is no mention of one at Tanis. In Esarhaddon's list of petty states Tanis appears to be one, and another is called Hininshi; but the latter is grouped with the cities of Lower Egypt, and was apparently situated in the central part of the Delta, so that it is difficult to identify it with Hunenseten-Hnês, although there are excellent etymol. and hist. reasons for so doing. There is indeed no sign of divisions in the country in the passage quoted from Is; Pharaoh is named in the sing. as at other times. But the two cities are evidently mentioned as leading ones, and it would be satisfactory to find them in the lists above referred to. If, as Esarhaddon's list would seem to indicate, Hininshi is not Hnês, it may still, perhaps, represent the biblical H., otherwise the latter is prob. Heracleopolis Magna in Middle Egypt. Naville has compared H. with Anysis, a city of Lower Egypt mentioned by Herodotus; again, Khens seems to be the Egyp. name of a district in the N.E. delta. The LXX had lost the clue to the meaning of v.^{4}, and substituted, 'For there are in Tanis princes, wicked messengers' (ὅτι εἰσὶν ἐν Τάνει ἀρχηγοὶ ἄγγελοι πονηροί). An Aram. version gives for Hanes, Tahpanhes, on the N.E. frontier of Egypt. There is at least some similarity in the names. F. LL. GRIFFITH.

HANGING is frequently mentioned in the OT, but it is very doubtful whether the word, in connexion with capital punishment, has ever the sense which it suggests to modern ears. As the analysis below will show, in most instances where the hanging (or hanging up) of a criminal is referred to, the meaning is that, after execution in some other form, his dead body was hung up. Again, even if 'hanging' sometimes designates a mode of execution, the probability is that it is impaling that is really meant. The scriptural terms and references are as follows:—

1. תָּלָה (in 2 S 21^{12} (Ḳerê), Dt 28^{66}, Hos 11^{7} (?) תָּלָא), 'to hang up' anything, e.g. the earth Job 26^{7}, the shields on the tower of David Ca 4^{4}, the harps of the exiles in Babylon Ps 137^{2}; especially of the hanging up of a dead body, in Gn $40^{19.\,22}$ 41^{13} of the chief baker, who was probably first beheaded and then had his body impaled as an aggravation of the punishment, see Dillm. ad loc.; in 2 S 4^{12} of the murderers of Ishbosheth, whose bodies, after their hands and feet had been cut off, were hung up by David beside the pool in Hebron; in 2 S 21^{12} of the bodies of Saul and Jonathan, which were hung up by the Philistines at Beth-shan. The fuller expression '(hang) upon a tree' (עַל־עֵץ) occurs in Gn 40^{19}, Dt 21^{22}, Jos 8^{29} $10^{26\,bis}$, Est 2^{23} (in which last passage it is possible that impaling of the dead bodies is meant; cf. Herod. iii. 125, ix. 78; Plutarch, Artax. 17, Timol. 22; Justin, xxi. 4). The Deuteronomic code regulated the Jewish practice (cf. Philo, de Spec. Leg. § 28) as follows:—'If a man have committed a sin worthy of death and he be put to death, and [after his death] thou hang him on a tree, his body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt surely bury him the same day, for he that is hanged is accursed of God (קִלְלַת אֱלֹהִים, LXX κεκατηραμένος ὑπὸ θεοῦ, Aq. Theod. κατάρα θεοῦ, not 'a curse, i.e. reproach, insult to God,' as one school of Jewish interpreters understood it), that thou defile not thy land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance' (Dt $21^{22\mathrm{f.}}$, where see Driver's note). This prescription is noted as having been carried out in the case even of the kings executed by Joshua (Jos 8^{29} 10^{27}). The requisite publicity has been attained by sunset and the land has been cleansed from the defilement affecting it. (On 'exposure' of this kind and its religious meaning see W. R. Smith, RS^{1} 351 n.). The exposure of the bodies of Saul's sons (2 S $21^{9\mathrm{ff.}}$) day after day was either exceptional, or reflects the practice of an age that was a stranger to the mildness of the Deuteronomic code (cf Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 333).

The LXX equivalent of תָּלָה is κρεμάννυμι, which appears also in the NT in Lk 23^{39}, Ac 5^{30} 10^{39}, Gal 3^{13}, the only difference from OT usage being that it is used in all these passages of the hanging of a living body upon a cross. The language of Dt 21^{23}, although it had of course no direct reference to crucifixion, could readily be transferred to it, and evidently was so transferred by the Jews, as we can gather from Gal 3^{13}. It was the hanging up, not the death, that brought disgrace upon the sufferer, and the epithet Tālûi (תָּלוּי 'the hung'), derived from Dt 21^{23}, is frequently applied in contempt to Jesus by the later Jews. See the very instructive note of Lightfoot, Galatians^{6}, $152^{\mathrm{ff.}}$.

The word תָּלָה is almost certainly used of 'hanging' as a mode of execution in Est 5^{14} 6^{4} $7^{9\mathrm{f.}}$ 8^{7} $9^{13.\,14.\,25}$ (possibly also in 2^{23}). The EV evidently understands it in the modern sense, for both AV and RV give for עֵץ gallows (in the text, although they have 'tree' in the margin). The 'gallows' which was destined by Haman for Mordecai, but was used for his own execution and that of his sons, is said to have been fifty cubits high. It seems most probable that impaling was the form of execution adopted, and that the 'tree' was a stake for the purpose (cf. Haley, Esther, 122 ff.). It could be lowered to receive its victim, who would then be raised upon it to that lofty height, that his doom and sufferings might arrest the public gaze.

The same word (תָּלוּי) is used in 2 S 18^{10} of Absalom, who was 'hanged in an oak,' i.e. caught by the neck in the fork of a branch. In La 5^{12} we read of princes being 'hanged up by their hand' (בְּיָדָם נִתְלוּ). Löhr would refer their to the enemy, that is to say, the princes were hanged up by the hand of the Chaldæans. Others, taking their as =their own, suggest that there may be a reference to crucifixion.

2. In Ezr. 6^{11} the Aram. יִתְמְחֵא appears to refer to being fastened on the impaling stake, although the LXX understands it more mildly, πληγήσεται, 'he shall be beaten.'

3. The only clear instances in the Bible of death by hanging, i.e. strangulation, are those of Ahithophel and Judas (2 S 17^{23}, Mt 27^{5}), and both these were cases not of execution but of suicide. As a mode of execution it seems to have been only by the later Jews that strangling was adopted (see W. R. Smith, RS^{2} 419, and art. CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, p. 527^{a}). In 2 S 17^{23} the Heb. term employed is יֵחָנַק (imperf. Niph. of [חנק], the only other occurrences of this root being the Piel ptcp. מְחַנֵּק used in Nah 2^{12} of the lion strangling prey for his lionesses, and the noun מַחֲנָק in Job 7^{15} 'My soul chooseth strangling'). The LXX has in 2 S ἀπέπνιξεν, in Nah ἀπήγξατο, which is the word used also in Mt 27^{5}.

4. הוֹקִיעַ, Hiph. of יָקַע which in Qal means 'to be dislocated' (Gn 32^{25} of Jacob's thigh) or fig. 'to be alienated' (joined with נֶפֶשׁ and followed by מִן or מֵעַל Jer 6^{8}, Ezk $23^{17.\,18}$), is used in 2 S $21^{6.\,9}$ of the 'hanging up' of Saul's sons by the Gibeonites (cf. v.^{13} Hoph. ptcp. הַמּוּקָעִים). Its only other occurrence is Nu 25^{4} 'Take all the chiefs of the people and hang (הוֹקַע) them up unto the LORD.' The Oxf. Heb. Lex. remarks, 'some solemn form of execution, but meaning uncertain.' Dillmann, Kautzsch, and Kittel tr. simply 'aussetzen'=expose. This follows the LXX, which has in 2 S ἐξηλιάζειν and in Nu παραδειγματίζειν. By others it is taken to mean impale (Ges., following Aq., ἀναπηγνύναι) or crucify (Targ. צְלַב, Vulg. crucifigere, affigere). Symm. has κρεμάζειν=hang, Vulg. in Nu suspendere, but it is probable that the word expressed something more than the ordinary תָּלָה (Driver, Text of Sam. p. 269). In all probability we should read the same word (הֹקִעוּ for תָּקְעוּ of MT) in 1 S 31^{10}, of the fastening up of Saul's body by the Philistines (so Lagarde, followed by Wellhausen, Driver, Budde, Grätz, Klostermann).

W. R. Smith (RS^{2} 419) suggests that in the above passages in Nu and 2 S precipitation from a rock may be intended. 'They fell all seven together' (2 S 21^{9}), and for this form of execution reference may be made to 2 K 8^{12}, 2 Ch 25^{12}, Hos 10^{14}. This explanation, however, seems to lack probability, particularly if we adopt the above textual emendation of Lagarde in 1 S 31^{10}. J. A. SELBIE.

HANGING, HANGINGS.—1. The former is the AV rendering of the Heb. term מָסָךְ, the name given in the Priests' Code (1) to the curtain or portière closing the entrance to the Tabernacle from the surrounding court (Ex $26^{36.37}$ 35^{15} 'the h. for the door at the entering in of the tabernacle,' 39^{38} 40^{5} etc.); (2) to a similar portière closing the entrance to the court itself (Ex 35^{17} 'the h. for the door of the court,' 38^{18} etc.); and (3) once, Nu 3^{31}, for the 'veil' screening off the Holy of Holies from the rest of the Tabernacle, the usual name for which is פָּרֹכֶת (Ex 26^{31} and oft.), or more fully פָּרֹכֶת הַמָּסָךְ (Ex 35^{12} 39^{34} 40^{21}, Nu 4^{5}). In all three cases, as we have said, the AV renders by 'hanging,' with the single exception of Nu 3^{26}, where we find 'curtain' (see CURTAIN, 2). The Revisers, however, have consistently rendered מָסָךְ by 'screen' throughout.

2. The plur. form 'hangings,' on the other hand, is the equivalent of another technical term of the Priests' Code, קְלָעִים (LXX ἱστία), the hangings which, suspended from pillars, fenced off the court of the Tabernacle from the outer world (Ex $27^{9.11}$ etc.), hence the fuller designation קַלְעֵי הֶחָצֵר 'the hangings of the court' (Ex 35^{17} 38^{9} etc.).

For the material, workmanship, and other details of these screens and hangings, see the general article TABERNACLE in this Dictionary.

3. In 2 K 23^{7} we read of 'hangings for the Asherah' (RV), which the women wove even 'in the house of the LORD' itself. The original, as the margin informs us, has 'houses (בָּתִּים),' by which Jewish tradition understands 'tents' (so RVm) to shelter the image of the goddess. It is extremely doubtful, however, if bāttîm (or bottîm) is correct in this connexion. The LXX has here a transliteration of some different reading (A χεττιείμ, B χεττιείν). Klostermann supposes that the Greek translators read כתיים, a copyist's error for כתנים = כֻּתֳּנוֹת (cf. Luc. στολάς). See further Oxf. Heb. Lex. i. 109*a*, s.v. בַּיִת. A. R. S. KENNEDY.

HANNAH (חַנָּה, Ἄννα, that is, grace).—One of the wives of an Ephraimite named Elkanah, who lived at Ramathaim-zophim (1 S $1^{2ff.}$). To her great distress H. had no children, and on the occasion of one of the yearly visits which she made with her husband to sacrifice to J″ at Shiloh, where the ark then was, she vowed that, if the Lord would give her a son, she would devote him to Him under the vow of a Nazirite. Her prayer was heard, and a child was born, whom she named Samuel. As soon as he was weaned, which according to Jewish custom might not be until he was about three years old, she took him up to Eli, the priest of the Lord, at Shiloh. On the same occasion she is reported to have given vent to her feelings in the beautiful song of 1 S 2^{1-10}. It is necessary to note, however, that this song is pronounced by modern criticism to be wholly unsuited to H.'s position and circumstances, and is thought to have been composed later in celebration of some national success. If so, v.^{5b} may have led to its association with H. (see Driver, LOT^{6} 174). Of H.'s subsequent history we are told only that she was in the habit of bringing Samuel a little robe (mᵉ'îl) from year to year when she came up to the yearly sacrifice; and that she became the mother of other three sons and two daughters (1 S 2^{21}).

G. MILLIGAN.

HANNATHON (חַנָּתוֹן).—A place on the N. border of Zebulun, Jos 19^{14}. The site is uncertain, but the name is probably to be identified with the Talmudic Caphar Hananiah, which according to the Mishnah (see Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. 179, 226) marked the limit of Upper Galilee. This is now Kefr 'Anân, at the foot of the mountains of Upper Galilee and N.E. of Rimmon. See SWP i. 205, 207. C. R. CONDER.

HANNIEL (חַנִּיאֵל 'grace of God').—1. Son of Ephod, and Manasseh's representative for dividing the land, Nu 34^{23} P. 2. A hero of the tribe of Asher (AV Haniel), 1 Ch 7^{39}.

HANOCH (חֲנוֹךְ 'dedication'(?)).—1. A grandson of Abraham by Keturah, and third of the sons of Midian (Gn 25^{4}). In the parallel list of 1 Ch 1^{33} AV gives the form Henoch. 2. The eldest son of Reuben, and head of the family of the Hanochites (Gn 46^{9}, Ex 6^{14}, Nu 26^{5}, 1 Ch 5^{3}).

HANUN (חָנוּן 'favoured,' cf. Assyr. Ḫanunu, king of Gaza).—1. The son of Nahash, king of the Ammonites. Upon the death of the latter, David sent a message of condolence to Hanun, who, however, resented this action, and grossly insulted the messengers. The consequence was a war, which proved most disastrous to the Ammonites, 2 S $10^{1ff.}$, 1 Ch $19^{1ff.}$. 2. 3. H. occurs in the list of those who repaired the wall and the gates of Jerus., Neh $3^{13.30}$.

HAP, HAPLY.—Hap, a Saxon word meaning 'luck,' 'chance,' is used once in AV, Ru 2^{3} 'And her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz,' where the Heb. is וַיִּקֶר מִקְרֶהָ, LXX καὶ περιέπεσεν περιπτώματι; AVm 'her hap happened'; Cox, 'her lot met her.' T. Fuller (Holy State, iii. 12, p. 181) says, 'Many have been the wise speeches of fools, though not so many as the foolish speeches of wise men . . . because talking much, and shooting often, they must needs hit the mark sometimes, though not by aim, by hap'; and imitates the passage in Ru when he says (Holy Warre, p. 200), 'his hap was to fall in just among the three captains.'

Haply is 'by hap.' 'Happily' is the same word under a different spelling, and had formerly the same meaning, though it has now come to mean 'by good hap.' Happily meaning simply 'by hap,' 'perchance,' is common in Shaks., though mod. edd. usually spell 'haply.' Thus Hamlet, II. ii. 402—

> 'Ham. That great baby you see there is not yet out of his swaddling-clouts.
> Ros. Happily he's the second time come to them.'

In AV 1611 the spelling is 'haply' in 1 S 14^{30}, Mk 11^{13}, Lk 14^{29}, Ac 5^{39} 17^{27}; but in 2 Co 9^{4} 'happily,' which mod. edd. have changed to 'haply' also. Sometimes the word is spelt 'happly,' as in Daye's ed. of Tindale's Pent. (1573), 'Enacke, a kinde of Giauntes so called happly, because they ware chaynes about their neckes.' The word occurs in AV only in the phrases 'if haply' and 'lest haply.'

RV has tr^{d} μήποτε by 'lest haply' in all its occurrences, except Mt 25^{9} 'peradventure—not,' Jn 7^{26} 'Can it be that,' and 2 Ti 2^{25} 'if peradventure.' Also μή που (TR μήπως) is so tr^{d} in Ac 27^{29}. J. HASTINGS.

HAPHRAIM (חֲפָרַיִם).—A town of Issachar, noticed with Shunem and Anaharath, Jos 19^{19}. These were to the east of the tribal territory. In the Onomasticon, however (s. 'Aphraim'), it is stated to be 'now Affarea, six miles from Legio (Lejjûn) to the north.' The site in question is now called el-Ferrîyeh, on the low hills south of Carmel. It is the site of an ancient town with remarkable tombs. See SWP vol. i. sh. viii. In Baedeker-Socin's Pal.^{2} 238, Haphraim is identified with el-'Afûleh, 2 miles W. of Solam (Shunem).

HAPPEN.—1. Ro 11^{25} 'Blindness in part is happened to Israel,' i.e. is fallen upon, has come to (γέγονεν), without the idea of 'hap' or chance; RV 'hath befallen.' Cf. Jer 43^{8} Cov. 'And in Taphnis the worde off the LORDE happened unto Ieremy.' 2. 2 S 1^{6} 'As I happened by chance upon Mount Gilboa' (נִקְרֹא נִקְרֵיתִי, LXX Περιπτώματι περιεπέσαν), i.e. 'I chanced to light upon.' Bunyan begins his Holy War thus: 'In my Travels, as I walked through many Regions and Countries, it was my chance to happen into that famous Continent of Universe.' Cf. Gn 44^{29} Tind. 'Yf ye shall take this also awaye from me and some mysfortune happen apon him, then shall ye brynge my gray heed with sorow unto the grave'; and esp. Rutherford, Letters (No. xli.), 'I happened upon a convenient trusty bearer by God's wonderful providence.' 3. 2 Mac 13^{7} 'Such a death it happened that wicked man to die,' the usual prep. being omitted. So Pr. Bk., 'Ordering of Priests,' 'And if it shall happen the same Church, or any member thereof, to take any hurt or hindrance by reason of your negligence, ye know the greatness of the fault, and also the horrible punishment that will ensue': in 1549 and 1552 the word is 'chance.' 4. The auxiliary to be (as well as to have) was formerly used with the verb to 'happen': so Jer 44^{23} 'this evil is happened unto you'; Ro 11^{25} (as above); and 2 P 2^{22} 'But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb' (RV 'It has happened'). Cf. Mt 28^{11} Tind. 'When they were gone, beholde, some of the kepers came in to the cyte, and shewed unto the hie prestes all the thinges that were happened.'

HAPPINESS.—This word, in its subst. shape, does not appear in the Eng. Bible, either in AV or in RV, and its synonym blessedness (occurring thrice in AV of NT) has now (see BLESSEDNESS) been changed by the Revisers (in accordance with the form μακαρισμός) into 'blessing' (Ro $4^{6.9}$) and 'gratulation' (Gal 4^{15}). The adj. μακάριος (almost invariably in OT representing Heb. אַשְׁרֵי 'ashrê, lit. happinesses of) is common enough in both Testaments. But while, in NT, the Revisers have reduced (cf. Jn 13^{17}) the renderings by 'happy' to three (Ac 26^{2}, Ro 14^{22}, 1 Co 7^{40}), and might consistently have reduced them to one (Ac 26^{2}—the external happiness of St. Paul in pleading before Agrippa), the OT Revisers have left happy and blessed just where they were, except Jer 12^{1}, where the Heb. word (here alone in AV of OT rendered happy) is changed to at rest, its proper meaning. Even in Ps $128^{1.2}$ happy and blessed are left side by side to represent the same word; cf. also Pr 16^{20} with Ps 34^{8}. If Carlyle's dictum (Sartor Resartus) has any force, 'There is something higher than happiness, and that is blessedness,' blessed is the word for the spiritual region; and the retention of happy so often in RV of OT tends to merge this distinction in a way defensible only on the ground that outward prosperity entered largely into the OT conception of bliss.

The more usual word for happy in profane Greek, εὐδαίμων, does not occur in LXX or NT. Probably, the δαίμων component was a stumbling-block to Greek-speaking Jew and Christian; but the preference for μακάριος is altogether suitable to the atmosphere, since μακάριος, and not εὐδαίμων, represented to the Greeks the happiness of the divine life.

In the course of the gradual elevation of the word μακάριος, and the idea of happiness from the pagan to the Christian level, from Greek tragedy to the Sermon on the Mount, more than one point is worthy of note. While the ordinary pagan notion was purely external, and the tragedians, among the exponents of Gr. thought, will call no man happy till a happy death has set its seal upon a happy life (Soph. Trach. 1 ff., cf. Hdt. i. 32); yet, in their view, continued prosperity was conditioned by natural piety and reverence (Soph. Œd. R. passim, and Hdt. iii. 40); and hence their preference for εὐδαίμων, 'with a good genius attending.' The Gr. philosophical schools, on the other hand, looking for a happiness secure from 'the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,' discerned its possibility, some mainly in the moral, as Socrates, who defined happiness as εὐπραξία, well-doing, rather than εὐτυχία, good luck (Xen. Mem. iii. 9. 14); others, more strictly in the intellectual, as Plato, whose notion of happiness reached its climax in the wisdom consisting in the cognition of the Ideal Good (Rep. 519), this cognition being the crowning point of the 'resemblance to God as far as possible' (Theæt. 176*b*); others, as Aristotle, in the intellectually practical, 'the life in obedience to the intellect,' 'the rational virtuous activity of the soul in a life fully provided,' 'the performance by man of the peculiar work which belongs to him as man' (Eth. Nic. i. 6, ii. 5, x. 4); while the Stoics looked for happiness in a life 'conformed to nature,' and combined with ἀταραξία, absence of all emotion.

The difference between such philosophical notions of happiness and the biblical, lies not so much in inwardness, as in the fundamental conditions of that inwardness, its relations, its developments, its possibilities. The blessedness even of some of the noblest conceptions of the OT is linked to the external (Ps $34^{8.12.13.14}$), though sometimes the external seems to be transcended (Ps $84^{5.7}$ 4^{7} $119^{1.111}$), and, even when the external is foremost, it always connotes righteousness and the consequent favour of God towards individual, family, or race, in the present or in the Messianic age (see BLESSEDNESS). But the element in biblical happiness which had been lacking to all previous thought was the personal relation, and that not only as faith in God, personal and ever-present (Ps $33^{12.20.21}$), but as love for Him, this being the highest requisite (Dt $6^{4.5}$, Jg 5^{3}, Ps $4^{6.7}$); and the most satisfying blessedness is to be in His presence and to behold His face (Pss 16. 17. 49). In NT we reach the 'roof and crown.' The happiness is now clearly inward, spiritual and present (Mt $5^{2\text{ff.}}$); and now the way to the personal relation is opened up through Jesus Christ, personal, loving (Jn 15^{9}), ever-living (Jn 14^{6}, He 10^{20}). Whatever the outward may be (Ro $8^{38\text{f.}}$), He is God with us (Mt 1^{23} 18^{20}); nay, veritable evils endured for Him and with Him actually make us blessed now (Mt $5^{10\text{f.}}$, 1 P 4^{14}). More than this, He is Christ in us, the hope of glory (Col 1^{27}); for the time shall come when, all hindrances being taken away, and the internal embodying itself in external realization,* 'we shall be like him' (1 Jn $3^{1.2}$, cf. Plato above cited) in the full enjoyment of the eternal life (1 Jn 5^{11}, Mt 25^{46}, Mk 10^{30}, Jn $17^{22\text{-}24}$). (See articles by the present writer, Expositor, 1st series, vols. ix. x. 'A Word Study in the NT, μακάριος').

HARA (הָרָא, Vulg. Ara) occurs 1 Ch 5^{26} as one of the cities or regions to which the Israelitish captives from Samaria were deported by the Assyrians. Modern scholars have often tried the hazardous etymology from הַר 'mountain' (presupposing a bad orthography instead of הרה !). From this etymology and the corresponding words of Kings, they concluded that the Western part of Media was meant, called Media Magna by classic writers, 'Irāḳ al-ajamî 'the Persian I.,' by the Arabs, or al-Jibāl, i.e. 'the mountainous region,' Kohistan by the Persians. But the name is wanting in the LXX (only Lucian's recension, ed. de Lagarde, has Ἀρραν, which looks like an emendation to the name חרן Haran). The corresponding passages 2 K 17^{6} 18^{11} have the expression עָרֵי מָדָי 'the Median cities,' but LXX ὄρη Μήδων 'the Median mountains.' This latter reading (which seems to be the more original text) furnishes the key to the name Hara. It is evidently due to a misreading of that original text הרי מדי, and represented originally hārê 'mountains of.' This misunderstanding is usually attributed to the Chronicler; but after the LXX, it would be rather an awkward addition by a later reader who missed the expression added in Kings. Of earlier comparisons hardly any deserve to be mentioned. Bochart (Phaleg) thought of Aria in Persia (Herod. iii. 93, vii. 62, 66). The name begins with an h according to the Persian inscriptions, but the country is too remote. No Assyrian king ever possessed Aria (Herod. vii. 62 is mistaken, and contradicts himself, identifying Arians and Medians). W. MAX MÜLLER.

HARADAH (חֲרָדָה, Χαραδάθ).—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites, mentioned only Nu 33$^{24.25}$. It has not been identified.

HARAN (הָרָן, 'mountaineer' (?)).—1. Son of Terah, younger brother of Abram, and father of Lot, Gn 11^{26} (P), also father of Milcah and Iscah, v.^{29} (J). Dillmann rejects the view of Wellh. (Prol. 330) and Budde (Urgesch. 443) that הרן is a mere variation of חרן. 2. A Gershonite Levite, 1 Ch 23^{9}.

HARAN (חָרָן, Χαῤῥά, Χαῤῥάν; Haran) is situated in the N.W. of Mesopotamia on the Belias, a tributary of the Euphrates, S.E. of Edessa (Oorfa), in a country rendered very fertile by watercourses from the Belias, which rises, at a distance of several miles, from the hills S. of the Euphrates. The origin of Haran is lost in antiquity, but it must have been early inhabited by Semites, perhaps Babylonians, the name of the city being expressed in cuneiform by an ideograph (Ḫarranu, 'road'), which was probably given it on account of its being a crossing point of the Syrian, Assyrian, and Babylonian trade-routes. The merchants of this city are mentioned in Ezk 27^{23}.

Nothing remains of the ancient city but a long range of mounds on both sides of the river and the ruins of a castle or fortress of a very ancient date, built of large blocks of basaltic rock; it has square columns 8 ft. thick supporting an arched roof 30 ft. high. The town is now represented only by a village on the slope of the hill. The small houses or huts are built (perhaps for want of timber) in the peculiar fashion depicted on the Assyrian bas-reliefs, i.e. with domed roofs. According to tradition, the well where Rebekah was met by Abraham's messenger (Gn 24^{15}) is near the city.

Haran is first mentioned when Abram and his family dwelt there after leaving Ur of the Chaldees on his way to Canaan (Gn 11^{31}), and there the descendants of his brother settled, hence the name of 'the city of Nahor,' which it also bears (cf. Gn 24^{10} with 27^{43}). Haran is frequently mentioned in the cuneiform writings. Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1120) in his great cylinder-inscription says that he killed ten elephants in 'the land of Haran,' and four he captured alive and took to his capital Asshur. Sargon says that he 'spread out his shadow over the city Haran, and as a soldier of Anu and Dagon wrote its laws'; and Sennacherib speaks of Gozan, Haran, and Rezeph as having been destroyed by one or more of his predecessors (2 K 19^{12}). The name of the eponymy for the years B.C. 742 and 728, Bel-Ḫarrani-bêli-uṣur, 'Lord of Haran, protect (my) lord,' would seem to indicate that Haran was then a very important city.

The great tutelary deity of Haran was the moon-god, Sin in Assyrian, known among the Semitic nations as Baal-Kharran or Lord of Haran, though other deities must have been worshipped there. An inscribed seal in the British Museum represents a priest in adoration before an altar, a small figure in the distance, and above the altar a star with the words 'The God of Haran.' Assur-bani-apli speaks of the god Sin as dwelling in Haran. The tablet K. 2701*a*, which is a letter apparently sent to Assur-bani-apli, seems to refer to the crowning of his father Esarhaddon when on his way to Egypt. Reference is made therein to the 'bethel' or temple at Haran, where the ceremony took place, and on this occasion the god Sin is said to have appeared to those present: 'When the father of the king my lord went to Egypt, he was crowned (?) in the kanni of Ḫarran, the temple [*] of cedar. The god Sin stood over the standard (?), two crowns upon his head, [and] the god Nusku stood before him. The father of the king my lord entered—[the crown] was placed upon his head,' etc. Later on, Nabonidus relates that Sin was angry with Haran and with his temple E-ḫul-ḫul (the house of joy) within it, and therefore allowed the Umman-manda (wandering hordes of Medes) to come and destroy it. Nabonidus then received from the gods Merodach and Sin, in a dream, instructions to rebuild the temple at Haran, and, when he pointed out that the Medes still surrounded the city, he was told by those gods that they would be destroyed, which destruction took place three years later under Cyrus. The city being relieved of the presence of the enemy, Nabonidus was able to finish the work of Shalmaneser and Assur-bani-apli, and, at the same time, to embellish the city. In the 5th cent. A.D. the Sabæans of Haran seem to have worshipped the sun as 'Bel-shamin,' the lord of heaven, later on using the Greek name of Ἥλιος. Gula (under the name of 'Gadlat') and Tar'ata (Atargatis or Derceto) are given by St. James of Seruj as the favourite goddesses of Haran. There was also a chapel dedicated to Abraham. The Roman general Crassus was defeated near Haran, but subsequently the province of Edessa fell into the power of the Romans, and Haran appears as a Roman city in the wars of Caracalla and Julian. It is worthy of notice that Haran retained until a late date the Chaldæan language and the worship of Chaldæan deities.

HARARITE, THE (הַהֲרָרִי), according to Ges. (Thes. 392) = 'a mountain-dweller,' but more probably it should be taken as a gentilic adjective = 'a native of Harar.' No such place is mentioned in the OT, but we may infer from 2 S 23$^{11f.}$ that it was situated somewhere near the Philistine frontier, probably in the Shephelah. Two (not three) of David's heroes are distinguished by this title.

[*] Lit. bethel (bêt-ili).

1. Shammah the son of Agee, 'one of the thirty' (2 S 23^{33} ὁ Ἀρωδείτης). In the parallel 1 Ch 11^{34} Shammah is probably to be read for Shagee (see Driver, Sam. l.c.). Further, in 2 S 23^{11} (where we must read 'the Hararite' [הַהֲרָרִי for הָרָרִי]) it is probably Shammah and not Agee (wh. see) who is thus designated. The LXX to 2 S 23^{11} (ὁ Ἀρουχαῖος) points to a reading 'the Archite' (הָאַרְכִּי), which is partly supported by its rendering of 1 Ch 11^{34} (B ὁ Ἀραχει and ὁ Ἀραρει; A ὁ Ἀραρι). See AGEE, SHAMMAH.

2. Ahiam the son of Sharar (2 S 23^{33}; read הַהֲרָרִי for הָאֲרָרִי; B Σαραουρείτης, A Ἀραρείτης). In the parallel 1 Ch 11^{35} Sharar appears as Sacar (אֲחִיאָם בֶּן שָׂכָר הַהֲרָרִי; B ὁ Ἀραρει, A ὁ Ἀραρι). See AHIAM, SHARAR.

HARBONA (חַרְבוֹנָא Est 1^{10}) or HARBONAH (חַרְבוֹנָה 7^{9}). LXX has Θαρρά in 1^{10} (B), Βουγαθάν in 7^{9}.—The third of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains who waited upon king Ahasuerus. It was he who suggested that Haman should be hanged upon the gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai. The name seems to be Persian: harban=donkey-driver.

HARBOUR.—See HAVEN.

HARD.—The various meanings of 'hard,' whether as adj. or adv., may be given as follows: 1. Literally, not soft, only Job 41^{24}, Ezk 3^{9}, Wis 11^{4}, Sir 40^{15} 48^{17}. 2. Unfeeling, cruel: Ps 94^{4} 'How long shall they utter and speak hard things?' (RV 'They prate, they speak arrogantly'); Wis 19^{13} 'they used a more hard and hateful behaviour toward strangers' (RV 'grievous indeed was the hatred which they practised toward guests'). Cf. Wyclif, Works, iii. 115, 'The vi tyme we schul trowe, that aftyr xxxij yer he suffrid hard passioun, undir Pounce Pilate.' 3. Trying, exacting: Ex 1^{14} 'hard bondage' (RV 'hard service'); 2 S 3^{39} 'The sons of Zeruiah be too hard for me'; Ps 88^{7} 'Thy wrath lieth hard upon me'; Pr 13^{15} 'The way of transgressors is hard' (RV 'The way of the treacherous is rugged'); Mt 25^{24} 'Lord, I knew thee that thou art an hard man'; Jn 6^{60} 'This is an hard saying; who can hear it?'; Ac 9^{5} 'It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks'). 4. Obdurate: Jer 5^{3} 'They have made their faces harder than a rock'; Ezk 3^{9} 'As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead.' Cf. Shaks. Ant. and Cleop. III. xi. 111—

> 'But when we in our viciousness grow hard,
> (O misery on't) the wise gods seel our eyes.'

5. Strenuous: only Jon 1^{13} 'the men rowed hard.' 6. Difficult: as Gn 18^{14} 'Is anything too hard for the Lord?' (RVm 'wonderful'); 1 K 10^{1} 'She came to prove him with hard questions'; Mk 10^{24} 'How hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God!' Cf. Rhem. NT, Preface, 'Moreover, we presume not in hard places to mollify the speaches or phrases, but religiously keepe them word for word, and point for point.' 7. Close, as Jg 9^{52} 'And Abimelech . . . went hard unto the door of the tower to burn it with fire'; Ps 63^{8} 'My soul followeth hard after thee'; Ac 18^{7} 'Justus . . . whose house joined hard to the synagogue.' This meaning of the word is common in early writers: cf. Lk 2^{9} Tind. 'And loo, the angell of the lorde stode harde by them'; Job 17^{1} Cov. 'I am harde at deathes dore.' It is sometimes used of time, as in Rhem. NT, note to Jn 20^{21} 'Though he gave them his peace hard before, yet now entering to a new divine action, to prepare their hartes to grace and attention, he blesseth them againe.'

For Harden, Hardening, see next article.

Hardiness.—This subst. occurs only in Jth 16^{10} 'The Persians quaked at her boldness, and the Medes were daunted at her hardiness' (θράσος, RV 'boldness'). Cf. Sir T. Elyot, Governour, ii. 47, 'What avayled fortune incomparable to the great kynge Alexander, his wonderfull puissance and hardynes, or his singular doctrine in philosophy, taught hym by Aristotle, in deliverynge hym from the deth in his yonge and flourisshing age?' So Cov. uses 'hardy' for 'bold' in Dn 11^{16} 'no man shalbe so hardy as to stonde agaynst him'; and Barlowe, 'hardily' for 'boldly' (Dialoge, p. 68), 'Use they such crafty conveyaunce in promotyng theyr Gospell? Ye hardely, and that without any shame when they be detected of it.'

Hardly does not occur in AV in the mod. sense of 'scarcely.' Its meanings there are two: 1. Harshly, grievously, Gn 16^{6} 'And when Sarai dealt hardly with her, she fled from her face' (וַתְּעַנֶּהָ, AVm 'afflicted her'); and Is 8^{21} 'hardly bestead and hungry' (Amer. RV 'sore'; see BESTEAD). RV introduces 'hardly' in this sense into Job 19^{3}. 2. With difficulty, Ex 13^{15} 'And it came to pass, when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, that the LORD slew all the firstborn in the land of Egypt' (כִּי־הִקְשָׁה פַרְעֹה לְשַׁלְּחֵנוּ, RVm 'hardened himself against letting us go'); Mt 19^{23} 'Verily I say unto you, That a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven' (δυσκόλως; RV 'It is hard for a rich man to enter,' a change that is commended by Beckett [Should RV be Authorised? p. 100] as much better, though less literal than AV, since the latter suggests, according to our mod. idiom, that a rich man can scarcely enter the kingdom of heaven. The same Gr. adv. occurs in Mk 10^{23}, Lk 18^{24}, and is tr^{d} in the same way in AV, a tr^{n} which RV accepts in these places); Lk 9^{39} 'and bruising him hardly departeth from him' (μόγις, WH μόλις); Ac 27^{8} 'And, hardly passing it, came unto a place which is called The fair havens' (μόλις, RV 'with difficulty'). This meaning of 'hardly' may be seen in North's Plutarch, p. 889, 'Demetrius was so scared, that he had no furthe leysure, but to cast an ill-favoured cloke abou him, the first that came to hand, and disguising himselfe to flie for life, and scaped very hardly, that he was not shamefully taken of his enemies for his incontinencie'; and T. Adams, II Peter (on 1^{4}), 'He that hath done evil once, shall more hardly resist it at the next assault.'

Hardness.—2 Ti 2^{3} 'Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ' (σὺ οὖν κακοπάθησον, edd. συνκακοπάθησον, RV 'Suffer hardship with me,' RVm 'Take thy part in suffering hardship'). Hardness for mod. 'hardship' is found in Shaks., as Cymb. III. vi. 21—

> 'Plenty, and peace, breeds cowards; hardness ever
> Of hardiness is mother.'

Elsewhere 'hardness' is either lit. of the clods (Job 38^{38}), or fig. of the heart (Mt 19^{8}, Mk 3^{5} 10^{5} 16^{14}, Ro 2^{5}).

HARDENING.—The moral difficulty of this subject is the ascription in OT of the hardening of men's hearts to God. Pharaoh's is the typical case; and his story is so vivid in its dramatic unity and details that we cannot wonder that practically his case is regarded as if it were unique. But it is not so; it is only a striking example of a class. Pharaoh's history sets before us the picture of a conflict between the proud head of a great empire and the Almighty, a conflict in ten onsets, or a drama in ten acts, in the last of which the human tyrant comes to the ground. As his case is a typical one, it is important to note the salient features. First of all, the result is twice foretold. The Lord says, 'I will harden his heart' (Ex 4^{21} 7^{3}). In the case of the first five plagues and the seventh (river turned into blood, frogs, lice, flies, murrain, and hail) the phrase is 'Pharaoh hardened his heart' or 'his heart was hardened' (Ex $7^{14.22}$ $8^{15.19.32}$ $9^{7.34.35}$). In the sixth, eighth, and ninth (boils, locusts, darkness) the phrase is 'the Lord hardened his heart' (9^{12} $10^{20.27}$). Thus the result is not ascribed to God only; both the divine and the human agencies are recognized. Whatever God had to do with the result, Pharaoh's freedom of action was not interfered with. Again, it is significant that 'the Lord hardened his heart' follows 'Pharaoh hardened.' It is the phrase used, with one exception, in the second severer series of divine judgments. When the lighter ones failed, heavier ones were sent. And even in the second series the result in one case is ascribed solely to Pharaoh (hail, $9^{34.35}$). Is it not evident that the divine action described in 'the Lord hardened' was a punishment for the previous disobedience of the king? Is it not equally certain that each judgment, up to the last one, while a punishment, was also a merciful warning and call to repentance? At each stage Pharaoh might have yielded instead of refusing. It should be noted that the phrase 'the Lord hardened' is peculiar to the OT; in the NT it occurs only in quotations from the Old.

The two modes of speech, however, are not confined to Pharaoh's case, but are common in OT. We find 'the Lord hardened' in Jos 11^{20}, Dt 2^{30}, Is 63^{17}, etc., the other phrase in passages like 1 S 6^{6}, 2 Ch 36^{13}, Ps 95^{8}. The language in such passages as Jg 9^{23}, 2 S 24^{1} may seem even more startling. But if we look into the context we shall find that, as in Pharaoh's case, the divine action is a punishment of sin. This language, which before reflection seems to shock our moral sense, is partly to be explained by the OT habit of recognizing the divine action everywhere in nature and history. The thunder is God's voice; storm and tempest do His will; heathen monarchs and empires are His instruments. Men at that early stage of revelation did not discriminate as we do between the different causes at work in events. If they did reflect, they would no doubt see that the two forms of language applied to the same events under different aspects. Very little observation would show them, as it shows us, that divine appeals and commands never leave men as they find them. If not yielded to, they increase insensibility, benumb and gradually deaden moral feeling. This effect is contrary to the divine purpose, and is entirely man's fault; but it is natural and inevitable. The more powerful the appeals, the more rapid the hardening process, until God's Spirit withdraws, and leaves man to his own ways (Ro 1^{28}). Looked at from the human side, Pharaoh, like every smaller transgressor, is seen acting with perfect freedom, consciously pitting his own will against God's, despising louder and louder warnings of ruin, self-punished and self-destroyed. Looked at from the divine side, God is seen commanding, forewarning, repeating rejected opportunities, doing everything to ensure submission and safety but coerce,—and at last leaving to destruction. It is evident that we have here again the old problem of reconciling the divine foreknowledge and government with human freedom and responsibility. Each element is attested by its own evidence. Both are necessary to a complete explanation. The two regions meet at some point invisible to human eye and undefinable in human speech and thought. 'To the Hebrew mind what we call secondary causes scarcely exist, at least in the sphere of religion. That which, in given circumstances, is the inevitable result of God's providential dispensations is viewed absolutely, apart from its conditions, as a distinct divine purpose' (Skinner on Is 6^{10}). HARE (אַרְנֶבֶת 'arnebheth, δασύπους, lepus).—Four species of hare are found in Bible lands. They are all called by the Arabs 'arnabeh, which is the same as the Heb. 1. Lepus Syriacus, Hempr. et Ehr. It is a little smaller than the Eng. hare, and of a dark grey colour. It is common along the coast, and in the wooded and hilly districts of Pal. and Syria. 2. L. Sinaiticus, Hempr. et Ehr. This species is much smaller, with a longer and narrower head, and longer ears, and is of a lighter grey. It is found in the valleys about the Dead Sea, and southward to Sinai. 3. L. Ægyptius, Geoffr. This animal is not more than 18 in. long from the tip of the nose to the root of the tail. The ears are long, and fringed inside with white hairs. It is of a light sand colour above, and nearly white beneath. It is abundant in the Jordan Valley, and in S. Judæa and the N. part of et-Tih. 4. L. Isabellinus, Rüpp. The Nubian hare. This species is even smaller than the last, and is of a rich fawn colour. It is found only in the S.E. deserts of Palestine.

The hare is a rodent, and not a ruminant. The statement (Lv 11^{6}, Dt 14^{7}) that it 'cheweth the cud' is to be taken phenomenally, not scientifically. The Arab of the present day regards it as a ruminant, and for that reason eats its flesh. As Tristram well says, 'Moses speaks of animals according to appearances, and not with the precision of a comparative anatomist, and his object was to show why the hare should be interdicted, though to all appearance it chewed the cud, viz. because it did not divide the hoof. To have spoken otherwise would have been as unreasonable as to have spoken of the earth's motion, instead of sunset and sunrise.' G. E. POST.

HAREPH (חָרֵף).—A Judahite chief, 1 Ch 2^{51}. See GENEALOGY.

HARHAIAH (חַרְהֲיָה, Ἀραχίας, but ABא omit the clause, Neh 3^{8}).—Some Heb. texts read חַרְחֲיָה, or even חֲרָהֲיָה. Uzziah the son of H., a goldsmith, repaired a portion of the wall of Jerus. in the days of Nehemiah.

HARHAS (חַרְחַס, Ἀραάς B, Ἀρδάς B^{b}, Ἀράς A, Ἀδρά Luc.).—Ancestor of Shallum, the husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 K 22^{14}). Called Hasrah חַסְרָה 2 Ch 34^{22}.

HARHUR (חַרְחוּר 'fever'? or 'freeborn').—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2^{51}, Neh 7^{53}), called in 1 Es 5^{31} Asur. See GENEALOGY.

HARIM (חָרִים, חָרִם 'consecrated,' cf. Sabæan pr. name חרם).—1. A lay family which appears in the list of the returning exiles, Ezr 2^{32}=Neh 7^{35}; of those who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10^{31}; and of those who signed the covenant, Neh 10^{27} [Heb.^{28}].

2. A priestly family which appears in the same lists, Ezr 2^{39}=Neh 7^{42}, Ezr 10^{21}, Neh 10^{5} [Heb.^{6}]. The name is found also among 'the priests and Levites that went up with Zerubbabel,' Neh 12^{3}, where it is miswritten Rehum (רְחוּם); among the heads of priestly families in the days of Joiakim, Neh 12^{15}; and as the third of the 24 courses, 1 Ch 24^{8}. To which family Malchijah the son of Harim, one of the builders of the wall (Neh 3^{11}), belonged cannot be determined. See GENEALOGY. H. A. WHITE.

HARIPH (חָרִיף, חָרִף, cf. חֹרֶף, 'autumn'). A family which returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Neh 7^{24}), and signed the covenant, Neh 10^{19} [Heb.^{20}]. In Ezr 2^{18} the name appears as JORAH; so Lucian in Neh 7^{24} Ἰωρήε. Hareph (חָרֵף) is named as a Calebite in 1 Ch 2^{51}, and one of David's companions in 1 Ch 12^{5} is termed a Haruphite (חֲרוּפִי, Kethibh), or Hariphite (חֲרִיפִי Ḳerê). The latter reading, if correct, perhaps points to a connexion with Hariph. See GENEALOGY.

H. A. WHITE.

HARLOT (זוֹנָה, אִשָּׁה נָכְרִיָּה, קְדֵשָׁה, LXX and NT πόρνη) is the name used in our English versions to describe different classes of women who come under the ban of morality. It is sometimes applied generally to women, including married women, of profligate life (Pr), but specially it denotes those who systematically gave themselves up to such a course of life, either for gain, or as a form of religious service. The existence of a class roughly corresponding to that which the name suggests to us may be traced throughout the history of Israel, originating as it did out of universally working conditions, and after the Solomonic period developing to the full its shamelessness, its seductive arts, and its blighting influence (Is 23^{16}, Jer 3^{3} 5^{7}, Ezk 16^{25}, Pr 7^{10} 29^{3}). But in OT times the harlot represented more than a moral problem and a moral danger of the utmost gravity. It is not too much to say that she was the concrete embodiment of the most powerful and insidious force menacing the purity and permanence of Mosaism. Like their kindred who took possession of the valley of the Euphrates, like the Greeks who were invaded by Phœnician commerce and culture, the Hebrews in Canaan found themselves in contact with a type of religion which deified the reproductive forces of nature, and paid them homage in the form of licentious rites and orgies. The harlot was thus invested with sanctity as a member of the religious caste, and the question was whether a licentious cult was to establish itself in the soil of Jahwism even as it naturalized itself in Babylon (cf. Herod. i. 199), and in Cythera and Corinth (Strabo, viii. 6). And undoubtedly the Canaanitish leaven deeply infected the popular Hebrew religion. In the story of Tamar's intrigue to secure her rights from the house of her deceased husband (Gn 38), she is spoken of as a קְדֵשָׁה—one of the consecrated class—when she sits at the entrance of a village in the guise of a harlot. Especially does Hosea (4^{14}) give us a vivid picture of the extent to which the local sanctuaries, where the worship of Baal and Astarte had been syncretized with that of J″, were coloured by the legitimated prostitution of servants of the divinities. In some sanctuaries a still lower depth was reached, and emasculated enthusiasts (קְדֵשִׁים) earned for the shrine 'the wages of a dog' by giving themselves up to that 'which is against nature.' These practices the prophets of the 8th cent. denounced as the height of impiety and the sure provocation of national judgments (Am 2^{7}, Hos 4$^{13ff.}$). By Asa and Jehoshaphat steps were taken to purge the land of the viler abomination (1 K 15^{12} 22^{46}, cf. 14^{24}); and the Deuteronomic code explicitly banished both classes of 'paramours' from Israel, and prohibited the acceptance of their unholy gains as temple-revenue (Dt 23$^{17.18}$, where see Driver's note in loc. with reff.). With idolatry prostitution was made an end of by the Exile. The Levitical legislation recalls the abominations of the Canaanites as the special ground of their rejection and destruction (Lv 20^{23}), and appears to have the class of harlots solely in view as created and sustained by moral depravity. The more important of its enactments are that which forbids a priest to take a harlot to wife (Lv 21^{7}), and the injunction that the daughter of a priest playing the harlot shall be burnt with fire (v.^{9}).

Upon the OT treatment of the subject it may be remarked as startling that there is no express condemnation of sexual immorality which does not involve violation of the marriage-bond. At the most, fornication seems to be condemned in Pr as health- and wealth-destroying folly, while the general tenor of the OT morality is content to proscribe adultery and religious prostitution. In explanation of this, it may be observed that the true ethical attitude towards prostitution was impossible so long as marriage was in the transitional stage mirrored in OT, and that the OT at least unfolded a conception of the divine holiness and its relation to sexual purity which was destined to mature into the higher sexual morality.

In NT the harlot, again, is associated with an important element of teaching. While it was part of the mission of the prophets to refute the horrible idea of the sacredness of her calling, it was a characteristic part of the work of Jesus to rescue her from the Pharisaic tribunal, and bring her within the pale of mercy and redemption (Mt 21$^{31.32}$). She illustrates at once the compassion of Jesus, His insight into the unexpressed longings and possibilities of degraded human nature, and the regenerative power of sympathy. In the apostolic writings we see some repetition of the conflict between the genius of revealed religion and the lax and antagonistic sexual morality of heathenism. In the Epistles to the Corinthians especially, St. Paul was addressing a community whose licentiousness had become a byword even in the putrefying cities of the classical world; and it is necessary for him to enlighten the Christian conscience as to the incompatibility of union with Christ with its hideous contrast in filthy 'conversation' (1 Co 6$^{15.16}$). And in various apostolic passages the prohibition of the Decalogue is explicated or extended so as expressly to exclude the sin in question (Gal 6$^{19ff.}$).

From the prophetic period the harlot was not only involved in, but was the symbol of, idolatry. The experience of Hosea seems to have suggested her faithlessness and fickleness as a fit emblem of the dealings of Israel with her true Lord and with other gods (see IDOLATRY).

LITERATURE.—On Prostitution as a religious institution in the ancient world, see Lucian, 'De Dea Syria'; Pausanias, 'Descriptio Græciæ'; Movers, Die Phönizier. On the special subject Selden, 'De uxore Hebraica'; Hamburger's Lexicon; Benzinger, Hebräische Archæologie.

HAR-MAGEDON.—Rev 16^{16} 'And he (AV; who? the sixth angel or the Almighty? RV 'they,' the three unclean spirits of v.^{17}) gathered them (the kings of the whole world, not 'the spirits of the Demons,' as Hommel explains in the passage to be quoted below) together into the place, which is called in Hebrew Armageddon' (AV, 'Har-Magedon' RV). The reading, as well as the meaning and even the context, of this hapax-legomenon is very uncertain.

(1) The TR spells Ἀρμαγεδδών; Lachmann, Tregelles, Tischendorf, Alford, Ἁρμαγεδών; WH Ἁρ Μαγεδών (the second word spaced out and in quotation type, referring to Zec 12^{11} [Heb.]). Several Greek MSS have but Μαγεδών or Μαγεδδών (thus Q). The shorter reading is supported by Tyconius and, now, by the (older) Syriac translation discovered and edited by Gwynn (Dublin, 1897): ܡܓܕܘܢ. The later Syriac translation (commonly printed with the Peshiṭta) has ܐܪܡܓܕܘܢ (not quoted in the Thesaurus Syriacus, col. 390). The shorter form must have arisen at a time when the whole word was considered to be a compound.

(2) The oldest explanation put forward in the Church seems to be that of Hippolytus, unhappily preserved only in Arabic (P. Lagardii, ad Analecta sua Syriaca Appendix, Lipsiæ, 1858, p. 27 n. 18): 'the meaning of this expression is the smooth (soft, trodden) place الموضع الوطى.' Is this = πεδίον ἐκκοπτομένου, the Septuagint rendering of בִּקְעַת מְגִדּוֹן in Zec 12^{11}? (For the Arabic expression comp. وطية قدم = βῆμα ποδός, Ac 7^{5}). It is added that Hippolytus understood it of the valley of Jehoshaphat, Jl 4^{2} [Eng. 3^{11}]^{12} (Hippolytus ed. [Bonwetsch-] Achelis, I. ii. 236).

Origen-Eusebius excluded the Apocalypse from their Bible Dictionary, but in the Onomastica Vaticana Ἀρμαγεδδῶν is explained: εἰς τὰ ἔμπροσθεν ἐξέγερσις (Onomastica sacra, ed. de Lagarde, p. 187, l. 45), i.e. עַר מִקֶּדֶם, and Jerome, who saw in it Mt. Tabor, explained likewise (ib. 80, 11): 'Armageddon (cod. H -gedon): consurrectio tecti (? עַר כְּגָג) sive consurrectio in priora, sed melius mons a latrunculis (cod. H om. mons; הַר מִגְּדוּר) vel mons globosus' (ה׳ מְגַר; גַּר = coriandrum).

(3) For a long time the explanation הַר מְגִדּוֹ(ן) 'the mount (of) Megiddo,' was considered pretty certain; see Westcott-Hort, ii. p. 313, who compare Ἁρ Γαριζείν, Ἁρ Σαφάρ, to which may be added, from the Hexapla, Ἁρ Σιών, Ps 47 (48)^{3}. Older scholars had also compared Ἀρσαμόσατα of the Classics, while Westcott-Hort prefer to see in the latter name another example of Αρ = עַר (עִיר) 'town,' as in עַר מוֹאָב (Nu 21^{28}, Is 15^{1}; transliterated in the latter place Ἁρ Μωάβ by Theodotion). The latter explanation was put forward long ago by Hiller and adopted by Hitzig, Hilgenfeld, Völter, and others.

A third explanation started from the root חרם (comp. חָרְמָה Nu 21^{28}; חֶרְמוֹן); thus Luther in his marginal gloss 'verdammte Krieger, verfluchte Rüstung . . . ab Herem et gad.' Older explanations need not be quoted here; see Poole, Synopsis Criticorum, ed. Franc. (1712) vol. v. 1829. Makkedah (מַקֵּדָה, LXX Μακηδά), where 'the five kings' were slain (Jos $10^{16.\ 26}$), lies too far away to be thought of.

(4) Upon the whole, to find an allusion here to MEGIDDO (see article) is still the most probable explanation. Megiddo was famous for the defeat and death of Josiah (2 K 23^{29}, 2 Ch 35^{22}; alluded to Zec 12^{11}); but it is not on account of this unhappy event that the place seems to be mentioned, but because of the victory over 'the kings of Canaan' (Jg 5^{19}). It has been objected that Megiddo lies in the plain (ἐν τῷ πεδίῳ M., 2 Ch 35^{22}; ἐπὶ ὕδατι M., Jg 5^{19}; עַל מֵי מְגִדּוֹ), and that a mountain was not a fit battleplace (Bousset, ad loc.). But in the very context of Jg 5 'Mt. Tabor' and 'the high places of the field' are mentioned (Jg $4^{6.\ 8.\ 12}$ 5^{18}).

(5) Hommel ('Inschriftliche Glossen u. Exkurse zur Genesis u. zu den Propheten,' Neue Kirchliche Zeitschrift, 1890, vi. pp. 407, 408) seems to have been the first who saw in Har-Magedon the הַר מוֹעֵר of Is 14^{13} (the mount in the north where the gods meet), supposing that a redactor corrected an original μανέδ or μωέδ into μαγεδών. He might have recalled the fact that in certain cases ע is transliterated by γ. This view was carried out by Gunkel (Schöpfung und Chaos, 1894), who finds here the remnant of an ancient tradition about the battle of the gods on a mountain, and reminds us of the gathering of the fallen angels on Mt. Hermon, Enoch 6^{6}. (To the literature quoted by Bousset add: The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, edited by R. H. Charles, Oxf. 1896, ch. xviii. p. 22). Siegfried (Theol. Lit.-zeitung, 1895, col. 304) also thinks that in Harmagedon the הַר מוֹעֵר of Is 14^{13} and Μεγιδδώ seem to have coalesced. Ewald (Die Johanneischen Schriften, ii. 1862, 294) found by calculation that ארמגרון and רומה הגרולה 'the great Rome,' have the same numerical value—304. The question whether there is in the passage an allusion to Nero and the Parthians must be left to the commentators on the Apocalypse. The solution of the riddle is to be sought for in the apocalyptic literature of the Jews.

HARNEPHER (חַרְנֶפֶר).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{36}. See GENEALOGY.

HARNESS.—In AV harness always means armour, and to harness means to put on armour, RV gives 'armour' in 1 K 20^{11}, 2 Ch 9^{24}, and 'armed' in Ex 13^{18}; while Amer. RV prefers 'armour' also in 1 K 22^{34}, 2 Ch 18^{33}; both have left Jer 46^{4} untouched: 'Harness the horses.' The meaning is not (as Cheyne and most edd.) yoke the horses to the chariots, but put on their accoutrements. These being chiefly of armour, 'harness' was once a good trⁿ, but now it is misleading. Cf. 1 Mac 6^{43} 'One of the beasts, armed with royal harness, was higher than all the rest' (RV 'breastplates'). In Apocr. 'harness' occurs also, 1 Mac 3^{3} (RV retains), 6^{41} (RV 'arms'), 2 Mac 3^{25} 5^{3} 15^{28} (RV all 'armour'); and the verb in 1 Mac 4^{7} (RV 'fortified'), 6^{38} (RV 'protected'). Examples of the word are, Nu 32^{20} Tind. 'And Moses sayed unto them, Yf ye will do this thinge, that ye will go all harnessed before the Lorde to warre, and will go all of you in harnesse over Iordane before the Lorde . . . then ye shall returne and be without sinne agenst the Lorde and agenst Israel'; Is 22^{6} Cov. 'I sawe the Elamites take the quyvers to carte and to horse, and that the walles were bare from harnesse'; Knox on Ps 6 (Works, iii. 141) represents David as saying, 'Didest not thow anis inflame my heart with the zeale of thy halie name, that when all Israell wer so effrayit that none durst encounter with that monster Goliath, yit thy Majesties spreit maid me so bold and valiaunt, that without harnes or weaponis (except my sling, staf, and stonis) I durst interpryes singular battell aganis him?' And Tindale on 1 Jn 5^{18} says, 'And as men of war they ever keep watch and prepare themselves unto war, and put on the armour of God, the which is God's word, the shield of faith, the helmet of hope, and harness themselves with the meditation of those things which Christ suffered for us.'

HARNESS.—(1) For shiryan (שִׁרְיָן 1 K 22^{34} ‖ 2 Ch 18^{33}), 'shirt of mail.' RV (Amer.) 'armour.' See BREASTPLATE. (2) For neshek (נֶשֶׁק 2 Ch 9^{24}), 'arms' (defensive or offensive), RV 'armour.' (3) For πανοπλία (2 Mac 15^{28}), 'the complete offensive and defensive equipment of a soldier'; RV 'full armour.'

Harnessed for ḥămushim (חֲמֻשִׁים Ex 13^{18}), RV 'armed.' See ARMS, ARMOUR.

HAROD (חֲרֹד).—A spring (עַיִן, not 'well' AV) beside which Gideon and his army encamped prior to their attack upon the Midianites (Jg 7^{1}). It was here that the famous test by the mode of drinking took place. In v.^{3} there is probably a characteristic play upon the word חָרֵד, 'whosoever is fearful and trembling' (חָרֵד). The site of Harod is not quite certain, although it is extremely probable that it should be identified with 'Ain Jalûd [Gilead (?); see GILEAD (MOUNT)], about $1\frac{3}{4}$ miles E.S.E. of Zerin (Jezreel). Robinson describes this as a spring of excellent water, spreading out into a fine limpid pool of 40 to 50 ft. in diameter, which abounds in fish. A stream sufficient to turn a mill issues from it. 'Ain Jalûd was probably also the spring beside which Saul encamped before the battle of Gilboa (1 S 29^{1}). It 'flows out from under a sort of cavern in the wall of conglomerate rock, which here forms the base of Mt. Gilboa' (Robinson). 'Ain Jalûd is mentioned in the days of the Crusades as Tubania (Will. Tyr. xxii. 26). Bohaeddin (Vit. Salad. p. 53) gives the name as 'Ain el-Jalût ('spring of Goliath'). This is no doubt a reminiscence of a Jewish legend (Asher, Benj. of Tudela, ii. 429 f.) that it was here that David slew Goliath.

LITERATURE.—Robinson, BRP^{2} ii. 323 f.; Buhl, GAP 106; G. A. Smith, HGHL 397 f.; Guérin, Samarie, i. 308 f.

HARODITE (הַחֲרֹדִי).—A designation applied in 2 S 23^{25} to two of David's heroes, Shammah and Elika. The second is wanting in LXX and in the parallel list in 1 Ch 11^{27}. In the latter passage, by a common scribal error (ר for ד and ה for ח) the Harodite (הַחֲרוֹדִי) has been transformed into the Harorite (הַהֲרוֹרִי). So Oxf. Heb. Lex., Siegfried-Stade, Driver, Kittel; cf. GENEALOGY, vol. ii. p. 132. 'The Harodite' was probably a native of 'Ain-ḥarod, Jg 7^1. See preceding article.

HAROEH (הָרֹאֶה 'the seer').—A Judahite, 1 Ch 2^{52}. Perhaps the name should be corrected to Reaiah (רְאָיָה). Cf. 1 Ch 4^2, and see GENEALOGY.

HARORITE.—See HARODITE.

HAROSHETH of the Gentiles (חֲרֹשֶׁת הַגּוֹיִם) was the dwelling place of Sisera (Jg 4^2), from which he advanced against Barak (v.^{13}) and to which he fled after his defeat (v.^{16}). The descriptive epithet 'of the Gentiles' is obscure; it may have been given to distinguish this place from a neighbouring Israelite Harosheth. H. is generally identified (by Moore rather doubtfully) with el-Ḥarathîyeh, on the right bank of the lower Kishon, at a point which commands the entrance to the Great Plain from the Plain of Acre and the commercial roads that led through it. Buhl objects that Harosheth cannot have been near the Kishon, and that a long distance must have separated it from the battlefield (cf. Jg $4^{13.16}$). This objection would have much more force if we could be sure that the story is a unity, but, upon the theory of a Jabin and a Sisera narrative having been combined, the situation of el-Ḥarathîyeh suits the Harosheth, which is uniformly connected with Sisera as Hazor is with Jabin. See further, JABIN, JAEL, SISERA.

LITERATURE.—Thomson (the first to identify with el-Harathîyeh), Land and Book^{2}, ii. 215 ff.; G. A. Smith, HGHL 393 f.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.^{2} 241; Buhl, GAP 214; SWP vol. i. sh. v.; Conder, Tent-Work, i. 132; Moore, Judges, 107 f., 119, 122.

HARP.—See MUSIC.

HARROW.—1. In modern agriculture the harrow is used both for breaking stiff soil and preparing it for the seed, and for covering in the seed when sown. For the latter purpose the harrow was certainly not used either in Bible times or later by the Jews, who ploughed in the seed (the technical word for which was חִפָּה, see Vogelstein, Die Landwirthschaft in Palästina zur Zeit der Mishnah, 1 Theil, 'Der Getreidebau,' 1894, p. 36) as their successors the Syrian fellahin do to this day (PEFSt, 1891, p. 116, ZDPV xii. p. 29).* As to the use of the harrow in preparing the ground for seed, the case is not so clear. On the one hand, we find in three passages of the OT unmistakable reference to some method, in addition to ordinary ploughing, for breaking up the soil preparatory to sowing. 'Doth the ploughman plough continually?' it is asked, 'doth he continually open and break the clods of his ground?' (Is 28^{24} RV). The last of these operations (Heb. יְשַׂדֵּד) is usually understood as, and often rendered by, harrowing (e.g. by Cheyne, Delitzsch, etc.). The same word is found in two other passages (Hos 10^{11}, Job 39^{10}), where it certainly denotes some agricultural operation by means of an implement to which an ox or other animal might be harnessed, as in the question, 'Canst thou bind the wild ox with his band in the furrow, or will he harrow (יְשַׂדֵּד) the valleys after thee?' (Job 39^{10} RV—the only passage where the verb is so rendered in our EV). On the strength of these passages it has been the custom to regard harrowing as the operation intended, and the harrow as in ordinary use among the Hebrews for the purpose stated. (See AGRICULTURE, vol. i. p. 49^a).

On the other hand, we must reckon with the following facts:—(a) the harrow is an implement unknown to the ancient Egyptians (Wilkinson, Manners and Customs, etc., ed. Birch, ii. 395) and the early Greeks (Büchsenschütz, Besitz. und Erwerb, etc. 304); (b) the harrow itself is not named either in the OT—see 2 below—or in the Mishna, which is so rich in the technical vocabulary of agriculture (see esp. Vogelstein's exhaustive study above cited, p. 42, n. 33); (c) it is not in ordinary use among the Syrian peasantry to-day (ZDPV xii. 31, and cf. list of modern agricultural implements by Post, PEFSt, 1891, p. 110). In the face of these facts, the use of the harrow by the Hebrews must at least be left an open question. It is not improbable that שִׂדֵּד may be a technical term for one of the various ploughings which were customary, in later times at least, before the soil was ready to receive the seed (cf. Vogelstein, op. cit. p. 36, n. 68), and may possibly correspond to our cross-ploughing. The Greek translators of Job, it may be noted, understood it of ploughing (ἑλκύσει σου αὔλακας ἐν πεδίῳ, 39^{10}), and we know that the Roman authorities much preferred ploughing to harrowing as a means of breaking up the stiff surface (Pliny, Nat. Hist. XVIII. ch. xlix.; Columella, II. iv. 2).

2. Throughout this discussion we have avoided any reference to the two passages in our EV where harrows are expressly mentioned. The captive population of Rabbah 'of the children of Ammon,' David, we read, 'put under saws, and under harrows of iron (חֲרִיצֵי הַבַּרְזֶל), and under axes of iron,' etc. (2 S 12^{31}, and with slight variations 1 Ch 20^3). By 'harrows of iron' it has been usual to understand—following the LXX ἐν τοῖς τριβόλοις τοῖς σιδηροῖς—the threshing-board or drag (חָרוּץ Am 1^3, Job 41^{22} [Eng.^{30}]) of the husbandman, with its under side set with nails and sharp flints (see AGRICULTURE, vol. i. p. 50^b). It is extremely doubtful, however, if this cruelty can be laid to David's charge. Almost all modern scholars are in favour of a rendering resembling that suggested in the margin of our RV. In this case the word rendered 'harrows,' which etymologically denotes a sharp instrument, may be the 'pick,' and the whole would read: 'he put them (to forced labour) with saws, and with picks, and axes of iron, and made them labour (reading הֶעֱבִיר for הֶעֱבִיד) at the brick-mould.' (See Driver, Text of Sam. 226 ff.; Condamin, Rev. Bibl., April 1898, p. 253 ff.).

HARSHA (חַרְשָׁא).—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2^{52}, Neh 7^{54}), called in 1 Es 5^{32} Charea. See GENEALOGY.

HARSITH (הַחַרְסִית Ḳerê, הַחַרְסוּת Kethîbh).—The name of a gate in Jerusalem (Jer 19^2 RV). RVm has 'the gate of potsherds,' i.e. where they were thrown out (Oxf. Heb. Lex.). AV deriving the word from חֶרֶס 'sun,' has 'the east gate,' AVm 'the sun gate.' LXX has B Θαρσεῖς, ℵ$^{c.a}$ Χαρσίθ, AQ Χαρσείθ. This gate led into the Valley of Hinnom. See JERUSALEM.

HART (אַיָּל 'ayyâl, ἔλαφος, cervus).—The Arab. 'îyyal undoubtedly refers to the same animal. It is probably Cervus Dama, L., the true fallow deer, but not that of AV Dt 14^{5}, 1 K 4^{23}, which is a mistr^{n} of yaḥmûr, and should read roebuck. The fallow deer is found in Amanus, and is said by Tristram to exist also in the wooded region N.W. of Tabor, and by the Litany River. The present writer has not, however, been able to verify this statement. Hasselquist met with it on Mt. Tabor. It may have become extinct there only in recent times. It seems clear from the fact that it appeared daily upon Solomon's table (1 K 4^{23}), and from the freq. allusions to it in OT, that it was once abundant in Pal. and Syria. It is expressly mentioned as allowed for food (Dt 12$^{15.22}$ 15^{22} 14^{5}). Its power of leaping is noted (Is 35^{6}), esp. that of its fawn (Ca 2$^{9.17}$ 8^{14}). Its weakness when hungry is spoken of (La 1^{6}), as also its longing for water (Ps 42^{1}). The former passage certainly, and the latter prob., alludes to the chase.

* Roman writers regard harrowing after sowing as bad husbandry (see 'Agriculture' in Smith's Dict. of Antiquities).

The Hind (אַיָּלָה 'ayyâlâh) is also freq. mentioned. Naphtali is compared to a 'hind let loose' (Gn 49^{21}, where, however, the text appears to be corrupt, see Ball's note in Haupt's OT). Her calving is alluded to (Job 39^{1}, Ps 29^{9}), and she is spoken of as deserting her young for lack of pasture (Jer 14^{5}). She is sure-footed (2 S 22^{34}, Ps 18^{33}, Hab 3^{19}). The tune Hind of the Morning (marg. title Ps 22 for Aijeleth hash-Shahar) may illustrate the early habits of the deer tribe in search of water and food. The writer has often seen gazelles, at break of day, feeding in the desert. G. E. POST.

HARUM (הָרֻם, but the vocalization is doubtful). —A Judahite, 1 Ch 4^{8}. See GENEALOGY.

HARUMAPH (חֲרוּמַף, Ἐρωμάφ, Ἐρωμάθ B, Neh 3^{10}). —Jedaiah, the son of H., assisted in repairing the walls of Jerus. under Nehemiah.

HARUPHITE.—1 Ch 12^{5}. See HARIPH.

HARUZ (חָרוּץ, perhaps 'keen' or 'diligent'; Ἀρούς BA Luc.)—Father of Meshullemeth, mother of Amon king of Judah (2 K 21^{19}).

HARVEST.—See AGRICULTURE and VINTAGE.

HASADIAH (חֲסַדְיָה 'J" is kind').—A son of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3^{20}. The Gr. form Asadias occurs in Bar 1^{1}. See GENEALOGY.

HASHABIAH (חֲשַׁבְיָה).—1. 2. Two Levites of the sons of Merari, 1 Ch 6^{45} 9^{14}, Neh 11^{15}. 3. One of the sons of Jeduthun, 1 Ch 25^{3}. 4. A Hebronite, 1 Ch 26^{30}. 5. The 'ruler' of the Levites, 1 Ch 27^{17}. 6. A chief of the Levites in the time of Josiah, 2 Ch 35^{9}, called in 1 Es 1^{9} Sabias. 7. One of the Levites who were induced to return under Ezra, Ezr 8^{19}, called in 1 Es 8^{48} Asebias. 8. One of the twelve priests entrusted with the holy vessels, Ezr 8^{24}, called in 1 Es 8^{54} Assamias. 9. The 'ruler of half the district of Keilah,' who helped to repair the wall, Neh 3^{17}, and sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{11} 12$^{24.26}$. 10. A Levite, Neh 11^{22}. 11. A priest, Neh 12^{21}. In all probability these eleven are not all distinct, but we have not sufficient data to enable us to effect the necessary reduction of the list. See GENEALOGY.

HASHABNAH (חֲשַׁבְנָה for חֲשַׁבְיָה?).—One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh 10^{25} [Heb.^{26}]).

HASHABNEIAH (חֲשַׁבְנְיָה for חֲשַׁבְיָה?).—1. Father of a builder of the wall (Neh 3^{10}). 2. A Levite, Neh 9^{5}=Hashabiah of Ezr 8$^{19.24}$, Neh 10^{11} 11^{22} 12^{24}. See GENEALOGY.

HASHBADDANAH (חַשְׁבַּדָּנָה). — One of the men, probably Levites, who stood on the left hand of Ezra at the reading of the law (Neh 8^{4}). In 1 Es 9^{44} Nabarias.

HASHEM.—See GIZONITE, JASHEN.

HASHMANNIM.—See PSALMS.

HASHMONAH (חַשְׁמֹנָה).—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites, mentioned only Nu 33$^{29.30}$. The LXX reading (Σελμωνά, Ἀσελμωνά, AF) appears to confuse this station with the Zalmonah of v.^{41}.

HASHUBAH (חֲשֻׁבָה 'consideration').—A son of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3^{20}. See GENEALOGY.

HASHUM (חָשֻׁם).—1. The eponym of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 2^{19} 10^{33}, Neh 7^{22} 10^{18}), called in 1 Es 9^{33} Asom. 2. One of those who stood on Ezra's left hand at the reading of the law (Neh 8^{4}). In 1 Es 9^{44} Lothasubus. See GENEALOGY.

HASIDÆANS (חֲסִידִים from חָסִיד 'pious,' in the sense of active love to God [Cheyne, Ps. 378], or because piety is supposed to be implied by kindness [Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.]; greeized into Ἀσιδαῖοι) occurs in three passages in the Apocr. 1 Mac 2^{42} (A) speaks of a company Ἀσιδαίων (some important MSS read Ἰουδαίων), and describes them as devoted to the law. 1 Mac 7$^{12.13}$ associates them with 'a company of scribes,' who were satisfied that Alcimus should be high priest because of his Aaronic descent. 2 Mac 14^{6} confounds them with the Hasmonæans (which see), whom, however, they did not always support (see 1 Mac 7$^{10-14}$). But, though not mentioned elsewhere by name, their beliefs and practice are shown in such passages as 1 Mac 1^{63} 2^{34}, 2 Mac 6$^{18\text{ff.}}$ 7$^{10-12}$, Jth 12^{2}; Jos. Ant. XIV. iv. 3. They were not a political but a religious party, composing the inner circle of the strictest legalists, and indisposed to interfere in civil government except in defence of Mosaism. They were not the progenitors of the Essenes, from whom they differed on the crucial question of sacrifice, but of the Pharisees, with whose rise their name as that of a party disappears (Wellhausen, Phar. und Sadd. 76 ff.; less correctly, Hamburger, RE ii. 132–137, 1038–1059). The name occurs in OT frequently, but it is not yet proved that it is used in a technical sense, even in Ps 116^{15} 149$^{5.9}$. In later Jewish literature the word denotes a rigid observer of the law (Berachoth v. 1; Chagigah ii. 7; Sotah iii. 4; Aboth ii. 10; Niddah 17*a*); but it was not until more recent times that its use strictly as the name of a special sect, rather than as descriptive of the habits of the extreme members of a larger party, was revived. R. W. MOSS.

HASMONÆAN, the family name of the Maccabees. It occurs in Jos. [who claimed (Ant. XVI. vii. 1) alliance with the family], under the forms of Ἀσαμωναῖοι and Ἀσσαμωναῖοι, and is derived from the name of an ancestor Ἀσαμωναῖος, who is represented as the great-grandfather of Mattathias (ib. XII. vi. 1). In the Talm. the family appears as בְּנֵי חַשְׁמוֹנָאִי (Middoth, i. 6), and as בֵּית ח׳ (Sabb. 21^{b}; also Targ. Jonathan to 1 S 2^{4}). The original ancestor חַשְׁמָן is not otherwise known; but his name is connected with חַשְׁמֹן 'fruitfulness' by Füerst, with חָשַׁם in the sense of 'to temper steel' by Herzfeld, and with חַשְׁמַנִּים 'opulent' (Ps 68^{32} [Eng. ^{31}]) by Ewald and others. The last suggestion is most probable, but is not unlikely to give way before Wellhausen's conjecture (Pharisäer etc. 94) that τοῦ Συμεών of 1 Mac 2^{1} is a misrendering of בֶּן חַשְׁמָן. That would explain the apparent absence of allusion to Ḥashmon in 1 Mac, and make him the grandfather of Mattathias. The exploits of Judas caused the family to be afterwards generally known as the Maccabees; but this designation does not once occur in old Heb. literature. Hasmonæan or Hasmunæan is found in its stead, and can hardly have been entirely excluded from the Heb. or Aram. original of 1 Mac. R. W. Moss.

HASRAH.—See Harhas.

HASSENAAH (הַסְּנָאָה).—The sons of H. built the fish-gate (Neh 3^{3}). Their name, which is prob. the same as Hassenuah (wh. see), seems to be derived from some place Senaah (cf. Ezr 2^{35}, Neh 7^{38}, and Berth.-Ryssel, ad loc.).

HASSENUAH (הַסְּנֻאָה).—A family name found in two different connexions in the two lists of Benjamite inhabitants of Jerus., 1 Ch 9^{7}, Neh 11^{9}.

HASSHUB (חַשּׁוּב 'considerate').—1. 2. Two builders of the wall, Neh 3$^{11. 23}$. 3. One of those who signed the covenant, Neh 10^{23} [Heb.^{24}]. 4. A Levite of the sons of Merari, 1 Ch 9^{14}, Neh 11^{15}.

HASTE.—The verb 'to haste' is used transitively in Ex 5^{13} 'And the taskmasters hasted them, saying, Fulfil your works' (RV 'were urgent'); Is 16^{5} 'And in mercy shall the throne be established; and he shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David, judging, and seeking judgment, and hasting righteousness' (RV 'swift to do righteousness'); 1 Es 1^{27} 'the Lord is with me hasting me forward'; and 2 Mac 9^{7} 'commanding to haste the journey.' So in Wyc., as Pr 13^{12} 'Substaunce hastid shal be lassid [=lessened]'; and in Shaks., as I Henry IV. III. i. 143, 'I'll haste the writer'; and Romeo, IV. i. 11—

> 'Now, sir, her father counts it dangerous,
> That she doth give her sorrow so much sway,
> And in his wisdom hastes our marriage,
> To stop the inundation of her tears.'

The intrans. sense is more common, as 1 S 20^{38} 'And Jonathan cried after the lad, Make speed, haste, stay not.' Cf. Is 26^{9} Cov. 'My soule lusteth after the all the night longe, and my mynde haisteth frely to the.' And the reflexive use is not infrequent, as Gn 19^{22} 'Haste thee, escape thither.'

J. Hastings.

HASUPHA (חֲשׂוּפָא Ezr 2^{43}, חֲשֻׂפָא Neh 7^{46}, where AV inaccurately gives Hashupha).—The head of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerub., called in 1 Es 5^{29} Asipha. See Genealogy.

HAT.—Hats are mentioned once in AV, but it is quite certain that this is a mistranslation. When Shadrach, Meshech, and Abed-nego were about to be cast into the fiery furnace, they were 'bound in their coats, their hosen, and their hats' (RV 'their hosen, their tunics, and their mantles'). The Aram. is כַּרְבְּלָתְהוֹן, from which comes the denom. vb. כִּרְבֵּל (Pual ptcp. מְכֻרְבָּל), which coupled with מְעִיל is used of David in 1 Ch 15^{27} as 'clothed with a robe of fine linen.' The RV 'mantle' in Dn 3^{21} is probably as nearly accurate a tr^{n} of כַּרְבְּלָא as one could suggest, although Marti favours the meaning 'cap' = Assyr. karballattu, a word which, however, Zehnpfund (Beiträge z. Assyriologie, ii. 535) contends itself means 'Kriegs[?]-mantel,' 'war-cloak.' See Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. [כרבל]. J. A. Selbie.

HATHACH (הֲתָךְ, Ἀχραθαῖος, Est 4$^{5. 6. 9. 10}$, AV Hatach).—A eunuch appointed by the king to attend on queen Esther. By his means Esther learnt from Mordecai the details of Haman's plot against the Jews.

HATHATH (חֲתַת 'terror').—A son of Othniel, 1 Ch 4^{13}. See Genealogy.

HATIPHA (חֲטִיפָא).—Eponym of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2^{54}, Neh 7^{56}), called in 1 Es 5^{32} Atipha. See Genealogy.

HATITA (חֲטִיטָא, cf. Aram. חֲטַט 'to dig').—Eponym of a guild of porters (Ezr 2^{42}, Neh 7^{45}), called in 1 Es 5^{28} Ateta.

HATRED.—The actual word 'hatred' is seldom found in the Bible. In the OT it represents three different words, two of which (אֵיבָה and מַשְׂטֵמָה occurring four times) mean more precisely 'enmity' (as of one nation towards another), and are so rendered by RV (Ezk 25^{15} 35^{5}, Hos 9$^{7. 8}$), while the other (שִׂנְאָה which occurs thirteen times) denotes the opposite of love (with which it is explicitly contrasted, Ps 109^{5}, Pr 10^{12} 15^{7}, cf. Ps 97^{10}). In all the cases in which they occur, the words have a personal significance, and express human feelings—the absence of sympathy and love and kindly sentiments, or the state of active ill-will, on the part of men towards men. In NT the word is found once only (ἔχθραι, lit. 'enmities,' so RV) in one of the lists of vices given by St. Paul (Gal 5^{20}).

The verbs, however, which have the meaning 'hate' are frequent both in OT and NT in various connexions. In OT שָׂטַן 'oppose,' corresponding to 'enmity,' occurs five times (in three of wh. instances RV renders 'persecute,' Gn 49^{23}, Job 16^{9}, Ps 55^{3}), always of personal animosity against a person. Far more frequent is שָׂנֵא, of which the Eng. 'hate' is the closest equivalent. It may be said to be used both in a good sense and in a bad sense, when the feeling denoted is praiseworthy and when it is not. It occurs about 125 times, and in three cases out of four it is used in a bad sense. In about half the full number of instances the objects of hatred are persons, men or women; twelve times it is God himself who is 'hated' (e.g. Ex 20^{5} ‖ Dt 5^{9}); only some ten times when the word is used in a bad sense is the object not a person but a principle (e.g. Job 34^{17}, Ps 50^{17}, Pr 1$^{22. 29}$). Of the comparatively few cases in which the word is used in a good sense the allusion is in half the number to the divine hatred of evil and sin, God being represented as personally hating evil persons or things, either directly or through his chosen spokesman (Dt 12^{31} 16^{22}, Ps 5^{5} 11^{5}, Pr 6^{16}, Is 1^{14} 61^{8}, Jer 12^{8} 44^{4}, Am 5^{21} 6^{8}, Hos 9^{15}, Zec 8^{17}, Mal 1^{3} 2^{16}). In the remaining cases it is used of men's dislike of and aversion from things (e.g. Ex 18^{21}, Ps 45^{7} 119^{104}) or persons (Ps 26^{5} 31^{6}) which have an evil character. In a few passages in the later books of the OT there is a special usage similar to that which is found in some cases in the NT (e.g. Lk 14^{26}, Mt 6^{24}) to express as forcibly as possible aversion from or disregard of the interests or claims of one thing relatively to those of another (Pr 13^{24} 29^{24}, Ec 2$^{17. 18}$).

In NT the reference (the Gr. is μισέω) is in a large majority of instances (two-thirds of the whole) to malicious and unjustifiable feelings on the part of the wicked towards persons who have not deserved evil. In half the remaining instances the word is used of a right feeling of aversion from that which is evil (Ro 7^{15}, He 1^{9}, Jude ^{23}, Rev 2$^{6. 15}$, 17^{16}); in the others the expression is somewhat hyperbolical, the context denoting relative preference of one thing over another (Mt 6^{24} ‖ Lk 16^{13}, Lk 14^{26}, Jn 3^{20} 12^{25}, Eph 5^{29}).

These passages taken together reveal a clear difference in ethical standpoint between OT and NT, such indeed as is suggested by the saying of Jesus, 'Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies . . .' (Mt 5$^{43f.}$). The 'imprecatory' psalms show plainly that there was under the old covenant no sense of incongruity in appealing to God for aid in carrying out the fiercest hatred, in executing vengeance on an enemy. There are cases, no doubt, where the psalmist rises above mere personal animosity, and has in view the enemies of Israel and therefore of Israel's God; but the standard is not always at the height it reaches in the cry, 'Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee?' (Ps 139^{21}), and 'There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked' (Is 57^{21}). See PSALMS.

The teaching of Christ leaves hatred of evil alone admissible. St. John's strong assertion, 'Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer' (1 Jn 3^{15}), is a true comment on the spirit of Christian ethics. The dominant principle of brotherly love, the brotherhood of mankind, is to control all the relations of life. Every thought of self, every personal consideration, all sense of personal injury, must be eliminated. 'Love your enemies . . . and pray for them which despitefully use you,' excludes the possibility of personal hatred; sin must never be resented as a personal wrong, with a personal feeling against the offender. To bear malice, to wish for evil towards a fellow-creature, to close our sympathies against him,—this in the teaching of Christ (and the interpretation of St. John) is to be guilty of spiritual murder. The real sin is the inward disposition, the wish, the purpose of evil; the act is only the outward show of it (cf. Mt $15^{11.\,17\text{-}20}$ 10^{28}). On the other hand, hatred of sin and evil in all its forms—evil, because it is evil and opposed to the purpose of God—is a necessary corollary of all the great principles of the Gospel of Love.

HATTIL (חַטִּיל, cf. Arab. ḥatila 'to be quivering').—Eponym of a family of 'the children of Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2^{57}, Neh 7^{59}), called in 1 Es 5^{34} Agia. See GENEALOGY.

HATTUSH (חַטּוּשׁ).—1. A priestly family, which appears among those 'that went up with Zerubbabel,' Neh 12^{2}; and at the signing of the covenant, Neh 10^{4} [Heb.^{5}]. 2. A descendant of David, who returned with Ezra from Babylon, Ezr 8^{2} (read with 1 Es 8^{29} 'of the sons of David, Hattush the son of Shecaniah'); see also 1 Ch 3^{22} (but if we accept the LXX reading here, a younger Hattush must be meant). 3. A builder at the wall of Jerus., Neh 3^{10}. See GENEALOGY. H. A. WHITE.

HAUNT.—To haunt is in older English simply to frequent, to make one's stay, be familiar with, and conveys no reproach. Thus Jn 3^{22} Tind. 'After these thinges cam Jesus and his disciples into the Jewes londe, and ther he haunted with them and baptised' (διέτριβε, AV 'tarried'); 11^{54} Tind. 'Jesus therfore . . . went his waye . . . into a cite called Ephraim, and there haunted with his disciples' (διέτριβε, AV 'continued'); Rutherford, Letters (No. 1), 'I trust you will acquaint her with good company, and be diligent to know with whom she loveth to haunt.' So in AV, 1 S 30^{31} 'to all the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt' (אֲשֶׁר־הִתְהַלֶּךְ־שָׁם); Ezk 26^{17} 'the renowned city, which wast strong in the sea, she and her inhabitants, which cause their terror to be on all that haunt it!' (לְכָל־יוֹשְׁבֶיהָ, RVm 'on all that inhabited her'); and the subst. in 1 S 23^{22} 'Go, I pray you, prepare yet, and know and see his place where his haunt is' (רַגְלוֹ, lit. 'his foot' as AVm and RVm). J. HASTINGS.

HAURAN (Αὐράνος, 2 Mac 4^{40}), described as a man 'far gone in years and no less also in madness.' At the head of a large body of armed men he endeavoured to suppress a tumult in Jerusalem provoked by the continued sacrileges of Lysimachus, brother of the apostate high priest Menelaus. Some MSS and the Vulg. support the reading Tyrannus, but the more familiar name is less likely to have been altered by copyists.

HAURAN (חַוְרָן; for various conjectures as to meaning, see Oxf. Heb. Lex.; Αὐρανῖτις; Arab. حَوْرَان, or in common speech el-Ḥaurân.—This was the name given, with varying definition of boundaries, to a tract of land E. of the Jordan, N. of Gilead, extending E. to the desert. In Ezk $47^{16.\,18}$ the Jordan is made the border-line between Haurân, Damascus, and Gilead on the one hand, and the Land of Israel on the other. Haurân is there the whole district between Damascus and Gilead, from the lip of the Jordan Valley eastward. This practically corresponds with the province under the Turkish governor of Haurân to-day, whose seat is in el-Merkez, and whose jurisdiction includes Jedûr, Jaulân, and part of the hill-country south of the Jarmuk, as well as the region now specially called Haurân.

A series of beautiful cone-like hills, extinct volcanoes all, runs southward from the roots of Gt. Hermon, through Jedûr and Jaulân. Almost parallel with these, along the edge of the desert eastward, stands the great basaltic dyke, known at different times as Mons Asaldamus, Jebel Haurân, and Jebel ed-Druze. Between these two ranges lies a vast hollow, about 45 miles in breadth. In length, from Jebel el-Aswad in the N. to the bank of the Jarmuk in the S., it is nearly 50 miles; while away to the S.E. it runs out into the open desert. If we derive the name from ḥawr, a 'hollow,' with the place-ending ân, it may very well have applied to this gigantic vale.

The natives now say that Haurân consists of three parts, viz. en-Nukrah, el-Lejâ, and el-Jebel. These are clearly defined districts. (1) En-Nukrah, 'the cavity,' lies between the range of ez-Zumleh on the S.W., the slopes of Jaulân to westward, the volcanic fields of el-Lejâ on the N., and Jebel ed-Druze on the E. The wide reaches forming the floor of the hollow are rich, and fairly cultivated. This is the great grain-growing tract E. of Jordan. The elevation of the plain is from 1500 to 2000 ft. above sea-level. (2) El-Lejâ may be roughly described as a triangle, about 24 miles in length, with a base line of about 20 miles in the S., the apex being at Burak in the N. It is composed entirely of cooled lava, which is thrown about in the most grotesque and fantastic forms. The general aspect is dark, stern, forbidding. Soil is scanty, and but indifferently tilled. There are a few springs, but for the most part the inhabitants depend upon rain water, collected in cisterns or natural cavities in the rock. Great tracts to the N.E., owing to lack of water, are left absolutely tenantless during the summer months. The borders, where the lava waves drop to meet the emerald of the surrounding plain, are so distinctly marked that many have supposed this must be the ḥebel 'Argob—'the measured lot of Argob' of Dt $3^{4.\,13.\,14}$, 1 K 4^{13} (but see ARGOB). The handful of peasants in the western parts are completely at the mercy of the Arabs of el-Lejâ', of whom a local proverb asserts that 'greater rascals do not exist.' The Druzes hold the district to the S.E. The name el-Lejâ', 'the asylum,' or 'refuge,' signifies the use to which the place is often put. The present writer has met, in the heart of el-Lejâ, men who had been charged with various offences in Mt. Lebanon and elsewhere, who, as soon as they passed the rocky ramparts round the borders, felt perfectly safe from the officers of the law. (3) El-Jebel is, of course, the great range which bounds the eastward view, of which el-Kuleib, 5730 ft. high, and Salchad, with its mighty fortress crowning the southern heights, are the most outstanding features. The range effectually guards the fertile reaches to westward against the encroachment of the desert sands. The mountain is referred to in the Mishna as 'Mount Haurân,' one of the stations whence flashed the fire-signals announcing the advent of the new year (Rosh hash-Shanah, ii. 4). The name Jebel Haurân is now interchangeable with Jebel ed-Druze. After the terrible massacres of 1860, many Druze families moved eastward, occupied the S.E. district of el-Lejâ', and became masters of the greater part of the mountain. The inaccessible nature of the country gives them a great advantage over any attacking force. Until recent years their submission to the Turkish Government has been hardly more than nominal. With the exception of the clumps of trees around Sheikh Sa'ad, the reputed home of Job, and el-Merkez, the plain is treeless. In el-Lejâ, here and there, are a few stunted shrubs. The mountain is well wooded, and fruitful vineyards cling to many of the slopes.

Materials for the history of Haurân are very scanty, and do not go beyond the 1st cent. B.C. Towards the end of his reign Alexander Jannæus brought the western part of Haurân under his dominion; but eastward, Aretas the Arabian, or rather Nabatæan, held sway. The Nabatæans were driven southward by the Romans B.C. 64, but continued to hold Bozrah and Salchad. Herod the Great, succeeding to the government, did much to hold in check the lawless bands who infested the province, and indulged his taste for temple building. The oldest Greek inscription in these parts was found in a ruined temple at Sî'a, near Kanawât, on the pedestal of a statue erected to him during his lifetime. Under his son Philip a period of great prosperity seems to have been enjoyed. On Philip's death, after an interval of 3 years, Herod Agrippa received the province from Caligula. In an inscription found at Kanawât, he speaks of the inhabitants 'dwelling in caves like wild beasts' (Waddington, 2329*a*). Agrippa died in A.D. 44, and for 9 years the province was administered by the Romans. Then Claudius gave it to Agrippa II., who died A.D. 100, when the region was finally associated with the Roman province of Syria. In A.D. 106 the Nabatæans were at last reduced, and the province of Arabia constituted. The capital of the new province was Bozrah, which city is so closely identified with Haurân that an ancient proverb says, 'the prosperity of Bozrah is the prosperity of Haurân.'

Under the Romans civilization advanced, and, as evidenced by the remains of churches and inscriptions, Christianity made rapid progress. In A.D. 632 the Moslem hordes from Arabia burst over the province like a tornado, and the blight swiftly fell, which lies heavy on the land to-day. The latest notice of a Christian building is an inscription found by the present writer at el-Kufr, which records the foundation of a church in A.D. 720 (see PEFSt, July 1895, Inscrip. No. 150). Of the cities whose dark ruins are so numerous throughout the region, none can be said with certainty to date beyond the Roman period; although several, such as Kanawât and Bozrah, evidently occupy ancient sites. Many houses, built entirely—both walls and roof—of basalt, the heavy doors and window shutters of the same durable material, still easily swinging on their stone hinges, stand to-day almost as complete as when, centuries ago, their last tenants departed. The underground dwellings for which the district is noted doubtless belong to a much more remote antiquity. The crumbling villages that dot the plain and stud the mountain slopes are nearly all built of materials taken from neighbouring ruins. They have yielded a fine harvest of inscriptions, relating chiefly to the earlier centuries of our era. The rude builders, ignorant of the value attaching to these remains, have destroyed much. Thus it comes that 'written stones,' carved capitals, and bits of sculpture, memorials of a great and splendid past, may now so often be found amid surroundings of squalor and decay.

W. EWING.

HAVE.—Although 'have,' both as auxiliary and as finite verb, is used in many archaic expressions in AV, its meaning is nearly always obvious, and its obsolete uses are few. The foll. examples may be given:—

1. To have, as a finite verb, is to possess, as Lk 8^{27} 'there met him out of the city a certain man, which had devils long time' (ὃς εἶχε, edd. ἔχων); 2 Co 1^{9} 'But we had the sentence of death in ourselves' (ἐσχήκαμεν, RV 'yea, we ourselves have had the answer of death within ourselves').

2. Have, followed by some subst., has the force of the verb corresponding to the subst., as 'have indignation,' Mt 26^{8}, Mk 14^{4} (cf. Lk 15^{28} Rhem. 'But he had indignation and would not go in'); 'have compassion,' Lk 15^{20}, He 10^{34}; 'have understanding,' Lk 1^{3}; 'have regard,' Ac 8^{11}; 'have knowledge,' Ac 17^{13}; 'have rejoicing,' Gal 6^{4}; 'have trial,' He 11^{36}. Cf. Ac 20^{3} Rhem. 'he had councel to returne through Macedonia.'

3. Have is sometimes equivalent to 'hold,' as Ja 2^{1} 'My brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons' (μὴ ἔχετε, RV 'hold not'); Ac 25^{26} 'Wherefore I have brought him forth before you . . . that, after examination had, I might have somewhat to write' (τῆς ἀνακρίσεως γενομένης). So 'have in abomination,' Lv 11^{11}, 1 S 13^{4}; 'have in derision,' Ps 119^{51}, Ezk 23^{32}, 1 Es 1^{51}, Wis 5^{3}; 'have in honour,' 2 S 6^{22}; 'have in remembrance,' Ac 10^{31}; 'have in reputation,' Ac 5^{34}; 'have in reverence,' Ps 89^{7}. Cf. He 13^{4} Tind. 'Let wedlocke be had in pryce in all poyntes'; North's Plutarch, p. 876, '[Cicero] scorned and disdained all Pompeys preparations and counsels, the which indeed made him to be had in iealousie and suspition'; Ridley, Brefe Declaration (Moule's ed. p. 163), 'For all the churche of Christ bothe hathe and ever hathe hadde hym [Augustine] for a man of most singular learnyng, witte, and diligence.'

4. Have has sometimes the meaning of 'carry' or 'take,' as 2 Ch 35^{23} 'And the king said to his servants, Have me away; for I am sore wounded' (הַעֲבִירוּנִי); 2 K 11^{15}, 2 Ch 23^{14} 'Have her forth without the ranges' (הוֹצִיאוּ אֹתָהּ); 2 S 13^{9} 'Have out all men from me' (הוֹצִיאוּ). Cf. Is 53^{8} 'He shal be had awaye, his cause not herde, and without eny judgment'; Jn 2^{16} Tind. 'Have these thinges hence, and make not my fathers housse an housse of marchaundyse.' So Knox, Hist. 151, 'who being slain, was had to the Queen's presence'; Adams, Works, i. 65, 'Herefore they bequeath so great sums for masses and dirges and trentals to be sung or said for them after they are dead, that their souls may at the last be had to heaven, though first for a while they be reezed in purgatory.'

5. Such phrases may be noticed as, 'Have in one's heart to,' 1 Ch 28^{2} (cf. Ph 1^{7} 'I have you in my heart'); 'I would have you without carefulness,' 1 Co 7^{32}; 'I would not have you ignorant,' 2 Co 1^{8}; 'Who will have all men to be saved,' 1 Ti 2^{4} (ὃς θέλει, RV 'Who willeth that all men should be saved'). Cf. Jn 21^{22} Tind. 'Yf I will have him to tary tyll I come, what is that to the?'

6. As a grammatical point observe 'had' not only for 'would have' (as Gn 43^{10}, Lk 24^{21}), but for 'would' alone, Ps 84^{10} 'I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.' The Revisers have been taken to task (Moon, Revisers' English, p. 135; Eccles. English, p. 190) for accepting this construction from AV. No doubt 'I would rather' is more grammatical, but 'I had rather' has the best authority and is still in use. Cf. T. Fuller, Holy State, ii. 16, p. 109, 'Some men had as lieve be schoolboyes as Schoolmasters, to be tyed to the school as Cooper's Dictionary and Scapula's Lexicon are chained to the desk therein.' Again, such a form as we find in He 11^{15} 'They might have had opportunity to have returned' is now reckoned ungrammatical. It is common in Shaks., as Hamlet, V. i. 268—

> 'I hoped thou shouldst have been my Hamlet's wife;
> I thought thy bride-bed to have deck'd, sweet maid.'

So Merry Wives, IV. v. 41—

> 'I had other things to have spoken with her.'

See Abbott, Shaks. Gram. § 360. RV has the modern form, 'they would have had opportunity to return.'

J. HASTINGS.

HAVEN.—1. חוֹף, properly 'coast,' 'strand,' from [חָפַף] 'enclose,' 'surround.' This word is rendered 'haven' by AV and RV in Gn $49^{13\ bis}$, and by RV in Jg 5^{17} (AV 'shore'). Its only other occurrences are Dt 1^{7} [AV '(sea)side,' RV '(sea)shore'], Jos 9^{1} [AV 'coasts (of the sea'), RV 'shore (of the sea')], Jer 47^{7}, Ezk 25^{16} [AV and RV '(sea)shore']. 2. מָחוֹז Ps 107^{30} (only). 3. λιμήν, Ac $27^{8.\ 12}$.

Havens are seldom mentioned in the Bible, probably for the reason that Palestine proper scarcely possesses any harbours, and the Israelites were not a maritime nation. The harbours in OT times on the Mediterranean coast were in possession of the Phœnicians and the Philistines (see GREAT SEA); and as regards that of Ezion-geber, at the head of the Gulf of 'Aḳabah (or Ælanitic Gulf), it was only for a short period in possession of the kings of Israel, notably in the reign of Solomon (1 K 9^{26}). The earliest mention of the word 'haven' (Gn 49^{13}) is in connexion with the blessings pronounced by Jacob on the future tribes, where it is said of Zebulun that he 'should dwell at the haven of the sea, and that he should be for an haven of ships, and his border (should reach) unto Zidon.' It is doubtful if, in the distribution of the Promised Land, the tribe of Zebulun actually touched the coast, though it reached as far west as Mount Carmel. From the port of Accho (Acre) the tribe was debarred by the predominating power of the Phœnician Sidonians, who in the time of the Judges 'oppressed Israel' (Jg 10^{12}); but it is a fair supposition that the terms of Jacob's Blessing point to the importance of the Bay of Acre as the future 'Key of Syria,'* and express the desire that it should come into the possession of Zebulun.

Next in importance and sequence of time to Sidon was the seaport of Tyre, situated about 20 miles S. of Sidon, and, like it, having a double harbour to the N. and S. of the promontory, which jutted out from the coast and terminated in a ridge of coralline rock. It was one of several islets lying at some distance from the shore. Only the events connected with the biblical history of Tyre and Sidon can here be referred to.† In the time of Solomon, Tyre had reached a high state of eminence under Hiram, who rendered assistance to Solomon in the building of the temple (1 K 5) and in supplying sailors for the fleet built at Ezion-geber, which traded to Ophir for gold (1 K 9^{26}). (See RED SEA). In NT history these cities are memorable for the visit of our Lord to their neighbourhood (Mt 15^{21}), and the miracle of healing in the case of the daughter of the Syrophœnician woman (Mk 7^{25}). But the glories of Tyre and Sidon have long since departed. In the height of their prosperity these Phœnician cities were centres of cruelty, licentiousness, and idolatry, which sealed their doom. When Alexander captured Tyre, the population of the city appears to have been about 40,000 souls; it is now a miserable fishing village with about a tenth of that number of inhabitants. The prophecies of Ezekiel have been literally fulfilled in the present state of these once flourishing cities (Ezk 26^{12} 27^{32}).

The Fair Havens (wh. see) are of interest in connexion with the voyage of St. Paul to Italy (Ac 27^{12}), and their position has been clearly determined; the name being preserved in the present Kaloi Limenes.* They consist of two contiguous roadsteads on the S. side of the island of Crete (Kandia), about 5 m. E. of Cape Matala (Theodia), and not far from the city of Lasea, of which they were the ports. In this position ships were secure against winds from the N.E., such as 'Euraquilo,' which burst upon the ship carrying the apostle at a later period of his voyage after leaving the island.†

HAVILAH (חֲוִילָה, Εὐειλάτ, Εὐειλά, Hevila).—A son of Cush according to Gn 10^{7}, 1 Ch 1^{9}, of Joktan according to Gn 10^{29}, 1 Ch 1^{23}. In Gn $2^{11.\ 12}$ the Pison is said to compass the land of H., where there was gold, bdellium, and 'the shōham-stone,' while in Gn 25^{18} the Ishmaelite tribes are described as extending 'from Havilah unto Shur,' the eastern frontier of Egypt, and in 1 S 15^{7} Saul is stated to have smitten the Amalekites or Bedawîn from Havilah (but here Glaser, Skizze, ii. 326, would read Hachilah) to Shur. H. will thus be the 'sandy' desert of N. Arabia extending from the Joktanite district of Ophir on the Persian Gulf to the neighbourhood of Edom. Glaser identifies it with Jemâma in N.E. Arabia, but its western boundary will have been nearer the Shur or 'Fortified Lines' of Egypt. The shōham-stone which came from it was perhaps the Assyrian samtu, which seems to have been the malachite or turquoise. At an early period the Arabian tribes made their way across the Red Sea to the opposite coast of Africa; hence H. is included among the descendants of Cush. The name of the Cushite Havilah is possibly preserved in the classical Aualis, now Zeila' in Somâli-land. A district of Khaulân (Ḥaulân) is mentioned in the inscriptions of S. Arabia; this is either Khaulân in Tihâmah, between Mecca and San'a, or another Khaulân S.E. of San'a. Niebuhr further found a Ḥuwailah on the Persian Gulf. The name, in fact, was widely spread in Arabia, and Yakut states that Ḥawîl was the name of a dialect spoken by the people of Mehri in the east of Hadramaut. The Mehri is the modern representative of the language of the Sabæan inscriptions.

HAVVOTH-JAIR (חַוֺּת יָאִיר, i.e. 'the tent-villages * of Jair').—A group of towns in Gilead, in the territory that was reckoned to the half-tribe of Manasseh. In Dt 3^{14} and Jos 13^{30} (both D^2) the Ḥavvoth-Jair are improperly located in Bashan, and in the latter passage they appear also to be confounded with the sixty fortresses of the Argob from which they are expressly distinguished in 1 K 4^{13}. Unsuccessful attempts have been made by Keil and others to harmonize the statements of D^2 with the testimony of JE (Nu 32^{39-41}, corroborated by Jg 10^4, 1 K 4^{13}, 1 Ch 2^{22}) that the Ḥavvoth-Jair were situated in Gilead. Varying explanations of the origin of the name are offered in OT. While in Nu 32^{41} and Dt 3^{14} Jair is a contemporary of Moses, in Jg 10^4 he is one of the judges. This variety of statement corresponds to the different OT traditions as to the settlement of the territory E. of the Jordan. The oldest narratives of the Hex. know of only two trans-Jordanic tribes, Reuben and Gad. (Compare Nu 32^{1-32} with vv.$^{33. 39-42}$). Even in the Song of Deborah (Jg 5^{14}) Machir is still one of the W. tribes, and only at a much later date became the designation of the Manassites in Gilead. This latter district, there is reason to believe, was really conquered from the west, after the occupation of Canaan proper. Hence in Jg 10^4 (which, however, is ethnographical rather than historical) there may be preserved the memory of an expedition led across the Jordan by Jair after the territory originally occupied by Manasseh had proved too small for that tribe. HAWK (נֵץ nêẓ, ἱέραξ, accipiter).—A generic word for birds of the hawk tribe. It probably includes all the species of the genera Accipiter, Falco, Circus, and Pernis, and perhaps Buteo, and excludes those of Milvus and Elanus, which have special names in Hebrew, da'āh, dayyah, and 'ayyâh (see GLEDE, KITE). The following is a list of the hawks found in Palestine and Syria:—

1. Accipiter nisus, L., the Sparrow Hawk (Arabic bâshiḳ). It is common over the whole country. 2. A. brevipes, Sev., the Levant Sparrow Hawk. It is much rarer than the last. It is recognized by its short thick tarsi. 3. Pernis apivorus, L., the Honey Buzzard. It is one of the resident species, but is rather rare. 4. Falco peregrinus, Tunst., the Peregrine Falcon (Arabic Ṭair-el-ḥurr). It is confined to the coast and western watershed of the mountains. 5. F. lanarius, Schl., the Lanner (Arabic shâhîn and ṣoḳr). This is the most common of the large falcons, and is a permanent resident. It resorts more esp. to the deserts. It is trained by the natives for falconry. 6. F. Sacer, Gmel., the Saker Falcon (Arabic soḳr). It is confined to the upland forests E. of the Jordan. It is esteemed by the Arabs the finest of all the falcons, and the name of Beni-Ṣoḳr, one of the tribes E. of the Dead Sea, is derived from this species. 7. F. subbuteo, L., the Hobby, is a summer visitor to Pal. 8. F. eleonoræ, Gene., the Eleonora Falcon, is also a summer visitor only. Tristram found it only in the Buka' (Cœlesyria). 9. F. æsalon, Tunst., the Merlin, is a winter visitor to Palestine. 10. F. vespertinus, L., the Red-legged Hobby, is a rare summer visitor. 11. F. tinnunculus, L., the Kestrel (Arabic bâshiḳ), is the commonest of all the hawks, and is universal throughout Pal. and Syria. 12. F. cenchris, Cuv., the Lesser Kestrel, is a spring and summer visitor, but, on its arrival, consorts with the last. 13. Circus æruginеus, L., the Marsh Harrier (Arab. dari'ah), is common over the marshes and plains. 14. C. cineraceus, Mont., the Ash-coloured Harrier, is rare, but resident. 15. C. cyaneus, L., the Hen Harrier, is also common. 16. C. Swainsonii, Smith, the Pallid Harrier, is especially found along the coast. The plumage is almost white. 17. Buteo vulgaris, Leach, the Common Buzzard (Arabic 'aḳâb), may be the Glede. 18. B. ferox, Gmel., the Long-legged Buzzard (Arab. shâhîn), is the largest of the hawk tribe, equalling in size some of the smaller eagles.

The above list amply justifies the expression 'after his kind' (Lv 11^{16}, Dt 14^{15}). It also justifies the expression in Job 39^{26}, where it is asked, 'Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings toward the south?' if by this, as is generally thought, an allusion is intended to the migratory habits of some of the species. Some think, however, that the allusion is simply to the power of flight of all the hawks. No allusion to hunting with falcons is found in the Scriptures. All the birds of this tribe were unclean to the Hebrews.

G. E. POST.

HAY.—The word occurs three times in AV (Pr 27^{25} RV 'hay,' m. 'grass,' Is 15^6 RV 'grass,' 1 Co 3^{12}). In both the OT passages the Heb. is חָצִיר ḥaẓîr, which is rendered by the LXX in the first passage χλωρός, and in the second χόρτος. In 1 Co the orig. is χόρτος. There does not seem to be any good reason for the tr^{n} hay in any of the above passages. The meaning is equally clear if the word be rendered grass (see GRASS). חֲשַׁשׁ ḥăshash has been thought by some to refer to hay. It corresponds to the Arabic ḥăshîsh, which signifies weeds, or green fodder. In Is 33^{11} it is rendered AV, RV 'chaff,' and in Is 5^{24} AV 'chaff,' but RV 'dry grass.' It is customary in Bible lands to cut or pull grass and other fodder plants, and give them to live stock. Women, with large back loads or donkey loads of such fodder, may be seen any morning at the gates, or in the market places of the cities, where they offer it for sale. Large areas are sown in barley, vetch, clover, medick, and other forage plants, to be cut and given to domestic animals in the spring and early summer. It is clear that it was also the custom in Bible days to cut grass for this purpose (Ps 37^2 72^6 $129^{6. 7}$, Am 7^1). But it is not customary to dry such cut-grass as we do in making hay, to be stored up as winter fodder, and there is no evidence that the Hebrews had such a custom. In fact it would be out of place, as the winter is the season of green grass here, and the flocks continue to crop the stubble to the end of the harvest season in midsummer, and after that find a scanty but sufficient pasturage until the early rains cause the 'tender grass' to sprout up with marvellous rapidity. Stall-fed animals have cut-straw mixed with their barley, and this seems to contain a considerable amount of nourishment, and to answer the purpose of hay. Stall-fed milch cows are fed mainly on this fodder, and continue fat, and give milk on it. It would therefore be better to render ḥăshash by cut-grass rather than by dry grass or hay.

G. E. POST.

HAZAEL (חֲזָאֵל, חֲזָהאֵל 'whom God beholds.' Ἀζαήλ BA Luc. Assyr. Ḫaza'ilu).—A powerful king of Syria who reigned contemporaneously with Jehoram (last 3 or 4 years), Jehu, and Jehoahaz kings of Israel, and Jehoram, Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Joash of Judah. Hazael is first mentioned 1 K $19^{15. 17}$, where Elijah at Horeb receives commission to anoint him king over Syria, that he may execute J″'s vengeance against the Baal worshippers of Israel. At this time he must have been an official at the court of the Syrian king Ben-hadad II., for some time later he was sent to Elisha at Damascus to inquire the issue of his master's sickness. The prophet marked him out as the future king of Syria and oppressor of Israel, and accordingly Hazael seized the earliest opportunity to murder Ben-hadad and usurp the throne (2 K 8^{7-15}). He seems to have been soon engaged in hostilities with the neighbouring kingdom of Israel, meeting the allied forces of Jehoram and Ahaziah of Judah at Ramoth-gilead (2 K $8^{28.\,29}$ $9^{14.\,15}$). Hazael gained a series of successes against Jehu, devastating all his country E. of Jordan, from the Arnon in the S. to the land of Bashan in the N. (2 K $10^{32.\,33}$); and throughout the reign of Jehoahaz, Jehu's successor, he made constant encroachment upon the territory of Israel (2 K13^{22}). It was not till after Hazael's death that Joash son of Jehoahaz was able successfully to repel the aggressions of Syria under Ben-hadad III. son of Hazael (2 K $13^{24.\,25}$). A century later the remembrance of Hazael was still fresh in the minds of the men of Israel, and Amos uses the expression 'the house of Hazael' as a parallel to 'the palaces of Ben-hadad' (Am 1^4). Hazael further directed his arms against the S. of Palestine, besieging and taking Gath, and then marching against Jerusalem, from which he was only bought off by tribute sent by Joash king of Judah out of the temple treasures (2 K $12^{17.\,18}$). According to 2 Ch $24^{23.\,24}$ a battle took place, in which the Syrians with a small army defeated the larger forces of the king of Judah.

* Ḥavvôth is probably connected with the Arab. ḥiwā, 'a collection of tents.' 'It may have originally denoted a group of Bedawin tents, but with the transition to pastoral life it would naturally be applied to more permanent settlements' (Moore, Judges, p. 274).

Hazael figures more than once in the cuneiform inscriptions. Shalmaneser II., who in the early part of his reign had defeated an alliance formed by Dadidri (Ben-hadad II.), Ahab of Israel, and other kings, and again in the 14th year of his reign had a second time worsted Dadidri (COT i. 191 ff.), states that in his 18th year (B.C. 842) he joined battle with Hazael of Damascus, who had assembled a large army and entrenched himself upon the mountain of Sanir in the Anti-Lebanon. The Syrian king was defeated, and lost 16,000 warriors, 1121 chariots, and 470 horsemen, together with his stores. Barely escaping with his life, he shut himself up in Damascus, which was besieged by the enemy, but, apparently, not captured, since Shalmaneser merely states 'his plantations I destroyed.' The same inscription speaks of Jehu as paying tribute to Shalmaneser 'at that time'; and it may thus be plausibly inferred that the aid of Assyria against the Syrians had been solicited by Jehu, as was done by Ahaz of Judah in later times (2 K $16^{7\mathrm{ff.}}$). Three years later, in the 21st year of his reign, Shalmaneser again marched against Hazael and took possession of his cities (COT i. 197 f., 200 f.).

HAZAIAH (חֲזָיָה 'J″ hath seen').—A descendant of Judah (Neh 11^5). See GENEALOGY.

HAZAR-ADDAR (חֲצַר־אַדָּר, ἔπαυλις Ἀράδ).—A place on the southern border of Canaan, west of Kadesh-barnea, Nu 34^4. It appears to be the same as Hezron (which see) of Jos 15^3, which in the latter passage is connected with but separated from Addar (which see).

HAZAR-ENAN (חֲצַר עֵינָן, once Ezk 47^{17} Hazar-enon עֵינוֹן).—A place mentioned in Nu $34^{9.\,10}$ as the northern boundary of Israel, and in Ezk 47^{17} 48^1 as one of the ideal boundaries. It was perhaps at the sources of the Orontes. Buhl (GAP 67, 111, 240) and Bertholet (Hesekiel, 244) suggest that it is identical with the well-known Banias, while v. Kasteren would locate it at el-Ḥaḍr farther to the east, on the way from Banias to Damascus, but these sites appear to be too far south.

HAZAR-GADDAH (חֲצַר־גַּדָּה).—An unknown town in the extreme south of Judah (Jos 15^{27}).

HAZARMAVETH (חֲצַרְמָוֶת). — The eponym of a Joktanite clan, Gn 10^{26}=1 Ch 1^{20}, described as a 'son' of Joktan, fifth in order from Shem. The name occurs in Sabæan inscriptions as חצרמות and חצרמת (ZDMG xix. (1865) 239 ff., xxxi. 74 ff.). Its identity with the modern Ḥaḍramaut is certain, and Hazarmaveth is probably also the same as the land of the Χατραμωτῖται, one of the four chief tribes of S. Arabia as described by Strabo (XVI. iv. 2). They were celebrated for their traffic in frankincense. For their history see ARABIA, p. 133^b. The modern Ḥaḍramaut is not so extensive as the ancient.

LITERATURE.—Dillmann and Spurrell on Gn 10^{26}; in addition to above references to ZDMG see also xxii. 658, xxx. 323, xliv. 186; Glaser, Skizze, ii. 20, 423 ff.; especially for account of inscriptions, Hommel, AHT 77 ff., 270, 274, 318 f., 321 n., and Sayce, HCM 39 f.

HAZAR-SHUAL (חֲצַר שׁוּעָל).—A place in S. Judah (Jos 15^{28}=1 Ch 4^{28}) or Simeon (Jos 19^3), repeopled by Jews after the Captivity, Neh 11^{27}. It may be the ruin S'awi on a hill E. of Beersheba. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xxiv.

HAZAR-SUSAH (חֲצַר־סוּסָה, in 1 Ch 4^{31} Hazar-susim חֲצַר־סוּסִים).—A city in Simeon, Jos 19^5 = 1 Ch 4^{31}. The name means 'horse-village,' and is noticed along with Beth-marcaboth, 'place of chariots.' These places were apparently in the southern plain, and were no doubt stations of a cavalry force, probably Egyptian. The sites are unknown. There is a ruin Susîn, W. of Beersheba. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xxiv.

HAZAR-SUSIM.—See HAZAR-SUSAH.

HAZAZON TAMAR (חַצְצֹן תָּמָר. 'Hazazon of the palm-tree') is mentioned in Gn 14^7 as inhabited by Amorites, and as destroyed, along with En-mishpat (Kadesh) and the Amalekite country, by Chedorlaomer. In 2 Ch 20^2 it is identified with En-gedi as the basis for an invading army from Edom (so read instead of Syria). Josephus (Ant. IX. i. 2), speaking of this campaign, says the invaders pitched at En-gedi, where grow the best kind of palm-tree and the opobalsamum.

Most probably the words preserve the older name of En-gedi (which see), and may still survive in the Wady Husaseh, N.W. from 'Ain Jidy (Engedi). See Rob. i. 506; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geogr. 271. Jerome (Quæst. in Gen.) translates the name urbs palmarum, which (cf. Jos. supra) suggests a comparison with that 'city of palm-trees' out of which (Jg 1^{16}) the Kenite clan went up with Judah. In that case it may have been this Kenite settlement on the rocky nest of En-gedi which Balaam saw from the heights of Moab, and to which he referred (Nu 24^{21}). G. A. Smith suggests (Hist. Geogr. p. 269 ff.) that here we must look for the Tamar of 1 K 9^{18} (Kethibh) and Ezk 47^{19} 48^{28}.

It is, however, possible that Hazazon-tamar may be, not En-gedi, but the Tamar of Ezekiel, and that the latter lay S.W. of the Dead Sea. In that case Jg 1^{16} may mean that the Kenites, entering Palestine by the south, joined the invading Judahites on the south of Arad.

A. C. WELCH.

HAZEL (לוּז lûz, καρύον, amygdalus).—This word, tr^{d} in AV hazel (Gn 30^{37}), is better rendered RV almond, for (1) the word לוּז is the same in form as the Arab. lauz, which signifies almond; (2) the hazel does not grow in Mesopotamia, where Laban lived, while the almond is universal. The objection that there is another name שָׁקֵד shâḳêd for almond is not decisive, as many plants and animals have two or more names. G. E. POST.

HAZER-HATTICON (חֲצַר הַתִּיכוֹן 'the middle Hazer').—A place named amongst the boundaries of (ideal) Israel, Ezk 47^{16}. It is described as 'by the border of Hauran.' If the MT be correct, Hazer-hatticon is quite unknown; but there can be no reasonable doubt that we ought, with Smend, Cornill, Bertholet, etc., to emend to Hazar-enon as in vv.$^{17.18}$ and 48^{1}. Wetzstein, indeed, proposes [ZKW (1884) v. 114] to identify Hazer-hatticon with Ḥaḍar to the north of Jebel Druze, 'at the foot of the eastern corner of Hermon.' See further, Davidson, Ezekiel, p. 352.

HAZERIM (חֲצֵרִים; Ασηδώθ, AF Ασηρώθ).—Mentioned in AV of Dt 2^{23} as the locality in which the AVVIM (wh. see) dwelt 'as far as Gaza.' There is no doubt that the word is not really a proper name, but that it should be rendered (as it is in RV) by villages. The clause describes how the Avvim dwelt, until they were expelled by the immigrant Caphtorim (or Philistines); they did not dwell in fortified cities, but in villages, or unwalled settlements (Lv 25^{31}), consisting, probably, of rudely-built huts of mud or stone, roofed with leaves or grass. Villages are usually mentioned as the dependencies of towns (e.g. Jos 13^{23}); but sometimes a particular tribe is characterized as inhabiting them, as Gn 25^{16} (Ishmaelites), Is 42^{11} (Kedar); and according to this archæological notice, the Avvim, or original occupants of a part of S.W. Palestine, dwelt in them similarly.

S. R. DRIVER.

HAZEROTH (חֲצֵרוֹת; Ασηρώθ).—A station of the Israelites in the wilderness, mentioned both in Nu 11^{35} 12^{16} (JE) and in the itinerary 33^{17} (P),—in the latter as the second station after leaving Sinai (the first being Ḳibroth-hatta'avah). Burckhardt (Syria, 1822, p. 495) suggested tentatively ('perhaps') that it might be 'Ain el-Ḥuḍerah, about 40 miles N.E. of Jebel Mûsa, and not quite half-way between Jebel Mûsa and 'Aḳabah; and this identification has been accepted by many subsequent writers, as Robinson, BR^{2} i. 151; Ewald, Hist. ii. 191; Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 81 f. (though not very confidently); Palmer, Desert of the Wanderings, 260–262 (cf. 313 f.), etc.; Dillm., however (on Nu 11^{35}), hesitates. All things considered, the identification seems fairly probable. The site is most fully described by Palmer (with an illustration).* It lies a little to the left of the main route from Jebel Mûsa to 'Aḳabah, which here, after leaving the Wâdy Sa'al, passes through a sandy plain (in the midst of which is a conspicuous eminence, called Hudeibat el-Ḥajjāj, or the Pilgrims' Hill), prior to entering the Wādy Ghuzāleh. Ascending for about 10 minutes from the camel track in this plain, the traveller reaches a cleft or gorge in the limestone rock, through which he looks down (towards the N.W.) upon the Wādy Ḥuḍerah, winding along between fantastic, brilliantly-coloured sandstone cliffs, with a 'forest of mountain peaks and chains' beyond, and 'on their left a broad white wādy leading up towards the distant mountains of the Tih.' In the middle of the Wādy Ḥuḍerah, beneath a lofty cliff, lies the dark green palm-grove of 'Ain Ḥuḍerah, with the fountain rising in the rock behind. The water from the fountain, which is still used as a watering-place for camels, 'is conducted by an aqueduct, cut in the solid granite, into a reservoir or pool, from which it is let out by a rude sluice to irrigate the gardens which the Arabs still cultivate here. The remains of several well-constructed walls point to a former and perhaps Christian occupation of the place.' A few miles to the N. of 'Ain Ḥuḍerah there circles round the Wādy el-'Ain, containing a stream of clear, fresh water, which joins ultimately the Wādy Ghuzāleh, to the N.E.

Keil objects that el-Ḥuḍerah, being only '18 hours' from Jebel Mûsa, is too near for Hazeroth, as the Israelites were 3 days (Nu 11^{33}) in reaching Ḳibroth-hatta'avah, the station before Hazeroth (11^{35}); and thinks that Hazeroth must have been some place on the more direct route to Kadesh (13^{26}), such as the station Bir eth-Themed, on the Tih-plateau (cf. Trumbull, Kadesh-barnea, 78, 314 f.). It would no doubt be a mistake to regard the identification as certain; still it may be questioned whether, under the circumstances, Keil's objections are cogent; and although the more usual route from Sinai to Kadesh may be through the Wādy Zulaka, on to el-'Ain and Bir eth-Themed (Robinson, i. 148, 198, with the map), yet a route past 'Ain el-Ḥuḍerah, through the Wādy Ghuzāleh, and up the Wādy Wetîr (ib. 153, with the map,—apparently the E. half of the Wādy el-'Ain of the Ordnance Survey map), does not seem to be so greatly more circuitous as to be pronounced out of the question. Dillm. thinks the evidence insufficient to show where Hazeroth was.

Whether the Hazeroth of Dt 1^{2} (LXX Αὐλῶν) be the same place depends upon the answer given to the difficult question, what the topographical notes contained in that verse are intended to mark (see DIZAHAB). If this verse defines a locality in the Steppes of Moab, Hazeroth will be some place there, otherwise unknown; if it describes—or in its original form described—places passed by the Israelites previously, it may be the Hazeroth of Nu 11^{35} etc. Sayce's location of Hazeroth (Early Hist. of Hebrews, 214) as 'near Paran on the borders of Moab' has nothing to recommend it, being inconsistent with the situation presupposed in either Nu or Dt. S. R. DRIVER.

HAZIEL (חֲזִיאֵל 'vision of El').—A Gershonite Levite in time of Solomon, 1 Ch 23^{9}. See GENEALOGY.

HAZO (חֲזוֹ, Ἀζαῦ).—The eponym of a Nahorite clan, Gn 22^{22}. It is no doubt identical with Ḥazû, which along with Bazû (Buz of v.^{21}) is mentioned in an inscription of Esarhaddon (see Delitzsch, Paradies, 306 f., also in Zeitsch. f. Keilschriftforsch. (1885) 93 ff.; Schrader, KAT^{2} 141, 221 [COT^{2} i. 127, 212], and Keilinschriften u. Geschichtsforsch. 399; Tiele, Geschichte, 337; Dillmann on Gn $22^{21f.}$).

HAZOR (חָצֹר, חָצוֹר).—1. A Canaanite city of Galilee, the chief place of that region, ruled by a dynasty which seems to have had the dynastic name of Jabin, Jos 11^{1} 12^{19}, Jg $4^{2.17}$. The great battle with the king of Hazor took place at the Waters of MEROM, Jos $11^{5ff.}$ (see art. JABIN). Hazor was fortified by Solomon (1 K 9^{15}), and captured by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15^{29}) in B.C. 734. Jonathan the Hasmonæan, after encamping 'at the water of Gennesareth, early in the morning gat him to the plain of Hazor,' 1 Mac 11^{67}. Josephus (Ant. V. v. 1) places Hazor near Kedesh, on the plateau looking down on the Hûleh lake, which he regards as being the Waters of Merom. This leads to the supposition that Tell el-Hurrawîyeh, a large ruined site in the required position, is intended. The mountain to the west still bears the name Jebel Ḥadhîreh. This is the only known indication, and, as far as the biblical notices are concerned, it would be equally possible to place Hazor farther south, where, at the foot of the chain of Upper Galilee, is found an important ruined site called Ḥazzur, in a position more appropriate to the use of the chariots which belonged to the king of Hazor. This latter would also suit well the Hazor of 1 Mac 11^{67} and Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 7. From Hazor two letters of the Tel el-Amarna collection were written in the 15th cent. B.C. to the king of Egypt. They are much damaged, but they speak of an attack on the place, and ask for aid. In one of them the king's name is given; and though the first syllable is damaged, it may be read I-eba-enu, i.e. 'Jabin.' Hazor is also noticed, with places in Upper and Lower Galilee, by the Mohar (an Egyptian traveller of the 14th cent. B.C.) on his way from the seacoast to the Lake of Tiberias. See SWP vol. i. sh. iv.

---

* A clearer view of the topography of the district may, however, be obtained from the Ordnance Survey of Sinai (1869), i. 122 f., with the accompanying map of the peninsula.

LITERATURE.—SWP vol. i. sh. iv.; Robinson, BRP^{2} iii. 63, 81, 365, 401 f.; Buhl, GAP 113, 182, 236; Guérin, Galilée, iii. 363 ff.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.^{3} 264; Schürer, HJP I. i. 249; Dillmann on Jos 11^1; Sayce, HCM 309, 336.

2. A town of Benjamin, Neh 11^{33}, now the ruin Ḥazzur close to Gibeon on the south. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xvii.; Oxf. Heb. Lex., Siegfried-Stade, and Buhl (GAP 177) suggest that it may be identical with Baal-hazor of 2 S 13^{23}; but see BAAL-HAZOR.

3. In Jos 15^{23} a Hazor in the Negeb of Judah is noticed. 4. In Jos 15^{25} another Hazor appears to be mentioned, which is identical with Kerioth-hezron (wh. see). 5. An unknown Arabian locality (Jer 49^{28}) mentioned along with Kedar as smitten by Nebuchadrezzar. C. R. CONDER.

HAZOR-HADATTAH (חָצוֹר חֲדַתָּה).—The text (Jos 15^{25}) is not beyond suspicion. If it is correct, the name may mean 'new Hazor,' with Aram. ת in חֲדַתָּה (Oxf. Heb. Lex.). LXX omits. The place was in the Negeb of Judah, but the site is unknown. It appears to be connected with 'Kerioth-hezron, which is Hazor.' See HEZRON.

C. R. CONDER.

HAZZELELPONI (הַצְּלֶלְפּוֹנִי, AV Hazelelponi).—A female name in the genealogy of Judah, 1 Ch 4^3. See GENEALOGY.

HE (ה).—The fifth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 5th part, each verse of which begins with this letter. It is transliterated in this Dictionary by h.

HE.—After the Heb. idiom (see Davidson, Syntax, § 106) a personal pronoun is sometimes inserted superfluously as the subject of the verb. Gn 4^4 'And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock' (וְהֶבֶל הֵבִיא גַם־הוּא); Dt 1^{30} 'The LORD your God which goeth before you, he shall fight for you'; Jos 22^{22} 'The LORD God of gods, the LORD God of gods, he knoweth'; Is 9^{15} 'The ancient and honourable, he is the head; and the prophet that teacheth lies, he is the tail.' In such cases there is a certain emphasis placed upon the subject, but, as Davidson points out, it is slight, and to translate 'as for the ancient and honourable' is to exaggerate it, though that construction may be permitted in a long sentence like 2 Ch 34^{26}, 'And as for the king of Judah, who sent you to enquire of the LORD, so shall ye say unto him' (וְאֶל־מֶלֶךְ יְהוּדָה . . . כֹּה תֹאמְרוּ אֵלָיו; RV 'But unto the king of Judah . . . thus shall ye say to him'). The same idiom is found in Apocr. and NT, as 2 Mac $4^{4.5}$ 'Onias seeing the danger of this contention . . . he went to the king' (RV omits 'he'); Jn 1^{18} 'No man hath seen God at any time; the only-begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him' (ὁ ὢν εἰς . . . ἐκεῖνος). There are many examples of this construction in Heb. that are not transferred into English. On the other hand, the example quoted from 2 Mac * is peculiar to the Eng. version, for this method of emphasizing a subject, or of catching it up again after a long parenthesis, belongs to all composition. An example of each kind may be quoted from Shaks. Com. of Errors, V. i. 229—

> 'There did this perjured goldsmith swear me down,
> That I this day of him received the chain,
> Which, God he knows, I saw not';

Hamlet, I. ii. 22—

> 'Now follows, that you know, young Fortinbras,
> Holding a weak supposal of our worth,
> Or thinking by our late dear brother's death
> Our state to be disjoint and out of frame,
> Colleagued with the dream of his advantage,
> He hath not failed to pester us.'

See also under IT, WHICH.

In Bel $^{3.4}$ there is an interchange between him and it, 'Now the Babylonians had an idol, called Bel, and there were spent upon him every day twelve great measures of fine flour. . . . And the king worshipped it, and went daily to adore it' (Gr. εἴδωλον . . . αὐτὸν . . . αὐτὸν . . . αὐτῷ). Cf. Tindale, Expositions, p. 96 (on Mt 6^{16-18}), 'If thou wouldest kill thy body, or when it is tame enough, pain him.' Similar occurrences of a masc. pronoun for a neut., or a neut. for a masc., are found in the earlier versions, and are due usually to a literal regard for the gender of the Greek word. Thus Jn 1^3 Tind. 'All thinges were made by it, and with out it was made nothinge that was made' (so all the VSS before AV except Wyc. and Rhem.); but 15^{18} 'Yf the worlde hate you ye knowe that he hated me before he hated you' (so Cran., but Gen. changed to 'it' and was followed by the rest). Cf. Mt 18^9 Rhem. 'And if thine eye scandalize thee, plucke him out, and cast him from thee'; and Wyc. Works, iii. 150, 'Ffor loued thing drawes men to hit, as tho stoon of a damaunt drawes irne unto hym.' In 2 S $12^{15.21}$ 'it' is applied to Bathsheba's child, but 'he' and 'him' in vv.$^{19.23}$. RV retains this as well as the more glaring discrepancy in Bel $^{3.4}$, and adds at least one instance of its own, Mt 14^{12} 'And his disciples came and took up the corpse and buried him' (reading αὐτόν for αὐτό, AV 'it'), Mk 6^{29} 'And when his disciples heard thereof, they came and took up his corpse, and laid it in a tomb' (retaining αὐτό here).

A clear example of the ancient dative him (='for him') remains in 1 K 13^{13} 'And he said unto his sons, Saddle me the ass. So they saddled him the ass.' Other instances are 2 K 10^7 'they . . . sent him them to Jezreel'; Sir 8^{12} 'Lend not unto him that is mightier than thyself; for if thou lendest him, count it but lost'; and with me, 1 K 13^6 'pray for me, that my hand may be restored me again.' But these instances are scarcely obsolete. In Ps 7^{13} we read, 'He hath prepared for him the instruments of death.' Coverdale's tr^n was 'He hath prepared him the weapens of death.' This became in Psalter of 1539 'He hath prepared hym the instruments of death,' and it remained in 1640, but in 1662 it was changed to 'for him,' because (as Earle shows) 'prepared him' must be 'prepared for himself' (sibi), which is clearly wrong.

Him is occasionally used reflexively: 2 K 13^{15} 'And Elisha said unto him, Take bow and arrows. And he took unto him bow and arrows'; Mt 9^{22} 'But Jesus turned him about, and when he saw her, he said, Daughter, be of good comfort' (ἐπιστραφεὶς, edd. στραφεὶς, RV 'turning'): so with you, Hag 1^6 'Ye clothe you, but there is none warm'; and with 'them,' 2 K $17^{9.10}$ 'they built them high places in all their cities.' Examples are frequent in Shaks., as Macbeth, V. iv. 4—

> 'Let every soldier hew him down a bough.'

And himself for he himself, which occurs in Mt 8^{17} 'Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses,' may be illustrated by Two Gent. of Verona, III. i. 143—

* So also He $9^{11.12}$.

HEAD is the translation in OT of ראשׁ (in 1 Ch 10^{10} גֻּלְגֹּלֶת 'skull'; in 1 S 19^{16} 26$^{7.\ 11.\ 16}$, 1 K 19^{6} מְרַאֲשֹׁת the place where or the object on which the head is laid; in Aram. portions of Dn רֵאשׁ) and in NT of κεφαλή. The word is used very frequently both in a literal and a metaphorical sense.

(a) Of men (Gn 40^{16}, Lv 8^{12}, Ca 8^{3}, Mt 5^{36}, Mk 6^{24}, Lk 7^{38} etc. etc.); opposed to 'foot' or used along with it in such expressions as 'from head to foot' (Lv 13^{12}, cf. Is 1^{6}); the son of the Shunammite cries, from the effects of sun-stroke, 'My head, my head' (2 K 4^{19}).

(b) Of animals (Gn 3^{15}), the serpent's head to be bruised [? see Dillm. ad loc.] by the seed of the woman, Ex 12^{9} the head of the paschal lamb, Job 40^{31} [Eng. 41^{7}] of the crocodile. A 'dog's head' is an expression of contumely, 2 S 3^{8}.

(c) In a transferred sense, of inanimate objects, e.g. the tower of Babel whose top (ראשׁ) was to reach to heaven Gn 11^{4}, Jacob's ladder 28^{12}, and frequently of mountains Ex 17$^{9f.}$ 19^{20} etc. We read of the head of Jacob's bed Gn 47^{31} (cf. He 11^{22} where ἐπὶ τὸ ἄκρον τῆς ῥάβδου αὐτοῦ is borrowed from the LXX, which must have read מַטֶּה 'staff' instead of מִטָּה 'bed.'

Similar to this is the usage of 'head' to denote the beginning or source of something, e.g. in Gn 2^{10} the river which issued from the Garden of Eden was parted into four 'heads,' i.e. stream-beginnings (Dillm.), each of which became a river with a separate course (cf. the use of ראשׁ in Is 51^{20}, Ezk 16^{25} 21^{21}, where it means the beginning of roads and streets).

(d) Another very common metaphorical sense of 'head' or 'heads' is to denote the principal person or persons in a community (e.g. Ex 6$^{14.\ 25}$ 18^{25}, Nu 1$^{4.\ 16}$ 7^{2} 10^{4} 13^{3} 17^{3} 25$^{4.\ 15}$ 30^{1}, Dt 1^{15} 5^{23} 28$^{13.\ 44}$, Jos 22^{21}, 1 Ch 5^{24}, Is 9$^{14.\ 15}$ (where 'head' and 'tail' are opposed). Allied to this is the NT reference to the man as head of the woman Eph 5^{23}, and to Christ as head of the Church Eph 4^{15} 5^{23}, Col 1^{18} 2^{19} (where also the idea of the head as a vital part is probably included), and as head over all principalities and powers Col 2^{10}.

'Heads' are used in apocalyptic literature to denote kings or empires (cf. the golden head of the image seen in Nebuchadrezzar's dream, Dn 2^{32}, which represented that king and his dynasty; the four-headed beast of 7^{6}; the beast with seven heads and ten horns of Rev 13^{1}, with one of the heads wounded to death, v.^{3}, on all of which see DANIEL, REVELATION, and Bruston, Études sur Daniel et l'Apocalypse).

The circumstance that the head is a principal seat of life explains the words of Achish to David, 'I will make thee keeper of mine head' (1 S 28^{2}), i.e. body-guardsman; cf. Ps 140^{7} 'Thou hast covered (סַכּוֹתָה) my head in the day of battle'; Dn 1^{10} 'endanger my head.' The head of an enemy might be cut off and exhibited as a trophy, or as a proof of death, Jg 7^{25}, 1 S 17$^{54.\ 57}$ 31^{9}, 2 S 4^{7} 20$^{21f.}$, 2 K 10$^{6ff.}$. Swearing by the head is mentioned as a Jewish practice in Mt 5^{36}. The character of the head as a vital part accounts also for certain superstitions connected with the head of a sacrificial victim. While in Ex 12^{9} it is expressly enjoined that the head and viscera of the paschal lamb are to be eaten, a different practice was widely followed amongst Orientals. The same taboo attached to the head as to the blood. Among the Egyptians the head * of the victim was thrown into the Nile, while by the Iranians it was dedicated to Haoma, that the immortal part of the animal might return to him. A dried human head or the head of an animal was frequently used by the Semites as a charm (W. R. Smith, RS 359, 362, 449, 456).

Jacob placed his hands upon the heads of Ephraim and Manasseh as a symbol of conveying the blessing to them (Gn 48$^{14ff.}$; cf. Gn 49^{26}, Pr 10^{6} 11^{26}). In like manner, evil is spoken of as being requited or returning on one's head (Jg 9^{57}, 2 Ch 6^{23} etc.). The laying of one's hands on the head of a sacrificial victim (Ex 29^{15}, Lv 1^{4} 4$^{29.\ 33}$ etc.) is very frequently interpreted as a symbolical transference of sin to the animal; but while this is distinctly recognized in the case of the scape-goat (Lv 16^{21}), it is not so certainly implied for the ordinary burnt-offering (see W. R. Smith, RS 401 f.).

The hoary head is a symbol of old age (Lv 19^{32}, 1 K 2$^{6.\ 9}$, Pr 16^{31}, Is 46^{4}, cf. Job 41^{32}); it is to be honoured, Lv 19^{32}; it is pronounced a crown of glory, the reward of uprightness, Pr 16^{31}.

While the general sense of the expression, 'heap coals of fire upon the head' (Pr 25^{22}, Ro 12^{20}) is clear enough (St. Paul paraphrases, 'Overcome evil with good'), its origin is somewhat uncertain (see Wildeboer, Reuss, etc., on Pr; and Meyer, Godet, Sanday-Headlam, etc., on Ro, ad loc.). A good illustration of the working of the principle is supplied by the words of Saul to David, 1 S 24^{17} 26^{21}.

To lift up the head, when spoken of oneself, may mean to recover from disaster (Jg 8^{28}, Zec 1^{21}), or, generally, to succeed or to carry oneself proudly Ps 83^{3} 110^{7} (cf. its use in 24^{7} of gates and see Wellh. ad loc. in Haupt's PB). To 'lift up the head' of another is used of raising to honour (Gn 40^{13} of Pharaoh's chief butler, 2 K 25^{27} of the captive king Jehoiachin, who was taken out of prison by Evil-Merodach). In Gn 40^{19}, with a designed contrast to the treatment of the butler, it is said that Pharaoh will 'lift up the head of the chief baker from off (מֵעַל) him,' the reference being to beheading.

When Elisha was told that 'the LORD will take away thy master from thy head' (2 K 2$^{3.\ 5}$), the reference is probably to the custom of pupils sitting at the feet of their teacher (so Siegfried-Stade; cf. Ac 22^{3}).

To wag or shake the head was a sign of contempt or of malicious enjoyment, Ps 64^{8} (RV), Jer 18^{16} (both נוד), La 2^{15} (נוע); cf. Ps 44^{14}, Jer 48^{27} (both מְנוֹד ראשׁ 'a shaking of the head'); Mt 27^{39}, Mk 15^{29} (κινοῦντες τὰς κεφαλάς, of the men who derided the suffering Saviour).

The head of one under a vow was not shaven till its completion (Nu 6$^{18ff.}$, Ac 18^{18} 21^{24}). See further under NAZIRITE. The Israelites were forbidden to 'round the corners of their heads' (Lv 19^{27}) in token of mourning (cf. Dt 14^{1}, where 'making baldness between the eyes' refers to the custom of shaving the front part of the head; see Driver, ad loc., and on Am 8^{10}, and W. R. Smith, RS 306 f.).

Anointing the head was a common practice amongst the Jews (Ps 23^{5}, Mt 6^{17} 26^{7}, Mk 14^{3}, Lk 7^{46}). See further under ANOINTING.

To cover (חָפָה) the head was a token of mourning [2 S 15^{30} David and his men when fleeing from Absalom, Jer 14^{3}, Est 6^{12} (‖ אָבֵל)]. The same was expressed by putting the hand upon the head (2 S 13^{19} Tamar after Amnon's outrage) or putting ashes (אֵפֶר) or earth (אֲדָמָה) upon it (Jos 7^{6}, 1 S 4^{12}, 2 S 1^{2} 13^{19}, La 2^{10}). It is possible that this custom is alluded to in Am 2^{7} 'that pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor,' i.e. who are so avaricious that they are eager to secure even the dust strewn upon their heads by the poor in token of their distress (see full discussion in Driver, ad loc.).

To have the head covered (κατακαλύπτεσθαι) in the Christian assemblies is enjoined upon women by St.

* Which was regarded as a special seat of the soul.

Paul (1 Co 11^{5}). The contrary rule applies to men (v.^{4}). Much obscurity attaches to v.^{10} 'For this cause ought the woman to have power (ἐξουσίαν, RV '[a sign of] authority,' AVm i.e. 'a covering, in sign that she is under the power of her husband,' RVm 'authority over') on her head because of the angels' (διὰ τοὺς ἀγγέλους). This passage will be fully discussed in art. POWER (see also WH's remarks on the text). It may be noted, meanwhile, that what is emphasized is the presence of angels in the sanctuary, and not the ordinary Jewish notion (Taylor, Sayings of the Fathers^{2}, p. 156) about guardian angels, two of whom were supposed to be always in attendance on every human being.

It is generally supposed that in Est 7^{8} there is an allusion to a Persian custom of covering the head or face in token of sentence of death (so Oxf. Heb. Lex., V. Ryssel in Kautzsch's AT, etc.). In support of this interpretation appeal is made to a similar custom among the Romans ('Caput obnubito, infelici arbori suspendito,' Cic. pro Robirio, iv. 13) and the Macedonians ('Capite velato in regiam adducunt,' Quint. Curt. vi. 8. 22). But in the Rev. Biblique Internat. (April 1898, p. 258 ff.) A. Condamin gives reasons for doubting whether either of these passages is relevant. Some evidence from such a quarter as Herodotus would be much more to the point. Moreover, the LXX have evidently followed a different text, or at least have interpreted differently from the MT (וּפְנֵי הָמָן חָפוּ) and the Vulg. (operuerunt faciem eius). They give Ἀμὰν δὲ ἀκούσας διετράπη τῷ προσώπῳ (cf. Jos. Ant. XI. vi. 11, Ἀμάνου δὲ πρὸς τοῦτο καταπλαγέντος καὶ μηδὲν ἔτι φθέγξασθάι δυνηθέντος). Condamin maintains that the order of the words in MT and the absence of אֶת־ with פְּנֵי plead in favour of this tr^{n}, 'the face of Haman became troubled' (so Siegfried-Stade, Hamans Gesicht verschleierte = verdüsterte sich). The context also he uses in support of his interpretation. If the MT חפו (either Qal or Pual) is considered insufficient to support the LXX rendering, it would be easy, he points out, to emend to חפרו. It may be added that חָפָה is never used elsewhere of covering the face but always the head (cf. Est 6^{12}, 2 S 15^{30}, Jer 14^{3}). When the face is spoken of, the verbs employed are כִּסָּה (Job 9^{24} 23^{17} 24^{15} etc.) or הִסְתִּיר (Ex 3^{6}, Job 13^{24} etc.).

With the Hebrews not the head but the heart was the seat of intellect. See HEART.

HEADBAND.—See BAND and DRESS.

HEADSTONE is erroneously printed in mod. edd. of AV as one word; in 1611 it is 'head stone' (as RV), and means simply the topmost stone of the building.

HEADTIRE.—See DRESS and TIRE.

HEADY.—This is the tr^{n} in 2 Ti 3^{4} AV of προπετής, which in Ac 19^{36}, its only remaining occurrence in NT, is tr^{d} 'rashly' (RV 'rash'). Heady is from Tindale; and has been adopted by all the VSS thereafter, except Rhem. 'stubburne,' and RV which uses its mod. equivalent in this sense, 'headstrong.'* In enumerating 'the heap of inconveniences that spring by intemperate and superfluous eating and drinking,' Tindale says (Expositions, p. 93, on Mt 6^{16-18}), 'Our fashions of eating make us slothful, and unlusty to labour and study; unstable, inconstant, and light-mannered; full of wits, after-witted (as we call it), incircumspect, inconsiderate, heady, rash, and hasty to begin unadvisedly, and without casting of perils.' Calvin (in Golding's tr^{n}) uses the word of Job's passions (on Job 32^{1-3}), 'Seeing then that Job had so heady passions, no doubt but in so dooing hee made himselfe more rightuous than God.' High-mind and Heady are the names of the guns which the inhabitants of Mansoul placed at Ear-gate to keep the King's forces out (Bunyan, Holy War, p. 50). Bp. Hall uses the word as equivalent to hasty (Works, ii. 109, on 'Zacheus'), 'There must be no more hast than good speed in our performances; we may offend as well in our heddye acceleration, as in our delay; Moses ran so fast downe the hill that he stumbled spiritually, and brake the Tables of God.' J. HASTINGS.

HEALTH.—This word has become greatly narrowed in meaning since 1611. Now restricted to the state of the body, it then expressed also the condition of the soul, the relation to God of the whole person. Hence in 'Morning Prayer,' 'We have left undone those things which we ought to have done, and we have done those things which we ought not to have done, and there is no health in us,' which has retained its place since the Pr. Bk. of 1552. But in the Communion Service, 'health' of 1604, 'And as the Son of God did vouchsafe to yield up his soul by death upon the cross for your health,' is found as 'salvation' in 1662. So we find in Wyc., Ac 28^{28} 'Therfore be it knowen to you, for to hethen men this helthe of God is sent'; and in Tind. (as well as in Wyc.), Lk 19^{9} 'This day is healthe come unto this housse.' Cf. also Erasmus, On the Creed, p. 40, 'The first degre [=step] than unto helthe is Credere deum esse (id est) to believe that there is God.' This is the meaning of 'health' in Ps 42^{11} 43^{5} 'Who is the health of my countenance' (Wyc. 'the helthe of my chere'). The Heb. is יְשׁוּעָה, which is tr^{d} 'salvation' in Ps 62^{1}, Is 56^{1} (Wyc. as usual 'helthe,' Cov. 'savynge health'), and elsewhere. In Ps 62^{2} the word is used of the person, 'He only is my rock and my salvation' (='saviour,' which is Cheyne's tr^{n} in Ps 42^{11} 43^{5}; RVm gives 'help,' which is Coverdale's word). Again in Ps 67^{2} 'That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations'; 'saving health' stands for the same Heb. word (Wyc. 'helthe'; 'savynge health' being from Coverdale, who uses the phrase in other places, as Is 51^{8} 'But my rightuousness shal endure for ever, and my savynge health from generacion to generacion').

But 'health' was often used in a still wider sense, denoting the prosperity or safety of a person or a place. As expressing 'safety' it occurs in Ac 27^{34} 'Wherefore I pray you to take some meat: for this is for your health' (σωτηρία, RV 'safety'). Cf. Ac 27^{20} Wyc. 'Sothely nether sunne nether sterris apperinge bi mo dayes, and tempest not litil schewinge nygh, now al the hope of oure heelthe was don awey.' See MEDICINE.

J. HASTINGS.

HEART, לֵב or לֵבָב, καρδία.—In the AV of the OT other Hebrew expressions for the inward parts of the body are also rendered by 'heart': e.g. קֶרֶב in Ps 39^{3}, מֵעַי Ps 40^{8}. 'Heart' has thus the general sense of the midst, the innermost or hidden part of anything, in such instances as the 'heart of the sea,' Ex 15^{8}; of heaven, Dt 4^{11} (RV and AVm); of a tree, 2 S $18^{14\text{ff.}}$; of the earth, Mt 12^{40}.

But its ruling use is (1) for the bodily organ, of the centrality of which as the seat of life the ancients had on the whole a correct view. Since in Bible phrase 'the life is in the blood' (Lv 17^{14}), that organ which forms the centre of its distribution must have the most important place in the whole system. So by an easy transition 'heart' came (2) to signify the seat of man's collective energies, the focus of the personal life.

This secondary or psychical meaning it holds unchanged and undisputed through the whole of the biblical writings. Its prominence as a psychological term in the Scriptures and in other ancient books is no doubt due partly to the fact that the physical heart bulked so much more largely in the view of those times than the head or brain. How rarely are any functions of thought attributed to the latter in the OT (see only Dn 2^{28} $4^{2.\,7.\,10}$ $7^{1.\,15}$ as exceptions). This fact introduces the only difference in the Bible use of 'heart' metaphorically from that of everyday modern speech. As from the fleshly heart goes forth the blood in which is the animal life, so from the heart of the human soul goes forth the entire mental and moral activity. To it also all the actions of the human soul return. 'In corde actiones animæ humanæ ad ipsum redeunt' (Roos). There the soul is at home with itself, becomes conscious of doing and suffering as its own. 'The heart knoweth the bitterness of the soul,' or 'of itself' (Pr 14^{10}).

* Headstrong occurs in AV, Sir 30^{8}, of a horse, as tr^{n} of σκληρός.

Heart is therefore the organ of conscience, of self-knowledge, and indeed of all knowledge. For though the reflective function is prominent, we must note that all inner human movements are denoted by this word in Scripture; the rational and intellectual as well as other. This is the main distinction between the biblical and the modern usage of the word. In the OT it by no means signifies mainly or only the emotional or volitional elements in human nature, but pre-eminently the intellectual (hence אֵין לֵב = 'without understanding'). It is only in the later Scriptures that the Greek habit of distinguishing the rational from the emotional finds place.

The following analysis of the OT uses of לֵבָב and לֵב is abridged from that of Oxf. Heb. Lexicon :—

1. Of the inner man in contrast with the outer; opposed to flesh Ps 73^{26}, garments Jl 2^{13}, hands Ps 73^{13}, La 3^{41} (?), eyes Nu 15^{39}, 1 S 16^{7}, ears Ezk 3^{10}, mouth Dt 30^{14}, speech Ps 28^{3} 78^{18}.

2. The inner man, comprehending mind, affections, will; note e.g. the frequent 'with all the heart and with all the soul' (בְּכָל־לֵבָב וּבְכָל־נֶפֶשׁ) Dt 4^{29} 6^{5} and oft.; cf. 'what is in the heart' (אֲשֶׁר בִּלְבָב) Dt 8^{2}, 'with the heart' (עִם לֵבָב) Dt 8^{5}.

3. With specific reference to mind, e.g. אַנְשֵׁי לֵבָב 'men of mind' Job $34^{10.\,34}$, knowledge Dt 8^{5}, 1 K 2^{44}, thinking, reflection, Is 10^{7}, memory 1 S 21^{12}.

4. With specific reference to inclinations, resolutions, determinations of the will, e.g. 'set the mind to' (אֶל־) 1 S 7^{3}, 1 Ch 29^{18}, 'Pharaoh's mind was changed' (יֵהָפֵךְ ל׳ פ׳) Ex 14^{5}.

5. With specific reference to conscience, 'my heart (i.e. conscience) shall not reproach me' Job 27^{6}.

6. With specific reference to moral character: God tries the heart 1 Ch 29^{17}; 'uprightness of heart' Dt 9^{5}, heart perfect with (עִם) 1 K 8^{61}; heart as seat of naughtiness 1 S 17^{28} (?), pride Ps 101^{5}; heart circumcised or uncircumcised Dt 10^{16}, Lv 26^{41}, hardened Dt 2^{30}.

7. Heart=the man himself, Dt 7^{17} 8^{17} 9^{4}, Is 14^{13}.

8. As seat of the appetites, Ps 104^{15}.

9. As seat of emotions and passions, e.g. joy Is 30^{29}, trouble 1 K 8^{38}, anger Dt 19^{6}, hate Lv 19^{17}.

10. As seat of courage (for which usually רוּחַ) Dn 11^{25}.

Because it is the focus of the personal life, the workplace for the appropriation and assimilation of every influence, in 'heart,' according to Scripture, lies the moral and religious condition of the man. Only what enters the heart forms a possession of moral worth, only what comes from the heart is a moral production. The Bible places human depravity in the 'heart' because sin is a principle which has its seat in the centre of man's inward life, and thence 'defiles' the whole circuit of his action (Mt $15^{19.\,20}$). On the other hand, it regards the 'heart' as the sphere of divine influence, the starting-point of all moral renovation: 'The work of the law written in their hearts' (Ro 2^{15}); 'A new heart will I give you' (Ezk 36^{26}); 'Purifying their hearts by faith' (Ac 15^{9}). Once more, the 'heart' as lying deep within contains 'the hidden man' (1 P 3^{4}), the real man. It represents the true character, but conceals it; hence it is contrasted with the 'outward appearance,' and is declared to be the index of character only for Him who 'searches the heart and tries the reins of the children of men' (1 S 16^{7}; Jer 17^{10} 20^{12}).

This scriptural usage—making the heart the source of the moral life—lends firmness and simplicity to its teachings about sin and grace. That man's moral corruption is seated in his heart means that not the substance of human nature or the personality of man is perverted, but his principles of action. That the saving process begins with 'a new heart' means that not another self or personality is substituted, but that new principles of action are introduced. Hence the whole doctrine of sin and grace is biblically grounded in a way to free it from mistake or exaggeration.

On the relation of the term Heart to Soul, Spirit, Reins, Conscience, see under these words.

HEARTH.—The word 'hearth' is found in seven passages of our AV, in all of which, with one exception (Is 30^{14}), it has been discarded by the Revisers. On the other hand, it has been introduced three times into their text (Lv 6^{9} [Heb.^{2}], Ezk $43^{15.\,16}$), and once besides in an explanatory note in the margin (Is 29^{1}; for all of these see No. 4 below).

1. The primitive domestic hearth was a mere depression in the earthen floor of the living-room, where the family meal was cooked, and around which, in the cold season, the family gathered for warmth. The Hebrew name for the hearth was perhaps מוֹקֵד môḳēd (Ps 102^{3} [Heb.^{4}] 'my bones are burned as an hearth' AV; but RV has 'as a firebrand,' cf. LXX φρύγιον, with the former rendering in the margin). This word would thus be identical in meaning as well as in form with the Arabic mauḳid.* The nearly allied יְקוֹד (Is 30^{14}), by AV and RV rendered 'hearth,' is more strictly the burning mass, a meaning which many would give to moḳed (see both words in Oxf. Heb. Lex.). The same uncertainty attaches to the form מוֹקְדָה môḳĕdah (Lv 6^{9} [Heb.^{2}] 'the burnt-offering shall be on the hearth' RV; 'on its firewood' RVm), which is probably not an independent word, but the masc. form (môḳēd) with suffix (so Dillm., Strack, etc.). A detailed description of the modern Syrian hearth (mauḳdi) is given by Landberg (Proverbes et Dictons, pp. 73, 74), with illustration (p. 455). The smoke from the hearth, on which various kinds of fuel, wood, charcoal, dung, etc. (see COAL, FUEL) were burned, escaped as best it might through door or latticed window (אֲרֻבָּה, Hos 13^{3} AV, RV 'chimney'), since chimneys were unknown (see CHIMNEY).

2. In the houses of the wealthier classes, at least, braziers or chafing dishes were in common use. Thus Jehoiakim on a memorable occasion had Jeremiah's roll 'consumed in the fire that was in the brazier' (הָאָח Jer $36^{22.\,23}$ RV; AV in each case 'on the hearth'; LXX ἐπι τῆς ἐσχάρας, which is ambiguous) in his 'winter house.' A similar firepan is referred to in Zec 12^{6} ('like a pan of fire' כִּיּוֹר אֵשׁ; so RV, but AV 'like a hearth of fire'). Cf. for NT times Jn 18^{18} 21^{9}.

3. In Gn 18^{6} Sarah is requested to 'make cakes upon the hearth' (AV), for which RV has, more literally, 'make cakes.' The cakes in question, termed 'ugôth (עֻגוֹת), were really baked 'upon the hearth' by being covered with the hot ashes, and are therefore accurately rendered by the Vulgate subcinericios panes (LXX ἐγκρυφίας). See BREAD, vol. i. p. 318.

4. We have seen (under No. 1 above) that, according to a possible interpretation, the top of the altar of burnt-offering was known as its 'hearth' (Lv 6^{9} [Heb.^{2}] in RV). This is confirmed by the description in Sirach of Simon the high priest standing 'by the hearth of the altar' (ἑστὼς παρ' ἐσχάρᾳ βωμοῦ, Sir 50^{12}). The upper portion of the altar also receives a special name from Ezekiel, viz. 'Arî'ēl (הָֽאֲרִיאֵל, so Kerê $43^{15.16}$), the origin and precise significance of which are uncertain. Most recent scholars are in favour of the meaning adopted by the Revisers, 'altar hearth' (AV wrongly 'altar.'*).

The enigmatical term Ariel (אֲרִיאֵל), by which Isaiah ($29^{1ff.}$) designates Jerusalem, is also, by various modern writers, understood in this sense of 'altar hearth' (cf. RVm 'hearth of God.' See comm. of Duhm and Skinner, in loc.; also ARIEL in vol. i. with reff. there, to which add Cheyne, Isaiah, in Haupt's 'Polychrome Bible').

HEATH (עַרְעָר 'ar'ar, עֲרוֹעֵר 'ărô'êr, ἀγριομυρίκη, ὄνος ἄγριος, myrica).—This is AV translation of the Hebrew name of a plant growing in the desert, doubtless identical with the 'ar'ar of the Arabs, Juniperus Phœnicea, L., which grows on the W. face of the range of the mountains of Edom, overlooking the 'Arabah. Its branches, clothed with minute scale-like leaves, may well entitle it to the name 'naked tree' (AVm Jer 48^{6}). In this and the only other passage where the word occurs (Jer 17^{6}), RVm has 'a tamarisk tree.' There is another species of Juniper, called by the Arabs 'ar'ar. It is J. oxycedrus, L. This species is not, however, a desert plant. It grows in the middle and subalpine regions of Syria. It is unlikely that this is the plant referred to. One species of heath, Erica verticillata, Forsk., grows on sandstone and chalky rocks, at an altitude of from 300 to 3500 ft., on the W. face of Lebanon and the chains to the northward. This cannot be the plant intended. There are no heaths in the desert.

G. E. POST.

HEATHEN.—The title 'Nations' in Scripture (Heb. Goiim, Gr. Ethnē), originally covering the nations of the world as a whole, soon comes to designate exclusively the non-Jews, the uncircumcised. Scripture casts its view, and it is a sympathetic view, over the whole human race, before it treats of the forefathers of the Israelites in particular. Though many of the Jews of later times became proudly exclusive in their treatment of those who did not belong to the privileged people, the religion of Scripture gives no warrant for such an attitude on their part; it is fundamentally characterized by the spirit of humanity. The synopsis of the peoples of the earth given in Gn 10, by connecting them all with Noah, presents them as related to each other like kinsmen. Dillmann (Genesis, p. 176) points out how other races too, Egyptians and Phœnicians, Assyrians and Babylonians, even Indians and Persians, had a certain knowledge of the earth and its inhabitants, but usually paid little attention to foreigners, except when influenced by political or commercial reasons, and often despised them as mere barbarians. 'Here in Genesis, on the other hand, all the peoples that were known by repute, most of whom could not have stood in any intimate relation to the countrymen of the writer, are included in his survey. All the divisions of mankind are collected in a genealogical tree, and Israel is held to be only an ordinary branch on the stock of universal humanity.' The same breadth of outlook is indicated in the announcements that God created man in His own image (Gn 1^{27}), that He blessed Noah and his sons, and assigned a penalty for the shedding of man's blood (Gn $9^{1.6}$). Even in giving the promise of special favour to Abraham and his seed, God showed Himself gracious to the other inhabitants of the world as well. One race was chosen and disciplined for the ultimate good of the whole. In Abraham all the families of the earth were to be blessed (Gn 12^{3}).

At the same time, we see the severest treatment of the heathen approved of in the OT. Efforts were made to extirpate the Canaanites after the land of Pal. was entered, and the OT represents that it was a great sin to spare them (Ex $23^{27ff.}$, Nu $33^{52ff.}$, Dt $20^{16ff.}$). The disaster that befell the Canaanites is viewed, however, as the consequence of their utter moral corruption, their grievous sin against the light of nature; the reflection stirred by their ruin is comparable to that which is now occasioned by the action of inexorable laws of Providence on demoralized nations of modern times. Israel was commanded to make no marriages with the inhabitants of the land that remained (Jos 23^{12}), and to make no league with them (Jg 2^{2}). The prophets had an arduous struggle to keep Israel's worship of J" separate from that which was contaminated by the idolatrous heathen rites as practised on the high places. Heathenism, with its distinguishing feature of idolatry, remained a congenital faith, even to the people of God, and spiritual monotheism was a new thing which was, for obvious reasons, repugnant to them. The centralization of Jewish worship at the temple, as enjoined in Dt, was mainly due to the purpose of the prophets to isolate the chosen people from all their heathen neighbours. The natural, racial, inherited proclivities of the Israelites could not be extinguished, and the nation could not advance in the knowledge and service of the true God otherwise than by the method of seclusion from the surrounding tribes.

The prophets, however, far from cherishing a spirit of blind hostility towards the heathen, foresee the day when the nations will be gathered into the one family of God's people, having rest and comfort, and enjoying the blessings of the law that goes forth from Jerusalem. The golden age of the world, according to the OT, is in the future, and the heathen will participate in its glory (Is 40-66). The Bk. of Jonah sets forth God's tender regard for the heathen.

Jewish exclusiveness as towards the heathen culminates in the post-exilic age. The Jews being shorn of political influence, became the more confirmed in their devotion to their faith, and hedged it round with an elaborate system of ritual (the Levitical law). The barrier between them and the heathen thus became more impassable than ever.

As the Greeks spread along the shores of the Mediter., and their speech and customs became more prevalent (2 Mac $4^{10ff.}$), they, as the principal representatives, stood for the heathen generally (Ro 10^{12}, 1 Co 10^{32} 12^{13}, Gal 3^{28}; cf. Jn 7^{35}).

The Jewish view of the heathen is marked by conflicting elements, and needs to be superseded. The heathen are at once held in repugnance, and called to the highest honour.

Christianity was, in the first instance, a development and modification of Judaism. As the world had needed preparation for the coming of Christ, so He took up the work which was begun among the Jews and completed it. But the principle of universalism is involved in His doctrine of the kingdom of God as a kingdom of righteousness and love; in His doctrine of God as the Father of individual spirits, who welcomes the returning prodigal on the sole condition that he repents and has faith (Lk 15); or, again, in His announcement that God is a spirit, who must be worshipped in spirit and in truth (Jn 4^{23}). God is the Father of all, and the conditions of acceptance with God are such as all men can and ought to fulfil.

* For ההראל har'ēl, Ezk 43^{15a} (RV 'upper altar'), we should read as above האריאל, or perhaps throughout האראל, as on the Moabite Stone (Smend and Socin, lines 12, 17).

What was implicit in the doctrine of Christ on this matter was made explicit, after a period of conflict with the other apostles, by St. Paul. To the latter there is no distinction between Jews and Gentiles, except that the Jews, as being the better prepared, through the oracles of God entrusted to them, have the privilege of hearing the gospel first (Ro 3^{2}). But the Gentiles, too, have had a measure of training by the law, that which is known through nature and conscience; and if they turn to God and keep the law, their uncircumcision will be counted to them for circumcision (Ro $2^{14.\,26}$). In all this a continuous plan is seen to be worked out by God, for those who sincerely believe are the true descendants of Abraham, having his faith; and they are the truly circumcised, for true circumcision is of the heart (Ro 2 ff.).

According to the gospel, heathenism proves to be, not a matter of nationality, but of spirit and character. So in the OT the moral aspect of it is frequently emphasized, especially in the Psalms, where heathenism is often synonymous with wickedness. Its essence is set forth by Christ in Mt $6^{31.\,32}$. To the heathen mind God is a power that needs to be appeased or conciliated for worldly purposes. The world only is sought with desire—protection from disease or misfortune, material prosperity, enjoyment bodily or mental. By the faithful spirit, on the other hand, religion is made the first choice, and the God who is worshipped is seen in His true character, is recognized as the true God; He is reverenced as a righteous Spirit, and loved more than aught else for His fatherly goodness. In this way distinctions of race, name, or profession pass over into such as are moral and spiritual. See FOREIGNER, GENTILE, GER.

HEAVEN.—The word 'heaven' is used in a variety of senses in the OT and NT, but especially in that of the dwelling-place of God, the abode from which Christ came and to which He has returned, and the destination of the perfected saints. The etymological associations of the term are extensive. It is of uncertain root, though it may be connected with the Lat. capere, and the Eng. have and heave. It appears in different forms in many European languages, Sw. hefva, Da. haeve, Go. hafjan, Ic. hefja, hifinn, Ger. heben, OHG heffan, AS hebban, ME heuen; Chaucer, CT, 552; in Robert of Gloucester, however, hebben. (See Skeat, Etymol. Dict.^{2}).

In the OT it usually represents שָׁמַיִם, Aram. שְׁמַיִן, which expresses 'heaven' in respect of its height; and in the NT οὐρανός, οὐρανοί, which may be connected with ὄρνυμι=lift, heave (cf. Ger. Luft, Scot. 'the lift'), and the Vedic varuna, from var=tegere (see M. Müller, Oxford Essays, p. 41). In the LXX οὐρανός stands not only for שָׁמַיִם, שְׁמַיָּא, but also for אֵל, אֱלוֹהַּ, מָרוֹם, שַׁחַק, חוּצוֹת, תֵּבֵל, תְּהוֹם, רָקִיעַ. In our AV the word 'heaven' represents in addition to שָׁמַיִם mainly three words of different significations, רָקִיעַ, מָרוֹם, שְׁחָקִים. But there are also certain words of which it is erroneously made the equivalent. One of these is the term גַּלְגַּל, which expresses the idea of roundness, and is rendered 'heaven' in Ps 77^{18} (AV), as if it meant the 'round orb of the sky,' but which conveys rather the notion of a 'whirl,' and may be best rendered 'whirlwind' (so RV). Another is עֲרָבוֹת, in Ps 68^{4}, in the description of J″ riding 'on the heavens.' But while the term might be taken, as it is by some, in the sense of the large expanse of the sky, it is more accordant with its usual meaning to take it in the sense of 'deserts.' Another is the term עֲרִיפִים, which is rendered 'darkness' by the Syr. and the Vulg., and 'heavens' in the AV in Is 5^{30}; but it means properly 'droppings,' 'clouds,' and expresses probably the idea of the clouds ready to discharge their rains. In Ps $89^{6.\,37}$, too, the word שַׁחַק is rendered 'heaven,' which properly denotes 'dust,' and may best be rendered the 'clouds' or the 'skies.'

The chief ideas attached to the word 'heaven' in the OT, therefore, are the following. It is used (1) in the largest sense, to signify the one half of the whole system of things, the upper division of the created world, the phrase 'the heavens and the earth' expressing the universe as a whole (Gn 1^{1}). More specifically it is used (2) to denote the firmament (στερέωμα), the sky, the expanse which God made on the second day of His creative work, after the formation of the 'earth' and the institution of 'day' and 'night' (Gn $1^{6.\,8}$). This 'expanse' is represented as dividing the waters above from the waters beneath. In speaking of it in its different aspects, the OT writers employ a great variety of terms, both literal and boldly metaphorical, which naturally move within the limits of the popular conceptions that prevailed among the Semitic and other ancient peoples on the subject of the system of things, and the place which the earth held in it as its centre and the proper object of God's creative action. The simple ideas which meet us in ancient Greek poetry (cf. Homer, Il. xvii. 425, Od. iii. 2; Pindar, Ol. Od. 10, Nem. vi. 3) and in the oldest literature of the East (e.g. the Vedic hymns, the Babylonian tablets, etc.), are also expressed in the OT. The 'firmament,' or vault of heaven, is described in terms of a strong cover, curtain, or roof provided for the earth (Is 40^{22}, Ps 104^{2}), resting on pillars, on the mountains and the waters of the earth (2 S 22^{8}, Job 26^{11}, Pr $8^{27\text{-}29}$). Its beauty is described as that of crystal or sapphire (Ex 24^{10}, Job 37^{18}, Ezk $1^{26\text{-}28}$). It is represented as the region of the fowls, the winds, the clouds (Dn 4^{12} $7^{2.\,13}$). In it the ancient Hebrews, like the Greeks and Romans (cf. Plutarch, De plac. phil. 2^{14}, Pliny, 2^{39}), conceived God to have placed the fixed stars and the planets (Gn 1^{17}, Is 14^{12} 34^{4}).

It is used also (3) to denote the peculiar abode of Deity, with which the ideas of elevation, majesty, glory, power, holiness, unchangeableness are associated. It is the place to which prayer ascends (2 Ch 30^{27}), which makes J″'s throne (Is 6^{1} 66^{1}), which is His peculiar possession in contrast with the earth which He has given to the sons of men (Ps 115^{16}). It is the 'height' or 'heights' (Job 22^{12}, Ps 148^{1}), supramundane, above the firmament and all created things (Ps $29^{3.\,10}$ $104^{2.\,3}$). As the dwelling-place of God it is described in terms of a temple, a sanctuary, a palace, a throne (Ps 11^{4}, Mic 1^{2}, Hab 2^{20} etc.). The ideas of the supramundane abode are taken so naturally from the visible things of the mundane holy place, which was the centre of the Jewish worship of God and the place where He was specially to be found, that it is sometimes difficult to say which of the two was immediately in the writer's thought (e.g. in Is 6; see Riehm, HW, under the word Himmel). It is the place, too, in which God has His court of angels (Job 1^{6} 2^{1}, implicitly). But while it is often thus spoken of as the peculiar habitation of God, it is also described as incapable of containing Him, and the prophets declare His greatness to be such as to surpass all the bounds of space and all idea of residence within the limits even of the heaven of heavens (Is 40^{12} 66^{1}; cf. 1 K 8^{27}).

But it is also used, (4), in the eschatological sense, to express the new constitution of things which shall in the end take the place of the present imperfect order. In many passages the quality of the changeless and enduring is ascribed to 'heaven,' especially in contrast with the mutable earth and the perishable life of man (Jos 11^{21}, Ps $72^{5.\ 7.\ 17}$ 89^{29}, Jer $31^{35.\ 36}$ $33^{25.\ 26}$). But it is also exhibited as an aspect of the changeful and transitory, as contrasted with the changeless being and eternal years of God Himself (Ps 102^{25-27}, Is 51^{6}). And the OT looks forward to a day of divine judgment, the issue of which shall be the dissolution of the present order, the renewal of the system of things, and the creation of a glorious condition of which a restored heaven shall form part (Is 65^{17} 66^{22}).

The NT takes over the general OT idea of 'heaven,' but with certain differences and enlargements. It has the same general conception of 'heaven' as a region above earth. As the OT speaks of a ladder reaching to heaven (Gn 28^{12}), of Elijah as going 'up' in a whirlwind to heaven (2 K 2^{11}), of the 'heights' of heaven (Job 11^{8}), etc., so the NT speaks of the angels of God ascending and descending in relation to heaven (Jn 1^{51}), of St. Paul as 'caught up' to the third heaven (2 Co 12^{2}), of St. John as seeing a door opened in heaven and hearing a voice saying, 'Come up hither' (Rev 4^{1}), of the holy city as descending from God out of heaven (Rev 21^{2}), etc. In the NT it is also the name given to the peculiar dwelling-place of God, and Christ's doctrine of God as our 'Father in heaven' adds to the OT conception of its majesty and remoteness and holiness the new ideas of security, grace, and love. The whole conception of heaven as the habitation of Deity is made more definite by its being presented as the scene of the present life and activity of Christ. It is the place from which He came to earth and to which He re-ascended (Mk 16^{19}, Lk 24^{51}, Ac 1^{11}); the habitation which 'must receive' Him 'until the times of the restitution of all things' (Ac 3^{21}); the scene of His present reign and His present work. In heaven He is in 'the presence of God' (He 9^{24}), and there His glory can be seen (Jn 17^{24}). The scene of Christ's risen life and the work of intercession which He carries on in it are described with special fulness in the Ep. to the Heb., and in terms of the ancient Jewish sanctuary, its conditions, its sanctities, and its services (He $8^{1\text{ etc.}}$ 9^{24}). Heaven is also the abode of the angels (Mt 18^{10} 22^{30}, Rev 3^{5}), and the place from which the Holy Ghost is sent down (1 P 1^{12}).

It is chiefly in its eschatological applications that the word 'heaven' is used in the NT. The idea of a renewal of heaven as well as earth that is associated in the OT with the judgment of the end, is given more distinctly in the NT. In certain large and significant passages the NT speaks of a redemption of the whole creation from the bondage of corruption (Ro 8^{21}), of a gathering together and a reconciliation of things in heaven as well as things on earth (Eph 1^{10}, Col 1^{20}), of a time of the restitution of all things (Ac 3^{21}), of a day when all things shall be made new (Rev 21^{5}), of the formation of a 'new heaven' as well as 'a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness' (2 P $3^{12.\ 13}$, Rev 21^{1}). The NT associates this renewal of the heavens with Christ's Second Coming and the Final Judgment, and connects the hope of a new scene and order for man's life with that of the final perfection of his life. Further, in the NT 'heaven' is in particular the final home of the righteous. It is the place which Christ has gone to prepare for them (Jn 14^{2}), the place from which He is to come with His holy angels (Mt 24^{30}, Mk 13^{26}, Lk 21^{27}, Rev 1^{7}) for the final arbitrament of things, and into which His own shall be received that they may be with Him and see His glory (Mt 5^{12}, Lk 6^{23}, 2 Cor 5^{1}, Eph 6^{9}, He 10^{34} etc.). So it is the sum of all good, and the goal of man's hope (Mt 6^{19}, Lk 6^{23} 10^{20}, Ph 3^{20}, 1 P 1^{4}, He 12^{23}).

There are other questions regarding the 'heaven' of the Bible which are of interest and require consideration. Some relate to the use of the term, others to the ideas of heaven which find expression in the Scriptures. Among these is the question whether the word 'heaven' or 'heavens' occurs either in the OT or in the NT as a metonymy for God. The Jew of later times had so exaggerated a sense of the sanctity of the divine name, that he did not allow himself to utter the most proper designation of God, but had recourse to equivalents. There is abundant evidence to show that by our Lord's time the word 'heaven' or 'heavens' was in frequent use in this way; and it is held by not a few competent scholars that the Jewish formula מַלְכוּת שָׁמַיִם is an instance of this, and that St. Matthew's phrase, 'the kingdom of heaven,' is literally the same as 'the kingdom of God,' which is the expression of the other evangelists and of St. Paul (see Cremer, Bib.-theol. Lex., sub voce βασιλεία; Thayer's Lex., sub voce οὐρανός; Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 265; Jhrb. f. prot. Theol. 1876, p. 166, etc.; Schürer, HJP, Eng. tr. div. II. vol. ii. p. 171). The instances of this use furnished by the Bible are at the best very scanty, and even the most probable cases are negatived by many. There seems, however, to be at least one sufficiently clear instance in the OT (Dn 4^{26}), and another, though more disputable, in the NT (Lk 15^{18}), where, however, it may be (as it is taken, e.g., by Meyer and others) a personification of the heavenly world 'as injured and offended.'

Another question is whether the conception of a series of heavens is found in the Scriptures. This has been answered in the negative, and the terms which seem to imply the influence of such a conception have been taken for plurals of majesty, or large, rhetorical expressions of the idea of infinity. But the evidence is all in favour of the affirmative answer. The plural form of the Hebrew word points in that direction. Much more decidedly is this the case with such forms as 'the heaven of heavens' (Dt 10^{14}, 1 K 8^{27}, Ps 148^{4}), 'all the heavens' (Eph 4^{10} RV), 'the third heaven' (2 Co 12^{2}). The same may be said of the peculiar phrase 'in the heavenly places,' or 'in the heavenlies' (ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις), which occurs five times in the Ep. to the Eph. ($1^{3.\ 20}$ 2^{6} 3^{10} 6^{12}), and has in each a local sense. To which must be added the idea of Christ as the great High Priest who has 'passed through the heavens' (He 4^{14}), and is 'made higher than the heavens' (He 7^{26}). The affirmative reply is also in harmony with the fact that the idea of a plurality of heavens prevailed among other ancient peoples, and in particular among those that were in contact with the Jewish nation at different periods of its history, such as the Babylonians and the Persians. This conclusion is further confirmed by the large place which is given to this idea in the Rabbinical literature, and in the apocalyptic and other pseudepigraphic books, both Jewish and Christian,—especially the Slavonic Enoch, the apocalyptic parts of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, 4 Ezra, the Ascension of Isaiah, the Apocalypses of Moses, Ezra, John, Isaac, Jacob.

With this is connected the further question whether the plurality that is recognized is one of three heavens or of seven. It has been thought by some that only the idea of a series of three heavens is found in Scripture. It has been pronounced by some (Estius, Le Clerc, Bengel) to be the doctrine of the Bible that there are only three heavens. Origen (Con. Cels. vi. p. 289) denied that St. Paul had the idea of seven heavens, and the idea of a threefold heaven obtained a considerable place in the Church (Suicer, Thes. ii. p. 520, etc.). But the evidence which bears out the existence of the idea of a plurality of heavens also favours the idea of a sevenfold series of heavens. Among the Babylonians a sevenfold division of heavens seems to have prevailed. They had the conception of seven world-zones; they surrounded their cities, Erech and Ecbatana, with seven walls; they thought of hell as divided into seven parts by seven walls. And though no explicit reference to it appears to have been discovered as yet among the inscriptions, it is reasonable to suppose that their heaven was also divided into seven sections (Jensen, Kosm. der Babyl. pp. 232–252; Sayce, Hib. Lect. pp. 221–227). In the Zoroastrian books, but not in the earliest, we find the idea of a succession of seven heavens, which were traversed by Sosioch in seven days, Zarathrustra himself occupying a golden throne in the seventh. The Jews were familiar, too, with the planets, of which four are mentioned by name in the OT (2 K 17^{30}, Am 5^{26}, Is 14^{12} 46^{1} 65^{11}). The same conception of seven heavens appears to have been almost universal among the Rabbis, only R. Juda being mentioned as diverging from the general doctrine, and teaching the existence of but two heavens. The pseudepigraphic writings, and very definitely the Slavonic Enoch and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, give the same enumeration of the heavens, and describe them at length. It is hazardous to infer, as Meyer does, from the notice of Paradise in 2 Co 12^{4} that St. Paul thought of it as higher than the third heaven and belonging to a fourth heaven; for in the pseudepigraphic literature Paradise is repeatedly represented as being in the third heaven. But, in view of the evidence, the most reasonable conclusion is that the conception of the heavens which pervades the OT and the NT (not excepting the Pauline writings, though St. Paul mentions only the third heaven and Paradise) is that of a series of seven heavens.

This idea of a plurality of heavens as it appears in the Biblical writings, however, is free from the extravagances and puerilities which we find associated with it in the extra-canonical literature. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, e.g., curious details are given of each of the several heavens. The first is full of darkness and gloom; the second, of fire, ice, and snow. The third contains the hosts that are to execute judgment on the spirits of deceit and of Beliar. In the fourth are thrones and authorities; in the fifth and the sixth are angels with different offices. In the seventh dwells the Great Glory. In the Slavonic Enoch there is a still more elaborate description. In the first heaven, it is there said, are 'a very great sea,' and 'the elders and the rulers of the stars,' and treasuries of snow, ice, clouds, and dew. In the second are the prisoners reserved for eternal judgment. In the third are found the Garden of Eden, and the tree of life and an olive tree ever distilling oil. In the fourth are seen the course of the sun and moon, the angels, and the phœnixes and the chalkidri that wait upon the sun. In the fifth are the watchers, troubled and silent, on account of their fallen brethren. In the sixth are seven bands of angels, very bright and glorious, students of the courses of sun, moon, and stars, also the angels over the souls of men, with seven phœnixes, seven cherubim, and seven six-winged creatures. In the seventh are the heavenly hosts, the ten great orders of angels, and the Lord Himself on His lofty throne. In the Rabbinical books we find similar trivialities. In the Beresh. rabba, c. 6, the Bammidbar rabba, c. 17, and the Chagiga, xii. 6, e.g., the differences between the several heavens are given in extreme and fanciful detail. The first or lowest heaven is called Vilon (וִילוֹן, Lat. velum), and is empty. The second is called Raḳîa, and contains the sun, moon, and stars. The third is called Shechaḳim, and contains the mills that grind the manna for the righteous. The fourth is called Zebul, and in it are the heavenly Jerusalem, the temple, the altar, and Michael. The fifth is named Maon, in which are the 'hosts of angels, praising God by night, but keeping silent by day that God may hear the praises of Israel.' The sixth is named Machon, and it holds the treasuries of the snow, hail, rain, and dew. The seventh is known as Aravoth, the seat of judgment and righteousness, with the treasuries of life, peace, and blessing. In it, too, are the souls of the righteous dead, the spirits and souls of men yet to be born, and the dew with which the dead shall be awaked. And in it are the Seraphim, Ophannim, Chayyoth, and other orders of angels (cf. Dante, Par. c. 27), and God Himself on His eternal throne. The Ascension of Isaiah gives another incongruous description of the series of heavens.

Similar speculations, and, if possible, even more tasteless and absurd, appear to have been indulged in by certain heretical leaders and their sects. Irenæus (Cont. Hœr. bk. i. c. v. 2) and Tertullian (Adv. Valent. 20) speak of the fancies of the Valentinians on the subject. From Irenæus (Adv. Hœr. bk. i. c. xxx. 4, 5), Origen (Con. Cels. vi. 31), and Epiph. (Hœr. xxvi. 10), we learn also that the Ophites held the doctrine of a Hebdomad of heavens ruled by seven potentates. Others, e.g. the Gnostic Marcus (Iren. Adv. Hœr. bk. i. c. xvii. 1), reckoned eight heavens, and Basilides (August. De Hœr. i. 4) held there were 365. Nor are the Christian apocalypses, such as the Apoc. Mosis, the Apoc. Esdræ, the Apoc. Johannis, less given to such speculations. The belief in a series of seven heavens, with some of the curious theories which prevailed so extensively on the subject, penetrated indeed into the Christian Church, and was more or less favoured by some of the leading Fathers. Clement of Alexandria, e.g., mentions it in terms which suggest that he did not question its validity (Strom. iv. 25). Origen refers to it in much the same way, explaining, however, that there was no authoritative doctrine on the subject (De princ. ii. 11). Augustine has an uncertain theory of his own, implying three heavens (De Gen. ad lit. xii. 5, 27). Even near the end of the 4th cent. these notions held such a place in Christian thought, that Philastrius pronounced it a heresy to deny the plurality of the heavens, though the question of the particular number, whether two, three, or seven, was left open (De Hœr. bk. 94). At last, however, the reaction came, and Chrysostom declared the whole conception of a series of heavens to be a human fancy, and contrary to Scripture. Repudiated by the Church, it was adopted by Mohammedanism. It is affirmed in the Koran (e.g. c. 22, 41), and in later Mohammedan writings it appears in the crudest possible forms.

The ideas of 'heaven' and the 'heavens' which are expressed in Scripture are of a different order. Neither in the OT nor in the NT have we anything like those far-fetched ineptitudes. It is the more remarkable that it should be so, in view of the fact that these things prevailed so long and so widely, and had so great a hold, not only of ethnic faith, but also of Jewish and Christian thought. Later Christian theology has relapsed from time to time into such theorizings, distinguishing between the heaven of clouds, the heaven of stars, and the empyrean; between the visible heaven or firmament, the spiritual heaven, the abode of saints and angels, and the intellectual heaven, which is the scene of the immediate vision of God (Elucidar. c. 3); between the cœlum sidereum, the cœlum crystallinum, and the cœlum empyreum (John of Dam., Thomas Aquin., etc.); or between the regio nubifera, the regio astrifera, and the regio angelifera (Grotius). But such strained refinements have no place in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures. In all their statements the Biblical books have the notes of simplicity and restraint. In many things they practise a reverent reserve.

There is at the same time a progress in the ideas of heaven which appear in them. These become more definite, more spiritual, and more sharply contrasted both in purity and in elevation with the conceptions found elsewhere. It was not alien to the common Jewish understanding, as it is seen in the curious literature of Judaism, to associate the presence of evil and trouble with one or other of the divisions of heaven. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs the second heaven is the habitation of the spirits of the lawless who are in confinement and punishment. In the Slavonic Enoch the second heaven contains the apostate angels who had transgressed with their prince, and were in reserve there against the judgment. In the third heaven, according to the same book, Enoch saw not only the Garden of Eden, but in its northern region a place of punishment, which had 'fire on all sides and on all cold and ice,' prepared for those who dishonoured God on earth and committed deeds of evil. And in the fifth heaven he saw the many hosts of the Watchers (ἐγρήγοροι), with their countenances withered and melancholy and their lips always silent, by reason of their sadness for their brethren, who rebelled in lust of empire and were imprisoned in the darkness of the second heaven. Such ideas were not altogether strange to the dramatic imagination of the OT, as is seen in the representation of the lying spirit that stood before the Lord (1 K 22^{21}), and in the appearance of Satan along with the angels in the presence of God (Job $1^{6.7}$ $2^{1.2.7}$). In the NT the nearest approach to such conceptions is the Pauline designation of the 'heavenly places,' the superterrestrial regions, as the sphere in which 'the spiritual hosts of wickedness' dwell and work (Eph 6^{12}). But in all its positive elements the Bible view of heaven is far removed from these things; and the vision which the NT Apocalypse gives of war in heaven between Michael with his angels and the dragon with his, ends in the overthrow of the latter, and the casting of the conquered ones 'out into the earth.'

Moreover, the ideas of heaven as the dwelling-place of God and the final abode and recompense of the righteous, move on in the course of the revelation of truth which is made in the Scriptures to larger and loftier things. In the OT heaven as the dwelling-place of God is presented chiefly in relation to the divine majesty and remoteness. In the NT it appears in the new and higher aspect of the Father's house, the place that has received the risen Christ, the scene of the activity of the great High Priest and the Advocate with the Father (He 4^{14}, 1 Jn 2^{1}). In the OT it is scarcely known as the future inheritance of the righteous. The eye of the OT looked mainly on the present, and the consummation which it expected was one that was to take place on earth. It had glimpses of things beyond, and at last rose to a clearer and more definite vision of an after life. But the completion of life which it looked to was something to be realized in this world, and the heaven which made its hope was a heaven to be found mainly in the joy of a near fellowship with God here and now. In the NT the heaven which is to be our final home and the goal of our hope is a heaven that is above this world and beyond time, not only superterrestrial, but supramundane, the transcendent heaven which is brought to light in the gospel.

The nature of this heaven, its conditions, and the things in which its blessedness consists, are nowhere given in definite or dogmatic statement. They are presented to faith and to the spiritual imagination by many suggestive expressions and by a great variety of figurative phrases. Heaven itself is described as a kingdom, one 'prepared from the foundation of the world,' the 'Father's kingdom,' the 'kingdom of God,' an 'eternal' or 'everlasting kingdom' (Mt 25^{34} 26^{29}, Lk 22^{16}, 2 P 1^{11}, Jude ^{21}); an inheritance, one of which we have the 'earnest' here, the 'inheritance of the saints in light,' an 'eternal inheritance,' an 'inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away' (Eph 1^{14}, Col 1^{12}, He 9^{15}, 1 P 1^{4}); a 'house of many mansions' (Jn 14^{1}); a place prepared by Christ (Jn $14^{2.3}$); a 'better country,' a 'city prepared' (He 11^{16}). Once at least it is described as Paradise (Lk 23^{43})—a term probably of Median origin, selected by the LXX as the rendering for the Garden of Eden, and used in Jewish literature to express the idea of a home of innocence and peace, with reference sometimes to the Eden of the past, sometimes to an Eden of the future, sometimes to an earthly Eden, sometimes to a heavenly (see article on PARADISE). Its life is set forth as an existence like that of the angels (Mk 12^{25}, Lk 20^{36}), an 'eternal life' (Jude ^{21}), a 'life that is life indeed' (1 Ti 6^{19}), a 'rest' (He 4^{1} etc., Rev 14^{13}), a life of worship, praise, service (Rev 5^{9} etc., 22^{4}). Its happiness is expressed by a rich and varied imagery, as reward, a 'great reward,' a 'full reward,' royalty, an everlasting reign, an everlasting existence, a partaking of the tree of life and the hidden manna, a new name, the dignity of a pillar in the temple of God, a place on the throne, praise, honour, glory, that which is within the veil, the presence of God's glory, a prize, a crown, the 'crown of life,' a 'crown of righteousness,' the promise, a manifestation, a salvation from wrath, the adoption, the vision of God, the being like Christ, the seeing of Him as He is, joy, 'exceeding joy,' 'the joy of the Lord' (Mt 5^{12}, 1 Co $3^{8.14}$, Col 3^{24}, 2 Jn ^{8}, Rev 22^{12}, 2 Ti 2^{12}, Rev 22^{5}, He 10^{34}, Rev $2^{7.17}$ $3^{12.21}$, 1 P 1^{7}, He 6^{19}, Jude ^{24}, Ph 3^{14}, 2 Ti 4^{7}, 1 Co 9^{25}, 2 Ti 4^{18}, Ja 1^{12}, 1 P 5^{4}, Rev 2^{10}, He 9^{15}, Ro 8^{19} 5^{9}, 2 Ti 2^{10}, Ro 8^{23}, Rev 22^{4}, 1 Jn 3^{2}, Jude ^{24}, Mt 25^{21}).

Theology has sought to answer many questions relating to heaven which Scripture suggests, but which it does not itself follow to their conclusions. It has occupied itself with the question as to how the spirituality and omnipresence of the Divine Being can be reconciled with the predication of heaven as His peculiar dwelling-place. It has also discussed the question whether heaven is to be regarded as a place or only as a condition. These are questions which are beyond the range of our present faculties and experience. Scripture freely speaks, on the one hand, of God as everywhere present and as manifesting Himself in different ways in all parts of His creation, and, on the other hand, as specially present in heaven and manifesting His glory in a peculiar sense there. And we can only say that it is with Him, though in a higher sense, as it is with the sun 'which shines everywhere, yet especially displays its full splendour in the firmament' (Oosterzee, Chr. Dog. p. 258). Neither can we disconnect the idea of locality absolutely from our conception of heaven. It belongs to the condition of our present mental life and experience to think of heaven more or less in terms of locality, even when we think of God who is spirit, much more when we think of the future home of beings like ourselves.

Theology also has engaged itself greatly (in some eras, however, much more than in others) with the question of the nature of the existence in heaven, the heavenly activities, the felicities of heaven. Sometimes it has committed itself to rude, material, sensuous conceptions; sometimes it has defined heaven as essentially a condition of passivity, contemplation, or quiescence. But for the most part, and in the case of its greatest names, it has avoided these extremes. Even Justin Martyr (Adv. Hær. 57), Irenæus (Apol. i. 8), and the Fathers who accepted the millenarian doctrine, thought of the immediate communion with God as the essence of the blessedness of heaven. Origen affirmed the progress of life in heaven, and dwelt largely on the intellectual conditions of heaven, regarding its chief joy as found in the satisfaction of the desire of knowledge (De prin. II. xi. 2). Greg. Naz. (Orat. xvi. 9), Greg. Nyss. (Orat. Cat. c. 40) and others, placed its felicity chiefly in the increase of knowledge and in intercourse with all the saints. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, xxi. 29, 30), agreeing with all others that the enjoyment of God is the substance of the bliss of heaven, added specially to that the recovery of man's true liberty. While the mystics of all ages have inclined to reduce the various Scriptural representations of heaven to metaphors of subjective states, the schoolmen generally construed them as implying locality, and speculated on the region, its divisions, and its employments. Extreme realistic views of heaven have been advocated by theosophic theologians in all times. And in the system of Emmanuel Swedenborg, with its principle of correspondence, in virtue of which the spiritual world is the outbirth of the invisible mental world and the natural world that of the spiritual world, we have a curious doctrine of the constitution of heaven as the subject of a revelation, and find the existence of three distinct heavens, consisting of three orders of angels, affirmed.

The Scriptures themselves are silent on many things on which theology has dilated. They give us a large, general view of heaven as the final home of God's servants; of its rewards as having degrees corresponding to the character and the service; of its blessedness as found in freedom from all sin, pain, sorrow, in the manifestation of the eternal love and glory, in the realization of hope, the possession of all good, the presence of Christ, the immediate vision and fellowship of God. It leaves much to the sanctified imagination, and makes its final teaching this—'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him' (1 Co 2^{9}).

HEAVE-OFFERING.—See SACRIFICE.

HEAVINESS.—Besides the literal sense of ponderous, heavy is used in two fig. meanings: 1. Burdensome, as Nu 11^{14} 'I am not able to bear all this people alone, because it is too heavy for me'; 1 Es 5^{72} 'But the heathen of the land lying heavy upon the inhabitants of Judea, . . . hindered their building' (ἐπικοιμώμενα [Fritzsche conjec. ἐπικείμενα] τοῖς ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ); Wis 17^{21} 'Over them only was spread an heavy night' (βαρεῖα); 2 Mac 5^{23} 'Menelaus, who worse than all the rest bare an heavy hand over the citizens' (ὑπερῄρετο τοῖς πολίταις, RV 'exalted himself against his fellow-citizens'). Cf. T. Lever, Sermons (Arber, p. 64), 'And their landlords which shuld defend them, be most heavye maisters unto them.' 2. Sorrowful, as 1 K 20^{43} 'And the king of Israel went to his house heavy and displeased' (סַר); 1 Es 8^{71} 'And as soon as I had heard these things, I rent my clothes, and the holy garment, and pulled off the hair from off my head and beard, and sat me down sad and very heavy' (σύννους καὶ περίλυπος, RV 'sad and full of heaviness'); 2 Es 12^{46} 'Be of good comfort, O Israel; and be not heavy, thou house of Jacob' (noli tristari; RV 'be not sorrowful'); Mk 14^{33} 'And he taketh with him Peter and James and John, and began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy' (ἀδημονεῖν, RV 'sore troubled'). So Lk 18^{23} Tind. 'When he heard that, he was hevy; for he was very ryche'; Is 1^{5} Cov. 'The whole heade is sick, and the herte is very hevy'; Hall, Works, ii. 144 (on 'Jairus and his daughter'), 'What a confusion there is in worldly sorrow? The mother shreekes, the servants cry out; the people make lamentation, the minstrelles howle, and strike dolefully; so as the eare might question whether the ditty or the instrument were more heavie'; Erasmus, The Commune Crede, Eng. tr., fol. 73*b*, 'And that Christ suffered in soule also, even his owne selfe doth witnesse, sayenge, My soule is hevy even unto the deathe.'

The adv. heavily means 'with difficulty' in Ex 14^{25} 'And took off their chariot wheels that they drave them heavily' (בִּכְבֵדֻת, lit. 'with heaviness,' the only example of the Heb. word). The meaning is rare in Eng.; cf. Mt 13^{15} Rhem. 'For the hart of this people is waxed grosse, and with their eares they have heavily heard, and their eies they have shut.' Heavily occurs also once in the sense of grievously, oppressively, Is 47^{6} 'upon the ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke'; and once as sorrowfully, Ps 35^{14} 'I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother' (RV 'I bowed down mourning'; see Abbott, Original Texts, 1891, p. 214).

Heaviness occurs often, but always with the meaning of grief. Thus Pr 10^{1} 'A wise son maketh a glad father: but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother'; 12^{25} 'Heaviness in the heart of man maketh it stoop: but a good word maketh it glad'; Is 61^{3} 'To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness'; 1 Es 8^{71} 'I sat still full of heaviness until the evening sacrifice' (περίλυπος); 2 Es 10^{8} 'And now, seeing we all mourn and are sad, for we are all in heaviness, art thou grieved for one son?' ('quoniam omnes contristati sumus,' RV 'seeing we are all in sorrow'); Sir 22^{4} 'She that liveth dishonestly is her father's heaviness' (εἰς λύπην γεννήσαντος, RV 'the grief of him that begat her'); 38^{18} 'of heaviness cometh death, and the heaviness of the heart breaketh strength' (both λύπη, RV both 'sorrow'); Ro 9^{2} and 2 Co 2^{1} (both λύπη, RV both 'sorrow'); 1 P 1^{6} 'Ye are in heaviness' (λυπηθέντες, RV 'Ye have been put to grief'); Ph 2^{26} 'For he longed after you all, and was full of heaviness' (ἀδημονῶν, RV 'was sore troubled'). In their Preface the AV translators say of the Scriptures, 'If we be ignorant, they will instruct us; if out of the way, they will bring us home; if out of order, they will reforme us; if in heaviness, comfort us; if dull, quicken us; if colde, inflame us.' The older versions have the word very often, as Jn 16^{6} Wyc. 'sorwe, or heuynesse, hath fulfillid youre herte'; Ps 30^{5} Cov. 'hevynesse maye well endure for a night, but joye commeth in the mornynge' (Cran. 'hevynesse maye endure for a night,' and so Pr. Bk.). Cf. Erasmus, The Commune Crede, fol. 31*b*, 'Agayn of the defaulte and wante of fayth springeth superstition, sorcerie, idolatry, and covetousness cosen to it, ambition, blasphemy, hevynes, desperation, pride, fear of death, desyre of vengeaunce, fynally what so ever vices or synnes do raygne in the whole worlde.'

J. HASTINGS.

HEBER (חֶבֶר 'association' or 'spell,' from חבר to 'unite,' especially by spells: possibly connected with Ḫabiri, Journal of Bibl. Lit. xi. 118, xii. 61).—1. A man of Asher and son of Beriah (Gn 46^{17}, Nu 26^{45}, 1 Ch $7^{31.\ 32}$). He founded what appears from the last passage to have been the principal clan in his tribe. The gentilic name Heberites occurs in Nu 26^{45}. 2. The Kenite, according to Jg 4^{17} 5^{24}, husband of Jael. He separated himself (Jg 4^{11}) from his Bedâwin caste of Kenites or nomad smiths, whose wanderings were confined chiefly to the south of Judah, and settled for a time near Kedesh, on the plain to the west of the Sea of Galilee (Conder, Tent-Work, ii. 132; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. 369, note 1). According to the narrative of Jg, Sisera in his flight after defeat by Barak was invited by Jael to take refuge in her husband's encampment, and was there killed by her in his sleep. But Jg 5^{24b} is shown by the metre to be probably a gloss from 4^{17}, which again appears to relate to a different locality from that of 4^{11}. On the whole it is not unlikely that two traditions are blended, and that in the original stories the unnamed wife of Heber dealt with Jabin in a similar way to that of Jael with Sisera. 3. A man of Judah, son (1 Ch 4^{18}) of Mered by his Jewish, as distinguished from his Egyp., wife. Beyond his genealogy, nothing is recorded of him except that he was the 'father' or founder of Soco. 4. A Benjamite and member of the family of Elpaal (1 Ch 8^{17}), which appears to have been of pure Heb. blood on both sides, as contrasted with its kindred of partially Moabite descent (1 Ch $8^{8.\ 11}$).

HEBREW, 'ibri (עִבְרִי, עִבְרִים, עִבְרִיִּים).—Ebrew (Shaks. I Hen. IV. II. iv. 198; AV 1611 Dt 15 heading): Ebreus (Wycl. 2 Co 11^{22}): through Norm. Hebreu, Hebræus, Ἑβραῖος, Aram. 'ibrai, det. forms, 'ibrā'ah, 'ibrāyah (עִבְרַי, עִבְרָאָה, עִבְרָיָה, Dalm. Jüd.-Pal. Aram. Gramm. p. 155). The Greeks were thus evidently first acquainted with the word through Aramaic-speaking peoples. If, as may be presumed, this was by way of N. Syria and Asia Minor, it throws no light on the date at which they came personally in touch with the Hebrews. As, however, Ἑβραῖος occurs only in later Greek (LXX, Pausanias; v. infra), it is possible that it was formed at a time when Aramaic was becoming the prevailing language of the Hebrews themselves, i.e. c. 300 B.C.

I. USAGE OF THE WORD.—(A) Old Test.—Not in P nor, save in Jer $34^{9.\ 14}$ (quot. from Dt 15^{12}), in documents certainly later than 7th cent. B.C., presumably because it has no theological or theocratic connotation but is purely secular, and 'Jew' (wh. see) took its place from the 7th cent. onwards. It is apparently the oldest designation of the chosen people (whether in its primitive use confined to them or not, see II. ii.) in contrast to those of another race. We thus find it used: i. by others—Gn $39^{14.\ 17}$ [J^2] 41^{12} [E], Ex 2^6 [E], Egyptians; 1 S $4^{6.\ 9}$ [E^1] 13^{19} [J^2] 14^{11} [J^1][] 29^3 [J^1], Philistines. ii. By Jews in addressing others—Gn 40^{15} [E], Egyptians; Ex 3^{18} 7^{16} 9^1 [all J], words that Moses was commanded by God to use to Pharaoh; 5^3 [J], words so used by him; Jon 1^9, by Jonah to the sailors who were presumably Phœnicians. iii. With a contrast to others expressed or clearly implied—Gn 14^{13} ['Exilic Midrash'??], Canaanites and Chedorlaomer's army; 43^{32} [J^2], Ex $1^{15.\ 16.\ 19}$ [E] $2^{7.\ 11.\ 13}$ [E], Egyptians; 1 S $13^{3.\ 7}$[] [J^1], Philistines; 14^{21} [J^1], Philistines and, apparently, the bulk of Israel that were already with Saul; Ex 21^2 ['Bk. of the Covenant'], Dt 15^{12}, Jer $34^{9.\ 14}$ 'a Hebrew slave' is contrasted with one of any other nationality.

(B) Apocrypha.—The word does not occur often, but the usage is similar, as far as it goes. i. Used by others, Jth 12^{11} (Holofernes, an 'Assyrian'), 14^{18} (Bagoas, an 'Assyrian').[†] ii. By Jews in addressing others, Jth 10^{12} ('Assyrians'), 2 Mac 7^{31} (Syrians). iii. With a contrast to others expressed or clearly implied, 2 Mac 11^{13} (Syrians)[‡] 15^{37} (Syrians). iv. The Prologue of Sir is slightly different, for it is there used distinctly of the Hebrew language in contrast to Greek, the discovery of the original of Sir showing that Hebrew, not Aramaic, was intended.

(C) New Testament.—The phenomena here are more difficult. 'Hebrews' are contrasted with 'Hellenists' (Ac 6^1),[§] i.e. those Jews who favoured Hellenism and practised Greek customs, and therefore, either by preference or by residence abroad, usually spoke the Greek language. Hebrews would therefore be those who more truly answered to the old idea of the people, the more conservative members who prided themselves on maintaining the old customs, and rejected as far as possible the insidious influence of Hellenism (2 Co 11^{22}, Ph 3^5, though St. Paul was a Jew of the Dispersion). In this way it is intelligible how 'Hebrew,' when used of language, may mean either Aramaic (Jn 5^2 $19^{13.\ 17.\ 20}$ 20^{16} Ἑβραϊστί, and probably Ac 21^{40} 22^2 26^{14} τῇ Ἑβραΐδι διαλέκτῳ) or Hebrew proper (Rev 9^{11} 16^{16} Ἑβραϊστί).[‖] In other words, the evidence now available tends to show that the use of 'Hebrew' does not refer fundamentally to the language,[¶] but rather to the historic position and worth of the nation. It is not a linguistic but a national word. Hence Josephus[] can remark that the Heb. say for 'red' ἄδωμα (Ant. II. i. 1) and for Pentecost ἀσαρθά (Ant. III. x. 6), i.e. pure Aram. (עֲצַרְתָּא, אֲרוּכָּא).[††]

II. ORIGINAL MEANING OF THE WORD.—Quot homines tot sententiæ, for a word that goes back to such primitive times readily lends itself to guesses on the part of those unacquainted with Hebrew, or acquainted with it only in its biblical form.

i. The derivation from Abram (אַבְרָם)[‡‡] is of course impossible, for א and ע do not readily interchange,[§§] and the loss of the final ם would be inexplicable. At most, the similarity of sound between the

For other examples of Ἑβραῖος, Hebræus, being used in the widest national sense, see Plut. Sympos. iv. qu. 6. 1; Pausanias, i. 5, § 5, v. 5, § 2, and 7, § 4, vi. 24, § 8, x. 12, § 9; Appian, civ. 2. 71; Porphyry, *vit. [§§] עבר is represented by אבר in recent Assyrian lexicons, but this is because there is no differential sign for either א or ע at the beginning of a syllable.

'Hebrews' and their most famous ancestor may have assisted in limiting the term to them.

ii. Eber (עֵבֶר Gn $10^{21.\,24.\,25}$ 11^{14-17}, 1 Ch $1^{18.\,19.\,25}$)[*] is a much more plausible explanation. Assuming him to be a real person, it would be a patronymic, used in two forms, (a) Hebrew (עִבְרִי), (b) bĕnē 'Eber (Gn 10^{21});[†] cf. bĕnē Lot (Ps 83^{9}), and bĕnē Israel.[‡]

iii. From עבר as verb or preposition, designating the Hebrews as those who have come across, or who belong properly to the land across, some well-known boundary. Euseb. (Præp. Evang. vii. 8, xi. 6) prefers to any other a spiritual interpretation, that the Hebrews were those who had passed over from the worship of false gods and the pleasures of the flesh to the service of the God of all and the life of true wisdom and piety. But this is homiletical, not scientific. Three natural boundaries have been suggested.

(a) The Red Sea. 'Why was Moses to say to Pharaoh, The LORD God of the Hebrews hath met with us? Because they had crossed over the Red Sea' (Exod. R. § 3 middle, by a Rabbin. conceit).

(b) The Jordan. So Wellhausen (Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch. p. 7, 1894), who thinks it was given to them by their neighbours in Western Palestine after they had crossed over. He thinks, however, that in old usage the term was so extended as to include the Edomites, with whom the Hebrews were originally united. Thus 'Hebrews' would mean those who dwelt עֵבֶר הַיַּרְדֵּן, cf. Gn 50^{10} and often (so Stade, Lehrb. § 1*b*; Kautzsch [doubtfully], Heb. Gram. § 2*b*).

(c) Euphrates. (1) In the sense that the Hebrews came from the east of Euphrates to the west, i.e. when Abraham crossed it from Haran on the way to Canaan. So Origen (in Field's Hex. on Gn. xiv. 13) περάτης (LXX) καλεῖται ὁ Ἀβραὰμ, ἐπειδὴ ἀπὸ τῆς Χαλδαίων χώρας διαπεράσας τὴν Μεσοποταμίαν, ἦλθεν εἰς τὰ μέρη τῶν Χαναναίων. This was also the reference of Augustine's word, transfluvialis (Quæst. Gen. § 29), and presumably of Aquila's περαΐτης, which Field thinks was formed by him from πέραν rather than περάω (περάτης) [to definitely correspond to the Hebrew (הָעֵבְרִי not הָעִבְרִי)].[§] 'Hebrew' will thus, according to this derivation, be from עֵבֶר in the same meaning that it has in mē'ēber lannāhār (1 K 14^{15}), and perhaps in the phrase 'ebrē nāhār (Is 7^{20})[‖] (so Dillm. on Gn 11^{12}).

(2) In the sense that the Hebrews went from west to east, the standpoint of the speaker being, that is to say, east of Euphrates. So Hommel in the Appendix to his Ancient Hebrew Tradition: illustrated by the Monuments, 1897 (contrast his earlier opinion, p. 258), after comparing Glaser's investigations of Minæan inscriptions with cuneiform documents. He supposes that Ebir nâri (=Eber hannā-hār of the Bible, 'Ibr naharân Minæan) was originally the region between Borsippa and Ur, i.e. on the west of the lower Euphrates, including the adjoining Country of the Sea to the southward. This is the region, therefore, indicated in Jos 24^{2} as the home of Abraham and the Western Semitic tribes who trace their origin to him. It was 'across the River' to the Babylonians among whom Abraham or his forefathers came, and he was called 'Ibri, as belonging to that land 'Eber, the term travelling with him and his descendants. In this way we can understand that (a) Ebîr nâri is used of the country west of Euphrates (and even of Palestine in an inscription of c. 1100 B.C.); (β) the biblical Eber han-nāhār in, perhaps, all other places than 1 K 14^{15} means the same: (γ) 'Eber in Nu 24^{24} need not mean either the Hebrews (so most commentators) or those non-Assyrian peoples who lived east of Euphrates (Dillm.), but a district in the north-west of Arabia.[*]

Upon the evidence before us this explanation appears to some the most satisfactory.[†] [See, however, Margoliouth's criticism of Hommel in Expos. Times, Aug. 1897, p. 500*b*. Even Sayce (EHH p. 8), after mentioning Hommel's theory, says, 'The origin and first use of the name (Hebrew) are still a matter of doubt']. But we should like further evidence of the use of such a word as 'Ibri in the inscriptions. Have we this?

III. EVIDENCE OF THE MONUMENTS AND INSCRIPTIONS.—Have we any mention in these of the Hebrews by name? Two identifications have been proposed.

i. 'Apri or 'Epri of the Egyptian monuments has been said to be merely an Egyptian transliteration of 'Ibri. This identification has been almost given up, but Hommel (loc. cit. p. 259) is disposed to regard it not unfavourably, comparing for the change of labial the Egyptian ḥurp taken from the Canaanite ḥereb, 'sword,' and pointing out that, although 800 'Epriu (Egypt. plur. of 'Epri) drawn from the foreign residents of 'An in the east of Goshen were employed under Ramses IV. long after the Exodus, yet it is possible that some of the Israelites remained behind and mingled with other foreigners. But the identification is, to say the least, very precarious.

ii. The Khabiri, or Abiri (for Assyriologists transliterate the word in both ways) of the Tel el-Amarna tablets. They are described in the letters of the king of Jerusalem to his suzerain, the Pharaoh, c. 1400 B.C. (Hommel), as attacking districts and towns in what we now know as the Negeb, the Maritime Plain, and Judah, and, perhaps, as even laying siege to Jerusalem itself. The king urgently applies for reinforcements, saying, 'If troops can be sent before the end of the year, then the territory of my lord the king may yet be retained; but if no troops arrive it will assuredly be lost.' The difference in the form of the word (Khabiri or Abiri and 'Ibri) matters little, for 'the [*] Augustine (see note ‡‡ p. 325) prefers it in Retract. ii. § 16, De Civ. xvi. § 3; cf. Euseb. Præp. Evang. vii. 6.

[†] Shem is here called אֲבִי כָּל־בְּנֵי עֵבֶר J², unless with Ball (Haupt's OT) כָּל־בְּנֵי is to be considered as an interpolation by P.

[‡] Sayce (Expos. Times, Mar. 1897, p. 258) suggests that 'Eber= Bab. Ebar, 'a priest.' If so, and if 'Hebrews' be derived from it, the paronomasia in 1 S 13^{7} (common text) is due to a faulty philology.

[§] Fürst (Lex. s.v. עִבְרִי) thinks that 'Hebrew' was limited to the Israelites by 'ēber hannāhār gradually changing into 'ēber hayyardēn (Jordan). So to Jews ἡ περαία was naturally Eastern Palestine (Jos. often, e.g. Ant. XIII. ii. 3, cf. πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, Mk 10^{1}) and περαΐτης an inhabitant of that province (Jos. BJ II. xx. 4).

[‖] Nisibis in Mesopotamia is described as being ἐν τῇ περαίᾳ τῇ πρὸς τῷ Τίγρητι ποταμῷ (Steph. Byz. s.v. Νίσιβις).

[*] So also the Asshur of this verse may represent the Minæan A'shûr, which seems to be a district to the S.E. of Gaza. It would then appear to be an earlier form of Shur (Gn 20^{1}). It should also be noticed that this wide use of 'Eber explains how among the bĕnē 'Eber are found both a western branch in S. Arabia of Joktan and other tribes (Gn $10^{25\cdot30}$) (J), as well as an eastern branch round the lower Euphrates in Peleg, the direct ancestor of Nahor and Abraham, with subdivisions arising in Isaac and Ishmael. 'Hebrews' is not, apparently, so used. We may suppose that, even if present in the original documents, the Hebrew editors and copyists preferred some less ambiguous term.

[†] Akin to this explanation is that which derives 'Hebrews' from the Arabic 'eber in the sense of a 'tract along the banks of a river (as the place for passing over), and κατ᾽ ἐξοχήν, that of the Euphrates, the whole tract of land stretching from the east bank of the Euphrates to the Tigris, and from the west bank to the Arabian Desert (berrîjet el-'arab), from which, according to the Turkish Kâmûs and Lex. Geographicum, ii. 232, 233, is derived 'Ibri or 'Ibrâni, the name of the Jewish people, as having come from the land stretching from the bank of the Euphrates to the Tigris' (Delitzsch on Is 7^{20}). W. R. Smith (*Enc. Brit.*⁹ s.v. 'Hebrews') mentions this conjecture, which makes Hebrews to be 'dwellers in a land of rivers,' adding, 'this goes well with Peleg (watercourse), as in Arabia we have the district Falag, so named because it is furrowed by waters' (Sprenger, Geogr. Arab. p. 234). In Doughty (Arabia Deserta. ii. 38) Fálaj is rendered 'the splitting of the mountain'; but the two derivations are not contradictory if, as it seems, Fálaj is a mountainous district with many torrents.

Canaanite 'Ayin, with which guttural the word 'Ibri commences, is elsewhere in the texts represented by the cuneiform Kh, and there are analogous instances of the abbreviation of an earlier form like 'Abiri into a later form such as 'Ibri.' * But the identification is at present quite uncertain: (a) the king appears to be describing an attack from the west side of Jordan, whereas the Hebrews came from the east side; (b) the names of persons do not agree with those mentioned in Joshua; (c) the date is much earlier than that which is now usually given to the Exodus, 1322 (Lepsius), or even 1200 (Petrie). But (a) the first difficulty may be fairly met by saying that the letters do not necessitate an attack from the west only, that the OT account is very brief, the conquest of even southern Palestine possibly extending over many years, and that much of the south-west country may have been taken before the king of Jerusalem felt in much danger.† (b) The second difficulty is not conclusive, as persons appear to have been known under different names. (c) The third depends wholly on the accuracy of the date given to the Exodus. If this is accepted, the Khabiri can be identical with the Hebrews only by some of the Hebrews having returned to Palestine before the Exodus; but though this may be consistent with raids having been made, or small detachments having separated themselves, the letters imply the approach of a large body. Hence, either Khabiri has a purely accidental resemblance to 'Ibri,‡ or the date of the Exodus must be placed much earlier. § We cannot as yet say which is right.

i. AIM AND CENTRAL IDEA.—This Epistle is one of the most important writings in the NT. It contains a distinct type of Christian thought, and in that respect may be classed with the Synoptic Gospels, the Pauline Epistles, and the Gospel of John, which also contain, each, a distinctive conception of the good that came to the world through Jesus Christ. It is in aim and method an apologetic writing, intended to help certain Christians, who had no true insight into the nature and worth of the Christian religion, to reach a better understanding of its excellence, and so to fortify them against temptations to apostasy. But the apologetic argument rests on a very definite theological position. The author has a very clear idea of the nature, and a very high estimate of the value, of Christianity. He attaches to it the value of the perfect and therefore the final religion, and he assigns to it this value because he regards it as the religion of free, unrestricted access to God. This is the central dogmatic thought of the Epistle, as indicated in 7^{19}, where Christianity is by implication set forth as the religion of the better hope through which we draw nigh unto God. No religion, in the writer's judgment, can be satisfactory which does not establish intimate relations between God and man. Herein, for him, lies the great inferiority of Leviticalism in comparison with Christianity. He conceives of Leviticalism as a religion which kept men at an awful distance, and the veil between the holy and the most holy place is in his view the symbol of that radical defect. It is self-evident to him that a religious system which shuts God up in a dark inaccessible shrine cannot be the perfect form of religion. It must eventually give way to a better. Christianity is that better religion. It knows of no veil, and no inaccessible holy place. Christ is not only a High Priest, but a forerunner, πρόδρομος: where He goes, though it be into the very presence of God, all believers in Him may follow.

ii. METHOD.—This is the radical contrast between Christianity and Leviticalism. This central contrast, however, is suggestive of many others, and the method adopted by the writer in the prosecution of his apologetic aim is to exhibit in detail the points in which the religion of the NT is superior to that described in the books of Moses. His idea of Christianity is that it is the best possible religion; but what he sets himself to prove is that it is better than the Levitical religion. It is not difficult, however, to read between the lines, and to see behind the apologetic better the dogmatic best.

The comparison of the two religions runs through the whole theoretic part of the Epistle from 1^1 to 10^{18}. It begins at the circumference and ends at the centre. The central truth is the priestly performance of Christ by which we are brought into filial relations with God. But the comparison begins with the agents of revelation, and proceeds from that starting-point to compare the agents of redemption. Under each of these two categories two sets of agents are ascribed to the old religion: prophets and angels under the head of revelation, and Moses and Aaron under the head of redemption. Thus there are four separate comparisons to be made—(1) between Christ and prophets, (2) between Christ and angels, (3) between Christ and Moses, (4) between Christ and Aaron. The first is made in 1^{1-3}, the second in 1^{4-14}, the third in 3^{1-6}, and the fourth in 8^1–9^{28}.

(1) Christ and Prophets.—The contrast is least emphatic in reference to the prophets, as they might be looked on as belonging in spirit to the new dispensation rather than to the old Levitical one. But there is a latent antithesis here also, traceable in the words carefully selected to describe prophetic revelation,—πολυμερῶς, πολυτρόπως. These adverbs convey the idea that the ancient revelation was fragmentary (in many parts) and tropical (in many modes); and it is implied, though not expressly stated, that the revelation made by Christ was free from both defects—complete and real, and therefore final. All this is in effect said by the phrase ἐν υἱῷ, used to describe the agent of the Christian revelation. In the end of the days God spake to men by one having the standing of a son. A son knows all that is in a Father's mind; when He has spoken there is nothing more to be said.

† Or may there have been a temporary and partial attack from the south early in the wanderings, such as Nu 21^{1-3} perhaps indicates? Jg 1^{16-21} may possibly refer to the same time.

‡ So Hommel, who identifies the Khabiri with those after whom Hebron was called (Jg 1^{10}). He thinks it is properly identical with Kheber in Gn 46^{17}, and represents part of the tribe of Asher who came into Palestine before the other Hebrews (loc. cit. p. 236).

(2) Christ and Angels.—We are apt to think that the second comparison, that between Christ and angels, might have been dispensed with. But the author was writing for the benefit of Jews (this, in the meantime, may be assumed; it is the impression one naturally first takes from the book), and angels held a prominent place in contemporary Jewish religious thought. To them was assigned the function of executors of God's will in the natural world, and also that of intermediaries between J″ and Israel in the lawgiving. The law was a word spoken by angels (2^2, cf. Ac 7^{53}, Gal 3^{19}). Therefore, whatever the writer's own thoughts might be as to the position of angels in the universe and in the history of revelation, he was under the necessity of deferring to current opinion and speaking of them as rivals to Christ. Therefore his second thesis is: Christ better than angels, his proof consisting of a mosaic of OT texts which bring out a threefold contrast: Christ to angels as son to servants, as king to subjects, as creator to creatures. The conclusion is that the essential function of angels is to serve. They are ministering spirits—all of them, even the highest archangel—to God, to Christ, even to Christians—'sent forth for service to those who are about to inherit salvation' (1^{14}).

(3) Christ and Moses.—For Moses the writer had a much deeper respect than for angels, whose rôle he probably conceived to be greatly inflated in Jewish theology. Moses was a great historic reality, whose functions in behalf of Israel at the creative epoch of her history he was not tempted to disparage. But even Moses occupied a place of subordination compared to Jesus, and he does not hesitate to point the fact out, contriving, however, to do so in a manner that could not wound Jewish susceptibilities. He knows how to praise Moses while yet giving him the second place. Faithful in all God's house, on God's own testimony, yet faithful only as a servant. But Christ was faithful as a son.

(4) Christ and Aaron.—While the comparison between Christ and Moses is despatched in a few sentences, that between Christ and Aaron runs through two chapters. This is not due to the writer having a higher esteem for Aaron than for Moses. The reverse was the fact. While for his mind Moses was probably one of the world's greatest men, and the Exodus one of the great heroic achievements of human history, the character and functions of the first high priest of Israel seem to have inspired him with only moderate respect. All that elaborate ritual on the great Day of Atonement, in which the high priest played the principal part, seemed to him much ado about nothing. For the blood of bulls and of goats could not take away sin. How poor that Levitical sacrificial system compared with the one sacrifice of Christ, who by an eternal spirit offered Himself to God! But why, then, make the comparison, and at such length? Because he is writing for people who think Aaron a very august figure, and his sacerdotal service one of very great importance; and because his apologetic method requires him to use Aaron as a type whereby to convey to ill-instructed Hebrew Christians some rudimentary ideas as to the nature of Christ's sacerdotal functions.

(5) Christ and Melchizedek.—One other OT personage is brought upon the stage in the course of the argument—Melchizedek. He is introduced, however, not for the purpose of contrast, but to aid in the embodiment of the writer's lofty conception of Christ's priestly function. His thesis here is not, Christ greater than Melchizedek, but, Christ like Melchizedek. His use of this historic figure also serves an apologetic purpose, but in a different way. He had a difficulty to meet in connexion with the doctrine that Christ was a priest. Jesus did not belong to the tribe of Levi. That was an insurmountable obstacle to the recognition of Him as a priest for law-ridden minds. How, then, does the writer deal with it? In effect thus: 'I know quite well that Jesus could not be a priest on earth, i.e. one of the only class of priests you Jews are acquainted with, because He did not belong to the tribe whence the priests are taken. But the Heb. oracles know of another priesthood besides the Levitical, whereof they make honourable mention—that of Melchizedek, priest of the Most High God. It was a more ancient priesthood than that of Aaron. Do you reply: yes, ancient enough, but rude, suitable only for primitive times, and, of course, superseded by a regularly established sacerdotal class, like that of Aaron and his family? I say, not so, for in a psalm later than the institution of the Levitical priesthood, and recognized by you all as Messianic, the Melchizedek priesthood is referred to as if it were the ideally perfect type. "A priest for ever after the order of Melchisedek." The Christ is to be a priest after this ideal type. And He is appointed by an oath of God which implies that it is an appointment of unique importance. And God declares that He will not repent of the appointment, which teaches by implication that God has repented of another kind of priesthood, and that it will pass away, and that the new priesthood will be of such excellence that it will never need to pass away.' We have here an apologetic use of the ancient priesthood of the king of Salem, analogous to that made by the Apostle Paul of the promise given to Abraham long before the era of the lawgiving.

iii. THEOLOGICAL IMPORT.—This rapid sketch may suffice to give some idea of the drift of this Epistle on its apologetic side. But our main concern is with its positive theological significance, to which we now turn.

It is important for a true appreciation of the theological ideas of the Epistle to keep steadily before us its central conception of Christianity as the perfect and final religion, both perfect and final because it brings men really nigh to God. All religions aim at this, Leviticalism included. Nevertheless, it had a veil dividing the tabernacle into two compartments, and a most holy place into which no man might go save the high priest, and he only once a year, and then only with due precautions. Christianity is the one religion that has really solved the problem. In the language of the Epistle it perfects the worshipper as pertaining to the conscience (9^9), or purges his conscience from dead works to serve the living God. It really takes away sin (10^4), so that believers in Jesus can draw near with true heart and full assurance of faith to the very presence of God (10^{22}). There can never be any reason for superseding such a religion. Therefore Christianity is eternal. The epithet 'eternal' is applied many times to the Christian religion and all that belongs to it. We read of an 'eternal salvation' (5^9), an 'eternal redemption' (9^{12}), an 'eternal spirit' (9^{14}), an 'eternal inheritance' (9^{15}), and an 'eternal covenant' (13^{20}). It is clear from such iteration that the thought of the perennial, because perfect, absolute character of Christianity is not incidental and subordinate, but fundamental in the author's system. It dominates his mind and affects his manner of viewing everything belonging to the Christian faith. As it is absolute, perfect, the ideal realized, so are all the personalities and functions connected with it. The Christian revelation is the ideal realized in that department. It is God's final, because full, complete word to men, to which nothing needs to be added. The Person by whom God spoke that last word is perfect in Himself, and in His functions as Revealer and Redeemer. His sacrifice is perfect, and possesses eternal validity and value.

(1) CHRISTOLOGY.—This general statement prepares us to find in the Epistle a very exalted conception of Christ. The first thought about Him to which we are introduced, in the very first sentence, is that He stands to God in the relation of Son (ἐν υἱῷ). It is observable that, in all the four comparisons already referred to, the superiority of Jesus Christ is made to rest on the foundation of His Sonship. That is why He is greater than the prophets as the agent of revelation. The Sonship of itself guarantees a perfect, therefore final, revelation. The reason is that Sonship involves likeness and intimacy. To know the Son is to know the Father, and the Son knows all that is in the Father's mind. In like manner the superiority of Christ to angels is made to rest on His Sonship. The Son is begotten; angels, with all other creatures, are made; the Son as the heir of His Father is destined to sit on a throne and be an object of homage to the universe, angels not excepted. Therefore His word, as the Revealer, claims more attention than that spoken by angels, with whatever solemn accompaniments, on Sinai. So also Sonship raises Christ above Moses, however great his character, and however epoch-making his function as the Leader of the Exodus and the organizer of a horde of slaves into a nation. Moses was the greatest in God's house, yet only greatest among servants; Christ is not only greater, but belongs to another category, that of Son. Finally, Sonship is the ground of Christ's incomparable superiority to Aaron. Aaron, though an important personage within the Levitical system, was after all but a sacerdotal drudge, ever performing ceremonies which had no real value: 'daily ministering and offering oftentime the same sacrifices which can never take away sin' (10^{11}). But our great High Priest is Jesus the Son of God (4^{14}), who, as a Son, learned obedience through suffering (5^8), and who after His Passion, voluntarily endured, was, as the Son, 'consecrated for evermore' (7^{28}).

These contrasts compel a lofty conception of Christ's Person as the Son of God. Sonship taken in a diluted sense will not bear the argumentative stress laid on it. Sonship must be taken in a unique sense, not in a sense common to Christ with men and angels, or even in a sense applicable only to the great epoch-making characters of history, the heroes of the human race. Why should Sonship make Christ greater than the prophets as agents of revelation, unless it be of such a character as to involve absolute likeness of nature and perfectly intimate fellowship? We know what the author of the Fourth Gospel means when he says, 'No man hath seen God at any time: the only-begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.' The author of our Epistle must mean something similar when he makes Sonship the ground of Christ's ability to speak the final satisfying word of God to men. And he shows that he does, and that he desires his readers to put the greatest fulness of meaning into the expression ἐν υἱῷ by the comment he immediately goes on to make, wherein he gives, at the outset, a statement of his Christological position. In this statement he represents the Son as made by God the heir of all things, an attribute arising naturally out of the relation of Sonship, especially as the Son is the first-begotten (πρωτότοκος, 1^6). Further, the Heir of all is represented as the Maker of all—by Him God made the ages (τοὺς αἰῶνας) or worlds. This implies pre-existence, or rather, seeing no reference has yet been made to an earthly state, ancient existence. It takes us back to the 'beginning' spoken of in Gn 1^1 and in Jn 1^1, to the primitive era of world-making. It gives to the Son the position assigned to the Logos in the system of Philo, that of God's agent in the universe, the statement being supplemented and completed by the added clause in 1^3: 'bearing all things by the word of his power.' The Son thus appears acting for God in the creation and preservation of the world. To all intents and purposes this means that the Son is a Divine Being, the active Deity of the universe. The presumption is that He is an Eternal Being, a parte ante as He is a parte post, a Son from eternity as well as for evermore (7^{28}), though the function of world-making implies strictly only antecedence to the things made.*

The eternal being of the Son is more clearly implied in the phrase following, wherein the Son is called the radiance of the glory and the exact image of the essence of God (ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης καὶ χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ). There might be a time when God was without a world, but there never was a time when God was without glory. It is the nature of that glory to manifest itself; like the sun it must shine, and the shining is eternal as the glory. The Son of God is the shining of His glory, and therefore eternal as the glory. Probably, however, the aim of the writer in using these remarkable expressions is not so much to declare the eternal being of the Son, as to indicate His supreme qualification for the function of fully revealing God. Who so fit to make God known as one who is related to Him as the sun's rays to the sun, and who resembles Him as the image impressed on wax resembles the seal? His word will be as the bright light of day, than which nothing can be brighter, and He may say of Himself, 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father.' The precise theological significance of these phrases cannot easily be determined; or rather, one should say, it is doubtful if they possess any such significance. They do not absolutely exclude Sabellianism or Arianism. The Sabellians laid stress on the term ἀπαύγασμα, as suggesting the idea of a model manifestation rather than of a distinct personality. The Arians, on the other hand, emphasized the term χαρακτήρ, as implying a position of subordination and dependence for the Son in relation to the Father. The orthodox, on their side, maintained that, by the combination of the two, both errors were excluded—the former phrase implying identity of nature, so excluding Arianism; the latter implying independent personality, so excluding Sabellianism.

The final clause of the Christological statement represents the Son as taking His seat 'on the right hand of the Majesty on high.' It is the place which befits one whose position and functions in the universe are such as previously described. The dignity answers to His nature as the Son, and to His vocation as the maker and sustainer of worlds. The language is grand and solemn, and is intended to convey the impression that the Son's place is the highest possible beside that of God. It may indeed be said that to place the Son beside God is not to make Him God.† Formally the distinction may be valid, but it cannot prevent the inference to Deity being drawn. He who sitteth at the right hand of God is God for all who believe in His exaltation. This exaltation, though only what corresponds to the nature of the exalted One, is a new event in His history. It takes place after He has performed a signal service for men, referred to in the words 'when he had purged our sins.' It is from this phrase only, so far as the person is concerned, that we learn that the 'Son' ever had a place in the history of this earth. He might have done all that is ascribed to Him, even spoken the final word of God, without being man. His word, like the law, might be that of an angel, spoken from heaven. But purging sin is a sacerdotal act, a function nowhere ascribed to angels, but only to men. That the purification was performed by one in the likeness of men would be very evident if the words 'by himself' (δι' ἑαυτοῦ) were part of the text. But that great thought, unfamiliar to the first readers though commonplace to us, would not be introduced by so skilful a writer till it had been carefully prepared for. The 'Son,' then, was man when He performed for us men a priest's part, how, remains to be seen, and it was after He had done this that He took His place at the right hand of Divine Majesty.

---

* Ménégoz, La Théologie de L'Épître aux Hébreux, finds in the Epistle only an Arian Christology, vide ch. i. on Le Christ.

† So, in effect, Ménégoz, p. 87.

(a) Incarnation.—The 'Son' became man. This momentous event is alluded to in various places and in diverse forms of language; now in terms borrowed from the Psalter as being made a little lower than the angels (2^{9}), now as becoming partaker of blood and flesh (2^{14}), and at another time by the very general expression 'in the days of his flesh' (5^{7}). Under what precise conditions the Son entered humanity, whether, e.g., by ordinary generation or otherwise, is nowhere indicated. The term 'children' applied to men in 2^{14}, and the expression 'likewise' (παραπλησίως) applied to the Son's becoming a participant in human nature, may justify the inference that the author conceives of Him as being born, and passing from childhood to manhood. This would scarcely be worth remarking, were it not that in the prologue of the Fourth Gospel these details are left doubtful. There the Logos simply becomes flesh, and dwells for a season among men.

(b) Earthly Life of Jesus.—What knowledge our author had of the earthly history of the Son, whether, e.g., he was acquainted with the evangelic tradition as embodied, say, in the Gospel of St. Mark, does not clearly appear. He certainly knew more than, after a cursory perusal of the Epistle, we might think. He knew of the temptations of Jesus (2^{18} 4^{15}), of the scope that His earthly experience afforded for the exercise of faith (12^{2}), of His agony in the garden (5^{7}), of the opposition He endured at the hands of evil, or ignorant, prejudiced men (12^{3}), of His gentle bearing towards the erring (5^{2}), of His work as a preacher of the good tidings (2^{3}), of His being surrounded by a band of companions who afterwards became a source of valuable and trustworthy information concerning the words of the Master (2^{3}). Of course, one who knew so much had the means of knowing more. In his description of the agony he seems to indicate knowledge of particulars not reported in the Gospels, when he represents Jesus as offering up prayers 'with strong crying and tears,' though it has been suggested that he borrowed this part of the picture from Ps $22^{14.\,24}$.*

(c) The State of Humiliation.—Be this as it may, one thing is certain, the writer has a magnificent conception of the moral significance of the earthly life of the Son as a whole; of the historic career of Him whose human name 'Jesus' he for the first time introduces in 2^{9}. He perceives clearly the pathos of that life, the humiliation and the glory in the humiliation. It may be, as has been said, that it is the exalted Jesus he has constantly in his eye, but he never forgets that the exalted One passed heroically through a severe curriculum of temptation and suffering, which awakens in his mind, as he contemplates it, admiration and love. There is no trace in his pages of the tendency, very perceptible in the Gospel of St. Luke, to tone down those elements in Christ's experience which might be thought out of keeping with the image of the exalted Lord as it presented itself to the eye of faith. [Compare St. Luke's report of the agony in the garden (leaving out the unauthentic verses, $22^{43.\,44}$) with the brief but strong statement on the same subject in this Epistle]. He was not without temptation to follow this policy, arising out of the state of feeling prevailing in the community of believers for whose benefit he wrote. Their conceptions of the Christian religion seem to have been crude, ignorant, and superficial all along the line. They did not yet understand even the first principles of Christian belief (5^{12}). The best clue to the nature of their deficiencies in Christian knowledge is to note the things emphasized and reiterated by their instructor. One of these things is the humiliation of Christ. That, therefore, was one of their stumbling-blocks. If the Son was so great as you say, how could He be tempted, and suffer death, and death in such an ignominious form? Such was one of their perplexities. One writing to a community in this state of mind was tempted to throw a veil over the indignities of the Saviour's life; to pass over in silence this, to understate that. But there is neither silence nor understatement. 'In all points tempted like as we are' (4^{15}); 'prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears' (5^{7}); 'though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered' (5^{8}); 'endured the cross, despising the shame' (12^{2}); 'endured such contradiction of sinners against himself' (12^{3}). This depicting in dark colours of the tragic humiliating side of Christ's earthly experience means much. It means, for one thing, that the writer sees in that aspect nothing to hide or be ashamed of; rather something to rejoice in and to be thankful for. He beholds glory in the humiliation, honour in the shame, contemporary honour, not merely honour following and compensating, in a state of exaltation. It means, further, that he does not despair of getting his readers to see this also. At least he is determined to try, because he knows that, until they see it, their faith is unintelligent, and their Christian standing very insecure.

Its Rationale.—The main contribution towards this object is to be found in ch. 2^{5-18}. The leading purpose of this very important section, crammed full with deep weighty thoughts, is to set forth the rationale of the earthly humiliation of Christ. And the drift of it is: a glory in the humiliation. On this theme three possible positions may be taken up—(1) the glory of the Son and the humiliation of Jesus incompatible, the position of unbelief; (2) the humiliation a temporary veiling of the glory compensated for by subsequent resumption of glory, the common position of average Christian belief; (3) the humiliation itself glorious when seen in the light of its aim and result, the position of enlightened faith. The writer of our Epistle occupies this highest position, his readers not being far from the lowest. He holds the humiliation itself to be glorious, and worthy of God the first cause and last end of all, profitable to Christ Himself, and full of benefit to us. It became God, he teaches, to subject His Son Jesus to suffering (2^{10}). It profited Jesus by perfecting Him for His office as Captain of Salvation, developing in His character the virtues of patience and sympathy, which are necessary to efficient captaincy ($2^{10.17.18}$). It is beneficial to us, for we have in Jesus one of whose interest we can be assured, and to whom we can always come with confidence that He will grant us seasonable succour (4^{16}). Such, in brief, is our author's splendid theodicy, his demonstration of the moral fitness of Christ's tragic experience. In the light of it we can have no doubt as to what he means when in ch. 2^9 he speaks of Jesus as 'crowned with glory and honour, that he, by the grace of God, should taste death for every man.' He means just what he plainly says, that God showed His favour to His Son in appointing Him to an office in connexion with which He should have to taste death for men, and that, in the very act of tasting death as Captain of Salvation, the Son was crowned with glory and honour. These things are true; they are also relevant to the situation. No one has really mastered the problem presented in the antinomy between glory and humiliation till he has got insight into their truth, and thorough mastery was what the writer possessed and aimed at for his readers. There is no difficulty in understanding his words. The difficulty felt by most interpreters arises from their unwillingness to credit him with clear insight into the moral order of the world. Such insight they appear to think beyond the reach of any writer in the first Christian century, even though inspired.

* So von Soden in Theologische Abhandlungen, Carl von Weizsäcker gewidmet, p. 119.

(d) Christ's Priesthood.—Passing from the subject of Christ's person to His priestly function, the subject may be introduced with the remark that the writer takes advantage of any means that offers itself of making intelligible to his readers the suffering experience of Christ. He is glad to be able to show them from any point of view that it behoved Jesus to die. Sometimes his lines of thought are remote enough from any recognized theories of atonement, as when he bases the thesis that Jesus had to die once only on the analogy of general human experience ($9^{27.28}$). The reason which he assigns in the same context for Christ's dying once, viz. that a testator must die before his will can come into effect, is also peculiar, inasmuch, as it is enough that a testator die anyhow, it is nowise necessary that his death should be of a sacrificial character. One wonders at the introduction of so elementary and inferior a view close upon the grand conception contained in 9^{14}; and all the more when it is observed that in order to get a chance of introducing it he has to take advantage of the double meaning of διαθήκη, as signifying at once an alliance or covenant and a testament. In the case of a covenant there is no necessity for the death of either party, therefore after the word has been used in the sense of a covenant in 9^{15} it is employed in the other sense without any apology. The reason for this must be found in the ignorance of the first readers. They had, it must be supposed, no understanding of the rationale of Christ's death from any point of view, and therefore their instructor felt that it was a point gained if he could assign any reason for that death level to their understanding. It is essential to our understanding of the Epistle that this state of ignorance in the first readers be constantly borne in mind. If we come to it, as some interpreters do, with the assumption that the whole doctrine of the atonement was familiar to the persons addressed, and that in all that the writer says on the subject of Christ's priestly work he is simply repeating commonplaces, we incapacitate ourselves for attaining any true insight into its meaning. The truth is, he is writing to persons who do not know the alphabet of the subject, and the problem for him is to get into their dull minds by any means the idea: Jesus, though the Christ, the Son of God, must die. For this purpose several lines of thought are pressed into the service: Jesus must die, as all men die, once; He must die, as a testator dies before his heirs enter into possession of his inheritance; He must die for His own advantage as the Captain of Salvation, because He could not be a good fit captain unless He were perfected by suffering; He must die as a priest, not indeed as a priest after the type of Aaron, who offered animals as sacrificial victims, but as a priest of a higher order, that of Melchizedek.

(a) The Melchizedek Type.—The excursus about Melchizedek in ch. 7 is of essential importance to the author's doctrine of Christ's priesthood. It were an entire mistake to regard it as a discussion on a curious topic in theology on which the writer happened to have some pet ideas. In that case the complaint he makes of the dulness of those to whom he writes is altogether unjustifiable. A man may be a good Christian, and yet remain ignorant, or even incapable of understanding an abstruse theologoumenon on the Melchizedek priesthood. The question at issue is really the fundamental one: was Christ in any sense a priest? The writer's conviction is that the priesthood of Christ is not understood in its reality and worth, unless it be seen to be of the Melchizedek type.

In ch. 5^{10} the author indicates the programme of his discussion on the priesthood of Christ in these words: an High Priest, after the order of Melchizedek. His plan is to employ two types of priesthood to indicate its nature—the order of Aaron, and the order of Melchizedek. His purpose is not, as some have imagined, to teach that Christ occupied in succession two priestly offices, one like that of Aaron, another like that of Melchizedek, the former on earth, the latter in heaven. His intention is rather to utilize the Aaronic priesthood to set forth the nature of Christ's priestly functions, and the Melchizedek priesthood to set forth their ideal worth and eternal validity. The two aspects are taken up in the inverse order to that in which they are named in the programme: first, a priest after the order of Melchizedek (ch. 7); second, a high priest after the order of Aaron (chs. 8. 9).

Every order or species has its characteristic notes or marks; therefore the first thing to be done is to determine the marks of the Melchizedek 'order.' To this task the writer addresses himself in ch. 7^{1-3}, which contains a summary of the facts about Melchizedek as stated in Gn 14^{18-20}, with a commentary pointing out their religious significance, and extracting from the facts the desired marks of the type. To make the facts serve his purpose the writer finds it necessary to attach importance, not merely to what is said of Melchizedek, but to what is not said,—to the silences as well as to the utterances of history; also to give ideal meaning to the names occurring in the story. This method of interpretation may seem vicious. We may call it allegorical, or allege that it is borrowed from Philo; the important thing to note is that it is his method. By this way he reaches what he is in quest of—the notes of the type. These are, in all, five. Taking them in the order in which they are referred to in the commentary, they are these: the Melchizedek type of priesthood is, first, a royal priesthood (king of righteousness); second, a righteous priesthood (king of righteousness); third, a priesthood promotive of peace, or exercised in the country of peace (king of Salem=king of peace); fourth, a personal, not an inherited dignity (without father, without mother, i.e. so far as the record is concerned); fifth, it is an eternal priesthood (without beginning of days or end of life—so far as the record is concerned). The first four may be conceived as standing to the fifth in the relation of cause to effect. Because the priesthood in question possesses these characteristics, it is eternal.

Observe, now, what the writer is really doing in making this ingenious commentary on the brief narrative in Genesis. He is trying to fix the characters of an ideal priesthood. He is solving the problem, What is the highest conceivable type or kind of priesthood? He might have adopted the method of philosophic speculation for the purpose, instead of the method of interpreting an OT text. The question may be asked, Does the latter method fully serve the purpose—give us all the essential features of the ideal? To answer it, one must have in one's mind a conception of the ideal. Now, without hesitation one would say that these things at least must enter into the idea of a priesthood of the highest order. The priest must be really, not ritually, holy; he must not be a mere sacerdotal drudge, but one whose priestly ministry is a course of gracious condescension—a royal priest; he must be one who, by his personal worth and official acts, can establish a reign of righteousness, peace, and perfect fellowship between man and God; finally, he must be one who ever liveth, whose priesthood does not pass from him to another, as a guarantee for the maintenance of peace.

But what about sacrifice, the most essential feature, one would say, in the vocation of a priest? We observe that in the close of the Melchizedek excursus, in a description of the ideal priest, which seems intended to supplement and complete the definition of the Melchizedek type, it is said that the ideal priest does not need to repeat sacrifice (7^{27}). But there is a previous question: does he offer sacrifice at all, and what is his sacrifice? By the method of laying stress on the silences, one would say that in the Melchizedek type there is no sacrifice at all, no mention being made of such in the history. If this were so, then it would seem to follow that precisely the most vital feature in the priestly office of Christ—the sacrificial offering of Himself—lay outside the type, as something sui generis, having nothing analogous to it either in the priesthood of Melchizedek or in that of Aaron. That would be a serious flaw in the writer's apologetic argument, too serious for him to have overlooked it. We must look more closely to see whether self-sacrifice be not immanent in the other characteristics of the ideal priest. We start from the statement that the ideal priest needs not to repeat sacrifice, like the high priests of Israel (7^{27}). Why so? Because of the other characteristics, especially that pointed at by the epithets holy, harmless, undefiled, which unfold the contents of the idea of righteousness. Because the ideal priest is holy (ὅσιος) in relation to God, benevolent (ἄκακος) towards men, and free from any fault that might disqualify for priestly functions (ἀμίαντος), therefore he needs not to repeat sacrifice. But for the same reason he must offer one sacrifice, himself. One who answers to the description king of righteousness, one who realizes in his character the ethical ideal, cannot escape the sacrifice of himself in this world. That is not said, but surely it must have been in the writer's mind. It was self-evident to him that one who had all the other characteristics of the Melchizedek type must have this one also, that he was ready to lay down his life for righteousness, equally so that he would be called on to do this, living as a holy one in an unholy world.

The self-sacrifice of the ideal priest, the priest after the Melchizedek type, can be reached by another line of deduction, viz. from the royal character of the type. The ideal priest is not a legal drudge, but a king who graciously condescends. Carry out the idea of condescension to its utmost limit and it will yield the result of a life laid down for others: this is the ne plus ultra of condescension and voluntary sacerdotal service, and the requirements of the ideal cannot be satisfied with anything short of it. 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for the many.' 'Who loved me, and gave himself for me.'

It is obvious that in these thoughts we pass out of the region of the ritual into the ethical, and are dealing with a kind of sacrifice of entirely different character and of incomparably greater value than those pertaining to sacrifices of Levitical victims. But to this there will be occasion to refer at a later stage. Meantime it remains to indicate the use made of the Aaronic priesthood in the exposition of the priestly office of Christ.

(β) The Aaronic Type.—The chief use is that of a foil. The burden of the section, chs. 8^1–9^{28}, is: the priestly ministry of Christ immeasurably superior to that of Aaron. The rubric of the whole passage is: the more excellent ministry. But as comparison can be made only between things having a certain resemblance, eulogy runs along the line of parallelism. Superiority is established on a basis of similitude. The points of resemblance are very general. Common to both is sacrifice, a sanctuary where sacrifice is offered, and a grand representative ceremonial in which the two systems culminate. The first point is briefly noticed in 8^3. Every high priest is appointed to offer sacrifice, therefore this man (Jesus) must also have something to offer. The vague statement is meant to provoke thought in dull Heb. readers. 'This man, if He be a priest, must have something to offer. What can it be? He has indicated what it is already—HIMSELF' (7^{27}), but he knows they have not grasped it, and he provokes them to reflection: 'What can it be? Not bulls and goats, of course; what then?' The second topic, the two sanctuaries, is handled at greater length ($9^{1-5.\,11}$). The construction and furniture of the Levitical tabernacle are minutely described, not, however, in an antiquarian spirit, but with a definite apologetic aim. The salient points in the description are the division of the sanctuary into two compartments separated by a veil, and the peculiar manner in which the location of the altar of incense (θυμιατήριον) is indicated. Of course it is the altar of incense that is meant; there should never have been any doubt about that. And it is represented as belonging to (not physically within) the Holy of Holies. The phrase is: the Holy of Holies having the golden altar of incense. The meaning is: that altar, though standing without the veil, being required for daily service, belonged of right, in spirit and function, to the inner shrine. And this antinomy—without in fact, within by right—is meant to startle into thought the sluggish minds of Hebrew Christians. 'Whence this puzzle as to the whereabouts and relations of the altar of incense? See ye not, it is all due to the existence of that veil, the emblem of a rude, imperfect, transient religion?' In comparison with the earthly tabernacle, the one in which Christ officiates is described as 'the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands' (9^{11}), and not belonging to the visible creation, not constructed out of material things, like the precious cloths, woods, and metals of the old tabernacle, which, however precious, were, like all material things, destined to wax old and vanish away.

The ceremonial selected for comparison is that of the great Day of Atonement. In that stately ceremonial the Levitical ritual culminated and was seen at its best. In it also, and in it alone, the Holy of Holies came into use. It was the one service in the year in which Israel's representative man came into the immediate presence of God. It also lent itself to comparison at this vital point, the high priest's entrance into the inner shrine being comparable to the entrance of Jesus into heaven. The latter event is therefore naturally expressed in terms of the former, giving rise at points in the description to obscurities, such as the representation of Christ entering through His own blood into the holy place (9^{12}).

All through, the unexpressed refrain 'more excellent' is audible, but it arrests the ear specially in connexion with the closing comparison between the effects of the two priestly functions—that of Aaron on the great Day of Atonement, and that of Christ when after His death on the Cross He entered into heaven. The effect of the one was to cancel the errors, or ignorances (ἀγνοημάτων, 9^{7}), of the people throughout the bygone year, to wipe out all the offences against Levitical law committed in a twelvemonth, so that they might make a fresh start. The effect of the other was to obtain an 'eternal redemption' (αἰωνίαν λύτρωσιν). Comparison here becomes futile: it is a comparison of the finite to the infinite.

(e) Theory of Redemption.—For modern readers the great thoughts of the Epistle to the Hebrews are obscured by being expressed so largely in terms of Levitical ritual. The apologetic, which was meant to elucidate, now serves to some extent as a veil to hide the true meaning. It is therefore desirable to make the most of those passages in which the writer, so to speak, shakes himself clear of his apologetic trammels, and expresses his ideas in terms of universal validity. There are two sentences in which he does this in reference to the significance of Christ's death. These are 2^{11} 9^{14}, the former containing the great axiom: the sanctifier and the sanctified are all of one; the latter, the sublime thesis that Jesus offered Himself a sacrifice through an eternal spirit. The earlier text enunciates the principle of redemption, the later explains the infinite efficacy of redemption achieved. The principle is: solidarity between sanctifier and sanctified; the two one in all possible respects, the more respects the better, the one radical difference of holy and unholy always excepted; the more points of contact the greater the sanctifying power. The rationale of infinite value is 'through an eternal spirit.' In the interpretation of this profoundly suggestive expression, theologians are unhappily not at one. To the present writer it has ever been associated with certain broad thoughts that help him to understand the value of Christ's self-offering as compared with Levitical victims. In the first place it suggests that Christ's offering was an affair of spirit, not merely of blood-shedding. It expressed a mind on the part of the victim. Of course that mind had certain ethical characteristics. Jesus offered Himself. So the mind embodied in His sacrifice was free, loving, holy; a mind of supreme moral value in the sight both of God and of enlightened men. None of these epithets, however, is used to qualify the spirit in which Jesus offered Himself to God. The epithet chosen is 'eternal.' It is selected because it serves to raise the sacrifice of Christ above the limits of time. Spirit is in its nature eternal, and the sacrifice of Christ as a spiritual transaction has an efficacy and value for all time, for the time that went before the Christian era, as well as for the time coming after. It is not a mere historical event which had no influence before it took place, and whose influence, after it happened, was destined to wane with the lapse of ages. It is an eternal fact having absolute value with God from everlasting to everlasting. But the ethical and the eternal aspects go together, the one conditioning the other. It is because the spirit in which Christ offered Himself was ethically perfect—free, loving, holy—that it has eternal value. In this remarkable phrase, combining these two aspects, the spiritual insight of the writer reaches its highest water-mark. Nothing better, more penetrating, more felicitous, on the subject of our Lord's death and its significance is to be found in Scripture.

(f) Christ's Priesthood in Heaven.—Before leaving the theme of the priesthood, we may notice briefly a question that has troubled interpreters. The priestly ministry of Christ is located in heaven, yet the sacrifice the Priest presents there appears to be none other than that offering of Himself which He made once for all; an event, so far at least as the initial stage of it, the blood-shedding, is concerned, happening on earth and within this visible world. The key to the solution lies in this, that for the writer heaven is the locus of realities, while earth is the locus of shadows. In heaven is the true tabernacle, the tabernacle which realizes the ideal of a sanctuary (8^{2} τῆς σκηνῆς τῆς ἀληθινῆς); there are the 'patterns' or types of which the vulgar realities of earth are but imperfect copies. For our author the 'true' and the 'heavenly' are synonyms. Whatever is true is heavenly, belongs to the upper world of realities, and whatever belongs to this upper world is true and real. If, therefore, Christ's self-sacrifice be a true sacrifice, it belongs to the heavenly world, no matter where or when it takes place. And Christ's sacrifice is, for the author, a true sacrifice, because it is an affair of spirit. Flesh and blood, whether of man or beast, are of the earth earthy, and belong to the realm of shadows. Even the blood of Christ viewed materially can find no place in heaven. Hence it is vain to attempt solving the above-stated problem by distinguishing between the first stage of the sacrifice —the death, or blood-shedding—and the second, the sprinkling of the shed blood on the mercy-seat within the sanctuary, relegating the former to earth as something lying outside the sphere of Christ's proper priestly activity, and to locate the latter in heaven as the point at which the priestly ministry begins. Christ's sacrifice finds entrance into heaven when blood is transmuted into spirit. In other words, the shedding of Christ's blood is a true sacrifice, as distinct from the shedding of the blood of bulls and goats, which was only a shadow of sacrifice, because it is the manifestation of a mind or spirit. And because it is that it belongs to heaven, though it takes place on earth. The magic phrase 'through an eternal spirit' lifts us above distinctions of time and place, and makes it possible for us to regard Christ's offering of Himself, in all its stages, as a transaction within the celestial sanctuary.

This conception of heaven as the place of realities, as distinct from earth as the place of shadows, is the philosophic presupposition of the system of positive Christian thought contained in our Epistle. It reminds us of Plato and of Philo. Whether our author was acquainted with the writings of either the Gentile or the Jewish philosopher is a question on which opinion differs, and on which a few remarks will be offered at a later stage. The important matter is, not to ascertain where he got this speculative conception, but to note carefully the fact that it was in his mind, and to keep it before our own minds in interpreting his words. At no point in the Epistle is it more necessary to do so than at that remarkable sentence in which the writer expresses his final deepest thought concerning the nature and worth of Christ's sacrifice.

(g) Salvation.—From the doctrine of Christ's priestly office to the conception of salvation contained in our Epistle, the transition is easy. The author describes the 'great salvation' variously, but always in terms suggested by the primitive history of man as contained in the early chapters of Genesis. He first represents it as consisting in lordship in the world to come, founding on a quotation from the 8th Psalm, which is a poetic echo of the statement regarding man's place in the world in Gn 1^{26} (ch. 2^{5-8}). Next he conceives it as deliverance from the power of death exercised by the devil, with obvious allusion to the history of the Fall in Gn 3, wherein death is set forth as the penalty of sin (ch. $2^{14.15}$). Finally, he exhibits it as the full final realization of the divine idea and promise of rest, to which he applies the felicitous thought-suggesting name Sabbatism (σαββατισμός), so making the final bliss of redeemed man consist in entering into the rest which God Himself enjoyed when He had finished the work of creation (ch. 4^{9}, cf. Gn 2^{2}). Taken together, the three conceptions suggest the thought of Paradise restored, the divine ideal of man and the world and their mutual relations realized in perpetuity, man made veritably the lord of creation, delivered from the fear of death, no longer subject to servile tasks, but occupied only in work compatible with perfect repose. From all the three points of view, salvation is a thing in the future. It is an apocalyptic vision. Fruition lies in the Beyond. Dominion, deathlessness, and Sabbatism belong to the world to come, and are objects of hope for those who bear the Christian name.

But salvation is not altogether in the future; it is a present good as well. Christians, as such, are conceived of as 'sanctified' (ἁγιαζόμενοι) and even 'perfected.' These words, however, do not bear quite the same meaning as that which we, familiar with the Pauline theology, are apt to attach to them. In the Epistles of St. Paul sanctification is ethical, and means making the Christian holy in heart and life. In the Epistle to the Hebrews this ethical sense appears (though the point has been disputed) occasionally to be traced, as in ch. $12^{10.14}$, but more commonly the term is used in a theocratic sense, to express the idea of being put in right covenant relations with God, as in the text: 'By one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified' (10^{14}). The sanctified in this theocratic sense are equivalent to St. Paul's 'justified.' In ch. 2^{11} the word ἁγιαζόμενοι should probably be taken in both senses. The statement the verse contains is of the nature of an axiom, to the effect that whatever parties stand to each other in the relation of sanctifier to sanctified are ipso facto 'of one,' have one interest, form a brotherhood bound together by community of nature, experience, and privilege. The principle holds good, whether we understand the sanctifying function theocratically or ethically. If the function of the sanctifier be to place the sanctified, i.e. those to be sanctified, in right relations with God, then the more points of contact the better. There must be unity in God's sight, so that what He does is done in the name of those He seeks to sanctify, and avails for their benefit. He must be one with them in death, as it is by His death that He makes propitiation for their sins. He must possess, in common with them, humanity, for otherwise He could not die. Finally, He must be one with them in experience of trial and temptation, because thereby is evinced the sympathy that wins trust, and unless the priest is trusted it is in vain that He transacts. On the other hand, if the sanctifier's function be to make his clients ethically holy, then, again, the more points of contact between Him and them the better. In that case, the sanctifying power lies in the example of the sanctifier: in His character, His history as a man. He makes men holy by reproducing in His own life the ideal of human character, and bringing that ideal to bear on their minds by living a truly godly life under conditions similar to those under which they are placed. In short, His power to sanctify ethically depends on likeness in nature, position, and experience.

The word τελειόω is sometimes also used in our Epistle to denote the establishment of right relations between man and God, that is to say, as equivalent to 'justify' in the Pauline vocabulary. So in the text: 'By one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.' Perfecting here means giving the worshipper a satisfactory assurance that his sins are forgiven. What the word means in any given case depends entirely on the connexion of thought. In general, it signifies to reach the end, and the specific sense depends on the nature of the end in view. Thus perfecting as applied to Christ in 2^{10} signifies to make Him a fully-equipped Captain of salvation. Applied to the fathers, who died in faith, not having received the promises in 11^{40}, it means getting at length what they had lived and longed for when the company of the saved is complete.

Condition of Salvation.—What is the condition of salvation in our Epistle? We know what it is in St. Paul's theology. We are justified by faith. Faith is a great word in the Epistle to the Hebrews also, but its use there is not quite the same as in the Pauline letters. In the apostle's system faith has two functions. It accepts as a gift the 'righteousness of God,' and it works through love as a sanctifying power. Of the former function there is no clear trace in Hebrews. Instead of faith we find obedience in the text: 'He became the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him' (5^{9}). We come nearer to the Pauline conception of justifying faith in 10^{22}, where the writer exhorts his readers to draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, where faith means confident expectation of welcome for Christ's sake. The function of faith as a force making for personal righteousness or noble conduct is very prominently set forth in ch. 11, where, in a series of well-chosen instances, it is exhibited as a power helping men to make their lives sublime. But the secret of its power is peculiarly conceived in Hebrews. In St. Paul's system faith derives its power from its personal object, the Lord Jesus Christ. It unites us to Him, and from Him flows a transforming influence. In Hebrews the secret of faith's power is its psychological character as a faculty of the human mind, whereby it can make the future as if it were present, and the unseen as if it were visible. So viewed, faith as a principle making for heroism is not confined to the Christian world. It is as wide as humanity, and can turn out heroes and heroines in every land. Hence even a Rahab finds a place in the roll of those who obtained a good report through faith.

(2) FATHERHOOD OF GOD.—The doctrine of the Fatherhood of God and the sonship of men, central in our Lord's teaching, and prominent also in the Pauline letters, is not very conspicuously taught in our Epistle. It makes a formal appearance chiefly in the hortatory section. There God is called 'the Father of spirits' (12^{9}), and it is taught that His supreme aim in all His dealings with His children is to make them partakers of His holiness (12^{10}). The phrase 'Father of spirits' seems to imply a paternal relation of God to men as such, coextensive with the human family, or, rather, inclusive of the human family, embracing it in a larger category, the world of spirits, including men living in the flesh but having a spirit, the spirits of just men made perfect, and angels. In the theoretical part of the Epistle the Fatherhood of God is referred to, or implied, mainly in reference to the Sonship of Christ. But while this is so, it must be ascribed to the exigencies of the apologetic argument controlling the train of thought rather than to the peculiarity of the writer's theological system, that the doctrine of the Fatherhood is so comparatively in the background. No man could be insensible to the importance of that doctrine who had such a vivid sense of the distinction and glory of Christianity as the religion of free access to and intimate fellowship with God. This central conception covers the whole ground. A religion of unrestricted access is a religion of sonship. Its spirit is filial, not legal; its watchword trust, not fear. It brings its votaries to Mount Zion, not to Mount Sinai. At another point the doctrine of sonship is immanent in the Epistle, though not formally named. This is where faithful Christians are called the comrades of Christ. 'We have become fellows of Christ if we hold fast the beginning of our confidence stedfast unto the end' (3^{14}). So we render the passage, taking μέτοχοι in the sense it bears in 1^9. The faithful the fellows of Christ, God's Son—such is the writer's idea, implying also, of course, that they are sons in the same house and family of God. This is just what was to be looked for from one who grasped the significance of the great principle, Sanctifier and sanctified all of one. It is but the other side of that great truth. The one side is Christ's oneness with those He undertakes to sanctify, and His readiness to accept all the conditions necessary to His complete identification with them. The other side is the unity of the sanctified with Christ, complete equality with Him in privilege. They are sons, therefore, as indeed they are called in 2^{10}, and therefore Christ's brethren. He was not ashamed to call them brethren even when they were in an unsanctified state (2^{11}); how much less will He be ashamed to call them brethren when they have experienced His sanctifying power! Therefore we need have no hesitation in taking μέτοχοι in the fullest sense of comradeship. In doing so we only assume that the author understands his own system of thought, and it may be added that he is in sympathy with the teaching of our Lord and with the conception of the relation between Christ and His people that pervades the entire NT. For the religion of the NT is throughout filial, and God, whether often or seldom so named, is always Father. The dialects for the purposes of theological reflection are various, but the central religious intuition is one.

iv. Relation to Philo.—Such in brief outline is the theological import of the Epistle. We have avoided preliminary discussion of the questions belonging to the head of Introduction, because we did not wish to give any countenance to the idea that a right understanding of the Epistle depends on the previous settlement of doubtful questions respecting its author, its first readers, its date, its theological affinities, etc. We do not believe anything of the kind. It has been said, e.g., that no one can understand the Epistle who does not regard it as the writing of one belonging to the School of Philo and thoroughly conversant with his philosophy. We are inclined to think, on the contrary, that to be too sure of this, and to lay great stress on the supposed fact, is the direct way to misunderstanding. It is possible to understand the main drift of the Epistle while remaining in suspense as to the connexion with Philo. It is best to commence the study of the work tolerably uncommitted on the point. It is quite proper, as we go along, to keep our eyes open to all traces of affinity with Philo, so that on arriving at the end of the book we may have, not only a distinct idea of its theological drift, but also a more or less probable opinion on the subordinate question as to the connexion of its author with the Alexandrine school of religious philosophy. But that question, however interesting, is not vital.

That there are affinities of thought and style is not to be questioned, and, indeed, has already been indicated in a passing way. The author's mode of conceiving heaven as the place of realities and the earth as the place of shadows is an instance in point. That peculiarity is a fact patent to any attentive reader altogether apart from the question to what source it is to be traced. We might notice it though we had never heard of Plato or Philo. The only effect of the hypothesis that the writer was a disciple of the Jewish philosopher is somewhat to sharpen our attention and lead us to attach more importance to it than we otherwise would, perhaps more than it deserves. But there need be no jealousy as to having our attention directed to phenomena of this kind. No question of religious importance is involved, and the multiplication of instances of affinity in word and thought between Hebrews and the writings of Philo serves the purpose, at least, of increasing our acquaintance with the literary characteristics of our Epistle.

Among the verbal affinities with Philo the following may be specified. Philo, like our author, uses the prophets for the OT. 'Απαύγασμα and χαρακτήρ find a place in his vocabulary, θυμιατήριον is used by him (not in LXX) for the altar of incense. Among the functions he ascribes to the Logos is that of cutter (τομεύς), even as our author describes the word of God as more cutting (τομώτερος) than any two-edged sword. The unusual words τραχηλίζω (4^{13}) and μετριοπαθέω (5^2) both occur in Philo. Less remarkable is the coincident use by the two writers of the epithets τεχνίτης and δημιουργός in reference to God (11^{10}). Among the thought affinities may be reckoned the distinction between τὰ φαινόμενα (11^3)=Philo's ὁ ὁρατὸς κόσμος, the visible world, and the non-visible things (μὴ ἐκ φαινομένων, 11^3)=Philo's κόσμος νοητός, the world of ideas; the conception of heaven as the country or home (πατρίς, 11^{14}) of the soul; the application to Christ of attributes ascribed in Philo to the Logos, such as πρωτότοκος (1^6) answering to πρεσβύτερος υἱός or πρωτόγονος in Philo; θεός (1^9), ἀρχιερεύς. To these instances thoroughgoing advocates of dependence on Philo would add the whole Melchizedek excursus, but without good reason. At this point our author drew his inspiration, not from Philo, but from the Heb. prophet who wrote the 110th Psalm. Philo does not quote or refer to the text about Melchizedek in that psalm, and there is nothing in all his writings to show that he followed the psalmist, or set the example to our author, in ascribing to the priest of Salem an ideal significance. Bleek states, with strict truth, that in Philo the significance of Melchizedek is always treated in an incidental manner.[*] As to the attribute of cutting, ascribed to the word of God in Hebrews, and to the Logos in Philo, the resemblance is in word rather than in thought. Our author is not thinking of the personal Logos in the passage in question, and the function he ascribes to the Word is ethical, exercised in the spirit of man, whereas the function Philo had in view was that of dividing the material of which the world is made into genera and species. On the whole, if, as is not improbable, the writer was more or less familiar with the ideas and philosophic dialect to which the Alexandrian school of Jewish philosophy gave wide currency in the first Christian century, there is no evidence in his work of abject discipleship, but at most of a very free independent use of words and ideas hailing from that quarter, just so far as they would serve his purpose.

v. Relation to St. Paul.—A similar relation of independence towards the Apostle Paul must be claimed for the Epistle. That the apostle was not the author of it is now so generally admitted that it is hardly worth while discussing the question. The diversity in the use of important theological terms such as ἁγιάζω and πίστις, the broad contrast in style, the marked individuality of the two authors in respect of religious temperament, all shut one up to this conclusion. As to the difference of style, it is a matter of detail, with reference to which a decided impression can be made only by a large accumulation of instances, but the following statement gives a sufficient idea of it. 'St. Paul was not free from Hebraism, and derives force from the simplicity of his language; the author (of Hebrews) expresses himself in idiomatic and polished Greek, and delights in the pomp of stately phrases and full-sounding derivatives. They differ in the elementary framework of their sentences by employment of different constructions and different connecting particles. Dialectical subtlety, impetuous bursts of natural eloquence, mighty thoughts struggling for expression in disjointed sentences, are the characteristic features of St. Paul's style. Rhetorical skill, studied antithesis, even flow of faultless grammar, and measured march of rhythmical periods, combine to stamp upon the Epistle a distinct and unique character of its own.'* Behind this difference of style lies an even more marked difference in religious temperament and experience. St. Paul is a man of great moral intensity; the author of Hebrews has about him an air of philosophic repose. We feel in every page of the Pauline Epistles that the man who wrote them has passed through a great religious crisis In reading Hebrews we have no such feeling. Instead of a tragic experience there has been a smooth quiet studious life, whose passage into Christian faith has resembled the dawn of day rather than the sudden flash of light from heaven which smote Saul of Tarsus to the earth on the way to Damascus. A significant index of this equable flow is the entire absence from our Epistle of the well-known Pauline antitheses: law and grace, faith and works, flesh and spirit. There are antitheses here also, but they are less pronounced, — shadow and substance, type and antitype,—pointing at, not radical contrariety, but different stages in the religious development of mankind.

The writer of Hebrews was not only not St. Paul, but not even a disciple of St. Paul. To a great extent the proof of the one thesis is at the same time the proof of the other. That he was acquainted with the Pauline literature has been confidently asserted, but cannot be clearly shown.† There are doubtless things that remind us of Pauline texts, e.g. the description of the law as 'the word spoken by angels' (2^2), which recalls a similar thought in Gal 3^{19}, and the idea of the heavenly Jerusalem (12^{22} 13^{14}) found in the same Epistle (4^{25}). But these may be mere coincidences in the use of conceptions belonging to the common stock of contemporary religious thought. Acquaintance with Philo's writings can be alleged with much greater show of reason.

But while not a follower of St. Paul, our author is in thorough sympathy with all the leading positions of Paulinism. Without doubt he stands on the ground of universalism. No express text, indeed, can be cited in support of this assertion. From beginning to end there is not a single allusion to Gentile Christians, or the slightest indication that the writer is aware of the existence of such people. He seems to have in view throughout, God's ancient people, and to have for his sole aim to enable Hebrew Christians to remain steadfast in the faith amid circumstances of trial. He takes no advantage of opportunities for indicating the universal destination of the gospel; not even in 2^{16}, where it would have been so natural to have said, He (Jesus) took not hold of (in order to save) angels, but He took hold of mankind; instead of which he says, He took hold of the seed of Abraham. Nevertheless, the Epistle breathes throughout the spirit of universalism. The whole scheme of thought, though excogitated for the benefit of Hebrews, is capable of universal application, and implies that Christianity is the concern of all mankind. The remark holds true especially of the Christology. The cosmic relations in which the Son is set in the proem indicate that the word spoken by God through Him is a revelation for the whole world. It is only in universalist writings, such as the Epistles of St. Paul and the Gospel of St. John, that a cosmic Christology is to be looked for. Not less universalist in tendency is the view of the sacrifice of Christ presented in ch. 9^{14}. The doctrine takes its colour from Levitical institutions, but in its core it is not Jewish but human. The phrase by an eternal spirit lifts the whole subject above the distinctions, not only of time and space, as already pointed out, but also of race and nationality. It has the same ring as the great epoch-making text in St. John's Gospel: 'The hour cometh, when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. . . . The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth' ($4^{21.\,23}$).

Our author is in thorough sympathy with St. Paul's conception of Christianity as a spiritual religion. He sees not less clearly than the apostle the utter worthlessness of rites and ceremonies, except as a shadow of good things to come. He makes no allusion to circumcision, but doubtless he would have been in full sympathy with the Pauline polemic against those who attached religious value to that rite. His own controversy is with those who attach overweening importance to Levitical ceremonial; but it is not less thoroughgoing than the apostle's, and it rests upon the same principles and postulates.

Once more, our author is at one with St. Paul in his conception of Christianity as a religion of free grace. His own conception of it as the religion of unrestricted access to God is an exact equivalent. It is the same truth set in a different antithesis. St. Paul opposed grace to legal works, our author opposes the privilege of free access to the distance at which Levitical regulations kept worshippers from God. The counsel 'Draw near' presupposes a gracious Father to be approached, from whom all spiritual good may be confidently expected: pardon of sin, seasonable succour in all times of temptation. In Hebrews as in Rom. and Gal. salvation is a free gift.

vi. WAS THE AUTHOR JEW OR GENTILE?—Whether the author of our Epistle was a born Jew or a Gentile cannot be decided. The style and the rhetorical structure of the writing make for the latter alternative, the familiarity with Jewish institutions for the former. Both might be combined in a Jew of Alexandrian Hellenistic culture like Apollos, with whom, since Luther threw out the suggestion, there has been a disposition to identify the author, though the hypothesis has no support in ancient tradition. The question of nationality is of subordinate importance. The only question of vital interest in connexion with the theological import of the Epistle is whether the author represented the standpoint of Jewish Christianity with its limited sympathies and its contracted religious ideas. A tendency to take this view of his position has been more or less apparent in some recent contributions to the exegetical literature of the subject. In so far as it is adopted, it makes the understanding of the book hopeless. We cannot too firmly grasp the fact that in his essential ideas the writer soars high above all Jewish-Christian narrowness. In his method of interpreting Scripture, in his modes of argument, and even in some of his subordinate conceptions, he may be a man of his time and people; but in his great central thought of Christianity as the religion of free access and of spiritual reality, he belongs to all time and to all peoples. Whether he came before St. Paul or after him in point of time, he is of the same spiritual brotherhood. He has seen with open face the true nature and the grandeur of the Christian faith.

vii. JEW OR GENTILE READERS?—In asserting the universal outlook of our author, we were obliged to admit that on the face of his work he seems to concern himself only with Jewish readers. Till recent times no doubt has been entertained that the inscription To the Hebrews, though not original, correctly indicated its destination. But of late there has been a tendency, supported by weighty names, to set this tradition aside, and to hold that the first readers must have been Gentiles, not Jews. Among those who share this opinion are Schürer, Weizsäcker, Pfleiderer, and, above all, von Soden. Among the grounds on which this hypothesis is made to rest are such as these: the fundamentals enumerated in $6^{1.2}$ are such as were suitable for catechumens of pagan antecedents; the expression 'the living God' (9^{14}) suggests an antithesis between the true God and pagan idols, and the moral exhortations, addressed to the readers, possess special appropriateness only when conceived as meant for Gentile Christians. The numerous phrases which seem to imply readers of Heb. extraction are explained so as to harmonize with the hypothesis, by the assumption that, at the time when the Epistle was written, the Gentile Church had served itself heir to the title and privileges of the elect people. To the question, what need for so elaborate a plea for Christianity versus Leviticalism in an Epistle written for Gentile Christians? the answer given is: The type of Gentile Christianity the author had to deal with was an eclectic syncretistic system, into which an amateur attachment to Levitical institutions entered as an element, and became so strong as to endanger the Christian faith with which it was associated, especially in a time of persecution.*

That an amount of ingenuity has been expended in support of this hypothesis, sufficient to make it appear plausible, is frankly admitted. But that the case has been proved we are far from thinking. We sympathize with Ménégoz when he says: 'What strikes us, in this Epistle throughout, is a Jewish "flavour of the soil," and an absence of all allusion to pagan worship so complete that we have difficulty in comprehending how anyone can discover in it the least indication of its being meant for readers of pagan antecedents. We do not say there were no pagan Christians in the community, there may have been for aught we know, but in the texts we see no trace of them.'† Ostensibly the first readers are Hebrews, and Hebrews alone; that is generally acknowledged. The onus probandi lies on those who affirm that they were not really such, and it requires a very elaborate display of exegetical ingenuity to explain away the apparent Jewish costume and physiognomy. If the readers were indeed Gentiles, they were Gentiles so completely disguised in Jewish dress, and wearing a mask with so pronounced Jewish features, that the true nationality has been successfully hidden for nineteen centuries, and even now, after learned critics have done their best to show us the Gentile behind the Jew, we shake our heads in honest insurmountable doubt, and feel constrained to agree with Westcott when he pronounces the argument of von Soden 'an ingenious paradox.'‡ viii. LOCATION OF FIRST READERS.—Where the Heb. community, to which the Epistle was addressed, was located, is a much debated question of inferior moment to that just disposed of. Palestine, Alexandria, Rome are the rival hypotheses, and weighty authorities can be cited for each of them.§ It is not necessary here to go into details on the subject, as the topic has no vital bearing on the theology of the Epistle. If we attach weight to the inscription To the Hebrews as indicating, not merely Jewish nationality, but a section of the Jewish people distinguished by the epithet 'Hebrew,' it points to Palestine or Syria as the locality of the first readers. 'Hebrews' means Jews speaking Hebrew. But as the Epistle was written in Greek, these 'Hebrews' must have been bilinguals acquainted with Greek as well as their mother-tongue. Such bilingual Jews would be found more readily in a Syrian city like Antioch than in Jerusalem. Other things point in the same direction, e.g. the statement in 2^3 that the persons addressed had heard the gospel, not from the lips of the apostles, but at second hand. This would apply to the Syrian Churches, which were founded by the scattered members of the Jerusalem Church after the death of Stephen.*

ix. DATE.—The date of the Epistle has more than curious interest. The solemn earnest tone of the hortatory parts speaks to a great crisis, such as that of the destruction of Jerus. and of the Jewish state, impending. All seems to say: a judgment-day is approaching (10^{25}). The Epistle is a supreme effort to avert apostasy at a time of extreme peril. A general overturn is at hand, when all things that can be shaken—cities, walls, temples, hoary religions—will be shaken to make room for the kingdom that cannot be shaken ($12^{26.27}$). There is therefore a high degree of probability in the suggestion that the Epistle was written when the war, which issued so disastrously for the Jewish people, was raging and drawing near to its awful crisis. 'The fatal year A.D. 70 had arrived, and the Roman armies had gathered round Jerus.; if the daily sacrifice had not already ceased, the siege had at all events begun; for until Jerus. was "compassed with armies" no Hebrew Christian would have ventured to address to his Heb. brethren so unsparing a condemnation of the national religion.'† The last statement in this quotation may be doubtful, for the prophetic men of Scripture always had the courage to utter their convictions at the proper time, but the selection of the period most suitable to the message delivered is otherwise appropriate. And the date called for by the solemnity of the message is borne out by minute hints occasionally dropped, e.g. by the allusion to the 40 years during which the people of Israel saw God's works (3^9). The mere circumstance that the writer connects the 40 years with the seeing of God's works, rather than with the trying of God's patience, as in the psalm quoted from, is significant. He does it intentionally, and as one aware of the original connexion, as is evident from 3^{17}, where he returns to the original connexion. What is his intention? To suggest a parallel between the case of Israel in the wilderness and the Heb. Church to this effect: 'Your fathers saw God's wonderful works, which ought to have kept them true to Him, for 40 years, yet they perished through unbelief. You have seen the wonders of God's grace in the Christian Church for the same period of time; see that ye perish not likewise on Israel's judgment-day.' Reckoning the 40 years from the beginning of the Church, corresponding to the Exodus, the period would take us down to the fateful year 70 or thereby.

That the Epistle was not written at a later date has been argued from the fact that throughout the writer seems to speak of the Levitical ritual as if it were still in force. This, however, it is now generally admitted, is not conclusive, as the author appears to write of that ritual from an ideal point of view. It may have been a thing of the past as an actual fact, yet present for his mind as an object of thought. The possibility of this must be admitted in view of the fact that it is not the temple but the old tabernacle the writer has in view as the scene of Levitical worship (see $9^{2.6.7}$).

x. AUTHOR.—The Epistle is anonymous, and the author has remained unknown. Apollos, as described in Ac 18^{24-28}, is the kind of man wanted —a Hellenistic Jew of Alexandrian culture, acquainted both with the OT Scriptures (in the Gr. version) and with contemporary philosophy. With this we must be content. Other conjectures thrown out from time to time have comparatively little to commend them. The most interesting, and one of the most ancient, is that which ascribed to Luke the Evangelist a share in the production of the work, at least to the extent of translating into good Greek a supposed Heb. original from the hand of the Apostle Paul. Clement of Alexandria entertained this opinion, and through Eusebius (HE iii. 38) it became the prevailing view that the Epistle was, in thought, the work of St. Paul, and in a Gr. version the literary work of St. Luke or Clement of Rome. A number of resemblances between the style of St. Luke in the Gospel and in Ac and that of our Epistle have been pointed out, so as to lend at least plausibility to the hypothesis that the evangelist is responsible for the Epistle in its Gr. dress. But if Luke might have been the translator (on the improbable hypothesis of a Heb. original), he certainly could not have been the author. The striking contrast between his account of the agony in the garden and that given in the Epistle is sufficient to settle that question.

We must be content to remain in ignorance as to the writer of this remarkable work. Nor should we find this difficult. Some of the greatest books of the Bible, such as Job and the second part of Isaiah, are anonymous writings. It is meet that this one should belong to the number, for it bears witness in its opening sentence to One who speaks God's final word to men. In presence of the Son, what does it matter who points the way to Him? The witness-bearer does not desire to be known. He bids us listen to Jesus and then retires into the background. We need have no anxiety about finding for his work an apostolic author who shall guarantee its inspiration and canonicity. The book speaks for itself. It is worthy to be in the NT. It rendered an indispensable service as an aid to faith in a transition time when an old world was passing away and a new world was coming into being.

A. B. BRUCE.

HEBRON (חֶבְרוֹן 'association').—1. The third son of Kohath, known to us only from P (Ex 6^{18}, Nu 3^{19}) and the Chronicler (1 Ch $6^{2.18}$ 15^{9} $23^{12.19}$). Nothing further is known of him personally, but there are a few scattered notices of his descendants. The Hebronites are mentioned with the three other Kohathite families at the census taken in the wilderness of Sinai (Nu 3^{27}), and appear again at the later census in the plains of Moab (26^{58}). In 1 Ch 15^{9} it is said that 'of the sons of H., Eliel the chief, and his brethren fourscore,' were amongst the Levites assembled by David when he brought the ark from the house of Obed-edom into Jerus., and in 1 Ch 23^{19} that when David numbered the Levites there were reckoned four sons of H., Jeriah, Amariah, Jahaziel, and Jekameam (cf. 24^{23}), while 1 Ch 26 mentions some members of the Hebronite family as holding certain offices under David ($26^{23.30.31}$). 2. A son of Mareshah and father of Korah, and Tappuah, and Rekem, and Shema (1 Ch 2^{42-3}). It is possible that in these vv. the names are those of localities rather than individuals.

W. C. ALLEN.

HEBRON (חֶבְרוֹן 'association,' Χεβρών, Arab. el-Khalîl).—A very ancient city in the southern part of Canaan, built 'seven years before Zoan in Egypt,' Nu 13^{22} (JE). Josephus (Ant. I. viii. 3) also states that it was seven years older than Tanis (Zoan) in Egypt, and also (BJ IV. ix. 7) that it was the oldest city in Palestine, older even than Memphis in Egypt, and that its age in his time was 2300 years; thus making it a rival of Damascus, which he states (Ant. I. vi. 4) was founded by Uz, the grandson of Shem.

Hebron included Mamre, Gn 13^{18} (J). Abram, when he moved his tents after separating from Lot, 'came and dwelt by the terebinths of Mamre, which are in Hebron': these trees were in possession of Mamre the Amorite, brother of Eshcol and Aner, with whom Abraham was confederate (Gn 14^{13}). When Sarah 'died in Kiriath-arba' ('the same is Hebron,' Gn 23^{2}), Abraham entreated the children of Heth for a burying-place for her, and bought the field of Ephron containing the cave 'which was in Machpelah which was before Mamre' ('the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan'), Gn 23^{17}. 'Now the name of Hebron beforetime was Kiriath-arba ('the city of Arba'), the greatest man among the Anakim,' 'the father of Anak' (Jos 14^{15} 15^{13}, Jg 1^{10}). As Machpelah was before or over-against Hebron (Mamre), it would appear that though close together they were distinct places.

The first mention of the giants who occupied Hebron is made in the account of the spies (Nu 13^{22}) sent by Moses into the land of Canaan, when the sons (Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai) of Anak were at Hebron. It would thus appear that at the time of Abraham there were both Amorites and children of Heth at Hebron, and also that the children of Anak were connected with the place, as they were there in the time of Moses, and the city itself was originally called after Arba the father of Anak (but see Moore, Judges, p. 23; and Hommel, Anc. Heb. Trad. p. 234, who make Kiriath-arba = Tetrapolis). There is no record as to whether the Anakim were Canaanites in common with the Amorites and children of Heth; but it would appear that they were not Rephaim, Zuzim, or Emim who dwelt east of the Jordan, and who are mentioned as being as tall and powerful as the Anakim, and not as the same tribe (Gn 14^{5} 15^{20}, Dt $2^{11.21}$). It has been pointed out [cf. Wellhausen, Comp. d. Hexat. p. 341 (1889)] that Amorite is the general name of the primitive population of Canaan, and that these names are descriptive titles, and not the names of distinct tribes (Gn 14^{13} 23^{5}, Jg 1^{10}), but they were probably originally distinct (see Driver, Deut. 11 f.).

The Jewish writers take Kiriath-arba to mean the city of four, which they refer to four saints,—Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Adam,—in which Jerome also concurs. Sir John Maundeville (in A.D. 1322) states that at the time of his visit the Saracens called Hebron Karicarba, while the Jews called it Arbothe; and he also refers to Adam being buried there.

Hebron became after the entry into the Promised Land a city of Judah, situated (Jos 15^{54}) in the hill-country (Jos 20^{7} 21^{11}), and is stated by Eusebius (Onom. s.v. Αρκώ) to be 22 miles south of Jerusalem and 20 miles north of Beersheba. It is now called el-Khalîl ('The Friend') by the Mohammedans.

Hebron played an important part in the early history of the Hebrews until Jerusalem became the capital of Palestine. Abraham, after waxing rich and separating from Lot, came and dwelt by the terebinths of Mamre, which are in Hebron, and built an altar there unto the Lord (Gn 13^{18}). From here he went to the rescue of Lot, and brought him back after defeating Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him; here his name was changed from Abram to Abraham, and it was here that he entertained the angels unawares (Gn $14^{13ff.}$ 17^{5} 18^{2}). Here Isaac was born, and Sarah died and was buried in the cave of the field of Machpelah, bought by Abraham as a burial-place. Here also Isaac and Jacob lived part of their lives (Gn 35^{27} 37^{14}); from here Jacob sent Joseph to seek his brethren, when he was taken into Egypt, and from here Jacob and his sons followed after (Gn 35^{14} 46^{1}). Here the three patriarchs and their wives, except Rachel, were buried (Gn $49^{30.31}$ 50^{13}). Here the spies sent by Moses saw the Nephilim or giants, the sons of Anak (Nu 13^{22}).

Hebron was taken by Joshua and given as an inheritance to Caleb, who drove out the three sons of Anak (Jos 14^{12} 15^{14}). It was made one of the six cities of refuge (Jos 20^{7}, Jos. Ant. V. i. 24, ii. 3), and given with its suburbs to Kohathite Levites; but the fields of the city and the villages thereof were given to Caleb (Jos 21^{11}). One of the exploits of Samson was to bring the gates of the city of Gaza and place them on the top of the mountain that is before Hebron (Jg 16^{3}). Hebron was one of the cities to which David sent a portion of the spoils after smiting the Amalekites; here he was anointed king over the house of Judah; and here he remained king of Judah seven and a half years, and six sons were born to him (2 S 2. 3).

Here Abner was treacherously slain by Joab at the gate, and was buried; and here the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, after their hands and their feet had been cut off, were hanged 'beside the pool' (2 S 3^{27} 4^{12}). Here came all the elders of Israel, and anointed David king over Israel (2 S 5^{3}). Here it was that Absalom came to be declared king (2 S $15^{7ff.}$). At this time there was a spot here for worshipping the Lord, probably the altar said to have been erected by Abraham to the Lord by the terebinths of Mamre (Gn 13^{18} 15^{17}). (But see Jerome, Quæst. Hebr. on 2 S 15^{17}).

According to Josephus (Ant. VIII. ii. 1), king Solomon went to Hebron to sacrifice to the Lord 'upon the brazen altar that was built by Moses'; and here the Lord appeared to Solomon, who prayed for a sound mind and good judgment; but it is stated in the Bible (1 K 3^{4}) that this took place at the great high place at Gibeon.

Rehoboam fortified Hebron (2 Ch 11^{10}), and it was occupied after the Captivity, when it was called by its old name Kiriath-arba (Neh 11^{25}). Judas Maccabæus captured it from the Edomites, and 'pulled down the strongholds thereof, and burned the towers thereof.' It had thus at that time ceased to be a city of Judah (1 Mac 5^{65}; Ant. XII. viii. 6).

At the time that Vespasian was making preparations for the final siege of Jerusalem, Simeon bar-Gioras made a sudden raid into Edom and took Hebron without bloodshed; but it was shortly afterwards recaptured by Cerealis, one of the commanders of Vespasian's army, and was burnt down (BJ IV. ix. 7, 9). Josephus states that at this time the monuments of the posterity of Abraham were to be seen at Hebron, 'the fabric of which monuments is of the most excellent marble, and wrought after the most elegant manner. There is also shown at a distance of six furlongs from the city a very large turpentine tree, which has continued since the creation of the world.'

In the 4th cent. the sepulchres of the patriarchs were still shown at Hebron, built of marble and of elegant workmanship. The church described by Eusebius at the terebinths appears to have been the Great Basilica of Constantine, remains of which are still to be seen (Onomast. art. 'Arboch') to the north of Hebron. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) describes the monument of Abraham as a quadrangle built of stones of admirable beauty. Antoninus Martyr (Itin. 30) describes a quadrangle with an interior court, open to the sky, into which Jews and Christians entered from different sides, burning incense as they advanced. In the 6th cent. Arculf visited Hebron when it was occupied by the Saracens, and he describes the sepulchre as small and mean, situated about a stadium from Mamre on the east, and surrounded by a low wall. Willibald in the 8th cent. passed here, and mentions the sepulchres in the castle Aframia; and Sæwulf, 1103, speaks of the monuments to the patriarchs being surrounded by a very strong castle. In 1167 Hebron was erected into a bishopric under the Latins. William of Tyre says that there never was a Greek bishop before this, but only a prior. Benjamin of Tudela, who visited Hebron in 1163, states that the ancient city was standing on a hill in ruins; while the modern city stood in the valley in the field of Machpelah. He also describes the iron door leading to the caves.

Hebron (el-Khalîl, 'the friend') is one of the four sacred cities of the Moslems, and the shrines of the patriarchs are very jealously guarded by them. The town is built without walls, and contains about 18,000 Moslems and 1200 to 1500 Jews. It is situated in a shallow valley surrounded by rocky hills, from which spring no fewer than 25 sources of water. Luxuriant vineyards still clothe the hills and vales, and produce some of the best grapes in Palestine, and groves of olive and fruit trees abound. The town is divided into four quarters; the houses are built of stone, with partially flat and partially domed roofs, on account of the scarcity of large timber for rafters. The valley in which the town is built runs from north to south; the main quarter lies on the eastern slope, with the Harâm or sacred area conspicuously rising above it. Two other quarters are to be seen in the north and west slopes, and one to the south. The streets opening on to the main roads have gates. At the northern end of the main quarter is a pool of ancient construction, 85 ft. by 55 ft., and low down in the valley southward is a larger one, also of high antiquity, over 130 ft. square and 28 ft. deep, the traditional spot where the murderers of Ishbosheth were hanged.

There are a large number of traditional sites about Hebron. In 'Ain Keshkaleh may be found the name Eshcol, although this identification is philologically difficult. At 'Ain Judeideh, west of the Harâm, is a vault where Adam and Eve are said to have mourned for Abel; and above are the Deir el-Arabîn, said to be the tombs of Jesse and Ruth; and the Kabr Hebrûn, said by the Hebron Jews to be the tomb of Abner. At the foot of this hill is the Ager Damascenus, from which was obtained the red earth of which Adam was made.

About two miles to the west of the Harâm is a venerable oak (Sindiân), one of the finest in Palestine. It measures 22½ ft. around the lower part. It is probably the tree described as a terebinth by Sir John Maundeville, Belon, and others. Since the 12th cent. it has been pointed out to Christians as 'Abraham's Oak,' under which Abraham pitched his tent. About two miles to the north, near the road to Jerusalem, is the Râmat el-Khalîl, called by the Jews of Hebron the house of Abraham. Here are the foundations of an immense building—200 ft. by 165 ft.—of large squared stones, of which two courses only remain, regarded by the Jews as the place of Abraham's tent and the terebinth at Mamre. Guerin (Judée, iii. 214) suggests that this enclosure was built round the tree under which the patriarch was supposed to have pitched his tent. Jerome speaks of a fair having been held annually on this spot. It seems probable that from 1st to 12th cent. this was the traditional site of Mamre. It is suggested (SWP iii. 323) that this building may have been the market mentioned by Sozomen (Hist. ii. 4) as the place where Hadrian sold Jewish captives for slaves (A.D. 165), close to which Constantine afterwards built his basilica at the terebinth of Mamre, the foundations of which are still to be distinguished (Conder, Palestine, 85).

It is quite clear that, if the present traditional sepulchres of the patriarchs are genuine, the present site of the city which stands around the Harâm cannot coincide with the site of the ancient city of Abraham's time, which was over-against the sepulchre; and this idea appears to have been present to the minds of the early Christian writers, who mention a site on the north-west of the modern city as the original Hebron.

The Harâm or 'sacred area' is a quadrangle 197 ft. by 110 ft. externally. The masonry of the wall is identical with that of the Wailing Place at Jerusalem, and is therefore probably not later than Herodian. The height of the ancient wall still standing is about 40 ft., and above this rise walls of modern construction, with lofty minarets at N.W. and S.E. corners. Within the enclosure is a mosque, probably the remains of the church built in the 11th cent. when the bishopric was established, and the monuments to the patriarchs are within. The tombs themselves are, however, below in the rocky cavern, and the iron door which is said to lead to them was shown to the present writer at the bottom of the flight of steps on the outside wall in 1867 (see account by Benjamin of Tudela, Early Travels in Palestine, p. 86; PEF Mem. iii. 333; Cte. Riant, Archives de l'Orient Latin, ii. 411, and art. MACHPELAH; Onomast. arts. 'Arboch' and 'Drys'; Antonini Mart. Itin. 30, Early Travels). C. WARREN.

HEDGE is used in AV to translate words of two different Heb. stems. One of these (gâdar, גָּדַר) refers to stone walls, though, perhaps, in some instances, to a stone wall crowned with thorns. In AV its derivatives are often tr. by the word 'wall.' In RV they are prevailingly, though not always, tr. by the word 'fence.' The other stem (sûk or sâkak, שׂוּךְ or שָׂכַךְ) refers to a thorn hedge. The Gr. φραγμός, tr. 'hedge' in Mt 21^{33}, Mk 12^{1}, Lk 14^{23}, denotes a fence of any kind, whether hedge, or wall, or palings. The purpose of the hedge, as the term is used in the Bible, is either to protect that which is enclosed in it (e.g. Job 1^{10}), or to restrain and hinder (e.g. Job 3^{23}, Hos 2^{6}). See FENCE.

HEED.—Heed is either 'carefulness,' as Is 21^{7} 'And he hearkened diligently with much heed' (וְהִקְשִׁיב קֶשֶׁב רַב־קָשֶׁב; LXX ἀκρόασαι ἀκρόασιν πολλήν; Vulg. 'et contemplatus est diligenter multo intuitu,' whence AV through Gen. 'And he hearkened and toke diligent hede'; Orelli, 'And has listened with most eager listening'); or simply attention, as Ac 3^{5} 'And he gave heed unto them, expecting to receive something of them' (ἐπεῖχεν αὐτοῖς). The phrase is always (except Is 21^{7} above) 'take heed' or (less often) 'give heed,' and the only noticeable occurrence is Sir 6^{13} 'Separate thyself from thine enemies, and take heed of thy friends' (πρόσεχε) This tr$^{\text{n}}$ is from Wyc. and Dou. after Vulg. 'ab amicis tuis attende,' the other VSS having 'beware of,' which RV adopts. The meaning of AV is probably 'pay attention to' suspiciously, as in North's Plutarch (Cicero, p. 879), 'After that time, Cicero and he were alwaies at iarre, but yet coldly enough, one of them taking heed of another.' But Shaks. uses the phrase in the sense of 'pay attention to' without suspicion, as Jul. Cæs. I. ii. 276, 'Three or four wenches, where I stood, cried "Alas, good soul!"—and forgave him with all their hearts; but there's no heed to be taken of them: if Cæsar had stabbed their mothers they would have done no less'; and Coverdale uses it in the sense of 'take care of,' Hos 13^{5} 'I toke diligent hede of the in the wildernesse that drye londe.'

J. HASTINGS.

HEGAI or HEGE (הֵגַי Est $2^{8.15}$, הֵגֵא 2^{3}, Γαί).—A eunuch of Ahasuerus, and keeper of the women, to whom the maidens were entrusted before they were brought in to the king. The name is probably Persian; cf. Ἡγίας, who is named in Ctesias (Pers. c. 24) as a courtier of Xerxes (so Roediger, Thes. Add.). H. A. WHITE.

HEGEMONIDES (Ἡγεμονίδης, 2 Mac 13^{24}).—An officer left in command (στρατηγός) of the district from Ptolemais to the Gerrenians (which see), by Lysias, when he was forced to return to Syria to oppose the chancellor Philip (B.C. 162). AV translates 'made him (Maccabæus) principal governor,' but no parallel for such a use of ἡγεμονίδης is to be found. Syr. recognizes the proper name, but Vulg. reads Ducem et principem. H. A. WHITE.

HEIFER (in all the passages cited below, the Heb. term. is עֶגְלָה except Nu $19^{2\text{ff.}}$, Am 4^{1}, Hos 4^{16}, where it is פָּרָה. In the only NT occurrence, He 9^{13}, the Greek is δάμαλις).—The heifer is repeatedly mentioned in the Bible, in connexion both with agriculture and with ritual services.

That it was customary to use heifers for ploughing is evident from the saying of Samson, 'If ye had not plowed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle,' Jg 14^{18}. Ploughing and harrowing are both specified in Hos 10^{11}, and from this passage as well as from Jer 50^{11} we gather that heifers were employed to tread out the corn.

A heifer of three years old was one of the animals divided by Abraham upon the occasion of his solemn covenant with J″, Gn 15^{9} (J). A heifer was the animal offered by Samuel at Bethlehem, 1 S 16^{2}. When a murder had been committed, the author of which could not be traced, a special atoning ceremony was prescribed, Dt $21^{3\text{ff.}}$. The elders of the nearest city had to take a heifer which had never been used for work away to a barren spot where there was a wady with running water, and there break its neck. Thereafter they washed their hands over the carcase, solemnly testified their innocence of the murder, and prayed that J″ would forgive His people for the crime that had been committed in their midst (see notes of Driver and Dillm. ad loc., also W. R. Smith, RS^{1} 351). For the ritual prescribed in Nu $19^{2\text{ff.}}$ and referred to in He 9^{13}, see RED HEIFER. In Nu 19^{17} AV reads, 'They shall take of the ashes of the burnt heifer of purification for sin,' which gives the sense (if not the exact tr$^{\text{n}}$) of מֵעֲפַר שְׂרֵפַת הַחַטָּאת better than RV, 'They shall take of the ashes of the burning of the sin-offering' (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. חַטָּאת). The reference is to v.^{9}.

The word 'heifer' is several times used in similes. Egypt is compared to a heifer in Jer 46^{20}, so is Chaldæa in 50^{11}, the points of resemblance being probably beauty, strength, and wantonness (cf. Am 4^{1} 'kine of Bashan' applied to the ladies of Samaria). Israel is compared in Hos 4^{16} to a stubborn heifer that will not accustom itself to the yoke (Nowack), and in Hos 10^{11} to a heifer which has hitherto had the easy task of treading out corn, but is now to have the harder work of ploughing and harrowing.

For 'heifer of three years old' of Is 15^{5}, Jer 48^{34} (AV and RVm) see EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH.

HEIR.—i. TERMS. יָרַשׁ yārash, and נָחַל nāḥal, LXX κληρονομέω, κατακληρονομέω, etc., Vulg. heres sum, etc., 'inherit'; ptcp. יוֹרֵשׁ yôrēsh, LXX κληρονόμος, etc., Vulg. heres, etc., 'heir'; יְרֻשָּׁה yĕrushshāh, יְרֵשָׁה yĕrēshāh, מוֹרָשָׁה môrāshāh, נַחֲלָה naḥălāh, LXX κληρονομία, κλῆρος, etc., Vulg. hereditas, etc., 'inheritance'; יָרַשׁ, נָחַל, and their derivatives are also commonly used in the more general sense of 'possess,' 'acquire'; and figuratively of the relation between God and His people, e.g. J″ is the naḥălāh of Levi, Dt 10^{9}, and Jacob is the naḥălāh of J″, Dt 32^{9}; בְּכוֹר bĕkhôr, LXX πρωτότοκος, Vulg. primogenitus, 'firstborn'; בְּכוֹרָה bĕkhôrāh, LXX τὰ πρωτοτόκια, πρωτοτοκεῖα, Vulg. primogenita (neut. pl.), 'birthright,' 'right of the firstborn'; גֹּאֵל gō'ēl, LXX ἀγχιστεύς, ἀγχιστεύων, λυτρωτής, συγγενής, Vulg. cognatus, propinquus, ultor, 'next-of-kin'; גָּאַל, gā'al, LXX ἀγχιστεύω, λυτρόω, etc., Vulg. propinquitatis jure retinere, eruere, redimere, etc., 'act as next-of-kin'; גְּאֻלָּה, gĕ'ullāh, LXX ἀγχιστεία, λύτρον, λύτρωσις, etc., Vulg. propinquitas, etc. On bĕkhôr, gō'ēl, and derivatives, see further below.

ii. INHERITANCE. The fact that the terms for heir, etc., for the most part meant originally, and continued to mean, possess, etc., indicates a certain lack of emphasis on the difference between inheritance and other ways of acquiring and holding property. Land, the most important kind of property, belonged to the family and the clan rather than to individuals, as is shown by the Jubilee and other land laws. All land was, as it were, entailed. Other property too—cattle, slaves, and, in some instances, wives—was inherited. The heir succeeded to the headship of the family, which included the control of the family property. Moreover, the heir succeeded as a right, according to law and custom; he took possession of what had become his. Wills were unknown in ancient Israel, though sometimes (cf. below) a father would interfere with the natural course of things to benefit a favourite son. The phrase 'set thy house in order,' צַו לְבֵיתֶךָ, shows that a dying man would sometimes arrange the disposition of his property, and the future status of the members of his family; but probably in accordance with recognized custom, if not with binding law. The blessing of the dying father would usually confirm the firstborn in his right, but might also, as in the blessings of Isaac and Jacob, transfer it to someone else.

iii. RIGHT OF THE FIRSTBORN, BIRTHRIGHT. The prevailing custom, which is everywhere taken for granted, was that the eldest son succeeded his father as head of the family, and took the largest share of the property. Thus we have the special terms bĕkhôr, bĕkhôrāh, for 'firstborn,' 'right of the firstborn.' The genealogies, Gn 5, etc., mention the firstborn, and him only. 1 Ch 5^{1} speaks of Reuben having an original right of pre-eminence, which he lost by misconduct. In 2 Ch 21^{3} Jehoram succeeds Jehoshaphat, 'because he was the bĕkhôr.' Probably the eldest son, if an adult, succeeded to the high priesthood; but the exceptions were numerous, both in the royal and sacerdotal dynasties. According to Ex 13^{2}, JE, the firstborn of every mother was sacred to J″. In Dt 21^{17} the bĕkhôrāh is a 'double portion,' פִּי שְׁנַיִם. The difference of status between the mothers of a man's children, often only loosely defined, was a fruitful source of discord as to the bĕkhôrāh. Reuben, the son of an inferior wife, is reckoned as Jacob's bĕkhōr; he is deposed for misconduct, not on account of his mother's status. On the other hand, Sarah claims that, because Ishmael is the son of a concubine, he shall not even share the inheritance with Isaac, Gn 21^{10}. Evidently, the prior right of the son of the wife over that of the concubine depended upon the feeling of the father towards mother and son, and probably also on the influence of the mother's family.

iv. CASES WHERE THE FIRSTBORN WAS PASSED OVER FOR OTHERS—JUNIOR RIGHT. The exceptions to the rule of the succession of the eldest son are numerous and striking. The line of divine election among the patriarchs usually passes through younger sons, Abraham apparently, Isaac, Jacob. According to 1 Ch 5$^{1.2}$, the bĕkhôrāh was transferred from Reuben to Joseph. In Gn 49 Jacob puts Ephraim before his elder brother Manasseh. According to Ex 7^{7} (P), Moses was the junior of Aaron. David was the youngest son of Jesse; and Solomon, one of the youngest, at any rate, among the many sons of David. We may take the circumstances of the succession of Solomon as typical. The father would often secure the succession for a favourite son by appointing him his successor, or even by associating him with himself in his lifetime. Such arrangements have always been common, especially in the East. The favourite wife would often be the one last married, and the favourite son the youngest. Apart from 2 Ch 21^{3}, it is never stated that the eldest son succeeded his father as a right. Great men with large harems and numerous families would follow the example of the kings. The transference of the bĕkhôrāh from Reuben to Joseph, and from Esau to Jacob, shows that such a change might be made for sufficient cause, and therefore, of course, on any plausible pretext: a case is mentioned in 1 Ch 26^{10}. A further proof of the occasional transference of the bĕkhôrāh at the will of the father is the prohibition of the practice in Dt 21$^{15-17}$.

The frequent succession of youngest sons suggests that the very widespread custom of 'Junior Right' or succession by the youngest existed in pre-monarchical Israel, and survived in some measure in later times. J. Jacobs (Studies in Biblical Archæology, p. 47), partly following Sir H. Maine, says: 'The custom would naturally arise during the later stages of the pastoral period, when the elder sons would in the ordinary course of events have set up for themselves by the time of the father's death. The youngest would in these circumstances naturally step into the father's shoes, and acquire the patria potestas, and with it the right of sacrificing to the family gods by the paternal hearth.' On the other hand, when the heir was a minor, the inheritance was probably often seized by adult kinsmen. Witness the constant complaints of the wrongs done to orphans.

v. WHO INHERITED WHEN THERE WERE NO SONS. In Nu 27$^{5-10}$ (P), in connexion with the daughters of Zelophehad, the following provision is made for this and similar cases: 'If a man die and have no son, ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter. If he have no daughter, ye shall give his inheritance unto his brethren. If he have no brethren, ye shall give his inheritance unto his father's brethren. If his father have no brethren, ye shall give his inheritance unto his kinsman, שְׁאֵר, who is next to him in his clan, מִשְׁפָּחָה.' In Nu 36^{6} it is further provided that heiresses must marry in their own clan. Though the law itself is late, the provisions are obvious and probably ancient, except perhaps the preference given to daughters. A member of another clan marrying an heiress joined her clan, Ezr 2^{61}, Neh 7^{63}, cf. BERIAH. Jeremiah's acquisition of his uncle's field, Jer 32^{7}, is an example of the rights of a kinsman in the family property.

Jacob's action in reckoning Ephraim and Manasseh as his sons is doubtless typical of cases of adoption. Similarly, women would sometimes, as in the case of Sarah, Rachel, and Leah, reckon children born to their husbands by their slaves as their own; but, as we have seen, the rights of such children were uncertain. In 1 Ch $2^{34.35}$ a genealogy is traced through the issue of a Jewess and an Egyptian. Abraham, Gn 15^{3}, expects that his slave will be his heir, cf. Pr 30^{23}, where, however, the translation is not certain. The last two cases would also be typical.

The succession is as a rule confined to the father's kin on account of the family sacra. W. R. Smith (Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, p. 95) points out that women could not inherit in early Arabia (cf. Benzinger, p. 355), and that there could be no question of a widow inheriting because she was a part of a man's property, and went with the rest of the estate to the heir. This principle is illustrated in Israel by the law of the levirate marriage, the case of Ruth, the incident in 2 S 16^{15-23}, and the incident of Adonijah and Abishag—to succeed to the king's widow implied succeeding to the throne. By the law of the levirate marriage (Dt 25^{5-10}; cf. Gn 38, Ru 4) the firstborn son of a man's widow by his brother, or gō'ēl, became his heir; (cf. GOEL, MARRIAGE, and see Driver on Dt $25^{5\text{ff.}}$).

vi. PROVISION FOR CHILDREN OTHER THAN THE CHIEF HEIR. The principle that the land belongs to the family, involves the providing for the rest of the family by the head who controls the family property. Probably, in early times the maintenance of younger children was provided for according to this principle by customs no longer traceable. Abraham, however, sends his younger children away with gifts (Gn 25^{6} [JE]); according to 2 Ch 11^{23} Rehoboam dispersed his sons among the walled towns of Judah and Benjamin, made ample provision for them, and gave them wives, in order to secure the throne for a favourite son, Abijah. Sons would often be got rid of in this fashion to secure an undisputed succession for a favourite. Other typical cases are those of Ishmael and Jephthah, who were sent away without any share of the inheritance. Daughters would almost always be married; unmarried daughters would be kept and have husbands found for them by their brothers, and where there were sons there would be no question of their sharing the inheritance. Job 42^{15} specially mentions that Job's daughters shared with their brothers, doubtless because this was exceptional.

Dt 21^{16} speaks of the father 'causing the son to inherit that which he hath,' which seems to imply some power on the part of the father to determine the inheritance of his property (Dillm., Driver, i.l.; cf. ii.). But this is strictly limited by the context, and it must have been similarly limited by ancient custom. The law, probably, is partly a protest against the violation of such, and partly a provision for new conditions. There is nothing in the history to suggest the subdivision of the family land at each successive generation. Benzinger (p. 354) is doubtful whether any such subdivision took place. It seems very unlikely. Unless, therefore, the above Deut. laws are confined to personal property they are probably late, perhaps were never effective.

The New Testament. No question of the laws or customs of inheritance arises in connexion with the NT. Christ is the (firstborn) son and heir in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mk 12^{7} etc., and in He 1^{2}); Christians are heirs of God's promises, etc. (Ro 8^{17}, Gal 3^{29} $4^{1.7}$, He 6^{17}, Ja 2^{5} etc.). The figure of inheritance is also used in reference to Abraham, and to the Israelites, etc. Διαθήκη is often translated 'testament' by AV, especially in reference to the institution of the Lord's Supper (Lk 22^{20} etc., 1 Co 11^{25}), but it should be 'covenant,' except perhaps in He $9^{16.17}$, where the rendering 'testament' is defended by many scholars (see commentaries, i.l.). RV has 'covenant' throughout, often with 'testament' in the margin, except that in He $9^{16.17}$ 'testament' is placed in the text, and the margin states that the Greek word means either 'covenant' or 'testament.' In Lk 12^{13} we read that 'one said unto him, Master, bid my brother divide the inheritance with me.' See also INHERITANCE.

HELAH (חֶלְאָה 'rust'?).—One of the wives of Ashhur the 'father' of Tekoa, 1 Ch $4^{5.7}$. See GENEALOGY.

HELAM (חֵילָם, in 2 S 10^{17} with ה locale חֵלָאמָה and the Massoretic note יתיר א. Budde, however, maintains that חֵלָאם is the correct form).—The Aramæans from beyond the river,* whom Hadarezer summoned to his aid, came to Helam (2 S 10^{16}) and were there met and defeated by David (v.$^{17\text{f.}}$). As far as the form of the word is concerned, חֵילָם in v.^{16} might mean 'their army' (so Aq. ἐν δυνάμει αὐτῶν, followed by Thenius). There can, however, be little doubt that the LXX (Αἰλάμ), Pesh. and Targ. are right in taking it as a proper name (so Ewald, Hist. iii. 155 n. 2; Bertheau, Wellh., Driver, Budde, Kittel). Cornill, upon the ground of the LXX Ἡλιάμ, introduces Helam also in Ezk 47^{16} (cf. also Bertholet, ad loc.). In this case it must have lain on the border between Damascus and Hamath. J. A. SELBIE.

HELBAH (חֶלְבָּה).—A town of Asher, Jg 1^{31}. Its identity is quite uncertain. (For various attempts to fix its site, see Moore, ad loc.).

HELBON (חֶלְבּוֹן).—A place from which wine was brought to Tyre, Ezk 27^{18}. It is the modern Ḥalbûn on the east slope of Antilebanon, about 13 miles N. of Damascus. The region around, on Hermon and the Antilebanon, is remarkable for its vineyards to the present day. The wine of Helbon is mentioned also in the cuneiform texts, and the Persian kings are said to have preferred it to any other. It has sometimes been wrongly supposed that Helbon is to be identified with Aleppo.

HELDAI (חֶלְדַּי; B Χολδειά, A Χολδαί).—1. The captain of the military guard appointed for the twelfth monthly course of the temple service (1 Ch 27^{15}). He is probably to be identified with 'Heleb the son of Baanah the Netophathite,' one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23^{29}; A Ἀλάφ, B omits). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11^{30}; B Χθάοδ, A Χοάδδ and Ἐλάδ) the name is more correctly given as Heled. The form Heldai is supported by Zec 6^{10} (see below), and should probably be restored in the other two passages.

2. According to Zec 6^{10}, one of a small band who brought gifts of gold and silver from Babylon to those of the exiles who had returned under

---

* The Euphrates, not the Orontes as Hitzig maintains. See Wellh. Sam. 179 f.

Zerubbabel. From these gifts Zechariah was bidden to make a crown for Joshua the high priest, which was to be placed in the temple as a memorial of Heldai and his companions. In v.^{14} Helem (חֵלֶם) is clearly an error for Heldai; the Peshiṭta in both places reads Holdai or Huldai (ܚܘܠܕܝ). J. F. STENNING.

HELEB (חֵלֶב 2 S 23^{29}).—See HELDAI 1.

HELED (חֵלֶד 1 Ch 11^{30}).—See HELDAI 1.

HELEK (חֵלֶק 'portion').—Son of Gilead the Manassite, Nu 26^{30}, Jos 17^{2} P. Patronymic, Helekites, Nu 26^{30}.

HELEM.—1. (הֶלֶם) A man of Asher, 1 Ch 7^{35}. 'The name must be altered to חוֹתָם (v.^{32}) to fit the context; otherwise we should have הֶלֶם in v.^{32} instead of חוֹתָם' (Kittel in SBOT). 2. (חֵלֶם) An exile who was sent from Babylon with gifts of gold and silver for the sanctuary at Jerusalem, Zec 6^{14}. He is called in v.^{10} Heldai (חֶלְדַּי). LXX has τοῖς ὑπομένουσιν, not treating this and other nouns in the same passage as proper names.

HELEPH (חֵלֶף).—A town on the border of Naphtali, Jos 19^{33}. Although mentioned in the Talmud (Megillah i. 1, see Neubauer, Géog. d. Talm. 224), Heleph has not been identified.

HELEZ (חֶלֶץ 'vigour'; B Σέλλης, A Ἕλλης, Luc. Χάλλης).—1. One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23^{26}). He is described as 'the Paltite,' i.e. a native of Beth-pelet in the Negeb of Judah (cf. Jos 15^{27}, Neh 11^{26}). But in the two parallel lists (1 Ch 11^{27} and 27^{10}) both the Hebrew text and the LXX (ὁ Φελωνεί; ὁ ἐκ Φαλλούς) read 'the Pelonite,' a variant which is supported by cod. A at 2 S 23^{26} (ὁ Φελλωνεί; B reads ὁ Κελωθεί); the former reading is further inconsistent with 1 Ch 27^{10}, where Helez is expressly designated as 'of the children of Ephraim.' From the latter passage we learn that he was in command of the military guard appointed for the seventh monthly course of the temple service. See PELONITE.

2. A Judahite, 1 Ch 2^{39}. J. F. STENNING.

HELI (Ἡλεί = Heb. עֵלִי).—1. The father of Joseph, in the genealogy of Jesus, Lk 3^{23}. 2. An ancestor of Ezra, 2 Es 1^{2}. Omitted in parallel passages, 1 Es 8^{2}, Ezr $7^{2.3}$. See GENEALOGY.

HELIODORUS (Ἡλιόδωρος).—The chancellor (ὁ ἐπὶ τῶν πραγμάτων) of Seleucus IV. Philopator. At the instigation of APOLLONIUS (which see), he was sent by the king to plunder the private treasures kept in the temple at Jerus.; but he was prevented from carrying out his design by a great apparition (ἐπιφανία),—a horse with a terrible rider struck him to the ground, while two young men scourged him severely. H. was carried out of the temple by his guards speechless and prostrate, but was restored at the intercession of the high priest Onias (2 Mac $3^{7\text{ff.}}$). Some have supposed that the discomfiture of H. was due to a device of Onias (cf. v.^{32}, so Rawlinson in Speaker's Comm.). Jos., who seems to have been unacquainted with 2 Mac, makes no mention of the mission of H.; but in 4 Mac 4 a similar story is related of Apollonius. In B.C. 175 H. murdered Seleucus, and attempted to seize the Syrian crown; but he was driven out by Eumenes of Pergamus and his brother Attalus, and Antiochus Epiphanes, brother of Seleucus, ascended the throne (App. Syr. 45; Liv. xli. 24). There is commonly supposed to be a reference to H. in Dn 11^{20}, but the interpretation of the passage is doubtful (cf. Bevan in loc.). Further, H. is frequently reckoned as one of the ten or the three kings of Dn $7^{7\text{f.}}$. H. A. WHITE.

HELKAI (חֶלְקָי, perh. shortened for חִלְקִיָּה).—A priest (Neh 12^{15}). See GENEALOGY.

HELKATH (חֶלְקַת and חֶלְקָת 'portion,' 'possession').—A Levitical city belonging to the tribe of Asher, Jos 19^{25} 21^{31}. The site is uncertain. The same place, owing perhaps to a textual error, appears in 1 Ch 6^{75} [Heb. ^{60}] as Hukok.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM.—The name given to the spot at Gibeon where the fatal combat took place between the twelve champions chosen on either side from the men of Abner and Joab, 2 S 2^{16}. The name חֶלְקַת הַצֻּרִים means 'the field of sword edges.' This is accepted by Driver (Text of Sam. ad loc.), who compares Ps 89^{44} [Eng.^{43}] צוּר חַרְבּוֹ 'the edge of his sword.' Others prefer to follow the LXX μερὶς τῶν ἐπιβούλων and read ח׳ הַצֹּדִים 'the field of the liers in wait' (so Ewald, Hist. iii. 114; Wellh. Sam. ad loc.; Budde, SBOT, ad loc.). Thenius reads ח׳ הַצָּרִים 'the field of the adversaries.' J. A. SELBIE.

HELKIAS (Χελκίας, Gr. form of Heb. חִלְקִיָּה, Hilkiah; in AV of Apocr. reproduced as Chelcias, Helkias, and Helchiah; RV uniformly Helkias).—1. The high priest Hilkiah in Josiah's reign. He is mentioned in 1 Es 1^{8} = 2 Ch 35^{8} as a governor of the temple, subscribing handsomely to Josiah's great Passover; in 1 Es 8^{1} (cf. Ezr 7^{1}) as the great-grandfather of Ezra; and in Bar 1^{7} as father of Joakim, who was governor of the temple in the reign of Zedekiah. 2. A distant ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1^{1}). 3. The father of Susanna (Sus vv. $^{2-29}$). J. T. MARSHALL.

HELL.—The term used in Old English to designate the world of the dead generally, with all the sad and painful associations of the dark region into which the living disappear. In modern English it has the specific sense of the place and condition of penalty destined for the finally impenitent among the dead. With this it expresses also the abode of evil spirits. It is cognate or connected with the German hehlen = hide, hüllen = cover, A.S. helan, Lat. celare, etc. It appears in much the same form in many of the European languages: Ger. hölle, Sw. helvete, Go. halja, Da. helvede, Du. hel, Ice. hel, O.H.G. hella, A.S. hel, helle, M.E. helle (cf. Chaucer, CT 1202). The Teutonic base, hal = hide, akin to kal, kar (in the older form), is supposed by Skeat to be a 'development from a root skar, of which the meaning was to cover.' Etymologically, therefore, the term denotes the covered, hidden, unseen place.

In our AV the word 'hell' is unfortunately used as the rendering of three distinct words with different ideas. It represents (1) the שְׁאוֹל of the Heb. OT, and the ᾅδης of the LXX and the NT, which have the general sense of the 'realm of the dead.' In this employment of the word the AV translators were justified so far by the sense which it had in their day, and by the fact that it was applied to the world of the departed generally in the Creeds, in Spenser, in Chaucer, in mediæval miracle and mystery plays, and in Old English religious poetry. It is not the only word which the translators of 1611 used as an equivalent for שְׁאוֹל and ᾅδης. At times they used 'the pit' (Nu $16^{30.33}$), and in a number of cases 'the grave' (Gn 37^{35}, 1 S 2^{6}, Job 7^{9} 14^{13}, Ps 30^{3} $49^{14.15}$ etc.). But 'hell' is their most usual rendering in the OT (Dt 32^{22}, 2 S 22^{6}, Ps 16^{10} 18^{5} 116^{3} 139^{8}, Pr 5^{5} 7^{27} 9^{18} etc.), and the rendering to which they adhered in all the NT passages, however different in their shades of meaning, in which they found some form of ᾅδης (Mt 11^{23} 16^{18}, Lk 12^{5} 16^{23}, Ac $2^{27.31}$, 1 Co 15^{55}, Rev 1^{18} 6^{8} $20^{13.14}$). It is now an entirely misleading rendering, especially in the NT passages. The English Revisers, therefore, have substituted 'Hades' for 'hell' in the NT. In the OT they allow the word 'hell' to remain in the text of Is 14, and give Sheol in the margin. In the poetical books they usually give Sheol in the text; while in the historical books they place Sheol in the margin, and allow the renderings 'the grave' and 'the pit' to stand in the text. In the American Revision the word 'hell' is entirely discarded in this connexion (as are also the terms 'the grave,' 'the pit'), and with a wise consistency Sheol is substituted all through the text of the OT, as Hades is in the text of the NT. (See also article on HADES).

The word 'hell' is used (2) as equivalent to τάρταρος in the verbal form ταρταρώσας in 2 P 2^{4} (cf. Jude ^{6}). In that passage it is retained by the RV, though it might be better rendered 'cast them down to Tartarus.' The particular case in view there is that of the punishment of fallen angels, and the word is applied to the intermediate scene and condition of penalty in which those offenders are detained, held in chains of darkness, in reserve for the final judgment. In this one instance the NT adopts the heathen term for 'hell'—the word which in Plato (Phæd. 113 E) designates the place into which the incurably corrupt are hurled with a view to their endless imprisonment; and which in Homer (Iliad, viii. 13, etc.) is the name given to the murky abyss, lying as deep beneath Hades as earth is beneath the sun, in which the sins of insurgent and defeated immortals, Kronos, Iapetos, and the Titans, are punished.

In this the paragraph in question, together with the corresponding passage in the Ep. of Jude (v.^{6}), attaches itself to ideas on the subject of the punishment of angels, which have a considerable place in the literature of Judaism, especially the apocalyptic writings. These ideas assumed strange and amorphous forms, unlike anything in the NT, as regards both the place and the nature of the penalty. The Book of Jubilees and the Apocalypse of Baruch, e.g., both speak of the fallen angels as 'tormented in chains,' and the former represents them as bound in the depths of the earth until the day of the great judgment (Bk. of Jub 5^{243} 7^{248} 22^{21} 24^{27} etc., Apoc. of Bar 56^{10-13}). The Book of Enoch dilates at greatest length on these things. Enoch is described as receiving a commission to announce the impending judgment of the fallen angels. Their leader, Azâzel, is doomed to be covered with darkness until the great day of judgment. The prison in which they are confined until the day of decision consigns them to the final retribution, is seen by Enoch. It is described as different from the abyss of fire, in the extremest depth of earth, into which they are in the end to be cast, and in certain parts of the book this preliminary place of punishment is represented, as was the case also with the Tartaros of the Greeks, as in the void at the end of heaven and earth (Bk. of Enoch 10^{6} 13^{21} 18^{11} 21^{7} 54^{6} 90^{24}).

The word 'hell' is used (3), and more properly, as the equivalent of γεέννα, the designation of the place and state of the just retribution reserved for the finally impenitent after the judgment. This word γεέννα (less correctly, in view of its derivation from the Aramaic, γέεννα), Gehenna, occurs twelve times in the NT, and for the most part only in the Synoptists. It is not found in the Johannine writings, nor in the Bk. of Acts, nor in any of the Epistles except once in one of the Catholic Epp. (Ja 3^{6}). But in the Synoptical Gospels it is found eleven times, and in a variety of phrases—'in danger of the Gehenna of fire' (Mt 5^{22}), 'to be cast into Gehenna' (Mt $5^{29.30}$ 18^{9}, Mk $9^{45.47}$), to 'destroy . . . in Gehenna' (Mt 10^{28}), 'the child of Gehenna' (Mt 23^{15}), the 'damnation' or 'judgment of Gehenna' (Mt 23^{33}), to 'go into Gehenna' (Mk 9^{43}), to 'cast into Gehenna' (Lk 12^{5}). It is found, therefore, in each of the three Synoptists. In all the instances of its use in the Gospels it is given as a word from Christ's own lips, and in one case we have the parallel narrative of Mt and Mk (Mt 18^{9}, Mk 9^{45}). It belongs to the tradition common to the first two evangelists, and there is every reason to believe that it forms part of the primitive report of Christ's words. Hence the importance of defining with all due care its precise sense, point, and connotation.

This term Gehenna, γεέννα, which is the solemn NT designation of hell, represents the Aram. גֵּיהִנָּם and the Heb. גֵּיא הִנֹּם 'the valley of Hinnom' (Neh 11^{30}), more fully גֵּי בֶן־הִנֹּם 'the valley of the son of Hinnom' (Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, 2 Ch 28^{3}, Jer 7^{32}), and גֵּי בְנֵי הִנֹּם 'the valley of the children of Hinnom' (2 K 23^{10}, acc. to the Kethîb). It is taken by some to mean the 'valley of howling' or 'the valley of lamentation,' גֵּיהִנָּם being supposed to come from an obsolete הָנַן (Arab. hanna, 'cry' or 'wail'). But far more probably the Hinnom is a personal name. The place so named after one unknown was a deep narrow gorge in the vicinity of Jerusalem, understood to be on the south side, forming a continuation of the valley of Gihon and separating the hill of Zion from the 'hill of Evil Counsel.' It is usually identified with the modern Wady er-Rebâbi, though this is contested by some (see Conder in Encyc. Brit. xiii. 640). It is repeatedly mentioned in the OT. The border of Judah is described as going up 'by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite . . . and to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward'; while the border of Benjamin is said to have 'come down to the end of the mountain that lieth before the valley of the son of Hinnom' and to have 'descended to the valley of Hinnom to the side of Jebusi on the south' (Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}; cf. Neh 11^{30}). It is described as 'by the entry of the East gate' (Jer 19^{2}), and as having the valley of Tophet or Topheth in it (2 K 23^{10}, Jer 7^{31} 19^{6}). Jerome speaks of it as having been of old a pleasant place, and as having again in his own time the attraction of gardens. But under Ahaz, Manasseh, and Amon it was made the scene of the gross and cruel rites of heathen worship, idolatrous Jews passing their children through the fire there to Molech (2 Ch 28^{3} 33^{6}, Jer 7^{31}). Hence king Josiah, when he put down the idolatrous priests who had burned incense to Baal under the apostate kings of Judah, also 'defiled Topheth, which is in the valley of the children of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech' (2 K $23^{5.10}$). It was also declared by Jeremiah that the place should be 'no more called Tophet, nor The valley of the son of Hinnom, but The valley of Slaughter' (Jer 19^{6}). After its pollution by the pious son of Amon it became an object of horror to the Jews, and is said to have been made a receptacle for bones, the bodies of beasts and criminals, refuse and all unclean things (so Kimchi). The terrible associations of the place, the recollections of the horrors perpetrated in it and the defilement inflicted on it, the fires said to have been kept burning in it in order to consume the foul and corrupt objects that were thrown into it, made it a natural and unmistakable symbol of dire evil, torment, wasting penalty, absolute ruin. So it came to designate the place of future punishment, and the Talmudic theology spoke of the door of hell as being in the valley of Hinnom (Barclay, City of the Great King, p. 90).

It has not this sense in the OT. The nearest approach to it is in such a passage as that in which the prophet makes the demand, 'Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?' (Is 33[14]). But the place is not mentioned there, and the fires in question are not those of a retribution after death, but those of the divine wrath and righteousness which now and on earth search all sinners, those in Sion no less than those in Assyria. The terrible description of judgment with which the Second Isaiah closes his great prophecy of grace might seem even more in point (Is 66[24]). It is possible that the horrors of the valley of Hinnom suggested the awful figures in which the prophet there declares of the returning Israelites, that they shall 'look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed' against Jehovah, 'for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh' (RV). But apart from the fact that here again the place is not named, and from the question whether the passage may not be of too early a date (as Dillmann supposes) for such a colouring, the vengeance which is intimated is not one that is to be looked for in the other world, but one which overtakes the transgressors in this world in the form of miserable overthrow and uttermost dishonour. It assumed this sense, however, in the period between the close of OT prophecy and the Christian era. By the time when Christ taught and the apostles preached, the word Gehenna had a well-understood meaning. We can follow the history of the term, and see how it came to have that sense. The history shows us also the variations in the application of the word, and the different ideas which were connected with it.

The OT itself offered the point of issue for the process of development. As its view of the future became enlarged, and the old notion of a Sheol which was without moral distinctions, and dealt out to all the dead the same joyless inane existence, began to give place to the loftier and more definite conception of a future embracing a resurrection, the foundations of the doctrine of a heaven and a hell were laid. The idea of a final judgment, which went with that of a resurrection (Dn 12[2]), led naturally to the twofold expectation of a special place of reward for the righteous, and a special place of punishment for the unrighteous in a world beyond the grave. The Jewish literature shows us how this belief shaped itself. It makes it plain, too, that Gehenna, as the definite place of future retribution, was originally understood to be something distinct from Sheol or Hades, though other ideas were attached to it now and again or in particular schools. The apocalyptic writings are of special importance in this matter, and the Bk. of Enoch above all others. It is perhaps in it that we have the first definite occurrence of the word as the designation of the place of just retribution destined for the wicked after the final judgment. In Enoch, however, as in the apocalyptic writings in general, there is much that is fantastic, and the statements which meet us in different parts of the book are by no means uniform. In certain sections, which are probably more deeply affected by Hellenic ways of thinking, Hades appears as a preliminary scene of reward and punishment, and is represented as lying in the remotest tract beyond the ocean. In it the souls of dead men wait the final condition, and have a foretaste of that condition. This moralised Hades is described as having in it intermediate abodes of four distinct kinds for four different orders of men: one for the righteous who died of oppression, and another for the rest of the righteous dead; one for sinners who were not judged by injustice or persecution on earth, and another for those who paid part of the penalty of their offences in their lifetime here (Bk. of Enoch 5. 22. 103[7] etc.). More usually these preliminary scenes of weal and woe were spoken of as only two—one for the good, called also Paradise and the Garden of Eden; and one for the evil, separated from the other by a wall or gulf, and called, at least in the later Jewish books, by the name Gehinnom, Gehenna. In the Slavonic Enoch, again, or The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, the second of the seven heavens is the prison-house of the apostate angels who wait the eternal judgment, and the northern region of the third heaven is the place of punishment prepared for those who did not honour God (chs. 7 and 10). In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs the place in which the spirits of the lawless are confined with a view to their punishment is the second heaven (Test. of Levi, ch. 3). In the literature of Alexandrian Judaism, on the other hand, in which we have the doctrine of an incorporeal immortality, and the idea that the souls of the pious dead are received at once by God into heaven, Hades is the place of punishment for the wicked dead, and is again practically identified with Gehenna (Wis 3[10-14] 4[10-19] 5[1] etc.; cf. Joseph. De Bell. Jud. II. viii. 11, 14). There is evidence enough, therefore, that opinion varied at different periods and in different sections of Judaism. In the theology of the Talmud and Midrash, Gehinnom, Gehenna meant the scene of penalty, while in certain phases of Jewish belief it appears to have been regarded at once as a place of punishment for the heathen and as a place of purgatorial detention for imperfect Israelites. But with all this there is reason to say that its original sense was that of the final place of retribution, that it was distinguished from Hades and from every form of an intermediate state, and that it had this meaning with the Jewish people generally (however it might be with the speculations of the schools) in Christ's time. The apocalyptic writings, which speak of a separation of the just from the unjust between death and the resurrection, also speak of a final punishment after the judgment, and describe the place of that retribution in terms which point to Gehenna. Enoch seems to identify it with the local Ge-Hinnom. He comes to the middle of earth, and sees a happy region of hills and valleys. But between the holy hills he sees an accursed valley where 'shall be gathered together all those who speak with their mouths unseemly words against God, and speak impudently of his majesty' (Bk. of Enoch 27[2. 3]). Elsewhere in the same apocalypse this place of final retribution is described as 'in the midst of the earth' and 'full of fire' (90[24-26]). And in express terms the Fourth Book of Ezra speaks of the 'gulf of torments' and the 'furnace of Gehenna' that shall be revealed (6[1-14] 7[36], Churton). 'Hell,' therefore, as expressed by γεέννα in the NT, is not the penal side of Hades (so, e.g., Grimm's Wilkii Clavis, etc.), but the final retributive scene and condition (see Meyer on Mt 5[22]).

It has further to be asked whether the term 'hell,' Gehenna, in the NT expresses the idea of a penal condition that is permanent. What the common belief of the Jews was on the subject of the nature and the duration of the final retribution at the time to which the NT writings belong, is a disputed question, and one by no means easy to answer. The literature, however, that is most pertinent to the question does not favour the idea that the doctrine of an ultimate restoration of all souls was the prevalent doctrine among the Jews of that period. It leaves us a choice between two views, annihilation and everlasting punishment, and the conclusion to which it points is that the latter was the belief of the great mass of the people. The apocryphal books speak in the most unambiguous terms of the lot of the wicked dead as final and enduring. In the Bk. of Judith, for example, the vengeance of the day of judgment is described as 'fire and worms' in the flesh of those who rise up against Israel, which 'they shall feel and weep for ever' (16^{17}). In one of the Bks. of Maccabees the lot of the tyrant is declared to be 'eternal torture by fire,' and 'interminable torments' (4 Mac $9^{8.\,9}$ 10^{10}). Another of these books speaks of the 'furnace of hell,' and of the despisers of the Most High as doomed to be 'henceforth in torments, always in pain and anguish of seven kinds' (4 Ezr $7^{36.\,79.\,80}$). As a general rule, the pseudepigraphic writings are equally explicit. They speak of the penalty of the wicked as an 'everlasting curse'; of the last day as a 'day of judgment and punishment and affliction upon the revilers to eternity'; of the 'abyss of fire' in which the impious shall be 'locked up for all eternity'; of a 'just judgment, in eternity for ever' (Bk. of Enoch $5^{5.\,6}$ $22^{4\text{-}11}$ $10^{11\text{-}14}$ $27^{2.\,3}$; cf. Apoc. Bar 44^{15} etc.). The testimony of Josephus, too, with all necessary abatements, is to the effect that both Pharisees and Essenes believed in everlasting punishment (BJ II. viii. 11, 14; Ant. XVIII. i. 3). On the other hand, the final retribution of the impenitent is in not a few cases expressed in terms of a destruction, a perdition, and the like (Ps. Sol 3^{13} 9^{9} 12^{8} 13^{10} 15^{13}, Bk. En 99^{11} etc.); from which it is inferred that the penalty in question was regarded as an ultimate extinction of being. Such expressions have to be read, however, in the light of the general Jewish conception of Sheol. So read they may convey the idea that there is no deliverance for the wicked from Sheol, but do not necessarily mean that the doom in question was absolute extinction of existence. They are also to be measured by other statements of a more definite and unmistakable kind, with which they are accompanied, and by the contrasts in which they are placed with descriptions of the lot of the righteous as an enduring one. In the Rabbinical books there is a wider variety of opinion. Gehenna appears there at times as a purgatory, and statements are found which indicate that at least at certain periods there were those who favoured the doctrine of annihilation, and those who inclined to the hope of a final universal restoration. But these were rather the dogmas or speculations of the schools than the belief of the people, and they belong to a later period. Even in the case of the great Rabbis who spoke of a limited punishment, exception was made of certain classes of sinners. The school of Hillel, e.g., taught that sinners of the heathen and others were punished in Gehinnom for a space of twelve months, and afterwards were consumed. But the Minim (the Christians), the Epicureans, those who deny the divine origin of the Torah and the truth of the resurrection, and those who sin like Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, were said to 'go down to Gehinnom,' and to be 'punished there to ages of ages.' The same is the statement made, but at greater length and in still more explicit terms, in the Rosh Hashshanah, in a passage which is described as the 'classical passage of the Talmud' on the subject (Plumptre, The Spirits in Prison, p. 52). The most probable conclusion appears to be this—that, while there were variations in belief from time to time, especially in the direction of annihilation, and divergent speculations in the Rabbinical schools, the idea generally connected with the term Gehenna, 'hell,' in our Lord's time was that of an irreversible doom for the wholly wicked, and that in His teaching as well as in that of His apostles the word was used in its popular and prevalent sense (see Schürer, HJP II. ii. 183; Edersheim's Jesus the Messiah, ii. pp. 440, 791; Meyer, Comm. on Mt 5^{22}; Holtzmann, Hand-Com. on Mt 5^{22}, Mk 3^{29} 9^{48}).

Other terms are also used in the NT to express the penalty and the condition indicated by the word Gehenna, 'hell.' In the evangelical records of Christ's own discourses such terms are found employed as 'eternal fire'; 'unquenchable fire'; the place where 'their worm dieth not, and their fire is not quenched'; the 'prison' from which there is no coming out until 'the last farthing' is paid; 'eternal punishment' as contrasted with 'eternal life'; exclusion from the kingdom; banishment from Christ; 'weeping and wailing, and gnashing of teeth'; the 'outer darkness,' etc. (Mt $18^{8.\,9}$, Mk $9^{43\text{-}49}$, Mt $5^{25.\,26}$, Lk $12^{58.\,59}$, Mt 25^{46} $7^{21\text{-}23}$ 13^{42} 25^{30}). Elsewhere the final destiny of the unrighteous is described as 'the mist of darkness for ever' (2 P 2^{17}); the 'blackness of darkness for ever' (Jude ^{13}); the 'fierceness of fire' and 'perdition' (He $10^{27.\,39}$); 'great tribulation,' 'burning with fire,' being 'without,' the 'second death,' being cast into the 'lake of fire,' the 'lake that burneth with brimstone and fire' (Rev $2^{22.\,23}$ $18^{8.\,9}$ 22^{15} 2^{11} $20^{6.\,14}$ 21^{8} 20^{10} 19^{20}); the 'wrath to come,' 'wrath and indignation, tribulation and anguish,' 'death,' 'punishment,' 'destruction,' 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord' (Ro 2^{5}, 2 Th 1^{9}, Ro 2^{8} 6^{21}, Ph 3^{19}, 2 Th 1^{9}). Beyond these terms of large suggestion, which are as remarkable for their variety as for their figurative force, the NT does not carry us. Theologians have gone further, and have ventured on many definitions of things left undefined in the Scriptures. They have distinguished between two forms of the future penalty, the pœna sensus and the pœna damni. They have spoken sometimes of the 'fire' of Gehenna as a material fire (cf. Petavius, De Angel. iii. 5), and sometimes as a figurative (Origen, De Prin. ii. 4). They have indulged in fruitless questions regarding the locality of hell, the Limbus or 'fringe' of hell, and much else. The NT is silent on many things on which imagination and speculation have both spent themselves largely and to little profit. It speaks much less of the retribution of the impenitent than of the reward of the righteous. In what it does say of the former it gives no satisfaction to curious inquiry. It limits itself to intimations which address themselves to character and conduct, and which convey the impression of the untold moral issues that depend upon the present life.

HELLENISM.—See GREECE.

HELM.—The helm is now the handle which moves the rudder, but it was formerly used loosely for the whole steering apparatus. Hence in Ja 3^{4} it is given as tr^{n} of πηδάλιον, a rudder. It was Tind. who introduced 'helm' here, and he was followed by all the VSS except Gen., which has 'rudder,' and Rhem., which has 'sterne.' RV follows Geneva. The only other occurrence of π. in NT is Ac 27^{40}, where Tind. and all after him give 'rudder.' Wyclif's word in both passages is 'governayle.' See SHIP.

HELMET (קוֹבַע ḳôbha' or כּוֹבַע kôbha'—Greek περικεφαλαία) was probably made of skin as a rule, since helmets of bronze (Goliath's 1 S 17^{5}, and Saul's ib. v.^{38}) are mentioned as something special. The form of an ancient helmet is shown in the illustration of Assyrian soldiers given under BATTERING-RAM. The helmets worn by the Romans were made either of leather (the galea) or of metal (the cassis). The helmet included plates to protect the cheeks, a band for the forehead, and a collar-like projection to protect the back of the neck. Such a helmet, when closed, showed little besides the eyes, nose, and mouth. (See illustrations in Lindenschmit, Tables ix. x. and xxii.).

Isaiah (59^{17}) describes the Lord as arming Himself for His people with righteousness as a coat of mail, and with salvation as a helmet. It is clear from the parallelism existing between the two halves of the verse (righteousness = vengeance, salvation = zeal) that the passage means that God arises with punishment for the enemy and with deliverance for His people. The 'helmet of salvation' is the helmet of the Lord's deliverance. St. Paul applies the phrase (Eph 6^{17}) differently; on the Christian's head rests (1 Th 5^{8}) a helmet of the hope of salvation. W. E. BARNES.

HELON (חֵלֹן 'valorous').—Father of Eliab, the prince of Zebulun at the first census, Nu 1^{9} 2^{7} 7$^{24.\ 29}$ 10^{16} (P).

HELP.—As a verb 'help' is used in AV in some archaic phrases: (1) Help forward, Zec 1^{15} 'I was but a little displeased and they helped forward the affliction,' i.e. aggravated. Golding uses the phrase in a good sense in Calvin's Isaiah (on 40^{3}), 'what an excellent consolation is this, to heare that God useth the service of Infidels, yea and when his Church hath need, to make all creatures put to their hands for the helping forward of our salvation.' Milton uses the verb without 'forward' in the same sense as in Zec, PL vi. 656—

> 'Their armour helped their harm, crush'd in and bruised
> Into their substance pent.'

(2) Help to = furnish with, 1 Mac 8^{13} 'Whom they would help to a kingdom, those reign' (οἷς δ' ἂν βούλωνται βοηθεῖν καὶ βασιλεύειν, βασιλεύσουσιν [א βασιλεύουσιν], RV 'Whomsoever they will to succour and to make kings, these do they make kings'). Cf. Piers Plowman, p. 27—

> 'Trywe charite
> That most helpe the men to hevene.'

(3) Help up, Ec 4^{10} 'Woe to him that is alone when he falleth: for he hath not another to help him up' (RV 'lift him up'). So Is 49^{8} Cov. 'I wil make the a pledge for the people, so that thou shalt helpe up the earth agayne'; and Shaks. Timon, I. i. 107—

> ''Tis not enough to help the feeble up,
> But to support him after.'

Help, both as vb. and subst., has often a fuller meaning than 'assistance,' it often means 'deliverance,' almost as much as 'salvation.' See esp. Ps 60^{11} = 108^{12} 'Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man' (עֶזְרָה . . . תְּשׁוּעָה, where the second word is usually tr^{d} 'salvation,' as AVm, RVm; LXX βοήθεια . . . σωτηρία; Vulg. 'auxilium . . . salus'). Cf. Jer 8^{20} Tav. 'The harvest is gone, the sommer hath an ende, and we are not healped'; Ps 22^{5} Cov. 'They called upon the, and were helped: they put their trust in the, and were not confounded' (so Pr. Bk. 'They called upon thee, and were holpen').

In Gn 2$^{18.\ 20}$ Eve is described as 'an help meet for' Adam. The Heb. is the usual word for 'help' (עֵזֶר), but the meaning is not, as vulgarly supposed 'a help to Adam,' one that will give herself to serve Adam. This mistake has caused the word 'helpmate' to be used of the wife (sometimes evidently under the impression that that is the term in Gn), as even Abp. Sharp, Works, IV. Ser. xii. 'God made man first, and out of him created woman; and declared withal, that he therefore created her that she might be a help-mate for the man.' The meaning is a helper (the word is of course concrete as in Ps 70^{5}) that will assist him in the work given him to do, carrying it on in the same spirit, as Vulg. 'adjutorium similem sibi.' The meaning is well illustrated by Southey, Wesley, ii. 188, 'It had therefore been much impressed upon his [Whitefield's] heart that he should marry, in order to have a help meet for him in the work whereunto he was called.' Tindale's tr^{n} is (2^{18}) 'I will make hym an helper to beare him company.' Cf. To 8^{6} 'Let us make unto him an aid like unto himself' (βοηθὸν ὅμοιον αὐτῷ, exactly as LXX of Gn 2^{30}, RV 'a helper like unto him'). Pennant, however (Brit. Zool. 'The Hog'), uses the word 'helpmate' in this sense: 'In Minorca the ass and the hog are common helpmates, and are yoked together in order to turn up the land.'

The plu. form 'helps' occurs thrice: (1) 2 Mac 8^{19} 'Moreover he recounted unto them what helps their forefathers had found' (ἀντιλήμψεις, RV 'the help given from time to time in the days of their ancestors'). (2) Ac 27^{17} 'they used helps, undergirding the ship' (βοηθείαις ἐχρῶντο). Page and Walpole's note is good: 'Cables passed round the hull and tightly secured on deck to prevent the timbers from starting, especially amidships, where in ancient ships with one large mast the strain was very great. The technical English word is frapping, but the process is rarely employed now.' See Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul^{2}, 105, and art. SHIP. (3) 1 Co 12^{28} 'And God hath set some in the church, first apostles . . . helps, governments, diversities of tongues' (TR ἀντιλήψεις, edd. ἀντιλήμψεις, AV 1611, 'helpes in governments'). See next article.

In AV 1611 and in most edd. still, the past ptcp. is 'holpen' in Ps 83^{8} 86^{17}, Is 31^{3}, Dn 11^{34}, Lk 1^{54}; RV retains the form, but Amer. RV prefers 'helped' in all but the last. The past tense is always 'helped'; and 'helped' occurs as past ptcp. in 1 Ch 5^{20}, 2 Ch 26^{15}, Ps 28^{7}, Is 49^{8}. J. HASTINGS.

HELPS (ἀντιλήμψεις, opitulationes).—In LXX (in Pss [for several Heb. words], 1 Es, Sir, 2, 3 Mac) ἀντίλημψις implies 'succour,' as of stronger to weaker, not the 'help' of an assistant to superior, e.g. Sir 11^{12} προσδεόμενος ἀ., 3 Mac ἀ. ἐξ οὐράνου, cf. Jos. BJ IV. v. 1. Similarly in papyri of the age of the Ptolemies ἀ. = βοήθεια, as in the phrase τυχεῖν ἀντιλήμψεως (cf. 2 Mac 15^{7}, 3 Mac 2^{33}); while ἀντιλήμπτωρ is a style of the king with whom is asylum (καταφυγή, cf. 2 S 22^{3}). In NT it occurs only in 1 Co 12^{28}, along with κυβερνήσεις, to which LXX usage attaches the meaning 'wise counsels' (תַּחְבֻּלוֹת Pr 1^{5} 11^{14} 24^{6} [Job 37^{12} Symm., Pr 20^{18} Theod.]: so κυβερνᾶν, Pr 12^{5}, Wis 10^{4} 14^{6}, Sus 1^{6}; Hesych. paraphrases by προνοητικαὶ ἐπιστῆμαι καὶ φρονήσεις. Gloss. on Pr 1^{5} ἐπιστήμη τῶν πραττομένων). The list of God-given gifts to the Church enumerates 'first apostles, second prophets, third teachers, next powers, next charisms of healings, succours, counsels, kinds of tongues'; while in the interrogative recapitulation, which follows in vv.$^{29.\ 30}$, 'succours' and 'counsels' fall out, probably as being less charismatic than the rest and more widely diffused among the brethren. This is confirmed by the analogous list of charismata in Ro 12$^{6-8}$, where the moral also is the same, viz. the duty of the many members to use their functional gifts for the common organic well-being. It is indeed hard to find in the latter list any single synonyms for 'succours' and 'counsels': rather they may well cover several things—the one, personal service (διακονία, cf. Phœbe as διάκονος, 16^{1}), charity (ὁ μεταδιδούς) or acts of mercy (ὁ ἐλεῶν); the other, instruction (διδασκαλία) and exhortation*

* ὁ προϊστάμενος is ambiguous, as (1) Phœbe is called προστάτις πολλῶν, i.e. patroness (a patrona in relation to clientes, as it were), which probably has reference to beneficence rather than rule; (2) προστασίαι (καταπονουμένων) is a recognized equivalent for ἀ. (see Suicer, s.v.). This must be remembered even in 1 Th 5^{12}.

(παράκλησις). But in any case the various activities are so intermingled as to exclude special reference to any officials. We are still at the stage when functions in the ecclesia, not functionaries, are everything (cf. 1 P $4^{10.11}$). In a somewhat later list (Eph 4^{11}) it is otherwise; and we get 'shepherds and teachers' in place of 'succours and counsels.' But meantime these gifts explain and are explained by Gal $6^{1.2}$, where 'the spiritual' help their weaker brethren to recover their footing, 'bearing one another's burdens'; and by 1 Th 5^{14}, where the brethren in general are to 'put in mind the unruly, comfort the faint-hearted, uphold the weak' (ἀντέχεσθαι τῶν ἀσθενῶν, the very words by which Theophyl. defines ἀντίλημψις). From this passage we further learn that it is unsafe to refer ἀ. and κυβ. to distinct offices, even when more or less regular officials are in question. In 1 Co itself we find only one class of regular workers (16^{15-18}), members of the household of Stephanas, who have 'devoted themselves unto ministry to the saints,' and to whose wise counsels the brethren are exhorted to yield subordination. In them, we can hardly doubt, the gifts of 'succour' and 'counsel' dwelt in eminent degree; and we may infer the like of those named in 1 Th 5^{12}, where κοπιᾶν, προϊστάναι, νουθετεῖν may be coextensive with ἀ. and κυβ. Finally, Ac 20^{35} comes in to clinch these conclusions. Speaking to Ephesian elders, whom he describes as guardians of the flock (^{28}), St. Paul bids them toil (κοπιᾶν) to succour the weak (ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι, cf. Lk 1^{54}, also συναντ. Ro 8^{26}), being mindful of their Lord's golden word. Just above he has spoken of the need of wise counsel on their part. So that, once again, we get ἀ. and κυβ. combined in an undifferentiated official class, here called 'elders.' The 'succour' in question, in keeping with linguistic usage, is that later on rendered by 'bishops' rather than 'deacons.' But so far there is no evidence of any such formal distinction, which meets us first in Ph 1^{1}—where indeed there is as yet no trace of subordination of the one class to the other (cf. their parallel position in 1 Ti 3^{1-13}, Teaching 15^{1}). In 1 Co 12^{28}, on the other hand, the 'succours' and 'counsels' not only occur on the same level, as it were, but what was later thought the humbler function actually comes first (there is nothing to suggest Meyer's 'climactic juxtaposition'). This makes the two terms most significant for primitive Christianity and its ministerial conceptions. Ἀντ., then, means 'anything that could be done for poor or weak or outcast brethren, either by rich or powerful or influential brethren or by the devotion of those who stood on no such eminence'; while κυβ. denotes guidance by 'men who by wise counsels did for the community what the steersman or pilot does for the ship' (Hort).

LITERATURE.—For the word, Schleusner, Lex. NT; Deissmann, Bibelstudien (1895), p. 87 (for the papyri); for the sense, Weizsäcker, Ap. Age, ii. 318 ff., Hort, Chr. Eccl. p. 157 ff., commentaries on 1 Co. J. V. BARTLET.

HELVE.—Dt 19^{5} 'As when a man goeth into the wood with his neighbour to hew wood, and his hand fetcheth a stroke with the axe to cut down the tree, and the head slippeth from the helve, and lighteth upon his neighbour, that he die; he shall flee unto one of those cities, and live.' This idiomatic tr^{n} is almost word for word from Tindale, including the word 'helve' for the handle of the axe. But that word is as old as the Wyclifite version of 1388, 'and the yrun slidith fro the helve' (the 1382 ed. has 'haft'). The word, though still in use locally, does not seem to occur in the Eng. VSS except in this place (where Dou. has 'handle,' translating directly the Vulg. manubrium), nor is it found in Shaks. or Milton. It is preserved in the proverb 'to throw the helve after the hatchet,' i.e. give up everything, as Howell, Forreine Travell, § 9, 'If shee should reduce the Spaniard to that desperate passe in the Netherlands, as to make him throw the helve after the hatchet, it would much alter the case.'

The Heb. is עֵץ 'wood' or 'tree,' the same word as has been tr^{d} 'wood' and 'tree' already in the same verse; hence RVm suggests that the axe is supposed to glance off the tree it is working on, which is probably correct. The LXX is τὸ ξύλον, 'the tree'; and the words tr^{d} 'haft' (Jg 3^{22}) and 'handle' (Ca 5^{5}) differ from this word. J. HASTINGS.

HEM.—See DRESS, FRINGES.

HEMAM (הֵימָם).—The eponym of a Horite clan, Gn 36^{22}, called in 1 Ch 1^{39} Homam (הוֹמָם). LXX has in both passages Αἱμάν. Kittel (in SBOT, 1 Ch 1^{39}) declares in favour of the reading Hemam, which answers to the Lucianic Ἡμάν. Dillmann (on Gn 36^{22}) points out that Knobel's comparison of Hemam with Ḥumaimeh, a town south of Petra, is against the phonology.

HEMAN (הֵימָן 'faithful'). This name occurs in three connexions. One man is probably referred to. 1. 1 K 4^{31} one of the four sages whom Solomon excelled in wisdom. Ethan, being specially termed the Ezrahite, appears to be by that distinguished from the other three, sons of Mahol. 2. However, one of the titles of Ps 88 ascribes its authorship to Heman the Ezrahite. If this be reliable, he might be Ethan's brother, and Mahol father only of Calcol and Darda (Keil). It can scarcely be doubted that the Chronicler (1 Ch 2^{6}) interprets Ezrahite as Zerahite, when he makes all four sages sons of Zerah, son of Judah (so Grotius). Delitzsch maintains the identity of the Heman of 1 K 4^{31} with the author of Ps 88. He also conjectures that this Heman has dramatized his own experiences in the Book of Job, 'a Chokma-work of the Solomonic age.' 3. 1 Ch 6^{33} $15^{17.19}$ $16^{41.42}$ 25^{1-6}, 2 Ch 5^{12} 35^{15} (1 Es 1^{15} Zacharias). A Kohathite Levite, one of the three precentors of David's temple choir. There are two suspicious features in the Chronicler's account of his family: (a) He is made the grandson of the prophet Samuel (1 Ch 6^{33}). But Samuel was an Ephraimite (1 S 1^{1}). Is not this the Chronicler's characteristic explanation of Samuel's constant offering of sacrifice? (b) In 1 Ch 25^{4} Ewald and Wellhausen (W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} p. 143, n.^{1}) have shown that the last six names of Heman's 'sons' are merely the words of an anthem: '(1) I have given great (2) and lofty help (3) to him that sat in distress; (4) I have spoken (5) a superabundance of (6) prophecies.' W. R. Smith (OTJC^{2} p. 204) maintains, moreover, that the three guilds of singers did not exist until the time of Alexander the Great (Neh 11^{17} 12^{24}). If this be true, the notices of Heman in Chronicles are unhistorical. Ewald (HI iii. p. 278 n.^{2}) conjectures that the Levitical schools of music adopted the Judahites Ethan and Heman into their family. Keil, on the other hand, says that the Levites Ethan and Heman are called Ezrahites because incorporated into the Judæan family of Zerah (cf. Jg 17^{7}, 1 S 1^{1}). The title 'seer' (ḥôzeh), applied to Heman (1 Ch 25^{5}), as also to Asaph and Jeduthun, may refer merely to musical skill. Cf. the use of 'prophecy,' 1 Ch 25^{1-3}. N. J. D. WHITE.

HEMDAN.—See HAMRAN.

HEMLOCK.—A word occurring in AV in two places (Hos 10^{4}, Am 6^{12}). In the former RVm has rôsh (see GALL (2) רֹאשׁ). The Heb. equivalent of the latter is לַעֲנָה la'ănâh, which is everywhere else rendered by AV wormwood. RV so renders it in this passage. Neither word refers to the poison hemlock, Conium maculatum, L., much less to the hemlock tree, Abies. G. E. POST.

HEN.—See COCK.

HEN (חֵן).—In Zec 6^{14} 'Hen the son of Zephaniah' is mentioned amongst those whose memory was to be perpetuated by the crowns laid up in the temple (so AV, RV). Wellhausen (Kl. Proph., ad loc.) substitutes for Hen the name Joshua [Josiah] found in v.^{10}, and in like manner corrects Helem of v.^{14} into Heldai of v.^{10}. The LXX does not treat the word as a proper name, reading εἰς χάριτα υἱοῦ Σοφονίου. This is followed by Ewald, Hitzig, Keil, Orelli, Marti (in Kautzsch's AT), who gives 'Freundlichkeit,' and RVm 'for the kindness of the son of Zephaniah.' J. A. SELBIE.

HENA (הֵנַע 2 K 18^{34} [wanting in the parallel passage, Is 36^{19}], 19^{13}=Is 37^{13}).—According to some a city in Syria, but probably to be taken rather as a divine name. In that case it should be identified with the Arabic star name al-han'a; and 'Iwwâ (better 'Awwâ), coupled with it, will be identical with the star name al-'awwâ'u (cf. Hommel, 'Hena' and 'Awwa' in Expos. Times, April 1898). F. HOMMEL.

HENADAD (חֵנָדָד 'favour of Hadad').—A Levite chief (Ezr 3^{9}, Neh 3$^{18.24}$ 10^{9}). See GENEALOGY.

HENNA.—See CAMPHIRE.

HEPHER (חֵפֶר, 'digging').—1. Son of Gilead the Manassite, and father of Zelophehad, Nu 26^{32} 27^{1}, Jos 17$^{2f.}$ P. Patronymic, Hepherites, Nu 26^{32}. 2. One of the tribe of Judah, 1 Ch 4^{6}. 3. A Mecherathite, one of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{36}.

HEPHER (חֵפֶר).—A Canaanite royal city, named immediately before Aphek, Jos 12^{17}. The site is uncertain. The land of Hepher (אֶרֶץ ח׳) is mentioned in 1 K 4^{10} along with Socoh.

HEPHZI-BAH (חֶפְצִי־בָהּ 'she in whom is my delight.' So in Phœnician חפצבעל 'the delight of Baal').—1. The mother of Manasseh, king of Judah (2 K 21^{1}). 2. Symbolic name of the Zion of Messianic times (Is 62^{4}).

HERALD (Aram. כָּרוֹז, emphat. כָּרוֹזָא; see Kautzsch, Gram. § 64, 4).—The word so translated occurs only once, in Dn 3^{4}. If=Gr. κῆρυξ (but see Bevan, 107 n.) it will be one of those words in the Bk. of Daniel that prove its author to have lived 'after the dissemination of Greek influences in Asia' (Driver, LOT^{6} 502); such words are קיתרס (κίθαρις), and the names of other musical instruments, mentioned in connexion with the herald's proclamation on this occasion. No distinct mention is made in the annals of Hebrew warfare of the herald in his function of summoning conflicting parties to conference, or of demanding the submission of beleaguered places. Goliath utters his own challenge (1 S 17$^{8f.}$). When Sennacherib invaded Judah, his demands were made known by the Tartan, the Rab-saris, and the Rab-shakeh, apparently prominent military and civil personages (2 K 18$^{17ff.}$). The official referred to in Daniel may, however, have performed such duties in Babylonian military operations, as on this occasion he is employed to make known the monarch's will at a high religious observance. Κῆρυξ is applied by St. Paul to himself (1 Ti 2^{7}, 2 Ti 1^{11}) as a preacher of the divine revelation in Jesus Christ, on both occasions in conjunction with ἀπόστολος. Noah is called (2 P 2^{5}) 'a herald of righteousness.' See PREACHING. G. WALKER.

HERB.—See GRASS.

HERCULES (Ἡρακλῆς) is mentioned by this name only in 2 Mac 4$^{19.20}$, where Jason, the brother of the high priest Onias III., who had secured by bribery his own appointment in the latter's place, and the head of the Hellenizing party in Jerus. (B.C. 174), sent 300 silver drachmas (about £12, 10s.) to Tyre as an offering in honour of H., the tutelary deity of that city. We know from the precedent of Alexander the Great (Quint. Curt. iv. 7) that it was customary for kings to send offerings to H. at Tyre ('quem praecipue Tyrii colerent'). The same deity is mentioned by Silius Italicus (iii. 14 ff.) as being worshipped at Gades, an old Phœn. colony. He was otherwise known as Mel-Carthus or Melek-Ḳartha='Lord of the city.' In a Phœn. inscription (CIS I. i. 122) he is called Adonēnu Melḳarth Ba'al Tzure='Our Lord Melḳarth, Baal of Tyre.' Jos. (Ant. VIII. v. 3; c. Ap. I. i. 18) also mentions H. and Astarte together, as Baal and Ashtoreth are often joined. The worship of the Tyrian Baal became widely prevalent in Israel on the marriage of Ahab with the Phœn. princess Jezebel (1 K 16$^{31.33}$), and in Judah during the reign of Ahaziah and the usurpation of his mother Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab (2 K 8^{27} 11^{18}).

H. was worshipped at Tyre from very early times, and his temple in that place was, according to Herod. ii. 44, as old as the city itself, 2300 years before his own time. As a personification of the sun he afforded an example of nature-worship so common among the Phœn., Egyp., and other nations of antiquity. The Greeks may have borrowed their deities from strangers, and, substituting individuals for abstract qualities or for the forces of nature, claimed for them an indigenous origin. Hercules (Ἡρακλῆς='renown of Hera') was with them the heroic embodiment of strength, a demigod powerful enough to restore even the dead to life (Eur. Alcestis, 1136). The connexion between the sun and strength can be easily traced. C. H. PRICHARD.

HERD.—Three words in Heb. are tr^{d} 'herd.' 1. בָּקָר bâḳâr, βοῦς. This word is generic for oxen. It is not like ẓôn, applicable to two or more species. Wherever it is used, therefore, it might without loss, and with sensible advantage, be translated oxen. 2. עֵדֶר 'êdher, βουκόλια. This word occurs once (Jl 1^{18}) in the construct state with bâḳâr, and the expression is tr^{d} 'herds of cattle.' It would have been better to translate herds of oxen. In the same verse 'êdher ẓôn is tr^{d} 'flocks of sheep,' being prob. intended to include goats as well. See FLOCK, SHEEP. 3. מִקְנֶה miḳneh. This word is usually rendered 'cattle.' See CATTLE. In construction with bâḳâr (Gn 47^{17}) it is tr^{d} 'cattle of the herds,' AV, RVm; while RV text renders the two words by one, 'herds.' The construct expression מִקְנֵה הַבְּהֵמָה (v.^{18}) is rendered 'herds of cattle,' AV, RV.

The NT word for herd is ἀγέλη, but it is used only for swine (Mt 8^{30} etc.). G. E. POST.

HEREDITY.—The law that like begets like, and that therefore children inherit the qualities and the responsibilities of their ancestors, is not scientifically stated in the Bible, but, in so far as it is matter of common experience, it is implied.

The simplest form in which it presents itself to observation is in the case of similarity of physical and moral features. Thus it is remarked by Raguel (To 7^{2}) 'how like' Tobias is to his father Tobit. And, again, it is said of a good son, 'His father dieth, and is as though he had not died; for he hath left one behind him like himself' (Sir 30^{4}). That the father's character is often repeated in his son is too common a phenomenon to escape notice. It is said, e.g., of Abijam (1 K 15^{3}), of Nadab (1 K 15^{26}), and of Ahaziah (1 K 22^{52}), that they walked in the evil ways of their fathers; and of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22^{43}) and Amaziah (2 K 14^{3}), that they followed their fathers' good example. This does not, indeed, constitute a universal rule. Good fathers often have bad sons, as we see in the case of Eli, and bad fathers have good sons; and even where the evil taint is reproduced, it is apparent in different individuals in different degrees. But with a people so quick to discern the ties of kindred, so imbued with a sense of national solidarity as were the Hebrews, the law of heredity was expected to fulfil itself. 'Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?' (Job 14^{4}) was a question with the answer, 'Not one.' They were accustomed to trace the characteristics of a tribe or a family in the person and career of its founder. Thus Esau is the true ancestor of the wild Edomite peoples, as Jacob is of the chosen race; and the enmity between the brothers Esau and Jacob reproduces itself in the thought of Obadiah in the jealous hate of Edom for Israel.

But not only do children inherit qualities of body and mind from their fathers; they inherit, as well, responsibility. This is the perpetual burden of the Pentateuch. The sins of the fathers are visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation (Ex 20^{5}, cf. Is 14^{21}); the divine punishments follow the family of the sinner (Lv 20^{5}). And as with sin, so with righteousness; its consequences are equally inherited, and the inheritance is more permanent than that of evil, for the LORD shows mercy unto them that fear Him 'unto a thousand generations.' Israel is beloved 'for the fathers' sake'; and the tenure of the inheritance of blessing is more lasting than the curse which follows sin.

The sense of responsibility seems, indeed, in the OT to attach itself to the family and the nation quite as much as to the individual. The sense of individuality was less felt in early ages than it is in modern life, where it has been strongly emphasized. But at the same time the ultimate responsibility of the individual to God is not overlooked in the OT. The Hebrews of the Captivity put forward as excuse for their miserable condition the sad proverb, 'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge'; but Ezekiel (ch. 18) warns them against its misinterpretation. Men do, indeed, suffer through their fathers' sins, but the soul is ultimately responsible to God for its own sin alone. 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die' (Ezk 18^{20}). See FALL.

We here come upon the great moral difficulty, felt by the Hebrews as by us, though not so keenly, as to the reconciliation of the two principles of the transmission of qualities from father to son, and of personal responsibility. On the one hand, it may be said that 'the dead rule the living'; each man is not only an individual, but a member of a series, or rather of an organism, in which each part is dependent on and affects every other. This, if pressed without qualification, results in the doctrine of traducianism, according to which a man's soul is the product of that of his parents—a doctrine which it is difficult to state so as to save the freedom of the will. On the other hand, we must conceive of each individual as in direct personal relations of responsibility with God; he is therefore not merely the product of the past history of his race, and a factor in the evolution of its future, but a fresh beginning with a soul which is, in part, a new creation (creationism). J. H. BERNARD.

HEREAFTER.—Where the witches (in Shaks. Macbeth, I. iii. 50) cry

> 'All hail, Macbeth, that shall be king hereafter,' they clearly mean 'at some time to come.' This is the present meaning of the word, and it is found a few times in AV, esp. Jn 13^{7}, Rev 1^{19} 4^{1} 9^{12}, where the Gr. is μετὰ ταῦτα, 'after these things.' But where (in the same play, I. iv. 38) Duncan says,

> 'We will establish our estate upon
> Our eldest, Malcolm; whom we name hereafter
> The prince of Cumberland,' he as clearly means 'from this time forward,' 'henceforth.' This is the most frequent meaning of the word in AV, and it demands attention because the mod. meaning of the word is apt to make one miss the sense of the passage. In Mk 11^{14} 'No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever' (μηκέτι, RV 'henceforth') there is no danger of mistake; but in Mk 26^{64} 'Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven,' it is not evident from the English version that the meaning is 'from now,' 'henceforth' (ἀπ' ἄρτι, RV 'Henceforth'). But that is the meaning also in Jn 1^{51} 'Hereafter ye shall see the heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of man' (where, however, edd. omit ἀπ' ἄρτι of TR, whence RV 'Ye shall see,' etc.); and in Lk 22^{69} 'Hereafter shall the Son of man sit on the right hand of the power of God' (ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν, RV 'henceforth'), and even in Jn 14^{30} 'Hereafter I will not talk much with you' (οὐκ ἔτι, edd. οὐκέτι, RV 'no more'). In 1 Ti 1^{16} 'for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting' (πρὸς ὑποτύπωσιν τῶν μελλόντων πιστεύειν), and in the OT passages (Is 41^{23}, Ezk 20^{39}, Dn $2^{29.45}$), the meaning is more indefinite, 'at any time after this' (observe that the לְאָחוֹר of Is 41^{23} is in 42^{23} tr^{d} 'for the time to come'). In Gal 6^{17} the Wyclifite version of 1388 is 'And heraftir no man be hevy to me,' while the version of 1380 gives 'Fro hennis forth no man be hevy to me.'

Hereafter is one of a number of so-called pronoun-adverbs, of which 'here' is the first part, always with the meaning of 'this.' The others found in AV are—

Hereby. In the Eng. language even of the beginning of the 17th cent. 'hereby' had sometimes a local meaning, as in Shaks. As You Like It, IV. i. 9—

> 'Where is the bush
> That we must stand and play the murderer in?
> Hereby, upon the edge of yonder coppice.'

But in AV it is always instrumental, 'by this means,' as 1 Jn 2^{3} 'And hereby do we know that we do know him, if we keep his commandments' (ἐν τούτῳ, a very common expression in this Epistle, and generally tr^{d} 'hereby').

Herein, lit. 'in this'; in NT always instrumental and always the tr^{n} of ἐν τούτῳ; in OT it occurs Gn 34^{22} 'Only herein will the men consent unto us for to dwell with us . . . if every male among us be circumcised' (בְּזֹאת, RV 'on this condition'); and 2 Ch 16^{9} 'Herein thou hast done foolishly' (עַל־זֹאת).

Hereof. Observe 1 Mac 16^{22} 'Hereof when he heard, he was sore astonished' (καὶ ἀκούσας, RV 'And when he heard'); Mt 9^{26} 'And the fame hereof went abroad into all that land' (ἡ φήμη αὕτη, AVm and RVm 'this fame'); He 5^{3} 'And by reason hereof he ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins' (TR διὰ ταύτην, edd. δι' αὐτήν, RV 'by reason thereof'). Cf. T. Fuller, Holy Warre, iii. 5, p. 117, 'But hereof hereafter.'

Heretofore=hitherto, as tr^{n} of תְּמוֹל שִׁלְשֹׁם (Ex 4^{10} $5^{7.8.14}$, Jos 3^{4}, Ru 2^{11}), or אֶתְמוֹל שִׁלְשֹׁם (1 S 4^{7}), lit. 'yesterday three days,' a primitive method of referring to past time. See TIME. In NT, 2 Co 13^{2} 'I write to them which heretofore have sinned' (τοῖς προημαρτηκόσιν).

Hereunto: Ec 2^{25} 'For who else can eat, or who else can hasten hereunto, more than I?' (יָחוּשׁ, RV 'have enjoyment,' RVm 'hasten thereto'; LXX πίεται; Vulg. 'deliciis affluet'; Gen. 'colde haste to outward things' (taking חוּץ so), with marg. note to 'outward things,' meaning to pleasures); 1 P 2^{21} 'For even hereunto were ye called' (εἰς τοῦτο).

Herewith, only Ezk 16^{29}, Mal 3^{10}, both as tr^{n} of בְּזֹאת 'with this.' RV adds Lv 16^{3} (same Heb., AV 'thus'). J. HASTINGS.

HERES (הַר־חֶרֶס).—1. A mountain named along with Aijalon and Shaalbim as one of the localities from which the Danites failed to expel the Amorites, Jg $1^{34f.}$. As the word ḥereṣ=shemesh, 'the sun,' it is very probable* that the Heres here referred to may be Beth-shemesh (1 K 4^{9}, 2 Ch 28^{18}) or Ir-shemesh (Jos 19^{41}), on the boundary between Judah and Dan. This is the modern 'Ain Shems to the S. of Wady Ẓurar, opposite Ẓur'ah (Zoar). The LXX (A) has ἐν τῷ ὄρει τοῦ Μυρσινῶνος, which implies a reading, הַר־הֲדַס='mountain of the myrtle grove.'

LITERATURE.—Robinson, BRP ii. 224 f.; Guérin, Judée, ii. 18–22; Moore on Jg 1^{35}; Oxf. Heb. Lex. and Siegfried-Stade, s. חֶרֶס.

2. In Jg 8^{13} (RV) 'the ascent of Heres' (מַעֲלֵה הֶחָרֶס) is mentioned as the spot from which Gideon returned after the defeat of Zebah and Zalmunna. Both the topography and the text of the narrative are doubtful. RV has the support of LXX A, ἀπὸ ἀναβάσεως Ἆρες. B reads ἀπὸ ἐπάνωθεν [τῆς παρατάξεως]† Ἄρες. Aq. and Symm. read הֶהָרִים 'the mountains,' and this is adopted by Siegfried-Stade. AV takes ḥereṣ as an appellative and tr. 'before the sun was up'; Targ. Rashi 'before the sun set.' Both these last renderings are pronounced by Moore to be impossible (see his note).

The same word ḥereṣ appears in the proper name Timnath-heres (wh. see), Jg 2^{9}; but by an intentional metathesis, to avoid anything that savoured of idolatry, Timnath-ḥereṣ='portion of the sun,' appears to have been changed into Timnath-ṣeraḥ, Jos 19^{50} 24^{30}.

For עִיר הַחֶרֶס of Is 19^{18} see IR-HA-HERES.

HERESH (חֶרֶשׁ).—A Levite, 1 Ch 9^{15}. See GENEALOGY.

HERESY (αἵρεσις, hæresis, secta; in LXX only for 'free choice,' cf. βούλησις, Hesych.).—Αἵρ. in the common sense of 'heresy' never occurs in NT. Here its dominant meaning is 'sect' or 'party' (τὸ αἱρεῖσθαι τὸ ἴδιον καὶ τούτῳ ἐξακολουθεῖν, Ath. Quæst. 38 de Parab.). In later classical usage it is the usual word for a philosophic school or sect, as selected by its adherents (see Diog. Laert. i. 19 f., etc., e.g. αἵρ. λέγομεν τὴν λόγῳ τινὶ ἀκολουθοῦσαν); in Philo it often stands for προαίρεσις=religio; and in NT its use is of a religious party (as in Jos.), with a more or less deprecatory suggestion, as of the self-willed or sectarian spirit. So always in Ac, whether of the Sad. (5^{17}), the Phar. (15^{5} 26^{5} κατὰ τὴν ἀκριβεστάτην αἵρ. τῆς ἡμετέρας θρησκείας ἔζησα Φ.), or the Christians, as seen from outside (24^{5} πρωτοστάτην τῆς τῶν Ναζωραίων αἱρ.; 24^{14} κατὰ τὴν ὁδὸν ἣν λέγουσιν αἵρ.—an excellent instance; 28^{22}, the Christian sect πανταχοῦ ἀντιλέγεται). In the Pauline Epistles the like clearly prevails. In Gal 5^{20} it occurs in a list of ἔργα τῆς σαρκός, as a manifestation of the unchastened self-assertive or egoistic principle (cf. 1 Co $3^{3,4}$); its immediate neighbours bring 'caballings' (ἐριθεῖαι) and divisions (διχοστασίαι), while itself denotes partisanship (cf. Ro 16^{17}). This was a special vice of the Greek temper; so that we are not surprised to find St. Paul saying in 1 Co 11^{19} that αἱρ. are part of God's providential discipline whereby sterling characters may be brought to light. This principle is given as the ground of his own attitude to the news that dissensions or 'schisms' (σχίσματα) exist in the Christian body at Corinth. It is probable, then, that αἱρ. are here practically synonymous with σχ., the latter term being fixed by the context to practical negations of sympathy and fellowship, especially as between rich and poor (taking outward effect at the Feast of Love itself). Coteries were formed, and the corporate unity vanished (αἱρ. ἐνταῦθα οὐ ταύτας λέγει τὰς δογμάτων ἀλλὰ τὰς τῶν σχ., Chrys. Hom. ad loc.; so Theodoret, Theophyl. etc., ap. Suicer. To a later mode of thought belongs Aug.'s definition, hæresis autem schisma inveteratum). So far we have no reason to connect αἵρ. (or even σχίσματα, pace 1 Co 1^{10}, where alienation in sentiment, arising out of intellectual contentions (ἔριδες) of secondary import, is in question, cf. 12^{25}, Jn 7^{43} 9^{16} 10^{19}) with serious doctrinal divergences in the Church, but rather with breaches in the harmony of love. It means a factious division, or the spirit that underlies it. And this is probably the shade of meaning attaching to the adjective αἱρετικός, 'factious,' or self-willed, in Tit 3^{10} (cf. Ro 16^{17}). A twofold development, however, is found in the use in 2 P 2^{1}, where αἱρ. ἀπωλείας are spoken of as being illicitly introduced. Here the qualifying gen. (='leading to ruin,' cf. Ph 3^{19}) and the verb alike suggest the new sense of falsely chosen or erroneous tenets. Already the emphasis is moving from persons and their temper to mental products,—from the sphere of sympathetic love to that of objective truth. But one change more remains to be made ere the biblical use passes wholly into the patristic and ecclesiastical. For the nature of the erroneous doctrine is here directly immoral (cf. Jude [4]); and so αἵρ. preserves part of the ethical connotation which is essential to its NT usage. The earliest case of its meaning pure theological error is also its earliest occurrence outside the NT, viz. Ign. ad Trall. 6, ἀλλοτρίας δὲ βοτάνης (=Docetism) ἀπέχεσθε, ἥτις ἐστὶν αἵρεσις, cf. ad Eph. 6. And in proportion as the conception of 'faith,' and the standard for testing it, became intellectual, the original sense of αἵρ., as a light and irresponsible exercise of native egoism in defiance of the claims of love, receded into the background (cf. Tert. De præsc. hær. 6, 'Quarum opera sunt adulteræ doctrinæ, hæreses dictæ Græca voce ex interpretatione electionis, qua quis sive ad instituendas sive ad suscipiendas eas utitur'). Finally, neither σχ. nor αἵρ. in the NT ever denotes a party that has withdrawn from the religious communion amid which it arose. In Judaism the co-existence of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes was not deprecated. In the more intimate unity of each Christian ecclesia 'rents' or 'factions' were felt to impair directly the vital functions of the local body in its κοινωνία of love, and so assumed a moral significance. Separate Christian communions, and the applicability to them of the terms σχ. and αἱρ., were problems of the future.

HERETH (חֶרֶת).—A forest (יַעַר) which was one of the hiding-places of David, 1 S 22^{5}. The LXX, reading עִיר instead of יַעַר, has ἐν πόλει Σαρεικ (B) . . . Ἀριαθ (A). The reference may be to the wooded mountain E. of Adullam, where the village of Kharâs now stands. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xxi.

HERITAGE is used in AV (and retained in RV except in 1 P 5^3 'the charge allotted to you' for AV 'God's heritage,'[*] Gr. οἱ κλῆροι) as a synonym for 'inheritance,' which has now displaced it except in biblical language and Scots law. See HEIR, INHERITANCE.

† The words in brackets are evidently an accidental repetition from the previous clause (see Moore's note).

HERMAS (Ἑρμᾶς), one of those saluted by St. Paul in Ro 16^{14}. The name is common amongst slaves (although not quite so much as Hermes). It was in its origin an abbreviated form of various names such as Hermagoras, Hermodorus, Hermogenes. He is commemorated in the Roman Calendar on May 9. According to the Menologium Basilianum, Nov. 4, he became Bishop of Philippopolis in Thrace.

The name Hermas is also well known as that of the author, or at any rate the professed author, of the Pastor or Shepherd, a well-known allegorical work, belonging to an early period of Christian literature, which for a time made some claims to be inserted in the NEW TESTAMENT CANON (which see). This book need only be referred to here, because from time to time its author has been identified with the Hermes mentioned in Ro 16^{14}. Origen, in his commentary on this passage, writes: 'I think that this Hermas is the author of the book called the Pastor, which appears to me a very useful writing (scriptum is not technical), and, I think, divinely inspired.' Origen's statement is a pure conjecture, based apparently only on the identity of name. His opinion was followed by others, but was never widespread, as the book became less and less popular; in later times it has been held by Cotelier, Cave, Pearson, and others. There is little to be said for it. The name was about as common as John is with us, and gives no clue at all; the date of the book may be doubtful, but its tone is certainly not that of the 1st cent.; the author never claims in any way to be a contemporary of the apostles, and very definite historical evidence places him a little before the middle of the 2nd cent. This is not the place to pursue the subject further, but for the benefit of those unacquainted with the book it may be stated that it consists of a series of Visions, Parables or Similitudes, and Mandates or Commands, conveying for the most part moral teaching, and has been called —not perhaps very happily—the Pilgrim's Progress of the Early Church. A further account may be found in Dict. Chr. Biog., and a text and translation in Lightfoot's Apostolic Fathers.

HERMES (Ἑρμῆς).—The name of a Christian, quoted with some others in Ro 16^{14}. It is one of the commonest of all slave names. The Greek Menaea and Menologium make him Bishop of Salona in Dalmatia, and one of the Seventy disciples. He was commemorated April 8.

A. C. HEADLAM.

HERMOGENES (Ἑρμογένης) is mentioned by St. Paul (2 Ti 1^{15}) as having, along with Phygelus and others in Asia, and in contrast to Onesiphorus, been ashamed of his chain. It is impossible now to say what form the denial took, or what led to it. Most likely it was caused by fear lest friendship with the imprisoned apostle might involve him in the same fate. Early traditions, of no historical value, however, associated him with magicians. Nothing is known of H. except what is stated by St. Paul, that he was of those in Asia who turned away. It is not easy to decide what is meant by those 'in Asia.' It has been variously held to mean, all Asiatics then in Rome, the Ephesians who had accompanied St. Paul to Rome, public opinion in Asia Minor, and the Asiatic sentiment in Rome. See PHYGELUS.

W. MUIR.

HERMON (חֶרְמוֹן, 'sacred [mountain]'; cf. Sab. מחרם 'temple,' Arab. ḥaram, 'sacred enclosure,' and ḥormah, 'asylum').—The great outlier of Antilebanon, at the springs of Jordan. See PALESTINE. It was called Sirion by the Zidonians, and Senir by the Amorites (Dt 3^9). The first of these names is used poetically in Ps 29^6. Senir occurs also in Ezk 27^5, Ca 4^8, 1 Ch 5^{23}. Perhaps it may be inferred from the latter two passages (where it is used along with Hermon) that Senir originally denoted a particular part of the mountain-range (so Driver, Buhl, etc.). The name appears in the cuneiform texts as Sanîru (Schrader, KAT^{2} 159 [COT^{2} 146]), and the Anti-lebanon N. of Damascus between Baalbek and Emesa is still called Sanîr by the Arabs. Sayce (RP^{2} vi. 41, HCM 341) traces a knowledge of the name Senir also to the Egyptians. In Dt 4^{48} another name, Sion (שִׂיאֹן), is given to Hermon. It is held by some that Sion is here a textual error for Sirion (שִׁרְיֹן, the reading of Syr.), but this is doubtful (see Driver, ad loc.). 'Mount Hermon' (הַר חֶרְמוֹן) is used in Dt 3^8, Jos 11^{17} $12^{1.5}$ $13^{5.11}$, 1 Ch 5^{23}, 'Hermon' alone in Jos 11^3, Ps 89^{12} 133^3, Ca 4^8. The circumstance that the mountain has three peaks accounts for the plur. form חֶרְמוֹנִים 'the Hermons' (RV; not 'the Hermonites,' AV) in Ps 42^6.

Hermon was held by Hivites (Jos 11^3); it was the northern limit of conquest ($12^{1.5}$ $13^{5.11}$). Its sacred character appears from Ps 89^{12} (where it is coupled with Tabor), and from the name Mount Baal-hermon (Jg 3^3), 'the mountain of the Baal of Hermon.' Cf. 1 Ch 5^{23}. The dew of Hermon is noted as falling on Zion (Ps 133^3), and its wild character is noticed in Ca 4^8. The fir trees of Senir are mentioned in Ezk 27^5.

Mount Hermon is the most conspicuous feature in the scenery of Palestine, rising 9200 ft. above the Mediterranean in a dome-like summit, usually covered with snow till late in summer. There are three low peaks on the top, with a connecting plateau. Lower down, the sides are covered with vineyards round the Druze villages. On the sandstones to the west there are still pines and firs, but the upper part is quite barren, and covered with snow-worn gravel between the cliffs. This mountain is the only place where the Syrian bear is known to exist. The view from the top is magnificent, including the Lebanon and the plain round Damascus. Towards the west Tyre and Carmel are seen, on the south the mountains of Upper Galilee and the plains of Lower Galilee. The Hûleh lake and the Sea of Galilee lie beneath as on a map. This view is, however, obscured in summer by the sudden formation of clouds on the summit.

Hermon was perhaps the 'high mountain' of Mt 17^1, Mk 9^2 ('the mountain' of Lk 9^{28}) near Cæsarea Philippi, which was the scene of the Transfiguration and of the cloud which covered the disciples. In the Roman period it was a sacred centre, and small temples were built on the slopes on every side, while the highest point was encircled with a masonry wall, and seems to have supported an altar. Close by is a rock-cut chamber on the plateau. In the 4th cent. A.D. (see Onomast. s. 'Aermon') there was still a temple at which the people of Paneas and Lebanon worshipped, on the summit of Hermon. In the 10th cent. it became the centre of the Druze religion, and to it Sheikh ed-Derâzi, the founder of the latter creed, retired from Egypt. At Hasbeya, on its western slopes, the sacred books of the sect were found by the French in 1860. Hermon is called Jebel esh-Sheikh, or 'mountain of the chief,' for this reason, being the residence of the religious Sheikh of the Druzes. The translation sometimes suggested, 'chief of mountains,' is grammatically impossible. Hermon was visited by the present writer in 1873 (when the height and geographical position were determined) and in 1882.

i. INDEX OF HEROD FAMILY.—In this index every member of the family mentioned in Josephus is recorded. The numbers refer to the genealogical table. The names that occur in NT are printed in clarendon capitals.

AGRIPPA I. (49), son of Aristobulus, grandson of Herod, king of Judæa; m. Cypros, dtr. of Phasael. Ant. XVIII. v. 4, XIX. ix. 1; BJ II. xi. 6; Ac 12.

AGRIPPA II. (66), son of Agrippa I. Ant. XVIII. v. 4, XIX. ix. 1; BJ II. xi. 6; Ac 25. 26.

Agrippa (64), son of Aristobulus and Salome. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Agrippa (73), son of Felix and Drusilla. Ant. XX. vii. 2.

Agrippinos (78), dtr. of Mariamne, dtr. of Agrippa I. and Demetrius. Ant. XX. vii. 3.

Alexander (23), son of Herod by Mariamne I.; m. Glaphyra, dtr. of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia; put to death by his father in B.C. 7. Ant. XVIII. v. 4, XVI. i. 2, XVI. xi. 6.

Alexander (42), son of Phasael and Salampsio. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Alexander (51), son of Alexander, grandson of Herod. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Alexander (80), son of Tigranes (61). Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Alexandra (43), dtr. of Phasael and Salampsio. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Alexas (19), 3rd husband of Salome, Herod's sister. Ant. XVII. i. 1.

Alexis Selcias (54), son of Alexas (19); it is not stated whether by Salome or not. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Antipas or Antipater (1), governor of Idumæa, grandfather of Herod. Ant. XIV. i. 3.

ANTIPAS (27), son of Herod and Malthace; tetrarch of Galilee, m. (1) dtr. of Aretas, (2) Herodias. BJ I. xxviii. 4; Ant. XVII. i. 3, XVIII. v. 4; Mt 14^{1-6}, Mk 6^{14} 13^{31} 23^{7-15}, Lk$3^{1.19}$ $8^{7.9}$.

Antipater (2), minister of Hyrcanus, father of Herod. Ant. XIV. i. 3, XIV. vii. 3.

Antipater (21), eldest son of Herod by Doris; m. a daughter of Antigonus, the last of the Hasmonæans; put to death by his father B.C. 4. BJ I. xxviii. 4; Ant. XIV. xii. 1, XVII. v. 2.

Antipater (36), son of Salome, Herod's sister; m. Cypros, dtr. of Herod and Mariamne. His father's name is not mentioned. Ant. XVII. ix. 5, XVIII. v. 4.

Antipater (40), son of Phasael and Salampsio. There seems to be some confusion between this Antipater and the son of Salome (36). Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

ARCHELAUS (28), son of Herod by Malthace, ethnarch of Judæa; m. (1) Mariamne, (2) Glaphyra, his brother Alexander's widow. Ant. XVII. i. 3; Mt 2^{22}.

Archelaus (76), son of Chelcias, 1st husband of Mariamne, dtr. of Agrippa. Ant. XIX. ix. 1.

Aristobulus (22), son of Herod by Mariamne I.; m. Bernice, dtr. of Salome and Costobar; put to death by Herod B.C. 7. Ant. XVI. i. 2, XVII. i. 2, XVIII. v. 4.

ARISTOBULUS (47), son of Aristobulus (22), grandson of Herod; m. Jotape, dtr. of Sampsigeramus, king of Emesa. Ant. XVIII. v. 4. See under ARISTOBULUS for the supposed ref. to him Ro 16^{10}.

Aristobulus (57), son of Herod of Chalcis, great-grandson of Herod, king of Armenia Minor; m. Salome, dtr. of Herodias. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Aristobulus (65), son of Aristobulus (57) and Salome. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Azizus (71), king of Emesa, husband of Drusilla. Ant. XX. vii. 1.

Bernice (37), dtr. of Salome and Costobar; m. Aristobulus, son of Mariamne I., mother of Agrippa I. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

BERNICE (68), dtr. of Agrippa I.; m. (1) Herod of Chalcis, (2) Polemon of Cilicia; favourite of Titus. Ant. XVIII. v. 4, XIX. ix. 1; BJ II. xi. 6; Ant. XX. vii. 3; Ac $25^{13.23}$ 26^{30}.

Bernice (79), dtr. of Mariamne (69) and Archelaus (76). Ant. XX. vii. 1.

Bernicianus (58), son of Herod of Chalcis and Bernice. Ant. XX. v. 2.

Cleopatra (14), a woman of Jerusalem, wife of Herod, mother of Philip the tetrarch. BJ I. xxviii. 4; Ant. XVII. i. 3.

Costobar (18), governor of Idumæa, 2nd husband of Salome, Herod's sister, whom she divorced. Ant. XV. vii. 9.

Cypros (3), an Arabian of noble family, wife of Antipater, mother of Herod. Ant. XIV. vii. 3.

Cypros (25), dtr. of Herod by Mariamne I.; m. Antipater (36), son of Salome. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Cypros (45), dtr. of Phasael, wife of Agrippa I., mother of Agrippa II. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Cypros (53), dtr. of Cypros (25) and Antipater (36), granddaughter of Herod; m. Alexas Selcias. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Cypros (62), dtr. of Cypros (53) and Alexas. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Demetrius (77), Alabarch of Alexandria, 2nd husband of Mariamne, dtr. of Agrippa. Ant. XX. vii. 3.

Doris (10), 1st wife of Herod, a woman of the people, mother of Antipater. BJ I. xxviii. 4; Ant. XIV. xii. 1.

DRUSILLA (70), dtr. of Agrippa I.; m. (1) Azizus, king of Emesa, (2) Felix, the Roman procurator. Ant. XVIII. v. 4, XIX. ix. 1, XX. vii. 1, 2; BJ II. xi. 6; Ac 24^{24}.

Drusus (67), second son of Agrippa I. and Cypros, died in youth. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Elpis (17), 8th wife of Herod. BJ I. xxviii. 4; Ant. XVII. i. 3.

FELIX (72), Roman procurator, husband of Drusilla. Ant. XX. vii. 1–2; Ac 23, 25.

Glaphyra (38), dtr. of Archelaus of Cappadocia; m. (1) Alexander, son of Mariamne I., by whom she had children; (2) Juba, king of Mauritania; (3) Archelaus. Ant. XVI. i. 2, XVII. xiii. 1, 4.

HEROD (6), called THE GREAT, son of Antipater; 8 wives of his are enumerated, and he had 2 others; he had 8 sons and 6 daughters. He died B.C. 4. Ant. XIV. vii. 3, XVII. i. 3; BJ I. viii. 9, I. xxviii. 4; Mt $2^{1.22}$, Lk 1^5.

HEROD (26), perhaps called PHILIP, son of Herod and Mariamne II.; m. Herodias; father of Salome. BJ I. xxviii. 5; Ant. XV. ix. 3 XVII. i. 2, XVIII. v. 4; Mt 14^3, Mk 6^{17}, Lk 3^{19}.

HEROD ANTIPAS. See ANTIPAS (27).

Herod (30), son of Herod and Cleopatra (14). Ant. XVII. i. 3.

Herod (41), son of Phasael and Salampsio. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

Herod (46), son of Aristobulus, grandson of Herod, king of Chalcis; m. (1) Mariamne, dtr. of Olympias; (2) Bernice. Ant. XVIII. v. 4, XX. v. 2; BJ II. xi. 6

Herod (63), son of Aristobulus (57) and Salome. Ant. XVIII. v. 4.

HERODIAS (50), dtr. of Aristobulus, granddaughter of Herod; m. (1) her uncle Herod, called Philip; (2) Herod Antipas. Ant. XVIII. v. 4; Mt 14^3, Mk 6^{17}, Lk 3^{19}.

Hyrcanus (59), son of Herod of Chalcis and Bernice. Ant. XX. v. 2.

Joseph (4), uncle of Herod, and also, by marriage with Salome, brother-in-law. Appointed ruler during his visit to Antony, and put to death B.C. 34. Ant. XV. iii. 5–9.

iv. ORIGIN OF THE DYNASTY OF THE HERODS.—The dynasty of the Herods rose into prominence during the confusion which resulted from the decay of the Hasmonæan dynasty, the transference of Syria and Palestine to the sway of the Romans, and the civil wars which marked the decay of the Republic. Their ancestor was Antipater or Antipas, a man of wealth and capacity whom Alexander Jannæus had made governor of Idumæa. So much is clear, but of the origin of the family there are very contradictory accounts. Nicolaus of Damascus said, according to Josephus (Ant. XIV. i. 3), that he was of the stock of the Jews who first came back from Babylon. This appears to have been a fiction invented for the benefit of Herod. Josephus evidently looked upon him as an Idumæan; as such he was considered half a Jew. But Pharisaic and perhaps Christian hatred was not satisfied with this. He is stated by Justin to have been a native of Ashkelon (Dial. c. 52), and therefore of the hated Philistine race; while Julius Africanus (ap. Eus. HE I. vii. 11) improves the story by telling us that some Idumæan robbers had attacked Ashkelon and carried away the father of Antipater, who was the son of one of the temple slaves; the priest of the temple was not able to ransom him, and so he was brought up as an Idumæan; this story Africanus had from the kinsmen of the Saviour. Whatever was the origin of the family, its ability is undoubted. Antipater's son, who bore the same name as himself, first appears in history on the death of Alexandra, the Maccabæan queen, in 69. Her eldest son, Hyrcanus II., a man of a peaceful and quiet disposition, allowed himself to be set aside by his younger brother, Aristobulus II., a man of very different character. Antipater, who had been building up for himself a strong position in Idumæa by allying himself with the Arabs at Petra and the Philistine cities, saw his opportunity; under Aristobulus he would be nobody, under Hyrcanus he would rule the country. He attached himself to Hyrcanus, persuaded him not to submit to his younger brother, and, so far as we know, remained absolutely faithful to him the whole of his life, quite content to have the reality of power, and too wise or too loyal to endanger his position by arousing dynastic hatred. At first he attempted to restore Hyrcanus with the assistance of Aretas, king of the Nabatæan Arabs,—(his wife Cypros belonged to one of the noblest families of that country),—but before the war was concluded a new power appeared on the scene. In 66 Pompey had defeated Mithridates, and was now pursuing his first march through Asia. On his approach all the rival parties of every state and country attempted to gain him to their side. Aristobulus, Antipater on behalf of Hyrcanus, and the Pharisaic party who wished to restore the theocracy, rivalled one another in bribes, complaints, and promises. Pompey was, as always, deliberate, and it soon became apparent that Aristobulus was too proud to submit, too faithless to be an ally, and too powerless to restrain the people from rebellion. When the Romans approached Jerusalem, the party of Hyrcanus delivered the city over without a blow; the war party with Aristobulus retired to the temple fortress. A siege followed, in which the defenders exhibited the fanatical courage which the Jews always have shown when their cause is hopeless, and observed the law so strictly that they refused to destroy their enemies' works on the Sabbath day. The city was taken by assault in the autumn of 63, about the fast of the Atonement, and the priests continued to offer the sacrifices in the midst of the battle and were cut down at the altar. Pompey violated the Holy of Holies, but did not plunder the wealth of the temple. Aristobulus and his family were carried captive, and the priest-king of the Jews had to adorn a Roman triumph. The kingdom was reduced in size, the Greek towns were freed, but the hierarchy was untouched. Hyrcanus was made high priest without the title of king, and Antipater became the most important person in the country. This was the first instance in which Antipater showed the marvellous power his family possessed of securing the support of every successive Roman of distinction. Historians generally ascribe it to their capacity for bribing, and this they undoubtedly possessed. Moreover, they had the wisdom to know that bribes must be large. But that was not enough. They were distinguished by being always faithful to the Romans, always competent, and always agreeable. To attach themselves to each successive Roman who became powerful, to spare nothing in his support, and to add to the services they had rendered an agreeable private friendship, was the secret of their success.

The next twenty years gave many proofs of this. Antipater helped Scaurus in an expedition against Aretas, and persuaded Aretas to submit. He made the acquaintance and even the friendship of Mark Antony. He assisted Gabinius in a war with Archelaus with corn and weapons and money, and Gabinius settled the affairs of Jerusalem as Antipater wished (Ant. XIV. vi. 4). When Cæsar was in Egypt after the battle of Pharsalia, Antipater saved him when he was in great danger. Cæsar, in return for this and many other services, confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood, and made Antipater a Roman citizen. Afterwards he made Hyrcanus ethnarch, Antipater procurator, and allowed the walls of Jerusalem to be rebuilt, while he conferred privileges on the Jewish race everywhere. When Cassius, after the death of Cæsar, came to Syria to collect money and show how hateful the cause of the Republic could be, Antipater and his sons had the wisdom to provide him with all he required, thus saving their cities from slavery. Antipater was murdered in the year B.C. 43 by a certain Malichos. 'He was distinguished,' says Josephus, 'for piety and justice and love of his country.' His eldest son Phasael had been made governor of Jerusalem, his second son Herod governor of Galilee. The latter had already shown the energy and the brilliant military capacity for which he was afterwards distinguished. When Antony came to Syria after the battle of Philippi, Herod exhibited all the address of his father by securing his friendship; he and his brother were made tetrarchs, and many members of the Pharisaic party, who persisted in bringing accusations against them, were put to death.

During all these twenty years of Antipater's rule, the younger branch of the Hasmonæan family, Aristobulus and his sons, had persisted in disturbing the country. They had clearly a considerable body of supporters, and it seems almost as if the Romans had allowed them to exist in order to prevent the country from becoming too strong. In the year 40 a Parthian invasion gave Antigonus, the last survivor of the family, his opportunity. He succeeded in getting possession of the persons of Hyrcanus and Phasael; the former he mutilated, the latter put himself to death; Herod only just escaped with his female relations to the fortress of Masada, and Antigonus had a troubled reign of three years. But Herod was not to be daunted; he fled to Rome, explained how Antigonus had allied himself with the Parthians, and much to his own surprise—for he had only hoped that the younger Aristobulus, his own brother-in-law, might become ruler—was made king of Judæa by Antony, Octavius, and the senate. It took him, however, three years to win the kingdom that had been given him, and it was only in the autumn of 37 that he succeeded in taking Jerusalem, and brought the Hasmonæan dynasty to an end.

v. REIGN OF HEROD THE GREAT, B.C. 37–4.—'C'était, en somme, une fort belle bête, un lion à qui on ne tient compte que de sa large encolure, et de son épaisse crinière, sans lui demander le sens moral.' So writes Renan; yet the character of Herod is not so easy to sum up, for to be a successful tyrant a certain minimum of morality is required, and that Herod, at any rate until the end of his life, possessed. Nor can we be certain of our information. His reign was a deliberate violation of all the religious instincts of the people, and the friends of the Hasmonæans and the Pharisees were equally interested in putting the worst construction on his acts. Josephus himself prided himself on his priestly family and connexions, yet he is not altogether unfair; much of his information came from Nicolaus of Damascus, who had written an apologetic account of his royal patron, and he suggests that many of the crimes of Herod were the necessity of his position. Physically, Herod was magnificent in his beauty and strength, and these qualities were not more conspicuous than his skill in war. He was clever, able, but unscrupulous and ambitious. He was munificent to his friends, capable of being magnanimous even to his enemies, e.g. to Shemaia, but absolutely unscrupulous when necessity seemed to demand it. How far he attempted to gain the kingdom we cannot say: when he received it he accepted the position without hesitation, and allowed nothing to check his ambition. Yet he was a good ruler up to a certain point, and knew well how to manage the Jews. He suppressed insurrection with absolute severity, yet he never indulged in religious persecution. He was munificent to the people: when famine came, he stripped his palace of gold and silver to buy corn. Whatever his feelings towards the Jews, he was always a good friend to them, and used his influence with Augustus to obtain privileges for them in various parts of the world. Although he was probably absolutely irreligious, he respected the Jewish religion so far as to demand that Sylläus, the Arabian, who wished to marry Herod's sister, Salome, should adopt the Jewish customs (Ant. XVI. vii. 6), refrain from any images or statues in the buildings he put up within Jewish territory, and put no effigy on his coins. He had the strong lusts and passions of an Oriental; the position of a tyrant and usurper surrounded him with plots, suspicions, and intrigues. As he grew older his cruelty and suspiciousness increased, and the misery of his old age seemed to be a judgment on the crimes of his life. There has been some discussion whether he deserved the title of Great. The fact that his life and works left no permanent results, that his house was built on the sand, may make us hesitate to give it him. But, taken in his person and in his career, he was one of the most conspicuous and interesting figures of his time. If he was not great, he had almost all the qualities which might have made him so.

The reign of Herod is divided by most historians into three periods. The first from 37–25, the period during which he consolidated his power. The second from 25–13, the period of his greatest prosperity. The third from 13 to his death B.C. 4, the period of family feuds.

(1) Consolidation of Herod's power, 37–25.—When Herod and the Romans captured the city, he did his best to restrain the butchery of the people and the plunder of the temple, and his vengeance on his enemies was possibly not greater than the necessities of the position demanded. He obtained from Antony the death of Antigonus, put to death forty-five of the principal men of his party, and replenished his coffers from their property; but Pollio and Sameas (Abtalion and Shemaia), the two leading Pharisees, he treated with great respect, and seems to have succeeded in making all but the most extreme section of the party acquiesce in his rule, as a judgment of God which had to be borne.

Shortly before the siege of Jerusalem, Herod had married Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus, to whom he was violently attached. He had hoped by this alliance with the old dynasty to strengthen his position, but he only succeeded in introducing dissension into his own family. Mariamne and her mother, Alexandra, who seems to have been a violent and unscrupulous woman, treated Herod's sister, Salome, and his mother, Cypros, with the most absolute contempt as low-born foreigners. Salome retaliated by raising Herod's jealousy, and accusing Alexandra and her family of disloyalty and conspiracy. As far as Alexandra is concerned the accusations were undoubtedly true, in other cases they were more doubtful. At any rate, first Aristobulus, the younger brother of Mariamne, who had been made high priest, and whose only crime was that he was too popular, was put to death; then the aged Hyrcanus, who had returned from Babylon at Herod's invitation, and had always been absolutely subservient to his Idumæan subjects; then Mariamne, his wife, of whom he was passionately fond, and whose death caused him infinite misery; last of all, Alexandra herself, the cause of all the misery, who during Herod's illness began secretly to rebel against him, and during all this time had been engaged in constant intrigues. The last victims to Herod's suspicions and severity were Costobar, governor of Idumæa, for a time Salome's husband, and some other mysterious persons, the sons of Babas, who seem to have been adherents of the Hasmonæan party. By the year 25 every possible rival had been removed; Salome's spite had been gratified; and Herod's position had been secured by the sacrifice of his passion or affection.

During the same time he was employed in consolidating his position with the Romans. He retained the friendship of Antony in spite of the opposition of Cleopatra, who wished to be queen of Jerusalem. Like Augustus, he had the wisdom to resist the temptation of her charms, and he also refrained from putting her to death. He fitted up a force in order to assist Antony at Actium, but had the good fortune to be employed at the time in an expedition against the Arabs. As soon as the victory of Augustus was certain, he went at once to him in accordance with the traditions of his family; he said frankly that he had been a good friend to Antony, and had done everything to help him, and he promised to be an equally good friend to him. Augustus accepted his friendship, and confirmed him in his kingdom. Herod on every opportunity was as good as his word. He rendered Augustus very material assistance, received various extensions to his kingdom, and the friendship of Augustus, Agrippa, and Herod became proverbial. From this time Herod's position was assured.

(2) Period of Herod's prosperity, B.C. 25–13.—Herod was now able to govern as he wished. He was rich, prosperous, and secure, and he devoted himself to the Hellenizing of his countrymen and the gratification of his taste for magnificence in building. In B.C. 25 he celebrated at Jerusalem the quinquennial games in honour of Augustus, and built there a theatre, amphitheatre, and a hippodrome. Throughout Palestine a number of new cities were founded, the most important of which was Cæsarea on the seacoast. Here and in other Greek cities he built temples to Augustus. He turned Samaria, which he renamed Sebaste, into a magnificent city; nor did he confine his buildings to his own dominions, his benefits reached as far as Rhodes and Athens. But his greatest work was the reconstruction of the temple. This he began in the year B.C. 20. The more sacred portions were completed in eight years; the building was not finished until the year A.D. 63, a few years before its final destruction. It was only a partially completed building in the time of our Lord, and existed only eight years after it was finally finished. To the other works must be added palaces, fortresses, parks, and pleasure grounds; and to the other signs of Hellenizing tendency, the Greek writers and teachers whom Herod attracted to his court, the principal of whom was Nicolaus of Damascus, his secretary and biographer.

(3) Period of domestic troubles, B.C. 13–4.—It is probable that we are inclined to exaggerate the troubles of Herod's last years, or rather to look at them from the point of view of the last three or four years of his life. Herod was considered a second Solomon, as the great Jewish king, and the rebuilder of the temple; he was, like him, also as a polygamist. The Jews were allowed more than one wife, but it was hardly the fashion at this time to take advantage of the licence to any great extent. Herod had ten altogether—nine at one time. He had eight sons and six daughters. The family troubles arose through the dissensions between the sons of Mariamne, the Hasmonæan, on the one side, Salome his sister and Antipater his eldest son on the other. Alexander and Aristobulus had been brought up at Rome; when they returned, their beauty, their popular qualities, and their legitimate descent attracted the attention of the people, and they became the centre for numerous intrigues and an object which fanaticism could put before itself. We need not follow the course of the intrigues. They nearly involved Herod in difficulties with the Roman government. They led Augustus to say that it was better to be Herod's pig than his son. Eventually, the two sons of Mariamne were strangled at Samaria (B.C. 7), and Antipater, after being imprisoned for some time, was executed, as the last act of his father's life, for a too premature act of self-assertion. Meanwhile, Herod was afflicted with a painful and loathsome disease. Fanaticism began to break out. The pupils of the Rabbis, Judas son of Sariphæus and Matthias son of Margaloth, were incited to destroy the symbol of idolatry, the golden eagle which adorned the gable of the temple, and the leaders were burnt alive. Herod's cruelty increased with his sufferings. He is said to have assembled all the leading people of Jerusalem in the hippodrome, that on his death they might be put to death, and there might be real grief at his funeral. He died five days after he had caused Antipater to be put to death, after great sufferings.

(4) Herod and the murder of the Innocents.—Herod comes into connexion with the gospel narrative, in two ways. Both St. Matthew (2^1) and St. Luke (2^1) agree in stating that it was during his reign our Lord was born. There is no reason to doubt that statement, only it has become quite clear that it could not also be during a taxing under Quirinius (see CHRONOLOGY OF NT, i. 404 f.). St. Matthew also gives us an account of the visit of the wise men, of their interview with Herod, and of the subsequent murder of the infants under two years old at Bethlehem. We have no other account of the event, which could not have been conspicuous in Herod's life; and all that it is necessary to say is that it was exactly consistent with his character, especially during the later years of his life. Reference is especially made to Ant. XVI. xi. 7, XVII. ii. 4—events which can have nothing to do with the massacre at Bethlehem, but show conclusively the temper of the king. Macrobius (5th cent.) says, Augustus, cum audisset inter pueros quos in Syria Herodes, rex Judæorum, intra bimatum jussit interfici filium quoque eius occisum, ait: Melius est Herodis porcum esse quam filium (Macrob. Saturn. ii. 4), a statement which is so confused as to be quite valueless.

vi. The SUCCESSORS OF HEROD.—Herod had made three wills. By the first he nominated Antipater his successor; if he died before his father, Herod, son of the second Mariamne (see HEROD, below), was to succeed; by the second, Antipas was declared his successor; by the third, Archelaus was to be king, and Antipas and Philip were to have tetrarchies. After suppressing some disturbances on his father's death, Archelaus went to Rome to claim his inheritance, to the same place went Antipas to attempt to obtain what had been left him under the second will, and a little later came Philip, not for his own sake, but to support the claims of Archelaus. Other deputations came asking to be freed from the rule of the Herods altogether. While Augustus delayed to give his decision, disturbances broke out throughout all Palestine, which were with difficulty suppressed. Ultimately, Augustus practically confirmed Herod's will. Archelaus was to govern Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, but only with the title of ethnarch, not of king; Antipas, Galilee and Peræa; Philip, Trachonitis and Ituræa. When Archelaus came home he removed the high priest Joazar, son of Boethius, who had taken part in the rebellion. There can be little doubt that this expedition of Archelaus to obtain the kingdom suggested the parable in Lk 19^{11} etc. of the nobleman who went to a far country to receive a kingdom.

(1) ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαος) was the elder of the two sons of Herod by Malthace, a Samaritan woman (Ant. XVII. i. 3). He was brought up at Rome with his own brother Antipas, at a private house. He had been accused by Antipater of disloyalty, and so had been at first kept out of any inheritance. His visit to Rome has been narrated above. After he had acquired the kingdom, there is little related of him. He outraged Jewish sentiment by marrying Glaphyra, widow of his brother Alexander, although she had had children by him, and had another husband (Juba of Mauritania) living, and his own wife was alive. He built a palace at Jericho, and a village in his own honour of the name of Archelais. He was the worst of all Herod's sons that survived, and, after nine years of his rule, the people of Judæa and Samaria could no longer endure his cruelty and tyranny. They complained to Augustus, who summoned Archelaus to Rome, and, after hearing the case, banished him to Vienne. From this time to the year A.D. 41 Palestine was under Roman procurators.

Archelaus is mentioned once in the NT, in Mt 2^{22}.

(2) ANTIPAS or HEROD ANTIPAS (Ἀντίπας), called in NT 'Herod the tetrarch.' He was the son of Herod by Malthace, and in the second of his father's wills had been designated sole heir. Ultimately, he received only Galilee and Peræa, a district which brought him in a yearly revenue of 200 talents. The two portions were divided from one another by the confederation of Greek cities called Decapolis. He seems to have had the ability to govern his country, a decidedly difficult one, and, like his father, he was distinguished for his love of building. He built as his capital Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee.

His first wife was a daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabatæans, but once on a visit to Rome he visited the house of his brother Herod (Philip), son of the younger Mariamne. This Herod had married Herodias, his niece, daughter of Aristobulus, and had by her a daughter, Salome. With Herodias Antipas fell violently in love, and determined to divorce his wife and marry her. This the daughter of Aretas became aware of, and fled to her father for protection.

About this time the territory of Antipas was the scene of the preaching of John the Baptist and of our Lord. It is needless to repeat the story which is told us in the Gospels of John the Baptist, of Herodias, of John's rebuke, imprisonment, and ultimate death (Mt $14^{1ff.}$, Mk $6^{14ff.}$, Lk 3^{19}). According to Josephus, the reason Herod gave for imprisoning him was the fear that he might create a revolt or disturbance among the people. The execution took place at the fortress of Machærus, beyond the Jordan (Ant. XVIII. v. 2).

We have more than one reference to Antipas during our Lord's ministry, apart from his relations to John the Baptist. When he heard of the fame of Jesus, his conscience smote him, and he was frightened, thinking that John the Baptist had risen from the dead (Mt 14^{1}, Mk 6^{14}, Lk 9^{7}). Jesus therefore went to Bethsaida Julias in the territory of Philip. Later, apparently when going through Peræa (Lk 13^{31}), a rumour is spread that Antipas desires to kill Him, and Jesus speaks of him as 'that fox,' alluding to his well-known character for craft. He wanted to drive out of his country a teacher who might cause some disturbance, and yet to be free from the guilt of condemning a second prophet (Lk 13^{31}). At that time, according to St. Mark (8^{15}), He had condemned the leaven of Herod. St. Luke (23^{7-15}) relates also an examination of our Lord before Antipas (who had wished to see Him for some time); the result of this was the reconciliation of Pilate and Herod. This was presumably only an informal examination, and not part of the regular trial. It is referred to again in Ac 4^{27}, and is prominent in the Gospel of Peter. It may be noticed that St. Luke appears to have had special means of information about the Herod dynasty, and that his information is apparently accurate. He does not, like St. Mark, incorrectly call Antipas king (Lk 8^{3}, Ac 13^{1}).

The marriage with Herodias was the cause of Antipas' fall. First a war broke out between him and Aretas (A.D. 36), although nine years later apparently than the flight of Herod's first wife. Antipas suffered a severe defeat, which some considered, according to Josephus, to be a punishment for what he had done to John the Baptist (Ant. XVIII. v. 2). Again later, Herodias persuaded her husband to go to Jerusalem and demand the title of king from Caius, being jealous of what the latter had done for Agrippa. The result of the application was that Agrippa brought charges against him which caused his banishment (Ant. VIII. vii. 2). His place of banishment was Lugdunum in Gaul (Ant. XVIII. vii. 2), but Spain, according to BJ II. ix. 6, was the place where Antipas died. It has been suggested that this was Lugdunum Convenarum at the foot of the Pyrenees, and not the better-known place of that name. (See Smith's *DB*² I. ii. 1347).

(3) PHILIP (Φίλιππος) was the son of Herod the Great by Cleopatra, a woman of Jerusalem (Ant. XVII. i. 3). He had been educated at Rome, like the remainder of Herod's sons. The territory to which he succeeded on the death of his father and by the decision of Augustus (see above), consisted, according to Josephus, of Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, Gaulanitis, and Paneas (Ant. XVII. viii. 1, xi. 4, XVIII. iv. 6; BJ II. vi. 3), according to St. Luke (3^{1}) the country of Ituræa and Trachonitis, Φιλίππου δὲ . . . τετραρχοῦντος τῆς Ἰτουραίας καὶ Τραχωνίτιδος χώρας. (On the meaning of this passage see ITURÆA). Speaking generally, it implied the district to the N. and E. of the Sea of Galilee. Its revenues were computed at 100 talents, and his title was that of tetrarch. He ruled for 38 years from his accession in B.C. 4 until his death in A.D. 34, without any startling event and without reproach. He was distinguished from the other sons of Herod by the absence of ambition, of cruelty, and of lust. He was only once married, to Salome the daughter of Herodias, and had no children. His character is summed up by Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 6. 'He was moderate and peaceful in his rule, and spent his whole life in his country. He went out with only a small retinue, always taking with him the throne on which he might sit and judge. Whenever he met any one who had need of him, he made no delay, but set down the throne wherever he might be and heard the case.'

His name is chiefly remembered by the city of CÆSAREA PHILIPPI, which he founded on the site of Paneas at the head waters of the Jordan. It was called Cæsarea in honour of the emperor, and received the name of Philippi to distinguish it from the more important city on the seacoast. He also rebuilt BETHSAIDA, situated on the left bank of the Jordan where it flows into the Lake of Gennesareth, and called it Julias. It was to this city, in all probability, that our Lord retired to escape the attention of Herod Antipas (Lk 9^{10}). He also showed his loyalty to the emperors by placing the busts of Augustus and Tiberius on his coins, a course which was possible mainly owing to the non-Jewish character of the population.

On his death his territory was joined to the province of Syria, but its taxes were collected separately. Caligula immediately on his accession gave it to Agrippa.

(4) HEROD, called PHILIP, was the son of Herod by Mariamne, daughter of Simon the high priest. Her father was a priest, of too low class to be allied with him, but too important to be despised. Herod was wise enough not to use his authority to her detriment, but did not scruple to make her father high priest (Ant. XV. ix. 3). Herod had been named in his father's first will, but, owing to the treachery of his mother, was left out in subsequent wills (BJ I. xxx. 7), and lived and died a private person, apparently in Rome (Ant. XVIII. v. 1). His claim to distinction is that he was the first husband of Herodias. Apparently, he also bore the name of Philip (Mt 14^3, Mk 6^{17}).

In Mk 6^{17} all MSS read τὴν γυναῖκα Φιλίππου τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτοῦ. In Mt 14^3 Φιλίππου is omitted by D, the Vulgate, and some Old Latin MSS. In Lk 3^{19} it is omitted by א B D, the Vulg., Old Latin, and was probably not part of the original text.

The discrepancy may be explained either (1) by assuming that Philip was the other name of Herod. This is all the more probable, as in the passage of Josephus (Ant. XVIII. v. 4) Herod Antipas is also called simply Herod. Against this is the fact that St. Luke, who generally has by far the most accurate information concerning the Herods, does not give the name; (2) by supposing that there is a confusion between the first husband and the son-in-law of Herodias, for her daughter Salome married Philip the tetrarch.

(5) AGRIPPA I. was born about the year 10 B.C., being 54 years old at the time of his death in A.D. 44 (Ant. XIX. viii. 2). He was the son of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus. His mother was Bernice, daughter of Salome, Herod's sister, and of Costobar (Ant. XVIII. v. 4). Not long after his birth his father was put to death by Herod, and he himself with his mother sent to Rome, where he was brought up. His mother was a friend of Antonia, widow of the elder Drusus, and he himself enjoyed the friendship of the younger Drusus. This imperial friendship appears to have been of doubtful advantage. He was magnanimous, reckless, and extravagant, spent large sums in bribing the imperial freedmen, got hopelessly into debt, and, on the death of Drusus, lost the imperial favour. He had to leave Rome, and during the next fourteen years of his life was subject to many strange vicissitudes. At one time he had even meditated suicide. When Tiberius died (March 16, A.D. 37) he was in prison, but the accession of Caligula, which he had looked forward to so indiscreetly as to lose his liberty, at length brought the change of his fortunes. The new emperor immediately gave him the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, the title of king, and a golden chain equal in weight to the iron chain with which he had been bound (Ant. XVIII. vi. 10), while the senate added the honorary title of prefect. In 38 he visited his new possessions, but in 39 he was back in Rome. He was responsible for the banishment of Herod Antipas in 39, and received his tetrarchy in addition to the other two. More creditable to him was the wisdom and boldness with which he persuaded Caius not to erect a statue of himself in the temple at Jerusalem. The death of Caligula (41) and the accession of Claudius gave him an opportunity of winning the goodwill of the latter; and he received Judæa and Samaria in addition to his other possessions, and ruled therefore over all the territory of his grandfather.

It is from this date that his three years of actual rule began. Its leading feature, and one which harmonizes with the narrative in the Acts, was his friendliness to the Jews and his regard for Jewish customs. He began his reign by offering all the fitting sacrifices in the temple, omitting nothing that the law enjoined; by paying the cost of many who wished to fulfil their Nazirite vows; and by dedicating in the temple the golden chain which he had received from Caius. His determination to uphold the privileges of his people was speedily shown. Some young men in the town of Dora had erected a statue of the emperor in the Jewish synagogue in that place. This angered Agrippa, for it meant the overthrow of the laws of the country, and he used his influence to persuade Petronius the governor of Syria to interfere, which he did, not only ordering the removal of the statue, but punishing those who had erected it. For his loyalty to Judaism both Josephus (Ant. XIX. vii. 3) and the Pharisees (Schürer, I. i. p. 444) are loud in his praise. His conduct is contrasted with that of Herod the Great, who showed all his benevolence towards the Gentile cities. He constantly lived in Jerusalem, and preferred it. He kept the laws of his country in purity. He lived a life of the strictest holiness, and allowed no day to pass without offering the sacrifice. So the Mishna tells us how he in person used to offer the first-fruits; and a story is told that at the Feast of Tabernacles, as he read the words, Dt 17^{15} 'Thou mayest not set a stranger over thee which is not thy brother,' he burst into tears. And the people cried out, 'Be not disturbed—thou art our brother! thou art our brother!' He also used his political influence—which was considerable—to spread Judaism. When he betrothed his daughter Drusilla to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, king of Commagene, he made him undertake to be circumcised.

Quite in accordance with this character is the narrative in Ac 12. He began a persecution of the Church. He slew James the brother of John with the sword, and, finding that this was pleasing to the Jews, proceeded to take Peter also. These events happened during the Passover. Another side of his Judaizing policy is shown by the attempts which he made—both frustrated by the interference of the governor of Syria, Marsus—to strengthen his kingdom. He enlarged the walls of Jerusalem, and while at Tiberias received no less than five vassal princes—Antiochus of Commagene, Sampsigeramus of Emesa, Cotys of Armenia Minor, Polemon of Pontus, and Herod of Chalcis, his own brother. That he was foolish enough to meditate any treason is improbable; he was too fond of peace, and knew too well what was the power of Rome; if he had any object beyond that of increasing his own magnificence, it was probably the extension of Jewish influence among them.

Of his death, which happened in A.D. 44, after the beginning of the month Nisan (see CHRONOLOGY, vol. i. p. 416), we have two independent accounts. According to Josephus (Ant. XIX. viii. 2), during the third year of his reign over all Judæa he came to Cæsarea. There he presided at games in honour of Cæsar, surrounded by all the leading men of the province. On the second day he put on a robe of silver of wonderful make. When the first rays of the sun struck it, it produced a wonderful effect. Immediately there were cries addressing him as a god, 'Be propitious; if up to now we feared thee as a man, henceforth we confess that thou art more than mortal.' The king did not rebuke them. Shortly afterwards, looking up, he saw an owl sitting over his head on a cord. He knew that the bird, which had formerly been a messenger of good, was now a messenger of evil, ἄγγελόν τε τοῦτον εὐθὺς ἐνόησεν κακῶν εἶναι, τὸν καί ποτε τῶν ἀγαθῶν γενόμενον. He was immediately seized with severe pains, and died after five days. The allusion to the owl is to an omen which had portended his good fortune when he was a prisoner in Rome (Ant. XVIII. vi. 7).

According to the Acts, Herod, after the release of Peter, i.e. after the Passover, went down to Cæsarea. He was angry with the people of Tyre and Sidon, and a deputation from them came before him asking for peace. Herod, on a day arranged, put on his royal robe, and sitting on his throne made an address to them. The people cried, It is the voice of a god, and not of a man. And immediately an angel of the Lord struck him, because he gave not God the glory; and he was eaten of worms, and died.

It is quite clear that there is a substantial agreement between these passages as to the main incident, but a difference which is quite incompatible with any literary obligation on the part of the author of the Acts.

Agrippa had married Cypros, daughter of Phasael, who was son of Phasael, Herod's brother. Her mother was Salampsio, daughter of Herod by Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus. He had two sons, AGRIPPA (see below) and Drusus, who died young, and three daughters, BERNICE, Mariamne, and DRUSILLA.

(6) AGRIPPA II., or, as he describes himself on coins, Marcus Julius Agrippa, was the son of Agrippa I. and Cypros. He was only 17 years old at the death of his father in 44, and Claudius was persuaded not to give him his father's kingdom owing to his youth. Agrippa then arrived at Rome, and used his influence on behalf of the Jews (Ant. XX. vi. 3). On the death of his uncle, Herod of Chalcis, he received the tetrarchy of the latter and the oversight of the temple (Ant. XX. v. 2; BJ II. xii.). In the year 53 he gave up Chalcis and received the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias. Later, Nero added various cities in Galilee and Peræa (Ant. XX. vii. 1, viii. 4). Of his relations to his sister Bernice the worst reports were current. Like all the Herods, he tried to combine Judaism and Hellenism. He improved his capital city, Cæsarea Philippi, and called it Neronias; he adorned Berytus with many statues and buildings; his coins bore effigies of the emperors. But Rabbinical tradition records his interest in Jewish questions; he attempted to extend Judaism among the surrounding kings, and under him the temple was finished (Ant. XX. ix. 6).

In Ac 25. 26 we have an account of the speech of St. Paul before Agrippa, Bernice, and Festus. St. Paul's compliment, that Agrippa was 'expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews,' was well deserved, and the somewhat enigmatic 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian' may be interpreted according to our conception of Agrippa's character.

Agrippa did what he could to check the growing storm (BJ II. xv. 1), and during all the war was on the side of the Romans. He took part in the festivities which succeeded the victory (BJ VII. ii. 1), and received a considerable increase of territory. Of his later life we only know that Josephus corresponded with him and received from him information for his history (Jos. Vita, 65). He died about the year 100 A.D., the last of the Herods.

vii. WOMEN OF THE FAMILY.—(1) HERODIAS (Ἡρωδιάς, WH Ἡρῳδιάς) was daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod by Mariamne, daughter of Hyrcanus. Her mother was Bernice, daughter of Salome, Herod's sister. She was thus sister of Herod of Chalcis, of Agrippa I., and of the younger Aristobulus (Ant. XVIII. v. 4). According to Josephus, she married first of all Herod, son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, daughter of Simon the high priest, and by him had a daughter of the name of SALOME. According to Ac 6^{17}, and probably Mt 14^{3}, her first husband's name was PHILIP (wh. see). Prompted apparently by ambition, she left him and married his brother Antipas. It was this marriage that drew upon them the rebuke of John the Baptist, and caused the tragedy that followed (Mt 14^{3-11}, Mk 6^{14-18}); and it was Herodias' ambition which caused Antipas his final ruin. 'She said life was unbearable for them if Agrippa, who came to her husband in such extreme poverty, now returned a king, while he himself, the son of a king, was contented with a private life' (Ant. XVIII. vii. 1). Her pride made her faithful to her husband in misfortune. Josephus represents her as saying to Caius, when he told her that it was only her brother who prevented her from sharing the calamity of her husband, 'You indeed, O emperor! say this in a magnificent manner, and as becomes you; but the love which I have for my husband hinders me from partaking of the favour of your gift; for it is not right that I, who have been a partner in his prosperity, should forsake him in his misfortunes.'

(2) SALOME was the name of the daughter of Herod (Philip) and Herodias who danced before Herod Antipas as mentioned Mt 14^{3-6} and Mk 6^{17-22} (but cf. reading of WH in v.^{22}). She married (1) Herod Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, by whom she had no children, and (2) Aristobulus, son of Herod of Chalcis, by whom she had three children—Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus (Ant. XVIII. V. 4).

(3) BERNICE or BERENICE (Βερνίκη) was the eldest daughter of Agrippa I. She was born about the year 28, being 16 years old at the time of her father's death in 44 (Ant. XIX. ix. 1). She was betrothed first to Marcus, son of Alexander the alabarch, but seems never to have been married to him (Ant. XIX. v. 1, but there is some doubt as to the reading); then about the year 41, being then 13 years old, she was married by her father to her uncle Herod, for whom he obtained from Claudius the kingdom of Chalcis. By him she had two sons, Bernicianus and Hyrcanus (BJ II. xi. 6). Herod of Chalcis died in 48. Bernice then lived at her brother's house, and the worst rumours were afloat concerning their relationship—rumours which reached as far as Rome (cf. Juv. Sat. vi. 156–160: '. . . adamas notissimus et Beronices in digito factus pretiosior; hunc dedit olim Barbarus incestæ, dedit hunc Agrippa sorori, observant ubi festa mero pede sabbata reges, et vetus indulget senibus clementia porcis. . . .'). In order to allay these suspicions she induced Polemon, king of Cilicia, who was attracted by her wealth, to be circumcised and to marry her. But she soon left him, δι' ἀκολασίαν Josephus tells us, and returned to her brother (Ant. XX. vii. 3). About the year 58 we find her with Agrippa visiting Festus to greet him on his appointment, and so, like her younger and equally notorious sister, Drusilla, listening to St. Paul. It may be noticed that great emphasis is laid on her presence. She was one who could always attract attention to herself (Ac $25^{13.\,23}$ 26^{30}). The next that we hear of her is in the spring of 66. She was in Jerusalem performing a Nazirite vow. Horrified by the massacre which Florus had ordered, she attempted to stop it, first sending her attendants to Florus, ultimately appearing herself (so it was said) barefooted before him. The only result seems to have been that the soldiers murdered their victims before her face and attempted to kill her. But, after her palace was burnt by the Jewish populace, she became an ardent supporter of the Roman cause and the Flavian dynasty (BJ II. xv. 1, xvii. 6). Already in 68 there seem to have been intimate relations between her and Titus (Tac. Hist. ii. 2); in 75 she came to Rome with her brother, and the intimacy was renewed. She lived in the Palatine with him, behaved as his wife (πάντα ἤδη ὡς καὶ γυνὴ αὐτοῦ οὖσα ἐποίει, Dio Cass. lxvi. 15), and was said to have been promised marriage (insignem reginæ Berniccs amorem cui etiam nuptias pollicitus ferebatur, Suet. Tit. 7). But the unpopularity of the connexion persuaded Titus that he must give her up, and when she returned to Rome after the death of Vespasian he took no notice of her ('Berenicen statim ab urbe dimisit invitus invitam,' Suet. loc. cit.; Dio Cass. lxvi. 18; and Au. Vict. Epit. 10); but even her fidelity to her royal lover was not free from suspicion, and a reputed paramour was murdered by the orders of Titus. After this period she vanishes from history. The only other memorial of her is an inscription found at Athens (CIG 361; C. I. Att. III. i. 556)—

Ἡ βουλὴ ἡ ἐξ Ἀρείου πάγου καὶ ἡ βουλὴ τῶν χ' καὶ ὁ δῆμος Ἰουλίαν Βερενείκην βασίλισσαν μεγάλην, Ἰουλίου Ἀγρίππα βασιλέως θυγατέρα καὶ μεγάλων βασιλέων εὐεργετῶν τῆς πόλεως ἔκγονον. . . .

A simple narrative of Bernice's life is really more eloquent than any comment. She was the last member of the family who played any prominent part in history.

(4) DRUSILLA (Δρουσίλλα) was the youngest of the three daughters of Agrippa I. She was born about the year 38, being 6 years old at the time of her father's death, in 44 (Ant. XIX. ix. 1); but she had already been betrothed by her father to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, king of Commagene. He, however, refused to fulfil his promise to be circumcised, and the marriage never took place. Her brother at the completion of the 12th year of Claudius (53) received from the emperor the northern part of Palestine, and then gave Drusilla, now about 14 years old, in marriage to Azizus, king of Emesa, who was willing to be circumcised. The marriage was neither happy nor of long continuance. Felix, procurator of Palestine, a freedman who had the distinction of being the husband of three queens (Suet. Claudius, 28), was so overcome by her beauty that he attempted to gain her for his wife. He sent, to effect this purpose, a man of the name of Simon, a Cyprian by birth, who had the reputation of being a 'magician.' She, unhappy in her marriage and wishing to escape her sister Bernice's jealousy, deserted her husband and transgressed the Jewish law so far as to consent to marry a Gentile. This marriage cannot have taken place earlier than 53 or later than 54, for in the first year of Nero (54–55) Azizus died, and we are particularly told that she left her husband. Drusilla had one son by Felix, called Agrippa, who perished in an eruption of Mt. Vesuvius in the reign of Titus, it is added σὺν τῇ γυναικί, which is interpreted by some to refer to his mother, by others to a wife of his own.

In Ac 24^{24} we are told how Felix with Drusilla his own wife (τῇ ἰδίᾳ γυναικί, RV), a Jewess, heard St. Paul speak of faith in Christ, and how, when he spake of righteousness, and self-restraint, and judgment to come, Felix trembled.

viii. CHARACTER OF THE HEROD DYNASTY.—In conclusion, it will be convenient to sum up some characteristics of the dynasty of the Herods.

(1) In the first place, we may take them as typical representatives of the Reges Socii under the empire. Of no other of the provinces have we the same detailed information as of the Jews in Josephus, and we are able to see the system of what we should call 'Protected states' at work. The kings and other rulers were absolutely dependent on the imperial power; they had no right of making war, their wills were only valid when confirmed by the emperor; they were expected to provide auxiliary troops when necessary. How clearly the Herods realized the limitations of their power is shown by the skilful manner in which they conciliated the Romans. Within their own territory they were supreme, but even here they were liable to accusations from their subjects. The value of the system in governing Orientals, whose character was so difficult for Romans to understand, may be realized by the contrast afforded to the government of the procurators. If Agrippa had lived there would perhaps have been no Jewish war.

(2) In relation to Judaism the first and most obvious characteristic of their rule is the Hellenizing influence that it represented. However distasteful to a large number of the people, however alien to their religious spirit, there is no doubt that the influence was considerable. It produced the inevitable reaction which was one of the causes of the final war, but it modified the ideas of those even who resented it. For Judaism to play its part in the world, it was necessary for it to have some contact with the spirit of Hellenism; and that the Herods gave it.

(3) The peculiar character and influence of Antipater and his descendants undoubtedly made Judaism a much more conspicuous factor in the Græco-Roman world than it would have been otherwise. We know how Cæsar recognized the Jews as one of the three divisions of people; we know how from him they obtained recognition of their privileges in a marked way, and this was to a considerable extent due to the Herods. Moreover, the social influence of the Herods seems to have been a considerable factor in extending Judaism among the other kings of the East.

(4) And how far were the Herodian monarchy and aspirations a natural product of Judaism? They were not absolutely inconsistent with its history, they were in keeping with its higher aspirations. From the days of Solomon temporal sovereignty had always been a dream of many of the people. It achieved its most prominent success in Herod, and the very success made the religious conscience of the people reject it. Ultimately, Christianity and Rabbinism became the two real products of Jewish history. 'The leaven of Herod' was felt to be unsound.

LITERATURE.—Our authorities may practically be reduced to two. Josephus has narrated to us the history of the whole Herod family with great fulness, and to supplement him we have only isolated references in other writings. A history from Rabbinical sources is given by Derenbourg, Essai sur l'histoire et la géographie de la Palestine. Modern authorities may practically be confined to Schürer, Geschichte des Jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christ (there is an English translation), who gives full references to all authorities ancient and modern. The best monographs are by Keim, in Schenkel's Bibel-lexicon. Accounts of the Herods are given by Stanley and Milman, and there is a popular work by Farrar. The articles in Smith's DB by Westcott are good.

A. C. HEADLAM.

HERODIANS (Ἡρωδιανοί, WH -ρῳδ-).—The Herodians are mentioned twice in the Gospels (Mk 3^{6} in Galilee; Mt 22^{16} = Mk 12^{13} in Jerus.), along with the Pharisees, as adversaries of Jesus. Some of the later Church Fathers (e.g. Tertullian) regarded them as a religious party, who held Herod to be the Messiah; but this is altogether improbable. They were apparently a political party, most probably the adherents of the dynasty of Herod. At the death of Herod (B.C. 4), his kingdom was divided among his sons, Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaritis being allotted to Archelaus. When Archelaus was deposed (A.D. 6 or 7), a Roman procurator was put in his place, and thenceforward Judæa continued under procurators, with the exception of a brief interval, during which Herod Agrippa I. united under his sway all the dominions of his grandfather. It was doubtless the constant desire of the family of Herod to restore the kingdom of their father; and the Herodians would seem to have been the party of those who favoured their pretensions. They were neither the adherents, in particular, of Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, nor exactly the friends of Rome; but those among the Jews who, in more or less veiled opposition to the Roman procuratorship, as well as to the idea of a pure theocracy, desired the restoration of the national kingdom under one or other of the sons of Herod. Their alliance with the Pharisees in opposition to our Lord was not due to religious or political sympathy, but to the recognition by both parties that Jesus was their greatest common foe. The question regarding the tribute paid to Cæsar (Mt 22^{17}, Mk 12^{14}) was skilfully calculated to draw from Him an answer that would either lead to His being accused of sedition against Rome (Lk 20^{20}), or discredit Him among the people. In order to get rid of Jesus, the Pharisees, who combined even with the Sadducees, would not scruple to enter into a temporary alliance with the Herodians, however much they were opposed to their religious and political sentiments. (See Keim, Jesus of Nazara, iii. 157 ff., and in Schenkel's Bibellex. iii. 65 ff.)

D. EATON.

HERODIAS.—See HEROD, pp. 353, 360^{b}.

HERODION (Ἡρωδίων, WH -ρῳδ-).—A Christian mentioned Ro 16^{11}, apparently a Jew (συγγενής), and perhaps a freedman of the Herods. See ARISTOBULUS, vol. i. p. 148^{a}.

HERON (אֲנָפָה 'ănâphâh, χαραδριός, charadrion).—This word designates an unclean bird (Lv 11^{19}, Dt 14^{18}), not otherwise mentioned in the Bible, but sufficiently well known to be taken as a type of a class. The LXX rendering simply means a swamp bird. The fact of the occurrence of this name immediately after חֲסִידָה stork, and followed by the expression 'after her kind,' gives the only clue we have to the bird intended. Of the birds suggested by various authorities, as the eagle, parrot, and swallow, none would go in a group with the stork. The heron, on the other hand, belongs to the same group, and, unlike the stork, of which only one species is found in the Holy Land, has no fewer than six species of the genus Ardea alone. The most common of these is A. cinerea, L., the Grey Heron (Arab. dŭnkeleh and ghŭrnûk). Less common is A. purpurea, L., the Purple Heron; A. alba, L., the White Egret; A. garzetta, L., the Lesser Egret; A. bubulcus, Audouin, the Buff-backed Heron or White Ibis (Arab. Abu-Bekr); A. ralloides, Scop., the Squacco Heron. There are also three other genera 'after their kind,' Ardetta minuta, L., the Little Bittern; Nycticorax griseus, L., the Night Heron; and Botaurus stellaris, L., the Bittern. In the absence of a better we may retain the rendering of EV 'heron.' RVm (Lv 11^{19}) gives 'ibis.'

HESHBON (חֶשְׁבּוֹן, LXX Ἐσεβών, Ἐσβών, Jos 21^{39} B) ('device' or 'reckoning'; note play on the word in Jer 48^{2} 'in H. they have devised . . .').—The chief city of Sihon king of the Amorites, captured by the Israelites on their way to the Jordan. The defeat of Sihon is related Nu 21^{21-26} (E), Dt 2^{24-37}, referred to briefly Dt 1^{4} 3^{6} 4^{46} 29^{7}, Jos 9^{10} $12^{2.5}$ $13^{21.27}$, Neh 9^{22}, more fully in Jephthah's message to the king of the Ammonites, Jg 11^{19-22}. In these passages Sihon is spoken of as 'king of' or 'dwelling in' Heshbon. In the distribution of the land H. is assigned to Reuben by Moses, Nu $32^{3.27}$ (E), and Joshua, Jos $13^{10.17.21}$. The inheritance of Gad extended from H. to Ramath-mizpeh, Jos 13^{26} (P); and in the list of Levitical cities (Jos 21^{39} (P), 1 Ch 6^{81}) H. is reckoned as belonging to Gad.

In the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah (Is 15^{4} $16^{8.9}$, Jer $48^{2.34.45}$ 49^{3}) H. and cities in its neighbourhood are mentioned as cities of Moab. For these passages, and the reference to H. in the song quoted Nu $21^{27f.}$, see MOAB and SIHON. The Jews are again in possession of H. in the time of Alexander Jannæus (Jos. Ant. XIII. xv. 4, where H. is described as in the country of Moab), and the surrounding district is called in Herod's time Essebonitis (Ant. XV. viii. 5) and Sebonitis (BJ II. xviii. 1). Whether in the account of places taken by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac $5^{26.36}$, Jos. Ant. XII. viii. 3) H. is mentioned, is doubtful [see notes on passage in 1 Mac (Camb. Bible for Schools) and the various readings in Niese's Josephus].

In the Onomasticon H. (Ἐσβοῦς) is described as 'urbs insignis' in the mountains, 20 miles (Roman) from the Jordan. The name occurs as the seat of a bishopric in the acts of the Council of Chalcedon. St. Sylvia of Aquitania describes Esebon as visible from Mt. Nebo, which is confirmed by modern travellers, and adds that it is now called Exebon—an interesting piece of evidence as to the pronunciation of the name in her time (Palestine Pilgrims Text Society, vol. i. 28). In the life of Saladin in the same series (vol. xiii. p. 97) occurs the modern name Hesbān, and Abulfeda mentions it as inhabited (Geography, Arabic text, edited by Schiers, p. 129, and translated by Lestrange, Pal. under the Moslems, p. 456). The site is now covered with extensive ruins, chiefly Roman, and by the side of the plateau on which these are situated runs a stream issuing from a cave, at which the tribes in the neighbourhood obtain water for themselves and their cattle. From the stream a steep winding mountain-path leads upwards to the city, and at the top of the ascent passes through a sort of passage cut through the rocks, about 3 or 4 yards wide. Buhl (Palästina, p. 123) remarks that in a branch of Wâdy Hesbān, N.W. of the city, are traces of ancient pools and conduits. It requires some imagination on the part of travellers to identify the one large ruined reservoir noted by them with 'the pools of Heshbon by the gate of Bath-rabbim' (Ca 7^{4}); but the position of the stream outside the present ruins, and the descriptions given above, fully illustrate the passage. Further information may be obtained from Reland's Palestina, containing reff. to Talmud, Ptolemy, Pliny, etc.; Conder, Heth and Moab, p. 125 ff.; PEFSt, 1882, 1888.

A. T. CHAPMAN.

HESHMON (חֶשְׁמוֹן).—An unknown town in the extreme south of Judah, Jos 15^{27}.

ḤETH (letter).—See Cheth.

HETH (חֵת, etym. and meaning unknown).—According to J (Gn 10^{15}=1 Ch 1^{13}), a son of Canaan. P (mistakenly, as Budde, Stade, Ed. Meyer, etc., think) locates Bĕnê-Heth at Mamre in the time of Abraham, who purchased from Ephron the Hittite the cave of Machpelah, Gn $23^{3ff.}$ 25^{10} 49^{32}. The wives of Esau are described in Gn 27^{46} as 'daughters of Heth,' a designation which is identified in the same verse with 'daughters of the land' and in $28^{1.8}$ with 'daughters of Canaan.' 'It appears that (ם)חִתִּי had their proper seat in the north (where also they were encountered by Assyrians from time of Tiglath-pileser I. and by Egyptians from time of Tahutmes III., cf. also Jg 3^3, Jos 11^3), but that individual Hittites were known in Israel (cf. besides 1 S 26^6, 2 S 11^3 etc., 1 K 9^{20}); that the Hittites were regarded (by J E D) as one of the peoples of Canaan, and that the name even came to be used in a more general sense for Canaanites. Only in P do they appear as having a definite settlement in the south' (Oxf. Heb. Lex.). Sayce's argument for the presence of Hittites in Hebron is disproved by Gray (see Expositor, May 1898, p. 340 f.). J. A. Selbie.

HETHLON (חֶתְלוֹן).—An otherwise unknown city, named in Ezk 47^{15} 48^1 as situated on the ideal northern boundary of Israel, in the neighbourhood of Hamath and Zedad (cf. Nu 34^8). Provided the text is not corrupt, Hethlon is probably (so Furrer, ZDPV viii. 27) the modern Ḥeitela N.E. of Tripoli. The LXX has in Ezk 47^{15} περισχιζούσης and in 48^1 περισχίζοντος. It may be mentioned that v. Kasteren proposes to identify Hethlon with the modern 'Adlûn N. of the mouth of the Ḳasimiyeh, which he takes to have been the ideal northern boundary of Israel. Bertholet (Hesekiel, ad loc.) and Buhl (GAP 66 f.) are inclined to favour v. Kasteren's identification. F. Hommel.

HEWER OF WOOD.—The Gibeonites, for their fraud practised upon Joshua, were condemned to become 'hewers of wood (חֹטְבֵי עֵצִים) and drawers of water' for the congregation (Jos $9^{21.27}$) and for the house of God (9^{23}) or altar of J″ (9^{27}). The phrase occurs also in Dt 29^{11}, where it is applied to strangers serving individual Israelites. Perhaps a more accurate translation, and one that better brings out the menial nature of the occupation, is 'gatherers of firewood' (see Driver on Dt 29^{11}); though the word for 'hewers' is used alone in 2 Ch 2^{10} of those that hew timber for building. See Drawer of Water.

HEXATEUCH.*—The name Hexateuch is now generally given by critics to the first 6 books of OT on the analogy of the Pentateuch, the name long given to the first 5. The object of the change of name is to show that the 6 rather than the 5 form a complete literary whole, and may be looked upon as one book in 6 parts. It is not intended by the title either to exclude the possibility that the Hexateuch, like the rest of OT, was subject to constant revision, or to imply that the sources out of which it was compiled are necessarily to be found only in these books. A century ago it was a matter of common belief that the Pentateuch was written by Moses; but this belief never rested on anything but tradition, and will not bear examination. It will be shown that, in fact, these books are the result of complicated literary processes extending over a long period. As the Mosaic authorship will be thus disproved at the very outset, it requires no separate discussion.

i. The Composite Character of the Hexateuch.—This is proved by (a) the many unnecessary repetitions. Thus the creation of beasts and birds is related in Gn 1^{21-25} and again in 2^{19}, of man in 1^{27} and in 2^7. The corruption of man and his threatened punishment are described in 6^{1-7}, and repeated almost immediately afterwards in 6^{11-13} [see Flood]. Abraham's departure from his native land is told in 11^{31} and in 12^{1-4a}. The latter cannot have originally referred to his departure from Haran, which was not his native land (see 12^1). The statement of the destruction of the 'cities of the Plain' and Lot's escape in 19^{29} is clearly unnecessary after the detailed account of the events just given. The charge given to Jacob to flee to his uncle Laban is twice related, in 27^{42-45} and in 28^{1-7}. So in Joseph's early history is the passing of the trading caravans, and his being taken down into Egypt, cf. 37^{25-27} 39^1 with $37^{28a.36}$. The giving of names to certain sacred spots is in many cases twice recorded, e.g. Beersheba 21^{22-34} 26^{26-33}, Bethel 28^{10-22} 35^{9-15}. We have even three accounts of the laughter which occasioned the naming of Isaac 17^{17} 18^{12} $21^{6.7}$. In the other books we find similar, though less frequent, repetitions. The name J″ is twice revealed to Moses Ex 3^{13-15} 6^{2-9}. The naming of Meribah and the events which gave rise to it are twice related Ex 17^{1-7}, Nu 20^{1-13}. Of the incidents of the manna and the quails, each occurs twice Ex 16, Nu 11. The frequent repetition of similar laws throughout the legislative portion of Hex. is obvious to the most casual reader. We have striking examples in the laws for the burnt-offering Lv 1. 22^{17-33}, the thank-offerings Lv 3. 7^{11-21}. In Joshua we find in 12^{1-6} 13^{8-12} two descriptions of the territory given to the trans-Jordanic tribes, quite distinct from the more detailed account of the portions assigned to the separate tribes in 13^{15-31}. The way in which Caleb obtained his portion is fully narrated in 14^{6-15}, and stated again as though a fresh fact in 15^{13}, and enlarged upon in 15^{14-19}. The lot for the children of Joseph is shortly described in 16^{1-3}, and then given again in rather greater detail, but with some repetitions, in vv.$^{4-9}$. It should be also borne in mind that the number of repetitions, of which in any case this is by no means a complete list, is largely increased if we regard as such what in their present form appear as similar incidents occurring on different occasions. Thus there can be little doubt that the three deceptions on the part of a patriarch's wife narrated in Gn 12^{10-20} 20^{1-18} 26^{1-11} are mere variants of the same story. The same is true of the expulsions of Hagar in Gn 16. 21^{9-21}.

(b) Frequent discrepancies and inconsistencies.—The Creation story beginning with Gn 2^{4b} differs from that of 1^1–2^{4a} in almost every particular, but most notably in the order of creation, the manner in which man is created, and in the creation of one single woman after that of a single man. The Flood according to $7^{12.17}$ $8^{6.10.12}$ lasted 54 days, according to 7^{24} 8^3 at least 150. [For other discrepancies see Flood]. Abraham's incredulity with reference to the possibility of Isaac's birth is mentioned in 17^{17} without comment, as though quite a natural thing. Precisely the same incredulity on Sarah's part is severely reprimanded in 18^{12-15}, and a different occasion and explanation of Sarah's laughter is given in $21^{6.7}$. The youth of Sarah implied in 12^{10-20} 20^{1-8} is inconsistent with Sarah's age as stated in 17^{17}; and it is strange that Abraham, so old that his begetting of Isaac is regarded as an unheard of miracle in 17^{17} 18^{11}, should after Sarah's death have married a second wife, and had several children 25^{1-6}. The caravan which bought Joseph consisted according to 37^{25-27} 39^{1} of Ishmaelites, according to $37^{28.\ 36}$ of Midianites. Often totally different explanations are given of the same name, as of Issachar, which in $30^{15.\ 16}$ is connected with the hire for the love-apples given by Leah to Rachel, in 30^{18} with the hire given by God to Leah for giving her handmaid to her husband. In 30^{20a} Zebulun is so named because God had given Leah a good dowry (זבד), in v.^{20b} to express the hope that Jacob would dwell (זבל) with her. Joseph is so called in 30^{23} because God had taken away (אסף) Rachel's reproach, in ver.^{24} in the hope that J″ would add (יסף) another son. In 32^{2} Mahanaim is so called because of the companies of angels which Jacob met there, in 32^{7-10} there is a significant mention of the two companies of people, flocks, etc., that were with Jacob. In the early history of Exodus we find a certain number of incidents which imply that the Israelites were living among the Egyptians, as the story of the midwives 1^{15-22}, and especially the events of the Passover night, when the houses of the Israelites had to be marked $12^{7.\ 13}$, and the Israelitish women were able to ask for jewels of their Egyptian neighbours $12^{35.\ 36}$. In many other passages the Israelites are described as living in Goshen, a country quite separate from the rest of Egypt, and distinguished by immunity from plagues (see esp. Gn 46^{34}, Ex 8^{22} 9^{26}). The law requiring that altars should be made of earth or unhewn stones, Ex 20^{24}, is inconsistent with the directions given so soon after for the altar of acacia wood overlaid with brass in 27^{1-8}; and the permission to erect such altars as the first in every place where J″ should record His name, implying a large number of sanctuaries, does not accord with the frequent directions in Dt that offerings should be made only in the place which J″ should choose, Dt 12^{4-11} etc. Many other inconsistencies of the same kind will be noticed in the course of this article. [See EXODUS, LEVITICUS].

(c) Want of continuity and order in the narrative.—A history of Noah should have begun, not at Gn 6^{9}, but certainly before 6^{8}, and most probably before 5^{29}. A history of Noah's sons Gn 10^{1} should have included 9^{18-27}. In Gn 20^{1} 'Abraham journeyed from thence,' should naturally have followed some statement mentioning the place where he was, instead of a chapter dealing with the history of Lot. Ch. 35^{9} implies that Jacob had just returned from Paddan-aram, and precludes the events of ch. 34. At any rate, it is out of place after the revelation in 35^{1}. In 37^{2b} 'Joseph being seventeen years,' etc., in the present text follows what is evidently the beginning of a history, or more probably a genealogy, of Jacob. Ex 7^{8-13} follows awkwardly after 7^{1-7}. It would be naturally at the first interview that Pharaoh would demand a wonder. Ch. 11^{4}, in which Moses speaks as a matter of course to Pharaoh, comes strangely after 10^{29}, in which he agrees never to see Pharaoh's face again. In the Sinaitic narrative as it now stands, it is almost impossible to get any intelligent idea of the order of events. In Ex 19 alone, Moses, the old man of 80, ascends and descends the mount no fewer than 4 times $19^{3.\ 7.\ 8b.\ 9b.\ 14.\ 20.\ 25}$. Ch. 20 follows very abruptly upon 19^{25}. Moses ascends again apparently in 20^{21}, and no fewer than 3 times in ch. 24, without any descent being mentioned between $24^{9.\ 13.\ 18}$. In ch. 33 there is obviously no connexion between vv.^{12} and ^{11}, and it is difficult to see the connexion between vv.$^{7-11}$ and the rest of the chapter, and throughout there is a want of any definite order in the various pleadings of Moses with God. Lv 26^{46} marks the conclusion of the Sinaitic legislation, and yet other cases follow in ch. 27, and a second similar conclusion is given at the close, 27^{34}. Nu 7^{1-9} seems to imply that preparations for the journey from Sinai were made directly after the completion and consecration of the tabernacle, and it is difficult to see what room is left for the legislation contained in the whole of Leviticus. The account of the spies in ch. 13 and the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram in ch. 16 involve numerous petty difficulties if read as continuous narratives (see below, iii. 2. C). The writing of Moses' song in Dt 31^{22} and of the law in 31^{24} are clearly out of place, the former referring to the following chapter, the latter to the laws given in previous chapters. The breaks in Joshua are not so obvious at first sight, but a careful reader will see that the book represents two different conceptions of the conquest of Canaan—one a rapid and complete conquest of almost the whole land under Joshua, and a subsequent allotment of the conquered portions; the other a gradual settlement carried out by the independent action of several tribes, an allotment having taken place before the conquest. The latter conception is more in agreement with Jg 1. But the accounts in Joshua which embody these two ideas have been so carefully interwoven that if that book stood alone it would be difficult to found an argument upon them.

(d) Differences of style and conception.—These, especially so far as they are connected with special phraseology, will be treated more fully at a later stage of the inquiry. It will be sufficient for the present, in addition to what has been already said of the Bk. of Joshua, to point out two very striking examples. (1) Notice the very remarkable difference in the whole tone and character of the two Creation stories, Gn 1–2^{4a} and 2^{4b} etc. The first describes creation as taking place in a systematic order, reaching its climax in man created male and female, everything being made out of nothing by a separate fiat of almighty God. In the second, all other things belonging to the earth (the heavenly bodies are not mentioned) are made, after the existence of the first man, in the order best suited for his wants, ending in the creation of woman. Men at least are moulded out of another material, the first man out of the dust of the ground, the first woman out of a rib taken from her husband. J″ walks and talks almost as a man with men. The first account is in form artificial and rhythmical, the second graphic and picturesque. (2) We may observe the same kind of difference in the conception of Moses. According to Ex 15^{22} 4^{10-17} he is indeed an able and practical leader, but a weak and timid speaker, who is allowed to engage Aaron as his spokesman. In Dt he appears as the most fluent and eloquent speaker of the Bible.

It can hardly be denied that these facts taken together form an irresistible argument for the belief that the Hex. was compiled from a variety of sources. It has been sometimes suggested that Moses compiled Genesis, but actually wrote the last four books of the Pentateuch. This does not meet the facts of the case, because, as already seen, the same phenomena which prove Genesis to be a compilation and not an original work appear abundantly in Exodus, and evidently enough in the other books of the Hexateuch. The compilation must therefore have taken place considerably after the time of Moses.

ii. METHOD OF COMPOSITION.—A. Three views at least are possible, which we may call (1) conglomeration or crystallization, (2) expansion, (3) stratification.

(1) The first would imply that a number of fragments, handed down either in writing or by oral tradition, were collected together so as to form a literary whole. If the fragments were collected at one single time the process might aptly be called conglomeration. Crystallization becomes the more appropriate term if we suppose that the fragments were gathered by degrees round some earlier nucleus. In fact it approaches more or less closely to (2).

(2) The second hypothesis is that a small original document, or a very definite oral tradition, was expanded by frequent revision at subsequent periods.

(3) Stratification is intended to imply that certain more or less independent documents, dealing largely with the same series of events, were composed at different periods, or, at any rate, under different auspices, and were afterwards combined, so that our present Hex. contains these several different literary strata.

There is probably some degree of truth in all these hypotheses, but there are strong reasons for believing that the last most nearly expresses the truth, and with some modifications it is the accepted theory of the great body of modern critics. The necessary modifications are: (a) that each stratum, before its incorporation into the united work, was subject to more or less revision, and in some cases considerable expansion from time to time; (b) that the combination of the several strata was itself a gradual process, some being already combined before others had been produced; (c) that the whole when combined was subject to editorial revision; (d) that certain fragments remain which probably did not originally belong to any of these larger strata, but have been connected with them either by the original writers or by later revisers.

B. The main grounds for accepting this third hypothesis (stratification) are: (1) that the various literary pieces, with very few exceptions, will be found on examination to arrange themselves by common characteristics into comparatively few groups; (2) that an original consecution of narrative may be frequently traced between what in their present form are isolated fragments. This will be better understood by the following illustration. Let us suppose a problem of this kind: Given a patchwork quilt, explain the character of the original pieces out of which the bits of stuff composing the quilt were cut. First, we notice that, however well the colours may blend, however nice and complete the whole may look, many of the adjoining pieces do not actually agree in material, texture, pattern, colour, or the like. Ergo, they have been made up out of very different pieces of stuff. So far, we have only proved what may turn out to be the first hypothesis of those given above, a conglomeration of fragments. But suppose that we further discover that many of the bits, though now separated, are like one another in material, texture, etc., we may conjecture that these may have been cut out of one piece. But we shall prove this beyond reasonable doubt if we find that several bits when unpicked fit together, so that the pattern of one is continued in the other; and, moreover, that if all of like character are sorted out they form, say, four groups, each of which was evidently once a single piece of stuff, though parts of each are found missing because, no doubt, they have not been required to make the whole. But we make the analogy with the Hexateuch even closer, if we further suppose that in certain parts of the quilt the bits belonging to, say, two of these groups are so combined as to form a subsidiary pattern within the larger pattern of the whole quilt, and had evidently been sewn together before being connected with other parts of the quilt; and we may make it even closer still, if we suppose that, besides the more important bits of stuff, smaller embellishments, borderings, and the like, had been added so as to improve the general effect of the whole.

C. It will now be shown that this view of the composition of the Hexateuch is borne out by an examination of the books. To do so we will first call attention to a few isolated facts, the bearing of which on the general question will afterwards appear. (1) It is obvious to the most casual reader that the Bk. of Dt, speaking generally, differs strikingly in style and character from the other books of the Hexateuch. It produces when read a different impression, just as St. John produces a different impression from the other Gospels. On examination we discover that this difference of impression is chiefly due to its highly spiritual tone and its constant appeal to the emotions. (2) In Ex 20^{22}–23. 24^{3-8} we find a definite body of laws, religious and civil, both marked by their singularly primitive character, described as written in a book, and marking the basis of a special covenant between God and man. (3) Throughout a large part of Exodus, the whole of Leviticus, and the greater part of Numbers, we meet with a large number of laws, mainly ritual, but partly civil, marked, however, throughout by a sameness of tone and spirit, the stress being always laid on ceremonial observances. Thus we find three distinct codes—the Covenant code (C), the Deuteronomic (D), the Levitical or Priestly (P). These will be found on comparison to differ, not only in general tone and spirit, but also in several definite details, both in their religious and civil portions. For instance, compare C's altar of earth or rough stone (Ex 20^{24-26}) with P's elaborate altar of acacia wood overlaid with brass (27^{1-8}), the offerer apparently himself the priest in C (Ex 20^{24}) with the Levites all priests in D (Dt 18^{1} etc.), and the elaboration of High Priest, Priests and Levites of P, as frequently throughout Leviticus, etc. Notice the differences in the feasts both in number and character: in C three, entirely agricultural, depending in time on the season, namely, Unleavened Bread, Harvest, Ingathering, Ex 23^{14-16} (15^{b} appears to be a later interpolation, cf. 34^{22}); in D also three: Passover and Unleavened Bread, Weeks, Booths, Dt 16, mainly agricultural, but the first in part historical as a memorial of the departure from Egypt in haste, the last two still dependent on the seasons, vv.$^{9.\,13}$, or the second only relatively fixed if the Passover is to be identified with the beginning of harvest; in P six holy seasons, besides the Sabbath, mentioned in the same category: Passover, Wave-sheaf, Weeks, Trumpets, Day of Atonement, Booths, Lv 23. Two of these only, Wave-sheaf and Weeks, are solely agricultural, the last partly agricultural and partly historical. The meaning of Trumpets is not explained; the Passover is historical, the Day of Atonement purely religious. The law of the manumission of slaves presents similar contrasts. In C (Ex 21^{2-6}) the Hebrew slave, bought as a matter of course, after six years' servitude is allowed to go free, but without the wife procured for him by his master and the children born in servitude. If from love of these or his master he elects to stay, his ear is bored, and he becomes his master's slave for ever. In D (Dt 15^{12-18}) the Hebrew slave who, in spite of his slavery, is, being a Hebrew, his master's brother, after six years' servitude (or possibly such of them as remained till the Sabbatical year, cf. 15^{1-11}) is to be manumitted with liberal presents in gratitude for his great service. Nothing is said of his wife and children, but it seems probable that they were to be manumitted too. If from love for his master and his master's family he elects to stay, he is treated as in C. In P (Lv 25^{39-55}) if a Hebrew, here called a brother, is sold into slavery through poverty (it is not conceived possible under any other circumstances), he is not to be treated as a slave at all, but as a hired servant. He is to be manumitted with his wife and children in the year of jubile, when he returns to his family and family possessions, which are then restored to him. But, even before this, any relative had the power to redeem him, or he might redeem himself. Slaves proper were to be only from the heathen around, or from the stranger that sojourned with them, and these were an absolute possession and heirloom.

That these three laws here contrasted belong to different dates is obvious. The similarity of form makes it equally clear that they are different versions, by revision, of the same law. The order of dates, both with respect to these and the religious laws before compared, is easily determined. The natural order is from the simpler to the more elaborate ritual, from the more barbarous to the kindlier treatment of fellow-countrymen. We should expect that in course of time feasts would be added, and for the sake of general convenience their dates more definitely fixed, and the priesthood become more ordered and defined. We know, too, that, as the danger of foreign invasion increased, the idea of a nation and of a religion both absolutely different from all others became more and more prominent, and hence a marked distinction between the treatment of the foreigner and the Israelite is a characteristic of late date (cf. Neh 13^{23-31}). We gather, then, that C, D, P is the historical order of these codes. It will be seen on examination how, in almost every particular, D marks a transition between C and P in the law of manumission. In C the treatment of slaves is harsh. They are regarded as little better than the absolute property of their masters. They have only the one chance of freedom, which, if they have married in slavery, can only be accepted at the cost of breaking the sacred ties of family. In D this harshness almost, if not entirely, disappears. It is suggested that the master might treat his slave so kindly that the latter would, apart from all other considerations, prefer his service to liberty, and if he did not the master was to reward him liberally. But if the slave elected to remain he had no second chance of liberty. In P the kindness hinted at in D becomes a legal requirement. The Hebrew slave had always through redemption a chance of liberty, and could not legally remain, even nominally, a slave after the year of jubile. The perpetual servitude of a Hebrew was in no case permissible.

D. How are these three codes related to the narrative portions of the Hexateuch? We may begin by examining Genesis. We find that the greater part of the book is divided into groups of longer or shorter pieces, generally paragraphs or chapters, distinguished respectively by the almost exclusive use of Elohim or J″ as the name of God. As the latter is the ordinary word throughout the other books of the Bible, it suggests at once that Elohim is purposely used in those sections where it occurs, because, according to Ex 3^{13-15} 6^{2-8}, the name J″ was first revealed to Moses in Midian, and it seemed improper to anticipate the name, even in the narrative portions of an earlier period. Further, it shows that this scruple was felt by one or more writers, but not by all. The theory advocated by some opponents of biblical criticism, that the names are used by the same writer with special reference to the subject in hand, Elohim representing the God of power, J″ the God of love, or other such distinctions, does not tally with the facts. Why in two narratives both dealing with Creation, and in two narratives both dealing with Abraham and Sarah's deceit, should Elohim be used in one of them and J″ in the other? But in other sections the name of God either seldom occurs, or Elohim is used by or to strangers, in which case J″ is on other grounds inappropriate; or again, in certain sections the two names seem to be used indifferently. Again, beyond Ex 6, the name of God is of less use as a criterion, because Elohim occurs seldom. We will provisionally designate the group of passages in which J″ is used as J, those in which Elohim is used as E. On further examination we discover that while J is, generally speaking, consistent in style and character, E, on the other hand, falls into two very distinct groups. One of them, which we will call provisionally E^1, is very much like J in general character and in the subjects with which it deals, and, moreover, has in many parts been combined presumably with J. The other, E^2, is entirely unlike either of these in style, but will be found on further examination to bear in point of language and character a close affinity to the P code. This is shown partly by the love for ceremonial law, as the Sabbath (Gn $2^{2.3}$), the provision against eating blood (Gn 9^4), the rite of circumcision (17, etc.); but even more remarkably by the use of the characteristic vocabulary and style of P. For example, in Gn 1–2^{3a} 'after his (her or their) kind' occurs very frequently as well as in 6^{20} 7^{14}. It also occurs in Lv 11^{14-29} (9 times), and far less frequently in the parallel passage of D (Dt 14^{11-18}); 'be fruitful and multiply' occurs in Gn $1^{22.28}$ 8^{17} 9^7 35^{11}, Lv 26^9. 'Everything that creepeth upon the earth (or ground),' Gn $1^{25.26.30}$ 6^{20} $7^{8.14.21}$ [contrast 7^{23} of J], Lv 11^{41-46}. We see, then, that the most characteristic phrases of Gn 1–2^{3a} occur not only in similarly characterized (i.e. E^2) passages of Genesis, but also in the code of P. We are thus justified in regarding P and E^2 as parts of a single source, and in future we shall understand P as including both. If we examine the narrative portions of Exodus and Numbers, we find the same phenomena, except that as here J″ is most frequently used as the name of God after Ex 3, it becomes more difficult to distinguish J and E. P can usually be separated with little difficulty because of its very marked character. Now, if we compare C with J and E, we find that it bears close affinities in point of language to both, so that we may call it JE, meaning thereby that in its final form it is probably a combination of both, and we shall further find it convenient to use this expression for the present for the J and E elements generally, without at this stage making any attempt to distinguish them. We shall find that by far the larger part of the narratives, as distinct from the laws, of Exodus and Numbers belong to JE, whereas, with special exceptions, the legal portions belong to P. In the last chapters of Dt and in the whole of Joshua we find elements of JE. In the latter book we also find elements which connect it with D (see below iii. 1. C). It should be observed that not only do we find here and there different separate pieces in the Hexateuch, shown by their characters to belong to these three sources, P, D, JE, but the pieces will often be found connected together by an obvious continuity of subject when pieced together, like the bits of patchwork in the illustration with which we started. For example, if we read continuously Gn 11^{27-32} $12^{4b.5}$ $13^{6a.11b.12a}$ $16^{1a.3.15-16}$ 17. 19^{29} $21^{1a.2b-5}$ 23. 25^{7-11a}, passages mainly, on other grounds, attributed to P, we get an almost continuous and complete, though very concise, account of Abraham's life. When we consider the number of revisions which the books of OT must have passed through, this is remarkable, and shows what a strong inclination the composers and editors must have had to preserve everything which they found.

iii. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE DIFFERENT SOURCES.—What has hitherto been said is little more than a statement of what has been proved by the critical investigation of some three-quarters of a century. A really satisfactory proof can only be obtained by one who has the patience to work out the problem step by step for himself. But to do this adequately a fuller account of these sources is necessary. For the convenience of the critical student these will now be taken in their order of difficulty, the first being that which can be most easily distinguished, and so with the rest.

1. D.—A. Characteristics of D.—As already observed, (a) the larger traits of D are very easily recognized. A serious student cannot fail to notice the hortatory character of Dt, its tone of gentle pleading, its spirituality as regards both God and man. God has no outward and visible form (Dt 4^{12}); God is near man, and His law is within man's heart (30^{11-14}); man's relation to God is by nothing more truly expressed than by love (6^{5} 10^{12}). The heart needs circumcision (10^{16} 30^{6}). Dt may be called the Gospel of the Hexateuch. Comparatively little importance is attached to religious ceremony. Though opposed to anthropomorphism, the writer expresses, in a very marked way, the personality of God in language which implies anthropopathic views; notice esp. 5^{9} 6^{15}. (b) The aims and contents of Dt are equally characteristic. It seeks emphatically to establish the worship of one God (6^{4}), and enjoins the absolute destruction of all visible representations of J″ as well as of heathen gods, the first by implication (4^{15}), the second by reiterated statement (7^{25} etc. $12^{2.\,3}$ etc.), the abolition of all places of worship except the one sanctuary chosen by God ($12^{5-7.\,11.\,14.\,18.\,21}$ $16^{2.\,6}$ etc.). Here, and here alone, they were to offer their sacrifices and keep their feasts. (c) Among the institutions contemplated, or perhaps we should rather say described, by Dt are a monarchy (17^{14-20}), a prophetic order (18^{15-22}), a priesthood of Levites; that is to say, every Levite is a priest without distinction; the phrase 'the priests the Levites' occurs frequently (17^{9} 18^{1} etc.). (d) The style of Dt is smooth and flowing, tending to redundancy, generally pleasing to the ear, but at times perhaps a little tedious. Notice especially the accumulation of synonyms, or of words of the same class. Such phrases as 'with all thy heart, with all thy soul,' etc.; 'the ordinances, the statutes, and the judgments'; 'the stranger, the widow, and the fatherless,' are frequent. There is, too, a constant repetition of favourite phrases (see below, B (2)).

B. Language of D.—We shall find it convenient to distinguish (1) favourite words, especially where one synonym is used in preference to another; (2) characteristic phrases and expressions. Under (1) notice especially Horeb (for Sinai), אָמָה 'a maidservant' (שִׁפְחָה only in 28^{68}); חֵטְא, the unusual word for 'sin' (the common form חַטָּאת occurs thrice only); אֲדָמָה 'earth' or 'ground,' very frequently in former sense (for common אֶרֶץ); לֵבָב 'heart,' very frequent (לֵב only 4 times); לִמֵּד 'to teach,' very frequent, marking the didactic character of the book; קְלָלָה 'a curse,' frequent (אָלָה occurs 6 times, 5 of them in Dt 29); קֶרֶב with בְּ or מִן 'in' or 'from the midst of' (for תּוֹךְ); שָׁמַר 'to keep, observe,' very frequent, esp. of keeping God's laws, etc.; also in Niphal in such phrases as 'take heed to thyself.' Under (2) the phrases 'J″ thy (your, etc.) God,' 'hear, O Israel,' 'prolong thy (your) days,' 'cleave to J″ thy God,' 'serve other gods, which neither you nor your fathers have known,' 'that it may be well with thee,' 'that thou mayest possess the land,' 'at that time,' are sufficiently familiar. Under both (1) and (2) we have given only a few of the most striking examples out of many. To show the full force of the argument we should have to point out the relative frequency of a very much larger number of words and phrases. But those given are so thoroughly characteristic that they will be at once recognized as specially belonging to Deut. by any one at all familiar with that book. Turn for example to Dt 6^{1-3}. In these 3 verses, taken almost at random, at least 8 examples occur of the words and phrases mentioned above; indeed there is hardly a single phrase in them, excepting 'a land flowing with milk and honey,' which does not illustrate the peculiar style of the book. It should be realized, too, that such differences of style as we can feel and appreciate go far beyond what can be expressed categorically, just as we may recognize a friend's face, or even his step or his handwriting, from a thousand, although we could but very imperfectly describe the manifold peculiarities which make up its individuality of character. These remarks are also true, more or less, of the characteristics of the other sources of the Hexateuch.

C. Extent of D.—Hitherto we have spoken of D as though it coincided exactly with Dt; but, as a fact, we find on examination (a) that the peculiar characteristics which mark D are not found in some few sections of Dt at all. (b) In other parts of Dt they are found less constantly, and these have also some peculiarities of their own. (c) The characteristics of D, or some of them, are found also in some other parts of the Hexateuch. In other words, D may be used in a narrower and a wider sense. In the narrower sense it includes only Dt 5–34 (or perhaps 12–34), except at least 31^{14-23} 32^{48-52} 34^{7-9} (see below, iii. 2 C). The portions of Hex. outside of Dt belonging to D in the wider sense are not so easily determined, though the fact that some do so belong may be regarded as certain. The reason is that in other parts of the Hex. we find very few passages which appear to have been originally written by D, but several which seem to have been revised by one or more writers in the spirit and style of D, because we find in them traces also of the characters which distinguish the earlier documents. Such revisions give rise to some of the greatest difficulties of biblical criticism, and it requires very nice handling to disentangle the various literary elements, but their extent is not large enough to throw the least serious doubt on the larger results of criticism, nor can there be any serious doubt of the fact of such revisions having taken place. As far as D is concerned, the revision seems to have varied very much in different cases. Sometimes a mere characteristic touch is added. Sometimes D must have rewritten passages altogether. Sometimes again D appears to have expanded the narratives, etc., by considerable insertions. This being the case, we can hardly be surprised at a considerable difference of opinion among critics. Thus Dillmann finds in Genesis a large number of passages belonging to D, whereas several critics find none at all. The most characteristic D passage of Genesis is 18^{19}. The suggestion that Abraham would or should command his children reminds us of Dt 4^{10} 6^{7} 11^{19} etc. 'Keeping' (of God's commandments) and 'doing judgment,' etc., are characteristically Deuteronomic; for the latter cf. Dt 6^{1}. Notice also the use of the synonyms 'justice' and 'judgment.' Ex 13^{3-16} is believed by many critics to have been revised by D. The solemn injunction to remember a great event in v.^{3}, the emphatic use of 'this day' in vv.$^{3.\,4}$, the direction to instruct the children in v.^{14}, the striking metaphors of vv.^{9} and ^{16}, are all familiar characters of D (see Dt 16^{3} 6^{20} 6^{8} 11^{18}), though it is, of course, possible, on the other hand, that Dt $6^{8.\,20-25}$ are in reality expansions of this very passage. There are also characteristic D touches in Ex 15^{25b-26}, 'a statute and an ordinance,' 'diligently hearken,' 'J″ thy God,' 'commandments and statutes.' When several touches of this sort occur together, it is extremely improbable that they are the result of a mere coincidence. Perhaps the most instructive example of a D revision is in the Decalogue in Ex 20. The expansion of the Decalogue, as distinct from the short commandments, which probably were the original 'ten words,' is full of D phrases: for example, 'J″ thy God' (vv.$^{2.\ 7.\ 10.\ 12}$), 'jealous God' (v.^{5}), 'love me and keep my commandments' (v.^{6}), and especially 'that thy days may be long' (v.^{12}). There appear to be traces of a similar revision in Ex 34^{10b-15}; and Nu 21^{33-35} is by several critics regarded as interpolated from Dt 3^{1-3}. When we come to Joshua we find that passages so characterized, instead of being as it were sporadic, become frequent; but except in 23, which is throughout Deuteronomic in style, they are mostly confined to the first 13 chapters. This seems to show that previous accounts of the conquest of Canaan were rewritten by D, who also added supplementary passages, such as 18^{7} 21^{43}–22^{8} 23 and parts of 24, while in the earlier books, as in some of the Exodus passages already cited, the D elements are so fused as to make an exact analysis very difficult and uncertain.

D. Date and Origin of D.—D, or part of D, has long been recognized as the book found in the temple in Josiah's reign, the account of which is given in 2 K 22, chiefly on the following grounds. (1) The whole of the Pentateuch, or even of the legal portions of it, could not have been read twice in one day, as was apparently the case with this book (2 K 22^{11} 23^{2}). (2) Josiah's reforms, confessedly based upon this discovered book, were, in fact, carried out in the spirit of Dt (a) by the destruction of the high places, not only idolatrous, but those in which J″ had been worshipped (2 K $23^{8.\ 9}$), so that the one single sanctuary, so emphatically ordered in Dt, then first became an established fact (it is clear that the attempt of Hezekiah, 2 K 18^{4}, to put down the high places was only partial or tentative); and (b) in connexion with this by the keeping of the passover at Jerusalem, cf. 2 K 23^{21-23} with Dt $16^{5.\ 6}$; (c) by the abolition of the Asherim and of all idolatrous images and symbols of worship. (3) The stress laid upon the prophetic order is specially suitable to this period, when the prophets exercised so great and wide an influence. That Jeremiah should have been permitted to utter such prophecies as those contained in chs. 7 and 22 with reference to the temple worship and the royal house without molestation, shows the awe which the prophet's office inspired. (4) The peculiar ideas and thoughts, and to a certain extent the phraseology, of D penetrate Jeremiah's prophecies, and in a less degree those of Ezekiel, as we should expect from a newly-written, epoch-making book. Take, for example, such remarkable thoughts as the spiritual circumcision, cf. Dt 10^{16} 30^{6} with Jer 6^{10} $9^{25.\ 26}$, Ezk 44^{7}, and the law written in the heart, cf. Dt 30^{11-14} with Jer 31^{31-34} and Ezk 36^{27}. But in both cases, the latter especially, the peculiarities in the style, etc., of these prophetic writers forbid our ascribing Dt to either prophet. And yet some of the ideas of Dt are to be found in a less complete form in Isaiah, and in this connexion we may bear in mind the first attempts by Hezekiah to put down the worship of the high places. From these facts we may conclude that Dt, or the essential part of it, was written either in the reign of Manasseh, or very early in that of Josiah. (1) If the former, it may have been the work of some priest or priests, who employed the time spent in forced seclusion in committing to writing their view of the law, derived partly from earlier documents, partly from the traditional teaching of the priests, and coloured largely, no doubt, by the religious ideas and feelings of their own time. In this way round an earlier nucleus a new body of laws might have gathered, which would naturally have developed all the more rapidly, as the priests, unable during the long reign of Manasseh to perform their ordinary functions, had more leisure for spiritual meditation, just as afterwards the Mishna resulted from the expulsion of the Jews under Hadrian. If so, this law-book was probably hidden by some priest for safety in the temple, in the hope that it might survive those troublous times as the written record of God's law, and the discovery of it may have been perfectly genuine. Even supposing that its existence and whereabouts were secrets known to the priests, this would not present a very serious moral difficulty. Just as the writer or writers of Dt in describing the customs and laws of their own times genuinely believed that they were giving the laws dictated by Moses by express revelation, their successors would have held the same belief, even though they may have known that they had been secretly written down, just as late Jews firmly believed that besides the Pentateuch a very large number of laws had been handed down from Moses by oral tradition. To understand the views of such an age we must first realize the entire absence of anything approaching to literary criticism. (2) Although not a necessary result of accepting the later date, the majority of critics believe this book of the law to have been the result of a pious fraud promulgated by Hilkiah and Shaphan with the intention of deceiving Josiah into the belief that the reforms which they desired were the express command of God revealed to Moses. We must reserve for a later stage some remarks about the various extensions and modifications of D. It will be enough at present to say that according to either view the book discovered can hardly be the whole of Dt, but rather the law which it contains, i.e. in the main, 12–29^{1} or 12–31^{13}, with possibly the addition of 5–11.

2. P. The Priestly Book.—A. The most striking general characteristics of P are: (1) first and foremost, the love of ceremonial law, most obvious, of course, in the legal sections, as in Leviticus and the Priestly laws of Exodus and Numbers, but very noticeable also in the narrative sections, as shown, for example, in the institution and reference to the Sabbath in Gn $2^{2.\ 3}$, Ex 16^{21-30}; the prohibition against eating blood, Gn 9^{4}; the rite of circumcision, Gn 17. 21^{3-5}; the Passover, Ex 12^{1-20}, Jos 5^{10-12}. (2) Fondness for statistical details, esp. those connected with persons and dates. The exact lengths of the lives of the patriarchs are always given, Gn 5. 9^{29} 11^{10-32} etc. By the age of a patriarch are marked the exact dates of important events, such as the beginning and end of the Flood, Gn 7^{11} 8^{13}, in which last the very day of the month is given; the institution of circumcision, 17^{24}; the age of the father at the birth of the firstborn (or covenant?) son, Gn 5. 11^{10-26}. The exact details and dimensions of the ark are given, 6^{14-17}, as well as of every part of the tabernacle and its contents, Ex 25–31^{17} 35–40. Notice also the frequent insertion of genealogies, for the most part little more than lists of names, Gn 5. 11^{10-26} 25^{12-18} 36. (3) A tendency to symmetry and similarity of phraseology in describing similar events. Notice, for example, in Gn 1 the regular repetition of such phrases as 'and God said' and 'God saw that it was good,' 'and the evening and the morning were the first (second, etc.) day.' The genealogies of Gn 5 and 11 are like recurring patterns, the verses scarcely varying except in the name and the number of years. In the five wonders of P in Ex 7–9 (see below iii. 2. C) there is a similar framework of phraseology into which the varying details are inserted. 'J″ spake unto Aaron (or unto Moses and Aaron)'—direction how to perform the wonders, beginning in the first four with 'take thy rod,' or an equivalent phrase—statement that the plague was done accordingly—that the magicians could (or could not in the last two) do so with their enchantments—and that Pharaoh's heart was hardened (with some variation of phrase), ‘and he hearkened not unto them as J″ had spoken.’ (4) We see also the same tendency to symmetry in the insertion of the same or similar headings in introducing subjects of a like kind, as ‘these are the generations of,’ Gn 2^4 (transposed probably from before Gn 1^1) 5^1 6^9 10^1 $11^{10. 27}$ $25^{12. 19}$ 36^1 37^{2a}, ‘and Moses gave unto the tribe of,’ Jos $13^{15. 24. 29}$; and of similar conclusions at the end of a subject or part of a subject, as, for example, in Gn $10^{5. 20. 32}$, Ex $25^{9. 40}$ 26^{30}, Jos $13^{23. 28}$. (5) In form P is in its narrative portions little more than a collection of dry annals. Stories are seldom inserted, and when they are it is for the sake of some ceremonial provision, as the Creation story of Gn 1 for the Sabbath, the Flood story as an introduction to the prohibition against eating blood. Both lack the picturesqueness of the corresponding J stories, and all that P has to say of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah is the bare statement of 19^{29}. There is nothing thought worth preserving of P’s history of Joseph except the short statistics of Gn 37^{1-2a} 41^{46a} $46^{6. 7}$, and possibly $47^{8a. 7-11\,27b. 28}$. (6) P’s style is stiff and formal, and seldom marked by delicate poetic feeling or grace of treatment, though occasionally stately and dignified, as in the Creation narrative, where the symmetry is certainly melodious, and adds grandeur to the conception. The repetitions help us to realize the almighty power of God. So, too, in the description of the five wonders in Egypt, Ex 7–9, the repetitions serve to intensify the stubborn obstinacy of Pharaoh in resisting the divine power. Again, Gn 23, though introduced by P with the obvious purpose of accounting for the burying-place of the patriarchs, is distinctly interesting because of its archæological quaintness, and is probably based upon some ancient document. The same is true of Gn 14, if, as some critics maintain, in its present form it belongs to P.

B. Vocabulary and Language of P.—In Genesis and Ex 1–5, prior that is to the revelation of the name J″, P always uses as the name of God ‘Elohim’ or אֵל שַׁדַּי ‘God Almighty,’ the latter esp. of His revelation of Himself to the patriarchs, cf. Ex 6^2 with Gn 17^1 35^{11} 48^3; P uses בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל ‘the sons of Israel,’ not ‘Israel,’ so also ‘the children of Heth’ (‘Hittite’ only in sing.); אֲנִי (130 times) for the more archaic אָנֹכִי (once only in P); נֶאֱסַף in the phrase ‘gathered to his people,’ of burial; ‘according to their generations’; זָכָר וּנְקֵבָה ‘male and female,’ Gn 1^{27} 6^{19} (in 7^2 J has אִישׁ וְאִשְׁתּוֹ ‘man and his wife’), Lv $3^{1. 8}$ etc.; ‘thou (you, etc.) and thy seed after thee,’ Gn 9^9, Ex 28^{43}; בְּיַד ‘by the hand of,’ with words of command; ‘that soul shall be cut off from his people,’ and similar phrases, Gn 17^{14} (contrast ‘shall surely be put to death’ in the Book of the Covenant, Ex 21 (E)); לוּן ‘to murmur’ (only in P); מִין ‘kind,’ Gn 1 (throughout), Lv $11^{14. 15}$; הַמִּשְׁכָּן ‘the dwelling,’ of the tabernacle (about 100 times); עֵדָה ‘testimony,’ as in the phrase ‘the ark of the testimony’ (only thrice in JE, and that in disputed passages); בְּעֶצֶם הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה ‘in the bone of this day,’ i.e. ‘in this very day,’ 14 times; ‘be fruitful and multiply,’ very frequent; ‘Paddan-aram,’ never ‘Naharaim’ (the abode of Laban is called ‘Haran’ in JE, cf. Gn 28^{10} 29^4 with 28^2 33^{18} 35^9, ‘the children of the East’ in 29^1); ‘Sinai’ (never ‘Horeb’). There is also an avoidance of several otherwise common words and phrases, such as נָא with imperatives, גֵּרַשׁ ‘drive out,’ עָשָׂה חֶסֶד ‘do mercy,’ וַיֹּסֶף ‘and he added’ to do something, i.e. did it again, לְפִי חָרֶב ‘by the mouth, i.e. the edge, of the sword,’ though these last two are so common as in a literal Greek translation to have found their way into the language of NT (Lk $20^{11. 12}$ 21^{24}, He 11^{24}), ‘a land flowing with milk and honey’ (except in Lv 20^{24}). In this list, which is only a small selection out of many, all sacrificial terms and words of a like nature, which might be accounted for simply by the peculiar subject-matter of P, have been studiously avoided. In P the argument from language is quite as strong as that derived from the general character of that document. In most passages either taken alone would form conclusive evidence.

C. Extent of P.—In Genesis P can be at once distinguished from J by the use of Elohim, from E by its general characteristics, style, and vocabulary. All the Elohistic passages of 1–11 belong to P, and create little or no difficulty. In the rest of Genesis we find belonging to P: (1) Short historical notices dealing with (a) leading events, such as the rescue of Lot from the cities of the Plain, 19^{21}; Jacob’s return from Paddan-aram, 31^{18} 33^{18}; his descent into Egypt with a characteristic statement of date, 46^8; the settlement of Esau in Seir, 36^{8-8}; (b) statistics of births, deaths, and marriages, $16^{3. 15}$ 21^3 25^{28b} etc.; (c) chronological details, 12^{4b} 41^{46}. (2) Genealogies, 25^{12-18} 35^{23-29} (ch. 36 as a whole is probably a still later insertion). (3) The blessings of Abram, Sarai, and Ishmael, connected with the rite of circumcision, and in the case of the first two the change of name, ch. 17; of Jacob by his father in connexion with his dismissal and projected marriage with one of his own family in contrast to the heathen marriage of Esau, 27^{46}–28^9; and again directly by God, with change of name, 35^{9-15}. (4) The purchase of Machpelah, explaining the origin of the burial-place of the patriarchs, ch. 23, who, according to P, were all buried there, as well as their wives, 23^{19} 25^9 49^{31} 50^{13}.

In the Sinaitic portion of Exodus the P sections are obvious. We may, without hesitation, ascribe to P 24^{15b-18} (or ^{18a}) 25^1–31^{17} (or possibly ^{18}) 35–40. In the earlier parts of Ex, P is more fragmentary, but it will be readily recognized that the following passages contain several of its characteristics and are evidently connected together. In 1^{1-7} we have a genealogical notice, with the statement in v.^{7} that the Israelites were ‘fruitful and multiplied.’ 2^{23b-25} is a passage with Elohim as the name of God, and refers back to the patriarchal covenant of Gn 17, etc., and therefore must also be assigned to P. We find the connexion between these two sections in 1^{14} a concise doublet of vv.$^{8-13}$, which latter has not the characters of P, and belongs therefore to another source (JE). In 6^{2-9} we have P’s version of the revelation of the sacred name J″ (contrast 3) marked as P’s by אֵל שַׁדַּי (see above, iii. 2. B). 7^{1-7} is clearly P’s introduction to its five wonders (vv.^{8} and ^{7} are very characteristic of P). P’s five wonders follow in 7^{8-13} rod into serpent, $7^{19-20a. 21b-22}$ water into blood, $8^{5-7. 15b.}$ [Heb. $8^{1-3. 11b}$] frogs, 8^{18-19} [Heb. 8^{12-15}] lice, 9^{8-12} boils, and $11^{9. 10}$ (by some ascribed to R) appears to mark the conclusion. In $12^{1-20. 28}$ we have the ordinances of the passover, marked as P’s both by its language and ceremonial character. Ch. 16, in its present form, appears largely to belong to P (special points of interest for P being the stringency of the Sabbath requirements, vv.$^{26-30}$, and the preservation of the pot of manna), though parts of the chapter are regarded by many critics as later. The rest of P in this part of Exodus consists merely of short statements giving an itinerary of the journey from Egypt to Sinai.

The whole of Leviticus evidently belongs to P in the wider sense of the word, and almost the whole of Numbers. The exceptions are: (a) Nu 10^{29}–12; (b) 13. 14; (c) 16; (d) 20–21; (e) 22^2–25^5; (f) 32. Of these (a) and (e) belong entirely to JE (see BALAAM). In (d) and (f), if we except perhaps 20^{1-13}, only unimportant fragments of P have been introduced. In (b) (the account of the spies) and (c) (the rebellion of Korah, Dathan and Abiram), P’s narrative has been combined with JE, but in both it can generally be separated without much difficulty. In 13^{1-17} we have the list of the spies, their fathers and their tribes, symmetrically arranged with a characteristic heading and conclusion, 'these are the (their) names,' etc., vv.^{4} and ^{16}, a descriptive summary of the geographical range of their search (omitting the picturesque details of JE, such as the huge bunch of grapes, and the terrific giants), and the date of their return, vv.$^{25.\ 26a}$. In their report no mixture of character is displayed, but there is a sharp contrast between the bad report of the ten spies, v.^{32a}, and the good report of Joshua and Caleb, $14^{6.\ 7}$, of whom the latter only appears in JE. The effects on the congregation, as told in the P narrative, are probably to be found in $14^{1.\ 2}$ (in part) ^{5} and ^{10}. This last verse has P's characteristic 'tent of meeting.' P's narrative seems to be continued in v.^{26}, but in this section the analysis is far more difficult and uncertain. In ch. 16 we can separate with little trouble P's rebellion of the Levitical Korah from JE's popular rebellion of Dathan and Abiram, the one against the high priesthood of Aaron, the other against the secular authority of Moses. Quite apart from the critical characters which mark the various sections of the chapter, it is evident that we have not here a single consistent account of a double rebellion, against Church and State, so to speak. For example, in v.^{22} there is an allusion to the sin of 'one man,' evidently Korah, the 250 of v.^{35} being merely his satellites; but almost immediately after, in v.^{24}, Dathan and Abiram are connected with Korah, as though acting in concert. In v.^{25} the first two appear alone, and in v.^{26} the warning to depart out of their tents, which as given by God in v.^{24} refers to all three, is given by Moses only with reference to Dathan and Abiram. The test by which the claim of these two is to be tried, vv.$^{29.\ 30}$, is different from that threatened to Korah and his men in v.^{7}. The latter, which is to take place while they are engaged in offering incense, is evidently connected with the punishment of v.^{35}. There can be little doubt that in P's original account Korah was consumed by fire with the 250. It is probable that when the accounts were welded together his name was added in v.^{32}, and those of Dathan and Abiram in vv.^{24} and ^{27a}. Except for some such modifications we can recognize P's narrative in vv.$^{1-11.\ 16-24.\ 27a.\ 35-50}$. The portions of Dt commonly assigned to P are 4^{41-43}, the appointment of the cities of refuge, a necessity which arose in course of time out of the abolition of the high places where sanctuary was originally permitted, 32^{48-52} $34^{1a.\ 7-9}$. P's account of the last days of Moses contains, among other characteristics of P, Moses' exact age, 34^{7}, and the statement that 'the children . . . did as J″ commanded Moses,' 34^{9}.

In Joshua the P portions are somewhat curiously distributed. P must certainly have contained some account of the conquest of the country, but it is probable that this was told in a dry and summary manner, and that the compilers preferred the more detailed and interesting account of the older sources. Certain it is that in chs. 1–12, containing the account of the conquest of the country, the only fragments which can be definitely recognized as derived from P are the accounts of the passover and other events in Gilgal told in 4^{19} 5^{10-12}, and of the covenant made with the Gibeonites by the princes of the congregation, $9^{15b.\ 17-21.\ 27a}$. There are also suspicions of P in such details as those given in 3^{4a} 4^{13} 7^{18b}, but we certainly cannot prove from them what the range of P's narrative really was. Beyond ch. 12 there is some difficulty, as there is evidence of mixture with other sources, but the following passages in their present form with little doubt belong to P, 13^{15-33} 14^{1-5} $15^{1-12.\ 20-62}$ 16^{4-9} $17^{1a.\ 3-6}$ (notice, among other things, the characteristic headings). With ch. 18 we get on clearer ground. With the exception of 18^{2-10} and $19^{40b-47.\ 49-50}$, $18\text{–}21^{42}$ and 22^{9-34} belong almost entirely to P. It should be observed, however, that in this general analysis of P we have not, as a rule, attempted to distinguish between the work of P proper and later revisers.

D. Date and Origin of P.—(1) The date cannot be earlier than Solomon's Temple. The condition of religious worship evidenced by the Books of Judges and Samuel, for example the social character of the sacrificial feasts, Jg 21^{19}, 1 S 9^{12-24} 20^{18-24} etc.; the performance of sacrificial rites by other than Levites, as by Samuel, 1 S 7^{9} 10^{8} etc. (though an Ephraimite, 1 S 1^{1}), David, 2 S 6^{17}, and David's sons, 2 S 8^{18}; the illegality of the priestly portions, 1 S 2^{12-17}, which though enjoined by the Levitical law are here regarded as so sinful as to warrant the downfall of the house of Eli ($2^{22b.}$ is a very late gloss, not found even in the best MSS of the LXX),—all show that the laws of P were either unknown, or absolutely ignored during this early period. (2) Even after Solomon's reign, even if we could suppose that 1 and 2 K always give us an accurate account of the matter, and were not themselves influenced by P or kindred elements, the Levitical law would appear to have been only very partially observed. There are few references to it beyond the elaborate descriptions of the temple in 1 K 5–7. It is still disregarded by such great lights as Elijah and Elisha, who as prophets themselves sacrificed just as Samuel had done, and that without any regard for the one sanctuary which P throughout supposes, for example Lv $17^{3.\ 4}$. (3) This argument from silence is strengthened by the remarkable fact that in Chronicles we have in many respects a Levitical version of the same facts as those differently related in Samuel and Kings; as, for example, of the bringing up of the ark from Kiriath-jearim (contrast 2 S 6 with 1 Ch $15\text{–}16^{6}$), and the conspiracy against Athaliah (contrast 2 K 11 with 2 Ch 22^{10}–23), making it almost certain that the Books of Samuel and Kings were in the main written before, those of Chronicles after, the institutions of P were formulated. (4) A further terminus a quo is furnished by a comparison between the codes of D and P. We have already shown at some length reasons for believing that the code of P was subsequent to that of D (see above, ii. C), showing in every respect signs of greater elaboration and development. (5) The style of P shows, by its stiffness, artificiality, and conciseness of treatment, that it is dealing with a dead past—a mere summary composed out of old written records, not the perpetuation in literary form of a still living tradition. All these facts point in the same direction, that P was far later than JE, and probably considerably later than D. Indeed, a considerable distance of time is required to account for the difference of vocabulary. (6) There is no historical event likely to account for P previous to the Exile. Such a document as compared with D marks a reformation, one might almost say a revolution, in religious worship. But it may easily be accounted for by the Exile itself. Outside of P there was no complete system of ritual laws. In all probability, they were largely traditional and of gradual growth. Some of them were codified in Dt, but a great many points are not mentioned, for precisely the same reason that many points of ritual are left untouched in the rubrics of the English Prayer-Book, because they are matters of common knowledge settled by prevailing custom. If a stranger could be supposed to have to conduct a service in an English Church, he would not know what he was expected to say, or whether he was expected to say anything, before and after the sermon, in what part of the Church he was to read the lessons, the Litany, or preach the sermon, and many other things of the kind. How many more serious questions must naturally have arisen concerning the ritual of sacrifice, involving, as it did, so much manual work! These things were originally decided, it is probable, by local custom. When religious worship had become centralized at Jerusalem they would probably be settled authoritatively by the body of priests, who are likely to have followed in the main the traditions of the old sanctuary of Jerusalem. (7) But when the line of tradition was broken by the Exile the need would have arisen for more elaborate directions, and we do actually find the prophet Ezekiel framing a sort of manual of ritual, though in some respects ideal and visionary (chs. 40–48). (8) But the troubles and disturbances which followed upon the Restoration must have made it difficult to establish any complete system of worship, and we do not hear of any complete religious organization till the time of Ezra. It would probably then be near the truth to say that P is the result of the religious movement which began with Ezekiel in Babylon, and found its completion with Ezra. Just as the book of the Law found in the house of J″ in Josiah's reign was D, or the nucleus of D, so it is likely that the law-book read by Ezra, Neh 8, was P, or the essential part of P. It is important to observe that the legal ordinances referred to in Neh are to be found in P rather than in D; for example, the custom of dwelling in booths, 8^{13-18}.

3. JE. The Jahwistic and Elohistic Sources.—A. When we have taken away from the Hexateuch all the passages which can with a fair degree of probability be assigned to D or P, we find that the remainder forms a fairly complete and homogeneous whole, giving us, by a succession of narratives more or less connected, an outline of Jewish history from the Creation to the Settlement in Palestine, in fact covering, speaking generally, the same ground as P. This remainder we might have regarded as one literary source, were it not that a difference of authorship is discovered by the use of Elohim and J″ in Gn–Ex 3 (see above, ii. D), which enables us to distinguish at once a certain number of sections as belonging to J and E respectively. Thus to J belong 2^{4b}–4^{26} 5^{29} 6^{1-4} 7–8 (ptly.) 9^{20-27} $10^{8-19.\ 21}$ 11^{1-9} $12^{1-4a.\ 6-20}$ $13^{1-5.\ 6b-11a.\ 12b-18}$ 15 (with some mixture perhaps of E), $16^{1b-2.\ 4-14}$ 18. 19^{1-28} 22^{20-24} (unless the insertion of a reviser) 24. 28^{13-16} 38. 39. To E we may with equal certainty assign 20^{1-17} 21^{6-32} 22^{1-13} $28^{10-12.\ 17-22}$ $31^{4-17a.\ 19-44}$ 31^{51}–32^{2} 35^{1-5} 40–42. 45 (almost entirely) 46^{1-5} $48^{1.\ 2.\ 8-22}$ 50^{15-26}. But in other sections either the name of God seldom occurs, or the names at first sight seem used indifferently, the sections being in the latter case generally compounded, as a close examination shows, of both sources. After Exodus, though we can readily see that both sources still continue, the distinction becomes more difficult, because though E, unlike P, still uses the name Elohim sometimes, J″ is more generally used; but even here this occasional use of Elohim is often helpful in discovering E sections. The mixture of divine names in Gn–Ex 3 sometimes arises from the fact that E purposely uses the name J″ and vice versâ. Thus E of necessity used the name J″ in Ex 3^{14} itself, but also in Gn 28^{22}, where the name has a peculiar emphasis, the point being that Jacob promises to worship his country's God even in a strange land; the name is, however, sometimes assigned to a reviser. This is probably the case also with Gn 22^{14}, unless it be actually a Jahwistic passage inserted in the E story. On the other hand, Elohim is sometimes used by J: (1) When God is spoken of by those not in covenant with J″, as by Adam and Eve before the time of Seth, when men began to call on the name of J″ (Gn 4^{26}), and by the Serpent (Gn 3^{1-5} 4^{25} etc.). (2) When emphasis is laid on God's abstract nature, especially in contrast to man, Gn 16^{13} 32^{30} (see below, iii. 3. B). (3) In the construct state, when with a following word it is used descriptively of God, as 'God of Abraham,' 'of heaven and earth,' etc., Gn $24^{3.\ 7.\ 27}$ 26^{24} etc.

B. The separation of J and E in mixed passages, and those especially in which the name of God is for any of the reasons given not a sufficient criterion, as in the later books of the Hexateuch, is a matter of considerable difficulty, there being no characters of J or E so marked as to enable us (as we could with D and P) at once to assign the sections in which they occur to either source; but it can in most cases be decided with a fair degree of certainty. Moreover, the more the passages which can be definitely assigned to one source or the other, the easier the task becomes, because we obtain a larger number of criteria by which to recognize either source. But in spite of the labours of critics there still remains a considerable number of passages in which the division of sources is very uncertain. There is, too, always a certain danger of using as criteria comparatively rare words or phrases, which possibly by accident happen to occur once or twice in one source or the other. The reasonings by which the critical results are obtained are very complicated. They are chiefly those suggested by breaks in the narrative, points of contact, whether by continuity of language or connexion of subject, with known E or J fragments, and the like. Such arguments are often more trustworthy than those derived from vocabulary. We can make this clearer by analyzing Gn 32 as an example. Here there is no P passage, and the whole certainly belongs to JE. Vv.^{1} and ^{2} (Heb.$^{2.\ 3}$, and so on with the other verses) are obviously the conclusion of an E section (31^{51}–32^{2}), the name Elohim being used throughout and constantly, though the section has no P characteristics. It will be seen on examination that vv.$^{3-13a}$ belong to J. For (1) there is no apparent continuity between vv.^{2} and ^{3}. (2) On the other hand, vv.$^{3-13a}$ form a narrative continuous in itself without any obvious breaks, and the same is true of vv.$^{13b-21}$. (3) Vv.$^{3-13a}$ contain parallels, differing in detail, both with the preceding and the following paragraphs, and therefore belong to a different source from either. Thus v.^{10c} gives a different explanation of Mahanaim from that given in v.^{2}, and in vv.$^{13b-21}$ Jacob is (a) again described as dividing his property in view of the coming of Esau, but (b) differently, each drove by itself, vv.$^{16.\ 17}$, instead of the whole into two, v.^{7}, and (c) with a different purpose, in order to propitiate his brother by degrees with an accumulation of peace-offerings, vv.$^{17-20}$, not that one might escape if Esau attacked the other, as in v.^{8}; (d) the property is differently described, goats being added, slaves—male and female—omitted, or rather male slaves mentioned, not as part of the proposed present, but as having charge of it, cf. vv.$^{14-16}$ with $^{5.\ 7}$. Again, v.^{21b} is a repetition of v.^{13a}. (4) Again, both vv.$^{3-13a}$ and $^{13b-21}$ have points of contact with other known J and E sections respectively. Thus the possessions of $32^{5.\ 7}$ correspond very closely with 30^{43}, which belongs to J's account of the manner in which Jacob obtained his wealth by trickery, 30^{35-43}, and stands in contrast to E's account, which describes it as a miracle revealed by God in a dream, 31^{4-17}, or, at any rate, as so explained by Jacob. The latter passage is marked as E's by the constant use of Elohim. Again, 32^{9} refers to 31^{3}, an evidently J passage. So far all is clear, but in vv.$^{22-32}$, which has the appearance of a complete and unmixed passage, there is some difficulty. At first sight we should naturally think that it belongs to E, because of Elohim in vv.^{28} and ^{30}, and it is so referred by Dillmann; but the word, which is after all only one out of many criteria, may have been used purposely to express the abstract idea of God. The divine nature was such that even to see God, far more to wrestle with Him, meant death. And there are, in fact, many reasons for ascribing the passage to J. (1) The crude anthropomorphism is more in accordance with J's conception of God, see Gn 3^{8} 8^{21} 11^{5} 18$^{1. 2}$, Ex 4^{24} etc. E, indeed, is fond of dreams described as dreams (Gn 20^{3} 28$^{10-12}$ 40. 41), but with J even these are described realistically (see Gn 15^{17}, and cf. 28$^{13-16}$ (J) with 28$^{12. 17 \text{ etc.}}$ (E)). (2) Stories explanatory of place-names are far more characteristic of J than of E. (3) V.^{23b} is a doublet of v.^{21}, which speaks of the present as having already gone over. We may confidently then assign to E 32$^{1. 2. 13b-21}$, to J 32$^{3-13a. 22-32}$. The examination of this chapter will give some idea of the methods by which J and E may be often separated, but it must be admitted that in many cases, as in Gn 27$^{1-45}$, the analysis is much more difficult and uncertain.

C. For a complete analysis of JE throughout the Hexateuch the reader is referred to the critical works enumerated at the end of this article, especially the Tables prefixed to Holzinger's work, and artt. EXODUS, NUMBERS, etc. Sometimes the subject-matter forms indirectly a sufficient criterion for E or J. In the last chapters of Genesis and the early chapters of Exodus we find, as already noticed, two distinct traditions with regard to the locality occupied by the Israelites—one representing them as being in Goshen, apart from Egypt; the other as being among the Egyptians, employing the same midwives, able in the hurried departure of the night-journey to borrow jewels of their Egyptian neighbours, their houses so close together that the difference put by J″ between the Egyptians and Israel in the plague of the firstborn was a miracle of Divine Providence. The second view is certainly that of P (see Gn 47$^{6a. 7-11}$), but we find it also running through several JE sections. Now there are several reasons for ascribing Gn 46^{28}–47^{5} to J, among them being the prominence given to Judah, as in what we have reason to believe to be the J fractions of 37. 38. and 43, and the use of the word 'Israel' for 'Jacob,' the latter being generally found in E. It will therefore follow that in the JE portions all the sections in which Goshen is spoken of as the home of the Israelites belong to J, the rest to E.

D. The general characteristics of JE stand in marked contrast to P. The narratives are full of life and movement, and have a genuine local colour. The characters are men and women with flesh and blood, engaged in all the real and varied occupations of a simple and natural life. The stories are never so subordinated to a religious or historical purpose as to lose their individual interest. They give the impression that, from whatever sources the writers may have derived the thread of their stories, the colouring is that of a life with which they were familiar in all its aspects. But beyond this it will be found that J and E have each sufficiently marked characters of their own. The God of E is a God separate from man, who reveals Himself usually by a voice from heaven, often that of an angel, as in Gn 21^{17} 22^{11} (where Elohim seems to have been altered into J″ to agree with 22^{14}); so in Gn 28^{12} the angels need a ladder to ascend and descend to and from God (contrast J's account in ver.^{13} 'and behold J″ stood beside him'). Or God reveals Himself by a dream, as in Gn 20^{3} 31^{11}. Even when anthropomorphic expressions are used, as 'God came,' Nu 22^{20}, 'the finger of God,' Ex 31^{18b}, 'spake unto Moses face to face,' Ex 33^{11} (cf. Nu 12^{8}), they do not seem, as in J, to convey any definite anthropomorphic idea. But the J″ of J is much more human. Though recognized as 'the God of heaven' and the 'God of earth,' Gn 24^{3} etc., He was yet believed on occasions to have in His own person walked and talked with men, Gn 3^{8} 18$^{1 \text{ etc.}}$ 28^{13}, Ex 4^{24}, so that Abraham actually mistook Him for a man, and Jacob wrestled with Him by night, Gn 32^{24}. He needed to go down in order to see the city and the tower, which the children of men builded, and again to see whether the Sodomites had done altogether according to the cry which had reached Him in heaven, Gn 11^{5} 18^{21}. E has a good deal more to say of religious worship, especially in connexion with different localities, such as Bethel and Shechem, so much so that God is once actually called 'the God of Bethel,' Gn 35^{7}. To E belong the earliest sacrificial laws, Ex 20$^{22-26}$. E mentions the construction of the holy Tent of Meeting, 33$^{7-11}$, and the ark, which is spoken of almost as though it were itself an object of religious worship, Nu 10$^{33-36}$. E also speaks of other primitive symbols of worship, as, notably, pillars, Gn 28$^{18. 22}$ 31^{45} 35^{14} (probably taken from E though in a P section), Ex 24^{4}; teraphim, Gn 31$^{19. 30}$; the brazen serpent, Nu 21$^{4-9}$ (cf. 2 K 18^{4}). But such symbols do not always meet with approval. Jacob as an act of exceptional piety makes his family put away their strange gods (teraphim) and ear-rings (a religious charm?), Gn 35$^{2-4}$; the calf-worship is condemned, Ex 32. E also has a reference to tithe in Gn 28^{22}. In J the feasts of the sacrificial laws, in their earliest form at any rate, have less of a ritual element, Ex 34^{10-28a}, cf. 23$^{10-33}$. As compared with E, J's narratives are, on the whole, more graphic and picturesque, and appeal more powerfully to the imagination, as especially Gn 2^{4b}–3. 24, Ex 2; but this is partly due to the subjects treated of. J's style is remarkably easy and simple, that of E is somewhat more stiff and formal, and the treatment more dignified, as in Gn 22. We have a good illustration of their difference of character in their treatment of the marvellous. In J the most wonderful phenomena appear quite natural. The writer feels himself in an ideal fairy land in which no wonders are surprising. When we are told that J″ brings the animals to the man to see what he would call them, we do not think of asking how this was possible, or even how it was done. But in other cases what in E are insisted upon as miracles, are in J ascribed to natural means. In J Jacob obtains his flocks and herds by a cunning trick thoroughly in keeping with his character, Gn 30$^{35-43}$. In E it is by a special act of God's providence, 31$^{4-13}$. In J the wonders of Egypt are performed by natural agency. It is an east wind that brings the locusts, Ex 10^{13}, that drives back the waters of the Red Sea, 14^{21}. In E these are performed by the, so to speak, magic power of Moses' rod. Similarly, Amalek is defeated by the virtue of Moses' uplifted hand. The story of Jacob and Laban illustrates also another tendency of E, to soften moral difficulties. The deception of his old father had been largely the fault of his mother, and also took place before the covenant with God at Bethel, and therefore might be passed over, but Jacob's dishonesty in dealing with Laban seemed inconsistent with the character of a patriarch. Notice again how E justifies the expulsion of Hagar, which in J is merely the result of jealousy (Gn 16$^{4-6}$), by representing it as the express command of God (21^{12}). There are also some important differences in the subject-matter of these two. In J Moses acts by and for himself. In E much importance is attached to subordinates. Aaron assists him in his miracles, and Jethro gives him practical advice, and leads him in the wilderness, Ex 18. Joshua acts as his minister, 24^{13}. In J the patriarchs are connected with Hebron, Gn 13^{18} 18^{1}, in E with Beersheba, 22^{19} 28^{10} 46^{5}, and Shechem, 33^{19} 48^{22}. In J Judah takes the leading part among Joseph's brethren, Gn 37^{26} 43^{1-14} $44^{14.16.18}$ 46^{28}, in E Reuben, $37^{21.22.29}$ $42^{22.37}$. In E the prophetic element is more prominent than in J. Abraham, Gn $20^{7.17}$, and Moses, Ex 33^{11} (E?), Nu 12^{8}, Jos 14^{6} (cf. also Ex 20^{18-21}, Nu 11^{2} 21^{7}), are described as prophets, Miriam as a prophetess, Ex 15^{20}. Joshua is the prophetic successor of Moses, both in wonder-working, Jos 8, and in his final exhortation and the promulgation of his law-book, 24.

E. Besides the use of Elohim and J″ respectively, we find the following words and phrases characteristic of these two documents :—

E.—'Amorites' (used as name of aborigines of Palestine) for 'Canaanites.' 'Horeb' for 'Sinai.' 'Jacob' for 'Israel' (yet latter occurs in several E passages, esp. Gn 48–50, perhaps introduced by R). 'Jethro' for 'Raguel' of J. 'The man Moses,' three times. אָמָה 'handmaid,' for שִׁפְחָה (J) invariably, as in Ex 21. בְּעִיר 'beast' (only in E). בַּעַל 'lord' in its several uses as 'husband' (J and P have אִישׁ in this sense, E never). חִזֵּק לֵב 'harden heart,' Ex 1–12, for הִכְבִּיד, כִּבֵּד לֵב (J). כֹּה of place (J applies it to time). לֵבָב for לֵב (J). נִסָּה 'try,' 'prove,' esp. of God, as in Gn 22^{1}, Ex 15^{25} 20^{20} (?Ex 16^{4} $17^{2.7}$). הֶעֱלָה 'bring up,' of bringing up the Israelites out of Egypt. פָּגַע בְּ 'to light upon,' as in Gn 28^{11}. רְגָלִים, lit. 'feet,' in sense of 'times,' Ex 23^{14}. רָפָא 'heal,' with God as subject, Gn 20^{17}, Nu 12^{13} (so a ground for ascribing Ex 15^{26} in its original form [see above, iii. 1. C] to E). שִׂים לְגוֹי, lit. 'put for a nation,' for עָשָׂה לְגוֹי, lit. 'make for a nation' (J). תְּמוֹל שִׁלְשֹׁם 'the day before yesterday,' with בְּ or כְּ, certainly characteristic of E, though in some of the Ex passages all critics do not agree. פָּתַר 'interpret' of dreams.

J.—אֲרַם נַהֲרַיִם 'Aram Naharaim' for 'Paddan-aram' (P). 'Israel' for 'Jacob.' 'Sinai,' as in P, for 'Horeb' (D, E). 'Canaanites,' but 'Perizzite,' Gn 13^{7} 34^{30}, Jg $1^{4.5}$ (according to Meyer an interpolation). 'To find grace in the eyes of,' very frequent in J, also in some JE passages. 'To call on the name of J″' frequent. 'To run to meet' frequent. Israelites called 'Israel,' not 'sons of Israel' (P), so 'Egypt' for 'Egyptian,' 'Reuben,' 'Gad,' etc., of the separate tribes. 'His brother,' in genealogies. אֲדָמָה 'land,' where אֶרֶץ would be used by E and P. אָנֹכִי for אֲנִי, usually. לָקַח לוֹ אִשָּׁה 'took him a wife,' regular formula in J, but once in E. בֹּאֲכָה 'as thou goest.' בִּי אֲדֹנִי 'I pray thee, my lord,' frequent but not exclusively in J. חִיָּה זֶרַע 'to preserve seed alive.' חָרֵב 'to be dry,' as of the Flood, for יָבֵשׁ (P). טֶרֶם for בְּטֶרֶם (E, only once in J). יָלַד Qal, 'to beget.' יָשַׁב בְּקֶרֶב 'dwell in the midst.' כָּבֵד in sense of 'to be great, important.' לֵב for 'self,' as Gn 6^{6} 8^{21}. מִסְפּוֹא 'fodder,' Gn $24^{25.32}$ (E has מָזוֹן, Gn 45^{33}). נָא with imperatives, etc. (in Gn 40 times in J, 6 in E). נִשְׁמַת חַיִּים 'breath of life,' Gn 2^{7} 7^{22} (רוּחַ inserted), for רוּחַ חַיִּים (P), הַפַּעַם הַזֹּאת, הַפַּעַם, etc., frequent. צָעִיר, צְעִירָה of younger brothers and sisters (E קְטַנָּה). עַל־כֵּן קָרָא frequently, but once in E, Gn 21^{31}. שִׁפְחָה with P, etc., for אָמָה (E). Notice also a preference for the verbal suffix אַת.

F. Date and Origin of JE.—The fact that most of the contents of JE are referred to by Amos and Hosea makes it probable that JE was prior to these prophets, but not absolutely certain, because, when these books were written, the stories may still have been current only in the form of oral tradition, and the absence of any mention of the story of Joseph, so full of religious and moral suggestions, is remarkable, though in such short books it is far from conclusive. But the priority to these prophets is made still more likely by the attitude of E towards religious symbols (see above, iii. 3. D). Hosea and Amos, while they show that such symbols still existed as a matter of course, evidently regarded them with disfavour. It is significant also that E, though disapproving of human sacrifice, exhibits no horror at the thought of it. To accept the blood of victims instead was a gracious act of God, who was willing in mercy to waive His just rights (Gn 22). Again, the fact that E speaks of Abraham, Moses, etc., as prophets (see iii. 3. D), points to a time when the prophet occupied an influential position. Add to this that the highest teaching of JE resembles that of the prophets. We can hardly then be far wrong in regarding the times of Hosea and Amos as the terminus ad quem for JE. But the differences of character between J and E, especially in their theological conceptions, tend to show that J is the older of the two documents. Moreover, the differences that we find within each of these documents, but most especially in J (see below, iii. 4. A), make it likely that both J and E were originally collections of stories varying in date, and probably handed down for the most part, if not entirely, by oral tradition, some of them, it may be, centuries before they were committed to writing. Probably, as among other nations, the oldest which acquired a fixed form were popular songs describing some great national events, such as the Song of Miriam (Ex 15) and those preserved in Nu 21 (cf. also the Song of Deborah, Jg 5). In Gn $4^{23.24}$ we have evidently a fragment of a song far older than the text with which it is incorporated. The chief allusion in the poem was apparently not understood, or at any rate is left unexplained by J. The attempt to fix the date of JE by comparing the patriarchal stories with the relations between the Israelites and the surrounding tribes is not very satisfactory. It may be true that the origin attributed to the Moabites and Ammonites is due to the animosity felt against these related peoples, but the animosity was so constant, at least from the time of the Judges, that we get little help in fixing the date of the story. Again, to refer the whole story of Joseph to the ascendency of the Northern kingdom in the time of Jeroboam II., and date its origin at this period, is to suppose it a deliberate invention, not, as the analogy of other such stories renders far more probable, a legend which had gradually grown up by oral tradition. From the importance attached to the local sanctuaries of Bethel, Shechem, and Beersheba (which last belonged to Simeon, one of the ten tribes), and the great prominence of Joseph, the father of Ephraim and Manasseh, it has generally been supposed that E at any rate was the product of the kingdom of Israel. Add to this that the North, the mission field of Elijah and Elisha, was in early times the chief scene of literary and prophetic activity. These arguments apply also, but with less force, to J, where Hebron takes the place of Beersheba as the abode of Abraham and Jacob; and Judah, instead of Reuben, holds a prominent place in the history of Joseph. From these facts it has been argued that J, though its material was originally derived from the same source as E, either in oral or written form, is in its present form the work of a Jewish composer or editor.

G. It is probable that J and E were blended into one whole before D's law-book was composed, as Dt 5–11 suppose it. Even if these chapters are not the work of D proper, they must have been added very shortly after.

4. Distinctions within the various sources.—We have hitherto regarded the different sources of the Hexateuch, for the most part, as though they were each homogeneous in character. In a certain sense they are, in that they possess individual characters which distinguish each from the rest; but within these are found considerable variations, just as we find among plants or animals several distinctly characterized species under one genus, or, to use a still better simile, varieties under one species. It is, in fact, probable that each of these larger sources represents in itself the result of a literary process extending in some cases over centuries.

A. For example, in the J sections of Gn the Flood story, with the beginnings of civilization and the dispersion of races following upon it (11$^{1-9}$), seems hardly consistent with the growth of civilization described in 4$^{16-24}$. It has also been suggested that Noah the inventor of wine (9$^{20-27}$) belongs to a distinct cycle of legends from Noah the hero of the Flood, and that 6$^{1-4}$ gives a different explanation of the origin of sin from 3. Finally, it seems probable that the story of Nimrod, etc. (10$^{8-15}$), came from the same cycle of stories as the Flood story, and is also of Accadian origin. Hence some critics have drawn a definite distinction between two series of stories, which they have denoted as J^1 and J^2 respectively. To the latter Wellhausen ascribes J's Flood, together with 10$^{8-15.\ 18b.\ 19.\ 21.\ 25-30}$ 11$^{1-9}$. Some critics, however, have ascribed 6$^{1-4}$ as well as 10$^{16-18}$ to revisers of JE (JE^s). Attention has been called to the fact that whereas in J^2 the three sons of Noah are Japheth, Ham, Shem (Gn 10), the sons of Noah in J^1 (9$^{20-27}$) were originally, as vv.$^{26.\ 27}$ apparently show, Shem, Canaan, Japheth. In Gn 12 and later chapters J^2 has been found by some critics a convenient peg on which to hang unknown fragments, interpolations, etc., such as 12$^{10-20}$ 18$^{17-19.\ 22-33a}$, and even 20^{18}, passages usually referred to JE^s or R.

B. Distinctions in E are not so frequently insisted on, but some critics have referred to an earlier source, E^1, such passages as show traces of archaic ideas or expressions, such as the anthropomorphic expressions of Gn 20$^{3-7}$ (cf. Nu 22^{20}, etc.), the ancient custom referred to in Gn 20^{16}, the word קְשִׂיטָה in Gn 33^{19}, Jos 24^{32}.

C. In D we can trace several different stages. It is now generally admitted that the Deuteronomic Code begins either with Dt 5 or with Dt 12. Dt 1–4, and perhaps also 5–11, were afterwards written as an introduction, and still later the history was continued with the Deuteronomic recension of Joshua. It seems likely that these were the gradual work of the Deuteronomic school, extending well on into the period of the Jewish captivity. The D elements of the earlier books of the Hexateuch are sometimes ascribed, not to this school, but to the compilers of JE. At any rate, they probably belong to a comparatively early period.

D. In P the fact of constant revision and gradual compilation is easy to prove, but it is not so easy to say how many distinct stages there were in its history, still less to assign the exact dates to which they belong. The following facts are, however, capable of easy demonstration.

(1) The nucleus of P lies in what is known as the Code of Holiness (P^h) contained in Lv 17–26, though these chapters now contain many interpolations (esp. 22$^{17-25.\ 29.\ 30}$ 23$^{1-8.\ 23-38}$ 24$^{1-14}$). This section is marked off from the rest of the P legislation (a) by its highly spiritual character and intense feeling of reverence for the holiness of God and everything connected with His service. P^h is the centre and kernel of the new religious movement; (b) by its intimate relation to the ideal of ritual, etc., sketched out by Ezekiel, chs. 40–48; (c) by its use of a special terminology, words and phrases being found which occur nowhere else. It will be sufficient here to call attention to such phrases as 'I am J″,' 'I J″ am your God,' 'I your God am holy,' and the like; 'walk in my (etc.) ordinances,' 'do and keep my statutes and my judgments,' אָתֵּן פָּנַי, 'I will set my face,' 'that man shall be cut off from his people,' 'my (J″'s, etc.) Sabbaths.' For a more complete list see Driver, LOT^{6}, 49. (d) By discrepancies between P^h and the general body of Levitical law. Thus in P^h the later distinction between the high priest and the ordinary priests is still in the making. The chief priest is but primus inter pares (the priest who is greater than his brethren, Lv 21^{10}). Notice that the injunction which in Lv 21^{10} is laid upon the chief priest only, not to let the hair of his head go loose, or rend his clothes, is in Lv 10$^{6.\ 7}$ laid upon all the priests. The Feast of Booths lasted, according to the original text of Lv 23$^{39-44}$, 7 days instead of 8, and is still determined by the season, 'when ye have gathered in the fruits of the land'; the addition of the 8th day and the words 'on the 15th day of the 7th month' in v.^{39}, evidently are interpolations (inconsistent with vv.$^{40-42}$) added when the laws were incorporated into the larger code. On the other hand, it is possible that P^h included passages now outside Lv. 17–26, as esp. Ex 6$^{6.\ 7}$, Lv 11$^{1-23.\ 41-47}$ in their original form. With reference to the relation of P^h to Ezekiel, it should be noticed that the resemblance extends not only to the general tenor of the subject, a thing in itself striking enough, but even to the style and phraseology; and in this respect it is not confined to these chapters of Ezekiel, but several expressions of P^h are found scattered in various parts of the prophet [see Kuenen, § 15, note 10]. That P^h, therefore, was written either by Ezekiel himself or by one imbued with his spirit, and in all probability a contemporary, does not admit of reasonable doubt, and we cannot be far wrong in assigning it to the latter half of the Exile.

(2) The next in order of time, and the most important of the Priestly documents, is the historical and legislative work known frequently as P^g, which contains all of P excepting P^h on the one hand, and certain later accretions in the legislative portions on the other. The central feature of P^g is the promulgation of the laws, which are all represented as revealed to Moses on Mt. Sinai. P^g was probably, as already suggested, the law promulgated by Ezra, Neh 8. 9^3. Notice that the Feast of Booths is kept eight days according to P^g, see Nu 29^{35}.

(3) A third stage is reached in the union of P^g and P^h, but whether it took place before or after the promulgation of P by Ezra cannot be determined. All that can be said with certainty is that Ezra was the head, perhaps the founder, of a school of scribes specially suited for carrying out a work of this kind.

(4) Lastly, there is evidence of various additions and revisions of the Priestly Code made from time to time (P^s). The most important of the former in Ex–Nu are Ex 30. 31$^{1-17}$ 34$^{29-35}$ 35–40, Lv 1–7. 8. 11$^{24-40}$ 12–15. 16 (in part), most of Nu 1–10^{28} 15. 19, the whole of 28–31. To these we should add the additions to P^h, esp. in Lv 23, to make it agree with P^g. The necessity of supposing such additions to P^g cannot be here proved at length. It is enough to say generally that the proof lies in certain repetitions, inconsistencies, and want of sequence. For example, Ex 35–40 Lv 8 taken together are a repetition of Ex 25–29. Ex 30$^{1-10}$ describes a special altar of incense of which there is no mention in the list of holy things in 26$^{31-37}$. Cf. Lv 16^{12}, which seems to imply that the one altar was used both for incense and sacrifice. Ex 30 (or at any rate 35)–Lv 8 breaks the sequence between Ex 29 and Lv 9, and Lv 1–7 is itself a collection of laws with several slight inconsistencies. Finally, Lv 11–15 breaks the connexion between 10 and 16.

(5) To these we should also add the incorporation of the already united JED into P; but to what date either this or the various supplements spoken of under (4) belong, cannot be determined. Probably, the latter represent a long and very gradual process. Kuenen argues from the difference of arrangement found in the LXX translation of Ex 35–40, belonging to 3rd cent. B.C., that the final redaction of these chapters was even then hardly completed.

5. Editorial Revisers.—It has not been found practicable within the limits of this article to give a complete estimate of the work of the various editorial revisers. That several alterations were made as the different sources were welded together is practically certain. A few examples of editorial emendations must suffice. In Gn 22^2 'the land of Moriah' is very suspicious (esp. if, according to Gn 14, Jerusalem was already in existence), inasmuch as (1) the name Moriah does not appear again until the very late Book of Chronicles, (2) E otherwise shows no partiality towards Judah, (3) it could not have taken 3 days to get from Beersheba to Jerusalem, see v.^{4}. It is probable, therefore, that an original 'Amorite' or name of some Ephraimitish mountain, which had perhaps become illegible, was altered by a reviser with Southern propensities, possibly JE, but more probably P^s. 22^{14-19} is certainly not part of the E narrative, but is possibly some fragment of J worked in to suit the story. It is, however, to be observed that in v.^{18} 'be blessed' is הִתְבָּרְכוּ, not נִבְרְכוּ as elsewhere in J; so some have regarded it as the work of a reviser. In $35^{14.\ 15}$ we have probably the working in of an E fragment in a section of P (see above, iii. 3. D). Ex 34^{11-26} has been revised by JE or D to agree with other passages, and in vv.$^{29-35}$ it is followed by a story embodying perhaps an old tradition, but written in the spirit and style of P.

iv. SUMMARY.—We may now summarize in this way the probable history of the Hexateuch. For many centuries probably the only records of the past were those contained in song and saga. It is very possible that, as with the ancient Icelanders, these were recited at religious festivals (Ex $15^{1.\ 20.\ 21}$, cf. Jg 11^{40}). The first attempts to collect these, so as to form a connected written history, probably date from the 8th or 9th cent. B.C., and originated presumably in the schools of the prophets. There are sufficient evidences of two distinct versions of this ancient history, J and E; but though they deal for the most part with the same cycle of subjects, and E is probably the later of the two, there is no proof that there is any literary connexion between them. Later on, towards the close of the 7th cent., these two documents were combined together, but so skilfully that it is often very difficult to separate them (JE). About the same time in Jerusalem a code of ritual regulations and customs, commonly believed to have been revealed by God to Moses, was set forth in writing and afterwards published in the reign of Josiah (D). This code was shortly afterwards provided with a historic setting and combined with the earlier history, and the whole, especially the conquest of Canaan, revised by the same school (JED). It has been conjectured by Kuenen, who has been followed by several other critics, that E's Book of the Covenant, Ex 20^{22}–23, was originally represented as drawn up on the plains of Moab, and that, when the code of D was substituted for it, the former was put back so as to form part of the Sinaitic legislation. This will account both for the present difficulty in connecting Ex 20^{22}–24^{11} with its context, and also for the fact that, while in the historical summary of Dt 1–4 there is no reference to the Bk of the Covenant, several of its provisions in a revised form appear in the main body of D. During the Exile, possibly before the work of D^s was complete, a new body of ritual law, more priestly in its character, was drawn up, probably by some disciple of Ezekiel, and very possibly under his direction (P^h). This was followed by a new version of the whole history, and especially the legislation, conceived in a still more sacerdotal spirit, which was probably completed about a century later, and promulgated by Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 8. 9) (P^g). Finally, by the union of this with P^h, and the additions of new laws and regulations from time to time, and various editorial revisions extending down to it may be the 3rd cent. (P^s), we get our present Hexateuch.

v. THE HISTORICAL VALUE OF THE HEXATEUCH.—It is, of course, obvious that the Hexateuch as it stands is not strictly a historical work. It did not need criticism to discover this, but criticism makes it absolutely certain. It shows that the most definite and statistical details, those given namely in P, are the least to be depended upon, being unknown to the earliest writers, and apparently the calculations of a writer very far removed from the events described. There is also observable throughout a tendency in the various writers to throw back into their composition the customs, etc., of their own times. Thus the whole body of laws, originating in local custom, or handed down as common law and promulgated from time to time, would come to be fathered on Moses; just in the same way as the Chronicler read into the old documents the ritual of his own day. Similarly, it is probable that the contemporary religious and social customs of Northern Israel are in JE described as those of their ancestors who lived in a distant past. Regarded as a history of the ancient migrations of the Israelites, their establishment as a religious and political community, and their settlement in Canaan, the Hexateuch contains little more than a general outline on which to depend. We may gather that the Israelites were one among a number of Semitic peoples, who after long migration settled in or near Egypt, from which after a period of serfdom they finally escaped, and after further migrations gradually gained a footing in the trans-Jordanic territory, and afterwards made various incursions across the Jordan; until, finally, the larger part of the territory, especially on the hills where the Canaanitish chariots were useless, fell into their hands. That so many traditions and stories should have attached themselves to Abraham and Moses, even though many of them may be inapplicable or exaggerated, shows what a deep impression their personality and work made upon their generation, and it is hardly too much to say that probably all that was noblest and best in the nation must be attributed to such men as these who first sowed the seed, of which the prophetic teaching was the fruit. But if the Hex. has little to tell us of the early history of Israel, it has much to tell us of the times in which the authors lived. The habits and customs, the ideas, above all those connected with morality and religion, are faithfully represented. And thus we are enabled to trace something more than an outline of that history of religion which was the needful preparation for the teaching of Christ.

HEZEKIAH (on forms and meaning of the Heb. name see next article).—1. A king of Judah (see next art.). 2. An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1^1), possibly to be identified with the king of the same name. 3. Head of a family of exiles who returned, Ezr 2^{16} = Neh 7^{21} (cf. 10^{17}).

HEZEKIAH (חִזְקִיָּהוּ or יְחִזְקִיָּהוּ, also חִזְקִיָּה or יְחִזְקִיָּה, 'J" hath strengthened' or 'J" strengtheneth,' LXX Ἐζεκίας, Assyr. Ḫazaḳi(i)au).—A king of Judah, son and successor of the feeble and superstitious Ahaz, with whom he contrasts as favourably as with his own son and successor Manasseh. He is conspicuous in Jewish history as the first king who is said to have attempted a reformation of religion on the principles which we find formally laid down in the Bk. of Deuteronomy (2 K 18, 2 Ch 29 ff.; see HIGH PLACE, ii. p. 382^b) Special interest also attaches to his reign on account of his close personal connexion with the prophet Isaiah, who occasionally exerted a great influence over him (especially in the memorable crisis which issued in the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib), and also because of the strong light thrown upon his times by the cuneiform inscriptions as well as by extant prophecies. H.'s history is recorded in 2 K 18^{13}–20^{19}, Is 36–39, and 2 Ch 29–32. The two former are very much alike, K being on the whole more full and exact, and Is having been borrowed from it by the compiler, who added the Song of H. (Is 38^{9-20}), but omitted the annalistic fragment in 2 K 18^{14-16} as not suiting his purpose, which was to trace the fulfilment of the prophecies of Isaiah in connexion with the siege of Jerusalem. Kings is evidently based not only on State annals, but also on prophetic narrative (derived partly from authentic documents, partly from tradition), which bears traces of the style of D in $37^{4.\,34.\,35}$ $38^{1.\,3.\,5}$ 39^1, and cannot be assigned to Isaiah (as suggested by 2 Ch 26^{22} 32^{32}) nor yet to a contemporary, in view of (a) the nature of the statements in $37^{7.\,(38).\,36}$ 38^5, (b) such late words as יְהוּדִית ($36^{11.\,13}$), (c) the apparent anachronisms in 36^{19} 37^{38}, and (d) the want of order and coherence in the narrative when carefully examined and compared with the Assyr. records.

The chronology of Hezekiah's reign is beset with special difficulty. According to 2 K 18^{10} the Fall of Samaria (722 as determined by Assyriologists) took place in the 6th year of H., which would give 728–7 as the date of his accession (Ewald, Bredenkamp, Delitzsch, Orelli, Strack, Driver, Kirkpatrick, Duhm, Skinner. Ussher, Winer, W. R. Smith make it 725). In 2 K 18^{13}, on the other hand, the invasion of Jerus. by Sennacherib (701) is said to have taken place in the 14th year of H., who must thus have commenced to reign in 715–4 (Kamphausen, Wellhausen, Ed. Meyer, Kittel, Guthe, Stade, Cornill, Hommel, Cheyne).

An attempt has been made to reconcile the earlier date with 2 K 18^{13} by supposing 14th to be a mistake for 24th (Bredenkamp), 27th (Rawlinson), 29th (Oppert), also by taking vv.$^{13-16}$ to refer to a campaign of Sargon in 711 (the name 'Sennacherib' being considered a late and erroneous insertion), a theory first advanced by E. Hincks (who confined the reference to Sargon to v.^{13}); but for reasons stated by Kuenen, W. R. Smith, and others, the theory of such an invasion by Sargon is now generally abandoned, and the best solution is probably to be found in a rearrangement of the narrative. We have a clue to such rearrangement in 2 K 20 (Is 38), which records a sickness of H. that must have taken place in the 14th year of his reign if the latter extended to 29 years, and if H. lived 15 years after his recovery (2 K 18^2 20^6, Is 38^5). This sickness the compiler seems to have connected with the invasion by Sennacherib (2 K 20^{6b}, Is 38^6), applying to the invasion the note of time (14th year), which properly belonged to the sickness, and introducing the latter with the words 'In those days,' which may have originally belonged to the invasion. This view is supported by the fact that the account of Merodach-baladan's embassy, which took place after the sickness (2 K 20^{12}, Is 39^1), ought certainly to have come before the invasion, as after that event Merodach-baladan was not in a position to send ambassadors, his downfall having taken place the year before (702); nor was H., after being impoverished by the war (2 K 18^{13-16}), possessed of such treasures as would be likely to excite the admiration of his visitors (2 K 20^{13}, Is 39^2). A middle date is suggested by Winckler (followed by McCurdy), who takes 2 K 16^2 as his guide, setting aside both 18^{10} and 18^{13}, and fixes H.'s accession at 720–19. The earlier date, however, besides having 18^{10} to rest on, fits in with the subsequent chronology of the kings of Judah, and agrees with Jer $26^{18f.}$, which represents H. as under the influence of the prophet Micah, who is known to have prophesied before the Fall of Samaria (Mic 1^6). On the other hand, it aggravates the discrepancy between the age of Ahaz at his death (by reducing his reign from 16 to 8 years, while the 715 date gives him 20 years of a reign) and the age of H. at his accession, which is stated in 2 K 18^2 to be 25 years (but in LXX 20),—a difficulty which Whitehouse meets by supposing that H. was co-regent with his father from 727 to 715, and that his 14th year is to be reckoned from the latter date, when he was in a position to initiate a new policy following the counsels of Isaiah.

This uncertainty as to the chronology is of less importance, as the interest of H.'s reign, in the light both of prophecy and the Assyr. records, practically closes with the invasion in 701. Even if we suppose him to have lived till 686 (as the later date for his accession would imply), we gain little or no additional information regarding the events of his reign. Assuming that H. came to the throne in 727, it was as a young and inexperienced prince in the midst of faithless and time-serving politicians, who scorned the teaching of the prophets, and a like-minded priesthood. The deplorable state of morality and religion is evident from Mic 1 ff. (cf. Is 28) delivered on the eve of the siege of Samaria, i.e. about 725. These testimonies, as well as the fact that the anti-prophetic party continued in the ascendant till 701, oblige us to receive with caution the circumstantial account given by the Chronicler (2 Ch $29^{3ff.}$) of the reforms effected by H. in the very first year of his reign. He is said to have purified and refurnished the temple, which had been shut up by Ahaz after being despoiled of its treasures, to have renewed the ancient sacrifices with great magnificence and pomp, to have ordained a joyful celebration of the long-neglected Passover, after purging Jerus. of its idolatrous altars and sending out invitations to the Israelites in the north, 'the remnant that had escaped out of the hands of the king of Assyria.' So great was the enthusiasm said to have been evoked that it led to a general crusade against the images and altars and high places in the cities of Judah and Benjamin, Ephraim and Manasseh, both king and people at the same time giving evidence of their devotion by their munificent provision of tithes and offerings for the support of the priests and Levites, who were now carefully registered and organized. The only part of these reforms that is recognized in K is the removal of 'high places' and destruction of 'pillars' and 'Asherah' (2 K $18^{4.22}$), but a remarkable instance of H.'s zeal for purity of worship is also given (v.^{4}) in his destruction of 'the brazen serpent that Moses had made' which had become an object of worship in Jerusalem (see NEHUSTAN).

While it is generally admitted that H. paved the way for the reformation carried out by Josiah in the next century, not only prohibiting idolatry, but seeking to centralize the national worship by destroying the local sanctuaries in the provincial cities of Judah, around which heathen practices were apt to gather (cf. Mic 1^{5} 5^{12-14}, Is 30^{29} 31^{9} 1^{29} 2^{20}), it is held by Wellhausen, W. R. Smith, Nowack, Stade, and others, that the reforms could only have taken place after the Assyrian invasion, which brought dishonour on the provinces, but was the means of exalting Jerus. and glorifying its protecting deity, thus counteracting the idolatrous tendencies inherited from the previous reign. In proof that the reformation could not have been earlier, they cite the allusions to prevalent idolatry in such late prophecies of Isaiah as 30^{22} 31^{7} (c. 702). These indeed show that the reformation had been far from perfect (cf. 2 K 23^{13} and revulsion under Manasseh), being largely due to royal command; but the whole traditional account of H.'s reign points to an earlier date for his turning to J". Cf. Jer $26^{18f.}$ already referred to, the eulogistic summary in 2 K 18^{3-7}, H.'s plea for divine favour in 20^{3}, and the demolition of high places, etc., ascribed to him by the Rabshakeh in 18^{22}, which, even if an interpolation (Cheyne), was not likely to be introduced unless it had some basis of tradition to rest on.

In addition to his work as a religious reformer, H. revived in some measure the glories of his great-grandfather Uzziah by successful inroads upon the Philistines, over one of whose cities (Ekron) we find him in 701 holding a position of suzerainty; by his care for the interests of national defence, repairing the walls and fortifications of Jerus., fitting up arsenals, constructing aqueducts and reservoirs for securing to Jerus., and cutting off from besiegers, a permanent supply of water; by building cities, and encouraging trade and agriculture through the erection of shelters for sheep and cattle and of store-houses for produce. Whether the underground tunnel leading from Gihon (the modern 'Fountain of the Virgin') to the upper pool of Siloam (1708 ft. long, and a work of great engineering skill) is to be identified with 'the conduit' mentioned in 2 K 20^{20} as the work of H., and apparently referred to in 2 Ch 32^{30} (cf. 32^{4} 22^{9-11} and Sir 48^{17}), is still a moot point, different opinions being held by experts as to the age of the inscription (discovered in 1880) at the mouth of the tunnel, which is in round characters and in old Hebrew but bears no date,* the question being also complicated by the mention of an already existing Shiloah in Is 8^{6}, on which see Dillmann's note, and Stade, GVI 593 f.

Among the merits which tradition assigned to H. was a taste for music and literature. In his restoration of the temple service, music, both vocal and instrumental, has a prominent place (2 Ch 29^{25-30}). In Pr 25^{1} we read of 'the men of Hezekiah' who copied out the proverbs of Solomon, and in the Talm. (Baba bathra, f. 15*a*) 'H. and his associates' are credited with the 'writing' of certain books of the OT. Is 38^{9-20} even contains a song which bears in its superscription to have been written by H. at the time of his sickness and recovery. But it is absent from 2 K, and its late insertion in Is appears to have disturbed the text, displacing v.$^{21f.}$. Moreover, it has no distinct marks of its alleged royal authorship, and bears a strong resemblance to Job and the later Psalms. For these reasons it is considered post-exilic by most recent critics, and is even supposed by Cheyne to refer (like Ps 88 and La 3) to the experience, not of an individual, but of the church-nation. In all probability, it was introduced into Is from a collection of liturgical songs (v.^{20}). The sickness referred to appears to have been of the nature of a boil or an abscess, being described by the same name (שְׁחִין) as is applied to one of the plagues of Egypt (Ex 9^{9}) and to the disease of Job (2^{7}). Its connexion with leprosy (Lv 13^{18}) explains the promise given to H. that on the third day he would 'go up unto the house of J".' The effect produced on H. by the prophetic announcement that his illness was to prove fatal, illustrates his tender and emotional nature, and enables us to understand the influence exerted over him by the wise and fearless counsellor who on this as on other occasions interpreted to him the will of J". With regard to the sign given to H. by the prophet in token of his recovery, if the fuller text in K be accepted as the original, the narrative must be held to imply a claim on the part of Isaiah to a miraculous control of the forces of nature (20^{9}); but if K be regarded as an expansion and Is be held to be the original (Stade, Duhm, Dillmann), it is possible to explain the deflection of the shadow as the result of a partial eclipse of the sun or of refraction of light by the atmosphere, the mode of expression in Is 38^{8b} being similar to that in Jos 10^{13}, and capable of similar interpretation (see DIAL).

Probably, it was shortly after this sickness (c. 714) that the messengers arrived from Babylon (2 K 20^{12-19}, Is 39). Even if we must regard the promise of deliverance from the king of Assyria in 2 K 20^{6b} Is 38^{6} as an interpolation, it is certain that about this time H. had reason to apprehend danger from that quarter. Almost from the commencement of his reign (cf. Is 28) there had been a growing feeling at Jerus. in favour of an alliance with Egypt. The feeling was shared by most of the Phœn. and Philistine powers, and in 720 a bold attempt was made by Gaza, with the support of Egypt, to throw off the supremacy. The defeat of the allied forces at Raphia crushed the movement before it broke into a general revolt; but Judah was no doubt more or less implicated, and it may have been to what took place at this time that Sargon refers in his Nimrod inscription (c. 717) when he speaks of himself as the 'conqueror of the remote land of Judah'—unless we suppose (with Winckler and Delitzsch) that Judah is here used by mistake for Israel. For the next seven or eight years Sargon was fully occupied in the consolidation of his empire in the east, and during that time the impression made on Judah and its neighbours by the fate of Samaria and Damascus had almost worn off, and a widespread conspiracy was forming against the domination of 'the great king.' With this we may connect the embassy from Merodach-baladan, Sargon's chief rival, who held the throne of Babylon from 721 till 710 when he was overthrown, only to regain his independence after Sargon's death, when he again wore the crown for about nine months, in 704–3; and to the latter period a few critics would assign his embassy to Jerus. (Wellhausen, W. R. Smith, Cheyne, McCurdy). The ostensible object of the visit was to congratulate H. on his recovery (cf. 2 Ch 32^{31}), but the real purpose (of which the accompanying gifts were a well-understood sign) was to court an alliance against the Assyr. power. The welcome which H. gave to the messengers, and the pride with which he showed them his sacred treasures and military stores, brought upon him, as might have been expected, the severest censure of the prophet; but the prediction of a Babylonian captivity for his family and possessions wears the appearance of a 'vaticinium ex eventu,' having nothing in common with the general tone of Isaiah's teaching at this time, which represents everything as culminating in the great struggle with Assyria. Notwithstanding the prophet's inflexible opposition to any alliance either with Babylon or Egypt, the danger of Judah's being involved in hostilities only became more threatening during the next few years (713–10), as we may judge from the intense earnestness of the prophet's utterances in connexion with the siege of Ashdod (Is 20), when he felt called of God to go about for three years 'naked and barefoot' in token of the fate which would overtake the Egyptians and their allies, as well as from Sargon's Ashdod inscription, which mentions the king of Judah among other tributaries who were at this time 'plotters of sedition,' stirring up rebellion against him and bringing gifts of friendship to Pharaoh, king of Egypt.

The death of Sargon in 705, and the accession of a new and untried king, was the signal for a fresh attempt on the part of many vassals to regain their independence. In the first instance Sennacherib directed his attention to his rebellious subjects in the east, and it was not till 701 that he turned his arms against Palestine in his third campaign, of which we have several monumental records, the fullest being that on the Taylor cylinder. But the rebels were slow in arriving at concerted action, owing to their dependence on Egypt; and in several of Isaiah's discourses about this time (chs. 29–32, cf. 18) we can trace the secret negotiations with Egypt, against which the prophet inveighs vehemently, predicting the utter failure of the hopes his countrymen were setting on 'Rahab that sitteth still' (30^{7} RV), and the shame and ruin they would bring upon themselves by their faithless and short-sighted policy—which was destined, however, to issue in a marvellous deliverance which would prove the regeneration of the national life. By this time H. had openly thrown off his allegiance under the influence of his premier, Shebna, apparently of foreign extraction, whose downfall is predicted by Isaiah a little later in 22$^{15ff.}$, and who afterwards appears in an inferior office in 36^{3}. That H. took a leading part in the revolt is evident from the fact recorded by Sennacherib in the cylinder referred to (col. ii. ll. 70 ff.), that H. had imprisoned at Jerus. Padi, king of Ekron, whose subjects had dethroned him on account of his loyalty to Assyria.

After reducing or receiving the submission of a number of powers on the east and north of Palestine, Sennacherib proceeded southward along the Maritime Plain, to punish the ringleaders in the revolt. In doing so, it is possible that he may have despatched a portion of his army to invade Judah from the north, and of this some writers find evidence in the description of the Assyr. advance in Is 10$^{28-32}$. But probably this is only an ideal picture, and the great prophecy of which it forms part (10^{5}–11^{16}), proclaiming both the mission and the doom of Assyria, admits of other dates, e.g. 711 (Cheyne [who, however, connects vv.$^{27b-32}$ with the siege of Samaria in 722], Guthe, Dillmann, Giesebrecht) and even earlier (W. R. Smith, G. A. Smith). The Assyr. record goes on to tell that Sennacherib took Ashkelon, and that his approach had struck terror into the hearts of the men of Ekron when he was confronted by a great army of Egyptians and Sinaitic Arabians under several of their kings, who had come to the relief of Ekron. These he defeated at Eltekeh (Altaku), and afterwards took Ekron. It was only then apparently that he sent his troops into Judah, where (he says) they took 46 fenced cities and small towns without number, carrying off 200,150 captives (probably an exaggeration) and obliging H. to sue for peace, which was granted him on payment of heavy exactions, including 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver, a narrative which is in substantial agreement with 2 K 18$^{13-16}$, even the discrepancy between the 300 and the 800 talents of silver being perhaps accounted for by the different standards of the two countries (Brandis, Münz-system, p. 98).

Such crushing calamities (Is 1$^{5ff.}$) could not fail to be regarded as a vindication of the prophet's counsel, and a condemnation of the policy to which he had been so strongly opposed. H.'s eyes were now opened to see where the true interests of his kingdom lay; and from this time we find Isaiah enjoying his fullest confidence, and guiding the national policy. But there were some on whom the lesson was lost, painful though it had been—citizens who gave themselves up to shameless mirth and revelry as soon as they saw the beleaguering force preparing to withdraw (Is 22). They thought the crisis was over, but it was not so. For Sennacherib soon realized the danger to which his army would be exposed if he advanced into Egypt, leaving such a strong fortress as Jerus. in the hands of a doubtful vassal like H.; and even at the expense of a breach of faith with H. (Is 33$^{1.8}$, Jos. Ant. x. i. 1) he resolved to make a fresh demand for its surrender. Recent critics (Stade and his followers) have detected in the long narrative (2 K 18^{17}–19^{37}) a somewhat confused combination of two different accounts, which, if referring to two different occasions, ought to be transposed; and Tiele would even place last of all the events related in 2 K 18$^{14-16}$. The problem is too intricate to be dealt with here. But there is no reason to doubt that Sennacherib made a renewed attempt from Lachish (with which his military achievements are associated in recently-discovered monuments, although he himself does not mention it even by name), and perhaps also from Libnah, to which he may have retreated on hearing that Tirhaka was coming out to meet him (2 K 19^{9}). That he failed to take Jerus. is almost implied in his own vague statement that he shut up H. like a bird in a cage; and his concluding boast about the tribute and other gifts being sent to him at Nineveh (instead of to Lachish, as related in Scripture) is evidently introduced to save any necessity for recording his subsequent disasters. These disasters are involved in mystery. But the biblical account finds an echo in the story told by Herod. (ii. 141), the destruction of his army being probably due to a plague (2 K 19^{35}, Is 37^{36}, cf. 2 S 24$^{15f.}$, 1 Ch 21$^{12ff.}$ and Is 6$^{4f.}$) in the pestiferous region on the borders of Egypt where the Crusaders and others have had a similar experience (cf. 2 K 19^{24} RV). The impression made on Sennacherib was such that though he lived for twenty years longer he never again entered Pal. or besieged Jerusalem. On the other hand, the dramatic account of the conference between his three emissaries (all whose names have now been identified with the titles of Assyr. officers) and the three Jewish deputies, on a famous spot under the walls of Jerus. (cf. Is 7^{3}), bears the stamp of historical reality, as does also the letter which H. is said to have afterwards received from him. In the prophetic words which are embodied in the narrative we have for the most part the genuine utterances of Isaiah, harmonizing with that 'most beautiful of all his discourses' (ch. 33) which marks the peaceful and triumphant close of his ministry, and which finds an echo in the 46th, perhaps also in the 48th, 75th, and 76th Psalms.

The event which was thus commemorated was one of the most impressive and glorious in Heb. history, and has taken rank in the estimation of the Jews with the Exodus from Egypt and the Return from Babylon. It was a most fateful moment, not only for Israel but for its religion; and while the victory of faith was mainly due to the influence of the one inspired man who held fast the conviction that in the Lord J″ was everlasting strength, and that amid all wreck and ruin He would preserve Mt. Zion inviolate as His holy habitation, the glory of the time falls also on the sovereign who shared his lofty spirit and fulfilled in some degree his Messianic hopes, when he made such a heroic stand against the dreaded invader before whom all the other kings of Palestine and Philistia had succumbed. Not unfitly, therefore, it stands written that 'after him was none like him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him' (2 K 18^{5}).

HEZION (חֶזְיוֹן 'vision'; Ἀζεὶν B, Ἀζαήλ A, Luc.).—Father of Tabrimmon and grandfather of Benhadad, the Syrian king whose alliance was sought by Asa, king of Judah, against Baasha, king of Israel (1 K 15^{18}). It has been plausibly suggested (Ewald, Thenius, Klostermann, etc.) that Hezion is identical with Rezon of 1 K 11^{23}, the founder of the kingdom of Damascus, and an adversary to Solomon. The three generations of Syrian kings may very well correspond with the four generations of the kings of Judah, since Abijam, Asa's predecessor, reigned for three years only. In place of Rezon in 1 K 11^{14} [Heb.^{23}] B reads Ἑσρώμ, Luc. Ἑσρών, Pesh. ܚܶܙܪܽܘܢ; and Klostermann regards חֶזְרוֹן Hezron as the original form of the name in both passages 11^{23} 15^{18}.

C. F. BURNEY.

HEZIR (חֵזִיר, either for חֲזִיר 'boar,' or cf. New Heb. חֵיזוּר 'apple').—1. The 17th of the priestly courses (1 Ch 24^{15}). 2. A lay family, which signed the covenant (Neh 10^{20} [Heb.^{21}]). For the name cf. the inscription on the grave of the 'sons of Hezir,' dating from the 1st cent. B.C. (see Driver, Text of Sam. p. xxiii). See GENEALOGY, III. 15.

HEZRO, HEZRAI (Kethîbh חֶצְרוֹ, Ḳerê חֶצְרַי; Ἀσαραί).—One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23^{35}). He was a Carmelite, i.e. a native of Carmel, the modern Kurmul, in the hill-country of Judah (see CARMELITE). In the parallel list (1 Ch 11^{37}) the reading of the Kethîbh (Hezro) is retained, but the LXX supports the form Hezrai (B Ἡσερέ; ℵ Ἡσεραί; A Ἀσαραί).

J. F. STENNING.

HEZRON (חֶצְרֹן and חֶצְרוֹן).—1. A son of Reuben, i.e. the eponymous head of a Reubenite family, Gn 46^{9}, Ex 6^{14}, Nu 26^{6}=1 Ch 5^{3}. 2. A son of Perez and grandson of Judah, i.e. the eponymous head of a Judahite family, Gn 46^{12}, Nu 26^{21}=Ru $4^{18.\,19}$, 1 Ch $2^{5.\,9.\,18.\,21.\,24.\,25}$ 4^{1}. This Hezron appears also in the NT in the genealogy of our Lord, Mt 1^{3}, Lk 3^{33} (in both of which passages AV following TR Ἐσρώμ has Esrom. WH has in Mt Ἑσρώμ, in Lk Ἑσρών). The gentilic name Hezronites (הַחֶצְרוֹנִי) occurs in Nu 26^{6} referring to the descendants of No. 1 above, and in v.^{21} referring to those of No. 2.

J. A. SELBIE.

HEZRON (חֶצְרוֹן).—1. A town in the south of Judah (Jos 15^{3})=Hazar-addar of Nu 34^{4}. It appears to be different from 2. Kerioth-hezron (קְרִיּוֹת חֶצְרוֹן), Jos 15^{25}, which is prob. identical with Hazor, No. 4. The name Hezron probably survives at Jebel Hadhîreh, a mountain in the Tîh desert N.W. of Petra.

C. R. CONDER.

HIDDAI (הִדַּי; B Ἀδαοί and Ἀδροί;* A Ἀθθαί).—One of David's thirty heroes (2 S 23^{30}). He is described as 'of the brooks [נְחָלִים, 'torrent-valleys'] of Gaash,' and probably lived in the neighbourhood of Mt. Gaash (cf. Jos 19^{50} 24^{30}, Jg 2^{9}) in the hill-country of Ephraim. Thenius and Wellh. prefer the alternative form Hurai (חוּרַי; B Οὐρεί; A Οὐρί), which is given in the parallel list 1 Ch 11^{32}.

J. F. STENNING.

HIDDEKEL (חִדֶּקֶל).—The name given to the Tigris in Gn 2^{14}, Dn 10^{4}. In the Sumerian or pre-Semitic language of Babylonia, the river was called Idiḳla and Idiḳna, which the Semitic Babylonians modified into Diḳlat by dropping the initial vowel and affixing the Semitic feminine suffix. Diḳlat is the Diglit of Pliny (HN vi. 27) and the Dijlah of to-day. The Persians assimilated the name to their own word tigra 'an arrow' (see Strabo, xi. p. 529; Q. Curt. iv. 9. 16; Eust. ad Dionys. Perieg. v. 984), from which was derived the Gr. Tigris. It is possible that in the first syllable of Idiḳla we have the Sumerian id, 'river.' See further Del., Paradies, 110 f., 170 ff.

A. H. SAYCE.

HIEL (חִיאֵל 'brother of God' or 'he whose brother is God.' The name is a contraction of אֲחִיאֵל Ahiel, and this form appears in LXX [Ἀχειήλ B, Ἀχιήλ A]. Cf. חִירָם for אֲחִירָם, and Phœn. חמלכת for אחמלכת).—A Bethelite, famed as the rebuilder of Jericho, in the reign of Ahab (1 K 16^{34}). He is said to have laid the foundations of the city at the cost of the life of Abiram his firstborn son, and to have set up the gates with the loss of his youngest son Segub; in fulfilment of Joshua's curse pronounced against the rebuilder of Jericho (Jos 6^{26}). The meaning of this statement possibly is that the builder sacrificed his sons, perhaps by enclosing them alive in the foundation and wall, in order to secure the prosperity of the city by this costly blood-offering. See FOUNDATION. Or, the tradition may have been that, through failure to perform such a rite, his eldest and youngest born sons were claimed by the offended deity at the initiatory and final stages of the building operations. For instances, from various sources, of the widespread primitive custom of human sacrifice 'in order to furnish blood at the foundations of a house or of a public structure,' cf. H. C. Trumbull, The Threshold Covenant, p. 46 ff. It may be urged, however, that the language of 1 K 16^{34} implies not a usual practice, but the occurrence of something involuntary on the part of Hiel; e.g. that the death of his sons was the result of accidents during the building operations.

C. F. BURNEY.

HIERAPOLIS (Ἱεράπολις, in more classical form Ἱερὰ Πόλις, and in ruder native Greek Ἱερόπολις), a city on the north edge of the Lycus valley, probably originally Lydian, but in the Roman period always reckoned to Phrygia, played a highly important part in the early history of Christianity. In the Bible it is mentioned only in Col 4^{13} in association with Laodicea. Standing on the site on the north edge of the Lycus valley, one looks due south across the hollow valley about 6 miles to Laodicea on a slight rising ground, while Colossæ, about 12 miles distant to the south-east, is concealed by the low hills that separate the upper or Colossian glen from the lower or Laodicean glen of the Lycus. Hierapolis, probably, was originally the 'Holy City' of the tribe Hydrelitai, which possessed the north bank of the Lycus; and Kydrâra (i.e. Kydrêla, Hydrêla) in Herod. vii. 31 is probably another name for it. It was marked out to the inhabitants by its marvellous medicinal hot springs as the place where divine power was plainly present. The water of these springs is strongly impregnated with alum (being on that account very useful for dyeing purposes), as Hamilton mentions, and it forms a calcareous deposit with extraordinary rapidity, so that the site is almost entirely covered with encrustation formed since the city was ruined, while the precipitous rocks on the south side of the city, over which the water tumbles in many rivulets, have been transformed into the appearance of 'an immense frozen cascade' (Chandler).[*] Even more remarkable was the Ploutonion or Charonion, a hole just large enough to admit a man, reaching deep into the earth, from which issued a poisonous vapour, the breath of the realm of death. Strabo had with his own eyes seen sparrows stifled by this vapour. The city, though devoid of political importance, derived high social consequence and prosperity in the peaceful Roman period from its religious character; and here, as the special stronghold of Satan, Christianity fixed itself from the first. The filling up of the Charonion, the dwelling place of the hostile power, may be plausibly attributed to Christian action in the 4th cent.

---

* The rendering of B is not found at v.^{30} but after v.^{39}, where it is out of place. Its omission in the first instance would appear to be accidental.

From the NT narrative (Ac 19^{10} and Col) it is clear that the Church in Hierapolis was founded through the influence diffused over Asia from St. Paul's residence in Ephesus (perhaps by Timothy, Col 1^{1}). But later legends[†] describe the Apostle Philip as the evangelist both of Tripolis (about 10 miles to the north-west, and also in view) and of Hierapolis, in which the Apostle John also preached; and the Hierapolitan Echidna (i.e. the serpent-form in which the Phrygian god Sabazios was there and everywhere represented) is described as their special enemy. It appears well attested that Philip preached and resided in Hierapolis, and that he was buried there with his two daughters, who were virgins, while a third daughter of his was married and buried in Ephesus (Eusebius, HE iii. 31, quoting Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus about A.D. 190). Owing to mere confusion of name, Philip the deacon (who had four prophetic daughters, Ac 21^{8}) is connected by some authorities with Hierapolis; but legend and an inscription[‡] found in the city agree with the earliest historical authority, Polycrates. The city, apparently, assumed for a time the name Philippopolis, for Tatianus, bishop of Philippopolis in Phrygia, at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, was in all probability bishop of Hierapolis,[§] and so also Andreas of Philippopolis in Phrygia in A.D. 692. Ten Christian inscriptions of Hierapolis are published;[||] two of them may perhaps be Jewish, if not Jewish-Christian.

Probably, nowhere in Asia Minor was the opposition between the native superstition and the Christian religion so strongly accentuated as in Hierapolis. In greater cities, like Ephesus, political considerations came in to complicate the antagonism. But Hierapolis was important only as the home of religion; the native superstition is there revealed to us in its sharpest and most aggressive form, as the worship of the mother goddess Leto (see DIANA) and her son Lairbenos (a form of Sabazios).

The early coins of the city, until about the time of Christ, bear the ruder native name Hieropolis, while those of Augustus' later period and all subsequent emperors have the more correct form Hierapolis; the change of spelling shows that a step in the Hellenization of the city was made about that time (though private persons seem to have occasionally used the form Hieropolis much later).[*] The Christians preferred the form Hierapolis.[†]

In the apostolic period H. was a flourishing city, to whose medicinal springs numerous visitors flocked; its prosperity lasted through the Roman period (as is shown by its rich coinage); and it easily recovered from such losses as that of the earthquake which probably injured it in A.D. 60 (Tacitus, Ann. xiv. 27). Epictetus is the only important figure in literature connected with Hierapolis. It was made by Justinian, if not earlier, a metropolis; and the north-west part of the great province of Phrygia Pacatiana was placed under it.[‡] The fact that several Christian martyrs were executed at Hierapolis[§] shows that it was a leading city under the Empire, where the proconsul held trials. The Neokorate in the Imperial religion was conferred on it by Caracalla about A.D. 215 (Athen. Mittheil. xix. p. 118).

LITERATURE.—On the topography and history, see Hamilton and older travellers; a plan of the city is given by Tremaux, Voyage Archéol. en Asie Mineure; fullest discussion in Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, vol. i. pt. i. pp. 84–120, 124 f., and 172–175; on the Christian Antiquities, pt. ii. pp. 500 f., 545 ff.; and on the pagan religion in Hierapolis, pt. i. pp. 86–105, 133–140. HIERMAS (A Ἱερμάς, B Ἱερμά), 1 Es 9^{26}.—In Ezr 10^{25} RAMIAH.

HIERONYMUS (Ἱερώνυμος).—A Syrian officer in command of a district of Pal. under Antiochus V. Eupator, who harassed the Jews after the withdrawal of Lysias in B.C. 165 (2 Mac 12^{2}).

HIGGAION.—See PSALMS (Titles).

HIGH, HIGHMINDED.—High is occasionally used in the sense of 'tall,' as 1 S 9^{2} 'From his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people' (גָּבֹהַּ); Jth 16^{7} 'For the mighty one did not fall by the young men, neither did the sons of the Titans smite him, nor high giants set upon him' (ὑψηλοὶ γίγαντες). So occasionally in Shaks., as Merch. of Venice, V. i. 163—

> 'A kind of boy, a little scrubbed boy,
> No higher than thyself.'

From the literal sense, 'high' passes readily into certain figurative applications, but that which we take as fig. would often to the religious consciousness of Israel be quite literal. See GOD, RELIGION, and compare the following passages: Ps 71^{19} 'Thy righteousness also, O God, is very high'; 92^{8} 'But thou, LORD, art most high (RV 'art on high') for evermore'; Is 6^{1} 'I saw also the LORD sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up'; 57^{15} 'For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity'; 2 Co 10^{5} 'Casting down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God' (πᾶν ὕψωμα); with many more. But in the foll. the fig. sense is complete, Dt 26^{19} 'And the LORD hath avouched thee this day to be his peculiar people . . . and to make thee high above all nations which he hath made, in praise, and in name, and in honour'; 32^{27} 'Our hand is high (RV 'exalted'), and the LORD hath not done all this'; 'a man of high degree' 1 Ch 17^{17} (הָאָדָם הַמַּעֲלָה, text certainly corrupt), or 'men of high degree' Ps 62^{9} (בְּנֵי־אִישׁ). Cf. Lk 16^{15} Wyc. 'that that is high to men, is abhomynacioun bifor god.' So frequently in Shaks., as Two Gent. of Verona, II. iv. 106—

> 'Too low a mistress for so high a servant.'

In this way 'high' takes on an offensive meaning, haughty, as Ps 101^{5} 'Him that hath an high look and a proud heart will not I suffer'; Pr 21^{4} 'An high look, and a proud heart, and the plowing of the wicked is sin' (רוּם עֵינַיִם, lit. as AVm, 'haughtiness of eyes'); which can also be illustrated from Shaks., as I Henry VI. IV. vii. 39—

> 'Once I encountered him, and thus I said:
> "Thou maiden youth, be vanquished by a maid";
> But with a proud majestical high scorn,
> He answered thus: "Young Talbot was not born
> To be the pillage of a giglot wench."'

Notice in this connexion the phrase 'high calling,' Ph 3^{14}, lit. 'calling upward' (ἄνω κλῆσις) as RV, which is better than the 'heavenly calling' of Lightfoot and others, though that is the ultimate destination.

In the phrase 'high day' we find two different meanings—(1) 'great,' practically equivalent to 'holy' in Ad. Est 16^{22}, Sir 33^{9}, Jn 19^{31}; and (2) the same as modern 'broad,' referring to the full light of day, in Gn 29^{7}.

For Most High see GOD; for High Place see the following art.; for High Priest see PRIESTS AND LEVITES; and for Highest Room (Lk 14^{8} πρωτοκλισία) see HOSPITALITY, HOUSE, ROOM.

In Ro 11^{20} [WH μὴ ὑψηλὰ φρονεῖν] and in 1 Ti 6^{17} the verb ὑψηλοφρονεῖν is tr^{d} 'to be highminded'; and in 2 Ti 3^{4} the ptcp. τετυφωμένος is tr^{d} 'highminded' (RV 'puffed up'). Thus in all its occurrences in AV highminded has the bad sense of 'haughty,' 'overweening,' its almost invariable meaning at the time. As Davies points out (Bible English, p. 207), Andrewes uses the word in a good (though not in the modern) sense when he says (Sermons, v. 50), 'O that you would mind once these high things, that you would be in this sense high-minded,' but it is plain that he is accommodating the word to his purpose; elsewhere he uses it in the same sense as AV. Cf. Babees Book (E.E.T.S.), p. 93, 'A hye mynded man thinketh no wight worthy to match with him.'

Highness, which, except in reference to persons of rank, is now displaced by 'height,' is found twice in AV, Job 31^{23} 'For destruction from God was a terror to me, and by reason of his highness I could not endure' (שְׂאֵת; RV 'excellency'; Amer. RV 'majesty,' which is Davidson's word); and Is 13^{3} 'I have commanded my sanctified ones, I have also called my mighty ones for mine anger, even them that rejoice in my highness' (עַלִּיזֵי גַּאֲוָתִי; RV 'my proudly exulting ones,' RVm 'them that exult in my majesty'). Cf. 2 Co 10^{5} Wyc. (1388) 'And we distrien counsels, and alle highnesse that higheth it silf aghens the science of God.' Fisher (on Ps 143) shows the word passing to its mod. sense: 'Blessed Lorde vouchsafe give us leve to speake unto thy hyghnes in this matter.'

HIGH PLACE, בָּמָה pl. בָּמוֹת. LXX τὸ ὑψηλόν, about 56 t.; ἀβαμά, ἀββαμμά (ἀβανά B, ἀββανά A), Ezk 20^{29}; τὰ ἀγαθά, Is 58^{14}; ἄλσος, Jer 26^{18}, Mic 3^{12}; ἁμαρτία=חַטָּאת, Mic 1^{5}; βαιμών, Jos 13^{17}; Βαμά, 1 S 9$^{12. 13. 14. 19. 25}$ 10^{5}, 1 Ch 16^{39} (21^{29} Lag.), 2 Ch 1^{13}, A. In some other passages the LXX renderings prob. rest on a different text from MT.

I. The original signification of the word cannot now be exactly determined, but that it denoted 'high, rising ground' is probable for the following reasons:—(a) The corresponding word in Assyr. (bamâtu, pl. bamâti) is said to mean 'height.' Del. (Assyr. Hwb.) renders 'Höhe (opp. Thal), ṣi-i-ru ba-ma-a-ti Feld und Höhen.' (b) We read of people 'going up' to (1 S 9$^{13. 19}$, Is 15^{2}) and 'coming down' from (1 S 10^{5} 9^{25}) a high place. (c) בָּמָה is used to explain גִּבְעָה רָמָה 'high hill' (Ezk 20^{29}).

II. In poetical language the word is used quite generally to denote the mountain fastnesses of the land, which ensure dominion to their holder (Ezk 36^{2}). In this sense it is used of Israel (Dt 32^{13} 33^{29}, Is 58^{14}; cf. 2 S 22^{34}=Ps 18^{33}, Hab 3^{19}); of God (Am 4^{13}, Mic 1^{3}; cf. Job 9^{8} 'the waves,' marg. 'heights,' RVm 'high places,' 'of the sea'; cf. also Is 14^{14} 'heights,' lit. 'high places,' 'of the clouds,' of the king of Babylon). But much more frequently it signifies 'high places' as places of religious worship. That these were the customary and legitimate places of worship for the Isr. until the 7th cent. there is abundant evidence. Samuel was accustomed to sanction such worship by his presence and blessing (1 S 9$^{12. 13. 14. 19}$). They were situated on the outskirts of the city (1 S 9^{25} 10$^{5. 13}$). In the days of Solomon 'the people sacrificed in the high places' (1 K 3^{2}). Solomon himself, we are told, 'sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places' (1 K 3^{3}), and, in particular, at Gibeon 'the great high place' (1 K 3^{4}). The same is true of the reigns of Rehoboam (1 K 14^{23}), Jeroboam (1 K 12$^{31. 32}$ 13$^{2. 32. 33}$), Asa (1 K 15^{14}), Jehoshaphat (1 K 22^{43}), Jehoash (2 K 12^{3}), Amaziah (2 K 14^{4}), Azariah (2 K 15^{4}), Jotham (2 K 15^{35}), Ahaz (2 K 16^{4}), and Elijah laments bitterly that the local sanctuaries of J" had been destroyed (1 K 19$^{10. 14}$). True, the compiler of the Bks. of Kings looks upon the worship at high places as a stain upon the government of these rulers, and sees in it additional ground for condemnation of the apostate kings (e.g. Manasseh, 2 K 21^{3}), and one cause of the captivity of the northern tribes (2 K 17$^{9. 11}$); but this is due to his inability to recognize that a custom which in his own day was under the ban of the ceremonial law, had ever been legitimate in monarchical times. It may seem strange perhaps that in the Bks. of Kings this worship should meet with such condemnation, whilst in Samuel the many allusions to it are passed over unnoticed; but this is explained by the fact that the editors of these books were influenced by the theory that such worship at high places was lawful before the erection of Solomon's Temple, but was inexcusable afterwards; cf. 1 K 3^{2} 'Only the people sacrificed in the high places, because there was no house built for the name of the Lord until those days.' In the passages already cited, high places are expressly mentioned, but in very many other cases the existence of sanctuaries of J″ all over the country in the period before the establishment of the monarchy is presupposed, e.g. at Bochim (Bethel?) (Jg 2^{5}), Ophrah (6^{24} 8^{27}), Zorah ($13^{16\text{-}19}$), Shiloh (18^{31}), Bethel ($20^{18.\,23.\,26}$ $21^{2.\,4}$), Mizpah (Jg 20^{1}, 1 S 7^{9}), Ramah (7^{17} 9^{12}), Gibeah (10^{5} 14^{35}), Gilgal (10^{8} 11^{15} 13^{9} 15^{21}), Bethlehem (16^{2} $20^{6.\,29}$), Nob (21^{1}), Hebron (2 S 15^{7}), Giloh (15^{12}), and the threshing-floor of Araunah (2 S 24^{25}). For a sanctuary that was purely Israelite in origin, cf. that at Dan (Jg 18^{30}).

But, widespread as was the worship at the local high places, there were gradually developed tendencies towards a centralization of the worship of J″. It was very natural, for instance, that the sanctuary at which the ark was stationed should enjoy a certain pre-eminence over the surrounding high places. Thus Shiloh (1 S 1^{3}) and, at a later period, Jerus. no doubt overshadowed the neighbouring sanctuaries and attracted worshippers from a wide area. Again, the establishment of the monarchy indirectly favoured religious, as directly it brought about political, unity. And, lastly, in the worship at high places itself there lurked a danger which eventually brought about their overthrow. This danger was twofold. Many of the more important of the high places had been the sites of Can. shrines (Dt $12^{2.\,30}$, Nu 33^{52}). With the place of worship the Isr. had taken over also the symbols of worship, the Mazzēbahs (see PILLAR) and the Ashērahs (wh. see). What was more likely than that the lascivious tendencies which had characterized the older forms of worship should lie hidden beneath these external symbols, and, defying expulsion, should burst forth from time to time into fresh vigour? Or, again, what was more probable than that J″ should seem to be brought down to the level of the Can. gods, of whose shrines He had taken possession, and whose name He sometimes assumed, and so become confounded with them alike in outward worship and in moral characteristics? [For such confusion of J″ with the Can. Baalim, cf. Hos $2^{16.\,17}$, and the proper names Jerubbaal (Jg 6^{32}), Meribbaal (1 Ch 8^{34}), Beeliada (1 Ch 14^{7}); and see Moore on Jg 6^{32}, with the references there given].

How real these dangers were may be learned from the vigorous way in which the prophets of the 8th cent. denounce the worship at high places as it existed in their own day. Cf., for the northern kingdom, Hos 10^{8} 'The high places of Aven, the sin of Israel shall be destroyed; the thorn and the thistle shall come up upon their altars' (2. $4^{13.\,15.\,17}$ 5^{1} $8^{5.\,11}$ $10^{1.\,2.\,5}$ 12^{11} 13^{2}); Am 7^{9} 'The high places of Isaac shall be desolate, and the sanctuaries of Israel shall be laid waste' (4^{4} 5^{5} 7^{13} 8^{14}); and for Judah see Mic 1^{5} 'What are the high places of Judah? are they not Jerusalem?' (where, however, we should probably read, with the LXX, 'sin' for 'high places') (5^{13} 6^{7}). Micah, writing probably after the fall of the northern kingdom, declares that the sanctuary at Jerus. is destined to the same fate that has fallen upon the high places of the sister kingdom. 'Jerus. shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of a forest,' i.e. as the high places that have been converted into waste forest-land by the invading army (3^{12} = Jer 26^{18}; cf. Ezk 36^{2}).

It should be noticed that what these writers denounce is, not the worship at high places in itself, but the corruption that has contaminated the worship of J″ at the local high places, and that they regard the approaching destruction of the high places, which they foretell, as part of a temporary loss of a national existence. Cf. Hos 3^{4} 'Without king, and without prince, and without sacrifice, and without ephod or teraphim.' The growing feeling against the corrupted local sanctuary worship was no doubt fostered by the introduction of foreign cults by some of the kings. Thus Solomon, we read, built high places for Chemosh and for Molech (1 K 11^{7}), for Ashtoreth (2 K 23^{13}); Ahab built an altar for Baal (1 K $16^{31.\,32}$); Manasseh did the same (2 K 21^{3}; cf. Jer 7^{31} 19^{5}).

For this corrupt state of things there were two possible solutions. There might be reformation, or there might be abolition combined with the centralization of the worship of J″ at Jerusalem. The latter was the course actually taken when the unifying tendencies of which we have spoken ripened into maturity. The compiler of the Bks. of Kings ascribes it to Hezekiah (2 K $18^{4.\,22}$ 21^{3}), but there are reasons for doubting the accuracy of his statement. 2 K 18^{4a} seems to be a later addition to the original passage; v.^{22} occurs in a section that is certainly of a late date; 21^{3} is due to the compiler; Hezekiah's reform, if historical, must have been singularly ineffective, for in the accounts of Josiah's reformation we have no hint of earlier steps in the same direction; lastly, Isaiah betrays no hostility to the high places as such (cf. Wellh. Proleg. p. 46; Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 14; Montefiore, Hib. Lects. p. 164; and, for a conservative view, Kittel, Hist. of the Heb. ii. 356). But, whatever may have been the action of Hezekiah with regard to the high places, the legislation of Josiah (B.C. 639–608) against them was carried through systematically and with thoroughness. Inspired by the then lately promulgated (B.C. 621) law of Deuteronomy (ch. $12^{3.\,5}$ and freq.), the young king caused the destruction of the high places throughout his dominions (2 K $23^{5.\,8.\,13.\,19}$). The idolatrous priests were apparently put to death (2 K 23^{5}), the priests of J″ were to be allowed to come to Jerus., but not as sacrificing priests (2 K 23^{9}); the worship of J″ was henceforth to have its sole sanctuary at Jerusalem.

A reformation so radical as that just sketched had of course its losses as well as its gains. The latter were seen in the sweeping away of a system that was polluting the very life-blood of the nation, and in the quickening impulse which it must have given to political unification, and to the spread of a more spiritual conception of the national God. But the loss was very great. It was an age when the social and the religious instincts found expression through the same channels, and the abolition of the local shrines must have affected everyday life in the rural districts in a hundred ways. For instance, from time immemorial all shedding of blood had been looked upon as sacrifice; now sacrifice was to be lawful only at Jerusalem. Again, many of the older local festivals would lose their importance now that there was no sanctuary round which they could revolve (cf. 1 S 1^{3} 20^{6} 25^{2}, 2 S 13^{23}). And, lastly, the abolition of the country priesthood, whilst it deprived a large class of the means of livelihood (Jg 17^{5}), removed from their position the recognized educational authorities (Mic 3^{11}, Dt 33^{10}), and made no provision for any substitute. Still, the spontaneous religious feeling of the country districts needed outlets for their expression, and the loss of those 'who handled torah' had to be supplied. If the body ecclesiastic was to have its heart in Jerus., it needed also its main arteries throughout the country, and in time such were found for it. In the post-ex. community the synagogue (wh. see) with its worship of prayer supplied to some extent the place of the high place with its cycle of sacrifices, and the recognized teachers of the Levitical law took the place of the older provincial priests.

III. The fortunes of the local high places thus briefly sketched from the historical books may be traced through the same stages in the legal codes. In the earliest legislation high places are not actually mentioned, but they are presupposed. Cf. Ex 20^{24} 'An altar of earth shalt thou make unto me, and shalt sacrifice thereon thy burnt-offerings, and thy peace-offerings, thy sheep and thine oxen: in every place where I record my name I will come unto thee and I will bless thee.'

Cf. also Ex 22^{29}, which presupposes the existence of local sanctuaries. In entire agreement with this the writers of the narrative portions of JE represent the Patriarchs as erecting altars wherever occasion demanded. Thus, e.g., Abraham builds altars at Shechem (Gn 12^{7}), at Bethel (12^{8} 13^{4}), at Mamre (13^{18}), and on Mount Moriah (22^{9}); Jacob sacrifices on the mountain of Gilead (31^{54}), and builds altars at Shechem (33^{20}) and at Bethel ($35^{1. 3. 7}$); Isaac does the same at Beer-sheba (46^{1}); and Moses builds an altar at Rephidim (Ex 17^{15}), and prescribes the erection of one on Mount Ebal (Dt 27^{5}; cf. Jos 8^{30}).

When we reach the Great Code of the 7th cent. [D=Deuteronomy] all this is altered. True, the compiler nowhere mentions by name the high places of J", but his zeal for their removal betrays itself in every page of his work. All the sanctuaries of Can. origin are to be destroyed (Dt $12^{2. 3}$), and for the Israelites there is to be but one place of sacrifice. 'Ye shall not do so unto the Lord your God. But unto the place which the Lord your God shall choose . . . thither thou shalt come, and thither ye shall bring your burnt-offerings . . .' (12^{4-7}). 'Take heed to thyself that thou offer not thy burnt-offerings in every place that thou seest' (12^{13}; cf. $12^{21. 26}$ 14^{23-25} 15^{20} $16^{2. 5. 6. 15. 16}$ 17^{8} 18^{6}).

Lastly, in the latest of the Pentateuchal Codes (P=Priestly Code) the one sanctuary is not so much inculcated as tacitly assumed (cf. Wellh. Proleg. p. 34).

IV. It has been said above that בָּמָה originally signified 'high, rising ground,' and it is probable therefore that the simplest form of high place was an altar on any slight elevation. They were situated generally, it may be supposed, near a city; cf. 1 S 9^{25} 10^{5}. Close to the altar would be placed the Mazzêbah and the Ashêrah. Sometimes we find the high place distinguished from the altar (2 K 23^{15}, Is 36^{7}, 2 Ch 14^{3}). Again, the high place is distinguished from the hill upon which it stood (Ezk 6^{3}, 1 K 11^{7} 14^{23}). In these passages the name seems to be transferred from the actual site to the apparatus for worship which stood upon it. In the vicinity of the altar were erected buildings for various purposes, the so-called 'houses of high places' (1 K 12^{31} 13^{32}, 2 K 23^{19}). In the case of idolatrous high places, these sometimes contained an image of the god worshipped (2 K 17^{29}). With 'high place' in this secondary sense of 'shrine' or 'sanctuary' we may compare those passages which speak of 'high places' in valleys (Jer 7^{31} 19^{5} 32^{35}, Ezk 6^{3}), or in cities (1 K 13^{32}, 2 K $17^{9. 29}$ 23^{5}), or 'at the entering in of the gate' (2 K 23^{8}; cf. Ezk 16^{24}). Cf. also Am 7^{9}, where it is synonymous with 'sanctuary' (מִקְדָּשׁ). In some of these cases it is probable that an artificial high place, with of course the necessary adjuncts, is intended. With this would agree the terms which are used of the destruction of 'high places.' So, e.g., 'destroy' (Ezk 6^{3}, 2 K 21^{3}; cf. Lv 26^{30}, Nu 33^{52}, where a synonymous term is used), 'break down' (2 K $23^{8. 15}$), 'burn' (2 K 23^{15}).

In connexion with these local sanctuaries we find, in addition to the Mazzêbahs and Ashêrahs, also Ephods and Teraphim (wh. see). So in Jg 17^{5}, 1 S 21^{9}; cf. Jg 8^{27}, Hos 3^{4}. That the former were images used in consultation of J" is probable from 1 S $14^{18\,\text{mg.}}$ 23^{9} 30^{7}. (See Moore on Jg 8^{27}). And in connexion with the Ephod we have the Urim and Thummim, or sacred lots for giving oracles, 1 S 14^{41} (on the reading see Driver, ad loc.). For the priests of these high places see CHEMARIM, PRIEST.

V. In four passages of OT the plur. of the word is used as a proper name. These are Nu $21^{19. 20}$, Nu 21^{28} RVm 'Bamoth of Arnon,' Jos 13^{17} Bamoth-baal. In this connexion it is noteworthy that the word occurs twice upon the Moabite Stone.

l. 3 'and I made this high place for Chemosh in QRHH.'

l. 27 'I built Beth Bamoth, for it was destroyed.'

HILEN (חִילֵן), 1 Ch 6^{58}.—See HOLON, No. 1.

HILKIAH (חִלְקִיָּהוּ, חִלְקִיָּה 'J" is my portion,' or 'he whose portion is J"').—1. The father of Eliakim, who was 'over the household' under Hezekiah (2 K $18^{18. 26. 37}$=Is $36^{3. 22}$; cf. Is 22^{20}).

2. The high priest in the reign of Josiah. He it was who found the book of the law in the temple, whilst the building was undergoing repair in the 18th year of Josiah (B.C. 621). That this book was substantially the Bk. of Deuteronomy is generally acknowledged (see DEUTERONOMY). Hilkiah communicated the news of his discovery to Shaphan the scribe, and this latter, having first made himself acquainted with the contents of the book, then read it before the king. Josiah was greatly moved upon hearing the threats and warnings of Deuteronomy against the introduction of idolatrous cults and the unrestricted worship of J" elsewhere than at the central sanctuary—'the place which the LORD God shall choose to put his name there' (Dt 12^{5}). Immediately a deputation was formed by order of the king, consisting of Hilkiah and others, who proceeded to Huldah, the prophetess, to learn at her mouth the will of the Lord. Huldah predicted the certain fall of the kingdom of Judah, on account of the religious abuses which had been introduced under king Manasseh, but added that for Josiah's sake a respite was to be granted, that he might not see the evil which J" would bring upon Jerusalem.* After receiving the message of the prophetess, the young king at once commenced active measures, and carried out the great religious reformation which is associated with his name (2 K 22 f.=2 Ch $34^{8\text{ff.}}$).

The narrative contains no suggestion by which a charge of fraud can be fastened upon Hilkiah, as though he had deposited the book in the temple and had then professed to make discovery of it, while all the time he was acquainted with the author of it, even if he were not himself the author. On the contrary, the simple and straightforward account of the repairs which were being carried out in the temple, and which led to the discovery, makes the inference obvious that the high priest was previously unacquainted with the book, and that it must have been placed in the temple for safety some time previously, either during the troublous reign of Manasseh, or during the earlier years of Josiah.

3. The father of Jeremiah, and member of a priestly family at Anathoth (Jer 1^{1}). 4. The father of Gemariah, who acted as ambassador from king Zedekiah to Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 29^{3}). 5. 6. Levites of the clan of Merari, 1 Ch 6^{45} [Heb.^{30}] 26^{11}. 7. A contemporary of Ezra, who stood at his right hand when he read the book of the law publicly (Neh 8^{4}). Probably, the same Hilkiah is mentioned as one of the chiefs of the priests who went up to Judæa with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh $12^{7. 21}$).

HILL, HILL-COUNTRY.—'Hill' is in AV the rendering of (1) גִּבְעָה (always), (2) הַר (sometimes), (3) in Mt 5^{14}, Lk 4^{29} ('the brow of the hill') 9^{37} of ὄρος (RV in 9^{37} 'mountain'), and (4) in Lk 3^5 23^{30} of βουνός (LXX usu. for גִּבְעָה); it occurs also in 1 S 9^{11} for מַעֲלֶה (RV 'ascent'), in Is 5^1 in 'a very fruitful hill' (the paraphr. rend. of the Heb. 'a horn, the son of fatness'—'horn' being, as in Arab., fig. for a small isolated eminence), and in Ac 17^{22} for πάγος (RV 'Areopagus'). Hill stands also in RV for עֹפֶל, a swelling or bulging place, in 2 K 5^{24}, Is 32^{14}, Mic 4^8.

'Hill' is thus the most characteristic rendering of גִּבְעָה, a word which, coming from a root signifying to be convex (cf. גָּבִיעַ 'bowl,' Aram. גְּבִיעַ 'humpbacked'), no doubt denotes properly (Stanley, Sin. and Pal. 138, 497) the large rounded hills, mostly bare or nearly so, so conspicuous in parts of Palestine, especially in Judah. Several places situated on such hills derived their names from the circumstance, as 'Gibeah of Saul,' 'Gibeah of Phinehas,' 'Gibeah of the Foreskins,' etc. (see under GIBEAH); cf. the hill of Moreh (or of the Teacher) Jg 7^1, the hill of God (Gibeah) 1 S 10^5, the hill of Ḥakîlah 1 S 23^{19} $26^{1.3}$, the hill of Ammah 2 S 2^{24}, the hill of Gareb Jer 31^{39}, also 1 S 6^1, 2 S $6^{3.4}$ 'the hill' (near Kiriath-jearim)—all localities so called from the same marked topographical feature. Zion, it may be noticed, though sometimes termed a 'hill' in AV, RV (as Ps 2^6 3^4 15^1), is in the Heb. regularly a 'mountain' (הַר); it is spoken of as a גִּבְעָה only Is 10^{32} 31^4 (in both ∥ 'mountain'), Ezk 34^{26}; cf. Zeph 1^{10}. Hills of the same kind were also a favourite spot for the idolatrous rites of the Canaanites, which the Israelites were sometimes only too ready to take part in: the standing phrase is 'on every high hill, and under every spreading tree' (1 K 14^{23}, 2 K 17^{10}, Jer 2^{20} al.; cf. Dt 12^2, Hos 4^{13}, Is 65^7, Jer 13^{27}, Ezk 20^{28} etc.). Notice that גִּבְעָה is also the term used in Ex $17^{9.10}$. A recollection of what a גִּבְעָה was adds force to Isaiah's picture of every high hill being fertilized by 'streams and water-courses' in the ideal future (30^{25}). גִּבְעָה is never used for a range of mountains (like הַר); but it often stands in poet. parallelism with 'mountain.' See e.g. Gn 49^{26}, Is 2^2, 30^{17} $40^{4.12}$ 41^{15}.

The passages in which 'hill' stands for הַר may next be considered. הַר is a much more general term than גִּבְעָה: it may be applied to what we should call a mountain-range, to a simple 'mountain,' and also to a block of elevated country (as the central part of Palestine). It thus no doubt in particular cases may correspond to what we should term a 'hill'; but it lacks the definite and distinct characteristics of the גִּבְעָה. Its being represented by 'hill' in AV is sometimes a source of confusion. Thus the 'hill' of Ex 24^4 is the 'mount' of vv.$^{12.13.15}$ etc.; the 'hill' of Nu $14^{44.45}$, Dt $1^{41.43}$ is the 'mountain' of Nu 14^{40}, Dt 1^{44}; 1 K 11^7 the 'hill' in front of Jerusalem is the 'mount' of Olives; the 'hill' of Zion in Ps 2^6, and the 'holy hill' of 3^4 15^1 43^3 99^9 (cf. 24^3 68^{16b}), is the 'mount' Zion of other passages. Other passages in which 'mount' or 'mountain' would have been better than 'hill' are Gn 7^{19} (see v.^{20}), Dt 8^7 11^{11}, Jos 15^9 $18^{13.14}$, Jg 2^9 16^3, 1 S 25^{20} 26^{13}, 2 S 13^{34} 16^{13} 21^9, 1 K $16^{24.24.24}$ (of Samaria, see Am 4^1 6^1 AV), $20^{23.28}$ 22^{17}, 2 K 1^9 4^{27} (see v.^{25}), Ps 18^7 $68^{15.16a}$ (of the great range of Jebel Ḥauran) 80^{10} 95^4 97^5 98^8 $104^{10.13.18.32}$ 121^1, Lk 9^{37} (see v.^{28}). In the great majority of these passages the correction has been made in RV.

עֹפֶל, which is represented by 'hill' in RV of 2 K 5^{24}, Is 32^{14}, Mic 4^8, was also (with the art.) the name of the bulging side of Zion on the S. of the Royal Palace (see OPHEL): this is probably alluded to in Is 32^{14}, Mic 4^8; in 2 K 5^{24} the name is applied to some similarly shaped spot in Samaria (cf. Mesha's Inscr. l. 22).—'Hill' is never, it may be added, to be understood in RV in the common English sense of an ascent, and only twice in AV (1 S 9^{11}, 2 S 16^1): the Heb. for this is מַעֲלֶה ('going up,' or 'ascent').

Hill-country occurs in AV 4 times, Jos 13^6 21^{11} (for הַר), and Lk $1^{39.65}$ (for ἡ ὀρεινή [often in LXX for הָהָר]); also Jth 1^6 2^{22} 4^7 5^1 $6^{7.11}$. In RV the term has been employed much more frequently. As was remarked above, the Heb. הַר is used not only of a single mountain, and of a range of mountains, but also often of a mountainous tract of country, esp. the elevated mountain tract, which forms, as it were, the backbone of Palestine, gradually rising from the plain of Jezreel on the N., sloping down on the E. and W. to the Jordan Valley and the Mediterranean Sea, respectively, and terminating (approximately) in the S. in the neighbourhood of Beersheba. In AV, הַר, in this application, is usually rendered 'mountain(s)' or 'mount,'—in neither case very suitably, 'mount' especially (as in 'Mount Ephraim,' 1 S 1^1 and frequently) suggesting a single eminence (as Mount Ararat, Mount Etna, Mount Zion, etc.), and not a tract of mountainous country. Accordingly, 'hill-country,' the phrase already used in the AV of Jos 13^6 21^{11}, has in RV been generally substituted in all these cases. Thus Dt $1^{7.19.20}$ 'the hill-country of the Amorites,' and 1^7 'the hill-country' (both of the high central ground of Canaan): so Jos 9^1 $10^{6.40}$ $11^{3.16}$ 12^8. Two parts of this 'hill-country,' which are frequently particularized, are the 'hill-country' of Ephraim (Jos $17^{15.16.18}$ 19^{50} 20^7 21^{21} $24^{30.33}$, Jg 3^{27} 4^5 7^{24} 10^1 $17^{1.8}$ $18^{2.13}$, 1 S 1^1 9^4 14^{22}, 2 S 20^{21}, 1 K 4^8 12^{25}, 2 K 5^{22} $19^{1.16.18}$, 2 Ch 13^4 15^8 19^4: in Jer 4^{15} 31^6 50^{19} 'the hills of Ephraim'); and the 'hill-country' of Judah (Jos 11^{21} 20^7 21^{11}, 2 Ch 27^4, Lk 1^{65}; cf. v.^{39}, Jos 18^{12}, Jg $1^{9.19}$, 1 S 23^{14}), the latter forming a clearly defined part of the territory of Judah (opp. to the 'lowland,' the 'Negeb,' and the 'wilderness'), the cities of which are enumerated in Jos 15^{48-60} (cf. Jer 32^{44} 33^{13} 'the cities of the hill-country'; and see JUDAH). We also have the 'hill-country' of Naphtali (Jos 20^7), as well as of the Ammonite territory (Dt 2^{37}), and of Gilead (3^{12}), on the E. of Jordan. G. A. Smith (HGHL 53) objects to the rendering 'hill-country,' on the ground that the Central Range of Palestine was recognized by the Hebrews as forming a single block, which they called accordingly not by a collective name but by a singular name, the mountain. The observation is, no doubt, correct; but 'the mountain' would in English have been so strongly suggestive of a single eminence that it could hardly be considered a preferable rendering.

HINGE (צִיר ẓîr, Arab. ṣā'ir, a pivot).—There seems to have been anciently only one kind of hinge in Syria, the pivot and socket. Doors of houses in Lebanon are made of wood, and generally the pivots on which the doors turn are projections of a piece of wood which runs the whole length of the door, and is called the ṣîyâr. The pivots themselves are called by the carpenters sûs, and are always of wood; they turn generally in sockets of iron, but sometimes a hole is made in a stone for the lower socket, and one is bored in the lintel for the upper.

On the east of the Jordan, in the Hauran, ancient buildings have been found in which the doors are made of one slab of stone, the projecting pivots being of stone also. The sockets are holes bored in the stone lintel and threshold. In 1 K 7^{50} פֹּת is the socket. (For a good illustration of an ancient door socket [of Sargon I.] see Hilprecht, Recent Researches in Bible Lands, p. 93).

DOORS OF LEBANON HOUSES, SHOWING PIVOTS AND LOCK.

The ancient Egyp. hinge consisted of a socket of metal with a projecting pivot, into which the corner of the door was inserted. This kind is not common in Syria. W. CARSLAW.

HINNOM, VALLEY OF, also called Valley of the Son of H., Valley of the Children of H. (גֵּי הִנֹּם Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, Neh 11^{30}; elsewhere [except in 2 K 23^{10}, where Kethibh has גֵּי בְנֵי ה׳] always גֵּי בֶן־ה׳ Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, 2 Ch 28^{3} 33^{6}, Jer $7^{31.32}$ $19^{2.6}$ 32^{35}).—Hinnom is mentioned in the OT invariably in connexion with the term gai [construct gê] (ravine), the Kidron being called naḥal, and the vale of Rephaim 'ēmeḳ. It seems probable that gai denotes the channel or course through which water may make its way in the hills, and thus in Palestine becomes a ravine in the mountains; but the word cannot by itself be taken to mean any particular nature of ravine. It is used, in contradistinction to mountains, to denote valleys or depressions (Is 40^{4}).

Naḥal is the exact equivalent of the modern wâdy. See BROOK. It is used of the deep gorges of the rivers Arnon and Jabbok, and of the shallow sandy stream of the 'river of Egypt' (Wâdy el-'Arîsh).

'Emeḳ is a broad vale fit for flowers (Ca 2^{1}), for corn land (Ps 65^{13}), for battlefields (Job 39^{21}), and chariots (Is 22^{7}).

It has been suggested by Birch (PEFSt, 1878, p. 179) that these three names represent the three valleys which encompass Jerusalem, east, centre, and west, in the order they are given in the OT, viz.:—naḥal, Kidron; gai, Tyropœon or Hinnom; 'ēmeḳ, Rephaim; but, unfortunately, this easy solution of a very difficult question does not satisfy the conditions.

Although the same appellative is used in the OT for a particular portion of a valley, there seems no reason against the various lengths of a valley being called naḥal, gai, and 'ēmeḳ in succession according to the requirements of the case; and it is obvious that when the branches of a valley have these different names, the portion below the junction must differ in name from one or other of them. Stanley (SP, Appendix, p. 482) points out that in 1 S 17^{2} 'ēmeḳ and gai seem to be used convertibly, and suggests that the 'ēmeḳ 'of the terebinth' contracted into a gai in its descent towards the plain of Philistia. It is suggested that in this case the 'ēmeḳ 'of the terebinth' (Valley of Elah) was the designation of the valley generally, while the separate portions were termed gai, etc., according to their character. At the present day the Arabs are in the habit of giving descriptive names to each reach of a valley, in addition to the general name for the whole valley.

Whatever view is taken of the position of the valley of Hinnom, all writers concur in its extending to the junction of the three valleys of Jerusalem below Siloam, i.e. there must be one spot below Siloam which all agree in making a portion of the valley of Hinnom. It is suggested that the valley of Hinnom does not end here, but is the name of the whole valley (Wâdy en-Nâr), extending from the north of Jerusalem to the Dead Sea. The point, then, which requires to be cleared up is whether it is the east valley or Kidron, the centre valley or Tyropœon, or the west valley or Wâdy er-Rubâbeh.

It is stated (Neh 11^{30}) that on the return of the children of Judah after the Captivity, they 'encamped from Beersheba unto the valley of Hinnom'—where the gai of Hinnom may be the Wâdy en-Nâr, extending from Jerusalem to the Dead Sea. The valley of H. was near the gate Harsith of Jerusalem (Jer 19^{2}), which in AV is tr^{d} 'east gate' (AVm 'sun gate'), and in RVm 'gate of potsherds.' It is stated (1 Ch 4^{23}) that the potters 'dwelt with the king for his work,' possibly near the king's palace at the southern side of the temple near the water gate, above the Kidron.

The word gai is also used for the 'valley gate' (2 Ch 26^{9}, Neh $2^{13.15}$ 3^{13}), which appears to have been on the west side of Jerusalem above the Tyropœon valley near the present Jaffa gate.

The valley of Hinnom is mentioned in connexion with the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin (Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}), but otherwise principally with reference to the abominable rites and ceremonies of the Ammonites. The high places of Tophet and Baal, where children were passed through the fire to Molech (Jer 7^{31} 32^{35}), were built in this valley. Ahaz and Manasseh burnt incense and passed their children through the fire to Molech (2 Ch 28^{3} 33^{6}). This practice was perhaps tolerated in Jerusalem by Solomon (1 K 11^{7}). Josiah defiled Tophet in order to prevent these horrible rites from being carried out there; and from the allusion to the graves of the children of the people (2 K $23^{6.10}$), it would appear that it was near the common burial-place. It was to receive the name of the 'Valley of Slaughter' in time to come (Jer 7^{32} 19^{11}).

According to Buxtorf, Lightfoot, and others (following Kimchi), there were perpetual fires kept up in this valley for consuming dead bodies of criminals and carcases of animals, and the refuse of the city; and this may be accepted (but see Robinson, BRP i. 274) as the most probable method of disposing of the immense masses of refuse which required to be destroyed for the sake of the health of the city (Rosenmüller, Biblische Geogr. II. i. pp. 156, 164).

The Talmudists place the mouth of hell in the valley of H. 'There are two palm trees in the valley of Hinnom between which a smoke ariseth —and this is the door of Gehenna' (see Barclay, City of the Great King, p. 90, and art. GEHENNA). In this sense it was used by our Lord (Mt 5^{29} 10^{28}, etc.). Jerome (Comm. in Jer. 7^{31}, and on Mt 10^{28}) describes Tophet as a pleasant spot in the valley of Hinnom, with trees and gardens watered from Siloam, lying at the foot of Moriah (i.e. in the gardens below Siloam at the junction of the east and west valleys).

Stanley (Sin. and Pal. p. 172) suggests that the ravine (gai) was named Ge Ben Hinnom, or Ge-Hinnom, after some ancient hero who had encamped there, and that from this was formed the word Gehenna. In the Mohammedan traditions the name Gehenna is applied to the valley of the Kidron (Ibn Batuteh, 124; Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, p. 218). Stanley further points out (Recov. of Jerus. xiv.) that the valley of H. includes, if it is not identical with, the glen of the Kidron east of the city. 'This appears to follow beyond question from Jer 19^{11}; and it agrees, not only with the Mussulman nomenclature, but with almost all the biblical indications on the subject, and especially with the word Ge-hinnom.'

The point which now requires clearing up is the identification of one of the three valleys which encompass Jerusalem as the valley of Hinnom. From En-rogel, 'the border went up by the valley of the son of H. unto the side of the Jebusite southward (the same is Jerusalem); and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of H. westward, which is at the uttermost part of the vale of Rephaim northward' (Jos 15^{8}). 'And the border went down to the uttermost part of the mountain that lieth before the valley of the son of H., which is in the vale of Rephaim northward, and it went down to the valley of H., to the side of the Jebusite southward, and went down to En-rogel' (Jos 18^{16}). In considering the direction of the valley of Hinnom south of the city of Jebus, it must be recollected that though we know the limits of ancient Jerusalem, on east, west, and south, by the deep valleys that begirt it, we do not know for certain what portions of it comprised the city of Jebus, and there is considerable difference of opinion on the subject owing to the many very difficult points which are not yet cleared up; in fact, the only solution appears to be derived from considering the dual condition of the ancient city to which references appear constantly in OT and early writings.

The following points seem to be concurred in generally:—

(1) That the temple mount (Moriah) is the eastern hill on which the Dome of the Rock now stands.

(2) That the city of David as mentioned in the Book of Nehemiah is on the spur of Ophel south of the temple area and extending to Siloam.

(3) That the Akra of the Maccabees and Josephus is either north or north-west of the temple area.

(4) That the upper part of the city, the modern Zion, is the φρούριον or upper market-place of Josephus, taken into the city by king David, and not necessarily a part of the ancient city Jebus.

A very brief summary of the information concerning Jerusalem is necessary to clear up this question as to Hinnom. It appears to be conclusively proved by the Tel el-Amarna tablets, that as far back as the year B.C. 1400, or prior to the time of the Judges, Jerusalem or Jebus was known as Urusalim (the element Uru being indicated by the Sumerian ideogram uru='city' (Hommel, AHT p. 201). 'Jebus, which is Jerusalem,' is first spoken of in OT in the account of the spies (Nu 13^{29}, Jos 11^{3}) as 'the Jebusite in the mountains,' and in the Book of Joshua (15^{63}) is allotted to Judah, and (18^{28}) also to Benjamin. It is stated that neither the children of Judah nor the children of Benjamin could drive out the Jebusites, and that they dwelt with them there. It would appear, therefore, either that Jerusalem was common to both tribes, or that a portion was allotted to each, or that different writers reckoned it differently. Lightfoot, quoting from the Talmud, states (Prospect of Jerusalem), 'For most part of the courts were in the portion of Judah; but the altar, porch, temple, and most holy place were in Benjamin.' It was reserved for king David to capture the stronghold of Zion, and the Millo or citadel. It is stated (2 S 5^{7}=1 Ch 11^{5}), 'Nevertheless, David took the stronghold of Zion: the same is the city of David.' The going up of Joab by the 'gutter' or watercourse, related subsequently, may have been a separate assault on another part of the city. Josephus evidently favours this view, for he says that David began the siege, and that he took the lower city (τὴν κάτω πόλιν) by force, but the citadel (ἄκρα) held out, and that it was taken by Joab (Ant. V. ii. 2, VII. iii. 1). If the stronghold of Zion may be accepted as the lower city of Josephus, and Millo as the Akra or citadel which Joab took, all difficulties concerning the passages appear to vanish.

The difference between the stronghold of Zion and the citadel of Millo seems to be accentuated in the following passages:—

'And David dwelt in the stronghold (mĕzûdah), and called it, The city of David. And David built round about Millo and inward' (2 S 5^{9}). 'And he built the city round about, from Millo even round about; and Joab repaired the rest of the city' (1 Ch 11^{8}). Millo is mentioned as separate from the walls of the city also in the following passages, 1 K $9^{15.\ 24}$ 11^{27}, 2 Ch 32^{5}. The meaning of Millo is given in QPB as rampart, and by Gesenius (Lex.) as a rampart or mound, built up and filled with stones or earth. Lightfoot says, 'Millo, which was an outward place and the suburb of Zion, distinguished and parted from Zion by a wall, yet a member of it and belonging to it.' Williams (Holy City, part ii. p. 43) says, 'It must never be forgotten that Jerusalem was originally two distinct cities united together by David.' Stanley has pointed out that the stronghold, fort or castle, of Zion, in all the passages (2 S $5^{7.\ 9.\ 17}$, 1 Ch $11^{5.\ 7.\ 16}$), represents the Hebrew words mĕẓûdah (מְצוּדָה) or mĕẓâd (מְצָד), the root meaning a lair whence hunters seek their prey, and to which they can flee as unto a safe retreat (Gesen.); the word itself denoting the top or summit of a mountain, or mountain castle. This word in the LXX is tr^{d} in all these instances as ἡ περιοχή. Grove has also pointed out that Millo is rendered in every case (except 2 Ch 32^{5}) by the LXX as ἡ ἄκρα (the citadel), which they employ nowhere else in the OT. This word ἡ ἄκρα is also used both by Josephus and the Book of Maccabees for the fort or citadel overlooking the temple to the north-west, during the struggle with the Macedonian adherents of Antiochus, which was at last razed and the rocky hill levelled by Simon Maccabæus (Jos. Ant. XIII. vi. 7; BJ V. iv. 1; but cf. 1 Mac $1^{30f.}$ $14^{36f.}$). Sayce (PEFSt, 1883, p. 214) also points to a 'stronghold of Zion' on the lower hill taken by David before he stormed the Jebusite citadel on the upper hill;* and states further, 'The dual form Jerushalaim, which apparently goes back to the time of the Maccabees, probably refers to the old division of Jerusalem into the lower city and the temple-hill.' The whole testimony appears, therefore, to be in favour of a Jerusalem separated into two portions—one called the lair or stronghold, which is the city of David, the other called the Millo or citadel. Now, the Book of Nehemiah clearly seems to place the city of David on the spur of Ophel south of the temple, above Siloam (Neh 3^{16} 12^{37}). Again, Josephus, while placing ἡ ἄκρα (the citadel) to the north-west of the temple, also speaks of the lower part of the city being taken by David, and places it near Ophel. The Books of Maccabees speak of the same citadel (ἡ ἄκρα) as Josephus does, and call the temple mount Sion (1 Mac 4^{37} 5^{54}). It therefore appears, that to accept the Ophel spur as the city of David or Zion, and the high ground east of the holy sepulchre as the Millo or citadel of the ancient Jerusalem, will satisfy the various data in the OT, the Books of Maccabees, and Josephus. We thus arrive at the conclusion that the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin, which went up the valley of Hinnom, was drawn south of either the spur of Ophel or of the citadel (ἡ ἄκρα), or of both.

The next point to ascertain is the position of En-rogel; and this seems comparatively easy, as there appears to be a consensus of opinion at the present day that it corresponds to the copious Virgin's Fountain. It is the only known fountain in the vicinity of Jerusalem. The Bîr Eyûb is a well and not a spring, the water being 70 to 80 ft. below the surface of the ground in summer. In a land where there are so few springs, this alone ought to identify it. The Virgin's Fountain is close to the stone Zehweileh, which Ganneau has identified as the stone Zoheleth, which is close to En-rogel (1 K 1^9). This position of En-rogel satisfies the requirements of the two passages (2 S 17^{17}, 1 K 1^9). Josephus describes it in two passages (Ant. VII. xiv. 4, IX. x. 4) as close to the royal gardens, and the Book of Nehemiah places the king's garden near Siloam (Neh 3^{15}). The Virgin's Fountain also appears to be Gihon-in-the-valley (Siloam being Gihon). Thus Hezekiah stopped the upper outlet at the Virgin's Fountain (Gihon) and brought it through the rock to Siloam (2 Ch 32^{30}) to the west side of the city of David, the city of David being on Ophel.

The third point to ascertain is the general position of the 'mountain that lieth before the valley of H. westward.' Assuming that the fountain of Nephtoah is identified with 'Ain Lifta, about 2½ miles to the north-west of Jerusalem, the mountain which lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward appears to be the high ground immediately north of Jerusalem, which, though not exactly a mountain, is the highest ground in the neighbourhood, from which valleys start in all directions to the Mediterranean and Dead Sea. The site of the Russian hospice may be said to occupy the position of this mountain. The line of boundary between Judah and Benjamin may now be traced from En-shemesh (east of Jerusalem) to En-rogel, thence up the valley of Kidron to a point opposite to the southern side of the temple, thence across the temple courts south of the temple, and up the valley on the south side of Akra to the Jaffa gate, and thence north by the Russian hospice to Lifta. Under this disposition the valley of Kidron becomes the valley of Hinnom; but it is suggested, that while the Kidron is only the name for the small narrow portion of the valley east of the temple, the valley of Hinnom is the name of the whole valley reaching from near the Russian hospice to the Dead Sea, which is now called Wâdy en-Nâr or the Valley of Fire. 'The head of this valley of Hinnom or Kidron commences near the Jaffa road, a mile and a half north-west of Jerusalem, and runs along the northern side of the Tombs of the Kings' (Recovery of Jerus. p. 291). Thus the boundary-line, after leaving the valley of H. on the east of the temple, again approaches it north-west of Jerusalem at the highest point of the land, i.e. to the 'top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward' (Jos 15^8).

As all writers appear to concur in considering that the position of Tophet in the valley of Hinnom was in the vicinity of Siloam, near the junction of the three valleys which are about Jerusalem, on the level ground there, it seems quite immaterial, so far as Tophet is concerned, which of those valleys was Hinnom, and the interest in this matter lies in the question, already answered, connected with the topography of Jerusalem as to the position of the city of David.

A brief description is here given of these three valleys—

(1) The Kidron Valley will alone suit the requirements of Jos 15^8 18^{16}, if En-rogel is to be accepted as identical with the Virgin's Fountain in the Kidron, as from thence the line 'went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom.' This identification allows of the partition of Jerusalem between Judah and Benjamin, and suits the requirements of OT, Books of Maccabees, Josephus, Talmudists, Jerome, and Jewish and Arab tradition. It also meets the requirement of Jos 15^8 and 18^{16}, under which the boundary-line twice approaches the valley of H.,—first at En-rogel, and secondly at the top of the mountain before the valley of H. eastward. Against this identification is the use of the word gai in connexion with the valley gate; but this objection is involved in the identification itself of the naḥal Kidron and the gai Hinnom as one and the same.

(2) The centre valley (or Tyropœon of Josephus), reaching from near the Jaffa gate or the Damascus gate to Siloam, has been identified by W. R. Smith (Encyc. Brit.^{9} 'Jerusalem'), Sayce (PEFSt, 1883, p. 213), Birch (PEFSt, p. 179), and Schwartz (Das H. L. p. 190), as the valley of Hinnom. This appears to necessitate the Bîr Eyûb being identified as En-rogel, although Birch expressly states that the Virgin's Fountain is En-rogel. The line passing up the Tyropœon Valley separates the eastern mount from the western, and thus places part of the city, but none of the temple courts, in Judah. The difficulty about adopting this valley as the valley of H. is that it exists only in Jerusalem. It begins at the Damascus gate or at the Jaffa gate, and ends at the pool of Siloam. It is an important division in the city of Jerusalem, but it is very insignificant compared with the valleys to east and west of the city. It cannot fulfil either of the conditions of extending as far as the mountain that lieth before the valley of H., or as far as the 'ēmeḳ where Tophet was: a glance at the map or model will show that it is a geographical impossibility to consider the gardens below Siloam as part of the central valley. These gardens clearly belong to the junction of the east and west valleys. There is thus no part of the central valley where the high places of Tophet and Baal could have been built.

(3) The identification of the Wâdy er-Rubâbeh as the valley of H. has hitherto been generally accepted among Western writers, though Jewish

* On the other hand, it may be maintained that 2 S 5^8 simply describes the manner of the conquest of v.^{7}, and that 'Zion' was the Jebusite stronghold. The passage is certainly ambiguous.

Arab tradition is against it. This valley commences as an 'ēmeḳ to the north-west of Jerusalem, and fulfils the condition of reaching 'the mountain which lieth over against the valley of H. to the westward'; it passes W.S.W. towards the Jaffa gate, then to south, and again trends round to the west and joins the Kidron near Siloam, thus compassing Jerusalem to the west and south. Two large reservoirs are built in it—the Birket Mamilla above, and the Birket es-Sultân below the Jaffa gate; its description in detail is given in the article JERUSALEM. At the junction of this valley with the Kidron it again forms an 'ēmeḳ or fields (Jer 31^{40}). But to identify the Wâdy er-Rubâbeh with the valley of H. appears to require En-rogel to be located at the Bîr Eyûb, and the whole of Jerusalem to be in Benjamin.

The junction of the east and west valleys cannot be considered to belong to one valley more than the other, and, so far as localizing Tophet, all will allow that the valley of H. extended to this junction. It is stated by Jeremiah (7^{32}) that the valley of H. in the vicinity of Tophet shall be called the 'valley of slaughter,' 'for they shall bury in Tophet till there be no more place'; later on he prophesies (31^{40}), 'and the whole valley ('ēmeḳ) of the dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields unto the brook Kidron, unto the corner of the horse gate to the east, shall be holy unto the Lord.' This seems clearly to point to the ground stretching from above the Virgin's Fountain to the Bîr Eyûb, including the mouth of Wâdy er-Rubâbeh. Now, this land is here described as 'ēmeḳ, although Kidron is termed a naḥal, and the valley of H. (wherever located) is termed a gai. This ground is also called fields (shĕdēmōth, Jer 31^{40} [Ḳerê]), and the 'king's garden' by Siloam (Neh 3^{15}), probably the same as the king's dale ('ēmeḳ), where Absalom raised a pillar (2 S 18^{18}), stated by Josephus (Ant. VII. x. 3) to be 2 furlongs from Jerusalem. Josephus also relates that the 'king's paradise' or 'garden' was in the vicinity of En-rogel, where Adonijah conspired against king David (1 K 1^{9}; Ant. VII. xiv. 4, IX. x. 4). Perhaps this may be the 'king's dale' or 'vale' ('ēmeḳ) of Shaveh (Gn 14^{17}), where Melchizedek met Abraham. The garden of Uzza is not located (2 K 21^{18}). This junction of the valleys may be the valley ('ēmeḳ) of Jehoshaphat or of decision (Jl $3^{2.12.14}$), where all nations shall be judged in 'the day of the LORD,' thus agreeing with the tradition of Christians, Moslems, and Jews for many centuries. See JEHOSHAPHAT (VALLEY OF). The 'king's gardens' were in the immediate vicinity of the remarkable waterworks constructed by the kings of Judah. The Virgin's Fountain is identified as Gihon in the valley (2 Ch 33^{14}), the upper outlet of which was stopped by king Hezekiah, who 'brought it straight down by an underground way on the west side of the city of David' (2 K 20^{20}, 2 Ch 32^{30}). This account exactly describes the rock-cut passage which runs through the Ophel spur to Siloam. There is, however, a still more ancient watercourse by which the Virgin's Fountain supplied the city of David with water (discovered by the present writer in 1868), and this waterduct has been identified by some as the 'gutter' by which Joab got up into the city of the Jebusites. On the outside of the Virgin's Fountain can still be seen the old conduit which led the overflow waters down the Kidron, and which may be identified as the conduit of the upper pool in the highway of the fuller's field (2 K 18^{17}, Is 7^{3} 36^{2}). It may possibly also be the 'king's pool' (Neh 2^{14}). The pool between the two walls at Siloam is also mentioned (Is $22^{9.11}$, Neh 3^{15}). But perhaps the greatest instance yet known of the magnitude of the waterworks of the past in the valley of Hinnom is the remarkable aqueduct cut in the rock running down the Wâdy en-Nâr below the Bîr Eyûb, discovered and cleared out in 1868 for several hundred yards, and serving for no apparent purpose. This seems probably the aqueduct to carry off 'the brook that overflowed through the midst of the land,' for 'Why should the kings of Assyria come, and find much water?' (2 Ch 32^{4}).

HIP.—The only occurrence of this word in AV is in the proverbial expression Jg 15^{8} 'And he smote them hip and thigh (שׁוֹק עַל־יָרֵךְ) with a great slaughter.' The Heb. is lit. 'leg upon thigh,' but the origin of the phrase is quite unknown. The phrase 'hip and thigh' comes from the Gen. Bible, which offers in the marg. 'horsemen and footmen,' the suggestion of Targ.; but that does not explain the expression. Nor is Kimchi's 'heels over head,' in reference to their flight, more likely or more lucid. Others suppose the meaning to be that they were cut in pieces, and limb piled on limb in bloody confusion. We may compare 'catch one or have one on the hip,' supposed to belong to the language of wrestling, and found in Shaks. and elsewhere, as Merch. of Venice, I. iii. 47—

> 'If I can catch him once upon the hip,
> I will feed fat the ancient grudge I bear him.'

RV introduces 'hip' into Gn $32^{32\,bis}$ 'the sinew of the hip,' for AV 'the sinew which shrank.' See SINEW. J. HASTINGS.

HIPPOPOTAMUS.—See BEHEMOTH.

HIRAH (חִירָה).—The Adullamite with whom Judah, according to the story of Gn 38 (J), appears to have entered into a kind of partnership in the matter of flocks (see Dillm. ad loc.). In vv.$^{12.20}$ he is called the 'friend' (רֵעַ) of Judah. Instead of רֵעֵהוּ, the LXX must have read רֹעֵהוּ 'his shepherd,' for in both these verses it has ποιμήν. This reading is followed also by Vulg. (pastor, opilio) and Luther (Hirte), but there can be little doubt that it is wrong. From v.^{1} it is evident that Hirah's relation to Judah was an independent one, even if Judah was the more important man of the two. After Tamar had successfully carried out her stratagem, it was by the hand of his 'friend' Hirah that Judah sent the promised kid to the supposed ḳĕdēshāh, Gn $38^{20\text{ff.}}$ J. A. SELBIE.

HIRAM (חִירָם; Χειράμ).—Some confusion exists as to the actual form of the name. In the books of Samuel and Kings the form given above is that which is usually adopted; but in 1 K $5^{10.18}$ [Heb. $^{24.32}$] 7^{40} Hirom (חִירוֹם) occurs, while the Chronicler adheres to the form Huram (חוּרָם; in 1 Ch 14^{1} Kethîbh חירם). The LXX invariably gives Χειράμ; Josephus Εἴρωμος (c. Apion. i. 17, 18) and Εἴραμος (Ant. VIII. ii. 6, etc.). The name further appears as Σίρωμος (Herodotus, vii. 98; Syncellus, p. 343 ff.) and Σούρων (Eupolemon cited by Eusebius, Præp. Evang. ix. 33, 34). The name is undoubtedly Phœnician, and is equivalent to Ahiram (אֲחִירָם Nu 26^{38}) = 'brother of the exalted one';* cf. Baethgen, Beiträge zur Semit. Religionsgeschichte, p. 156 (but see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 75 ff., upon whose theory the meaning is 'brother is exalted'). According to Movers (Die Phönizier, i. p. 505 f.), Hiram or Huram is the name of a deity = 'the coiled or twisted one'; but this derivation is very improbable.

* Names of this type are especially common in Phœnician; cf. Abibaal, Abiram. Similar instances of the dropping of the initial א occur in Hebrew (Hiel, 1 K 16^{34} חִיאֵל, for אֲחִיאֵל), and in Phœnician (חמלכת, חמלך = 'brother of Milk,' 'of Milkath'; חתמלכת = 'sister of Milkath').

1. King of Tyre, and contemporary with David and Solomon. According to 2 S 5^{11}, 1 Ch 14^{1}, H. sent an embassy to David after the conquest of Jerusalem, and provided him with artisans and materials for the building of his palace. On the accession of Solomon messengers were again sent to the Israelite court, doubtless to offer congratulations to the new king (1 K $5^{1f.}$). A treaty was concluded between the two kingdoms, in accordance with which H. supplied cedar trees and fir trees from Lebanon, together with skilled workmen for the building of the temple. In return, Solomon paid a yearly tribute of 20,000 cors of wheat and 20,000 baths of pure oil (after the reading of LXX, 2 Ch and Josephus; the Hebrew gives '20 cors of oil,' 1 K 5^{6-11}). At the end of the twenty years 'wherein Solomon had built the two houses, the house of the LORD and the king's house,' he presented Hiram with twenty cities in the land of Galilee. The gift, however, failed to please the Phœnician king,* though in return he made Solomon a present of 120 talents of gold (1 K 9^{10-14}). The friendly relations between the two monarchs were further strengthened by their combined trading operations: for 'the king (Solomon) had at sea a navy of Tarshish with the navy of Hiram: once every three years came the navy of Tarshish, bringing gold and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks' (1 K 10^{22}, 2 Ch 9^{21}). In addition to this, we are expressly told that the sailors of Solomon's merchant vessels trading between Ezion-geber (at the top of the Gulf of Akabah) and Ophir were accompanied by Hiram's servants, 'shipmen that had knowledge of the sea' (1 K 9^{26-28}, 2 Ch $8^{17.18}$), and were well acquainted with the route to Ophir (1 K 10^{11}).

In the Chronicler's account of Solomon's dealings with Hiram (2 Ch $2^{3f.}$) the yearly tribute paid by the former is increased to '20,000 measures of beaten wheat, and 20,000 measures of barley, and 20,000 baths of wine, and 20,000 baths of oil,' and is applied to the maintenance of the Tyrian workpeople.

This statement seems due to some confusion on the part of the Chronicler: probably a certain quantity of wheat and pure oil was supplied to the Phœnician court, and a similar contribution of barley, wine, and oil handed over to 'the hewers that cut timber.' The Book of Kings only mentions the former payment, which the Chronicler incorrectly combines with a second statement (apparently obtained from another source) relating to the workpeople only. A more striking discrepancy between the two accounts occurs at 2 Ch $8^{1.2}$, where the Chronicler, who ignores the present of gold made by Hiram to Solomon (1 K 9^{14}), refers to the cities of Galilee as if they had been presented to Solomon by Hiram. The omission, as well as the contradiction of the statement of 1 K $9^{11f.}$, is probably due to the desire of the Chronicler to bring the history more into conformity with the views of his own age. According to the later conception it would be as improbable that Solomon, with his fabulous riches, should receive gold from Hiram, as that he should present Israelite cities to a foreign monarch.

A more serious difficulty, however, confronts us when we compare the biblical narrative with the information supplied by Josephus from the Tyrian historians, Menander and Dius (Ant. VIII. ii. 6–9, v. 3; c. Apion. i. 17, 18). According to the latter, Hiram was the son of Abibaal, and died at the age of 53 after a glorious reign of 34 years. Now, we have already seen that the building of David's palace followed immediately after the capture of Jerusalem (2 S 5^{11}), i.e. in the seventh year of David's reign. It is further stated (1 K $9^{10f.}$) that Hiram was still alive in the twentieth year of Solomon's reign, so that, according to the biblical narrative, the total length of his reign must have exceeded 50 years. The disagreement between the two accounts is made even clearer by the statement of Josephus (Ant. VIII. iii. 1), that the building of the temple began in the 11th year of Hiram. For the temple was begun in the 4th year of Solomon (1 K 6^{1}), so that Hiram and David could have reigned only 8 years contemporaneously. It has been conjectured by Ewald (Gesch. iii. p. 307) and Bertheau (on 2 Ch 2^{2}) that the Hiram of David's reign was the grandfather of Solomon's contemporary. Thenius, on the other hand (on 2 S 5^{11}, 1 K 5^{1}), supposes that Abibaal was merely an honorary title, and that both father and son were called Hiram. The most probable solution of the difficulty is that the Books of Samuel are not chronologically arranged, and that David's palace was not actually built until the end of his reign (Movers, Die Phönizier, ii. 1, p. 148 f.; see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF).

Josephus further recounts (Ant. VIII. v. 3; c. Apion. i. 17, 18), on the authority of Menander and Dius, that Solomon and Hiram engaged in a contest with riddles, in which the former was finally overcome by a young Tyrian named Abdemon. In another passage (Ant. VIII. ii. 6–7) he sets forth the letters which passed between the two kings on the subject of the building of the temple, and asserts that copies were preserved, not only in Jewish books, but in the Tyrian state-records (cf. 2 Ch 2^{11}). In all probability, these letters are to be ascribed to Josephus himself; they are given at greater length by Eupolemon (Eusebius, Præp. Evang. ix. 33, 34), and are mentioned by Alexander Polyhistor (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 21). According to Clem. Alex. (loc. cit.) and Tatian (Or. c. Græcos, § 37), Solomon married the daughter of Hiram (cf. 1 K $11^{2.5}$, where Zidonians are mentioned among Solomon's wives).

Among the more important events of the glorious reign of Hiram may be mentioned (1) the campaign against the inhabitants of Cyprus, who had refused to pay the customary tribute; (2) the fortification of the island of Tyre; (3) the erection of new temples to Hercules and Astarte. H. further restored many old sanctuaries and enriched one of the chief temples (that of Zeus-Baalsamin) with numerous golden ornaments, in particular with a golden pillar (mentioned by Herodotus, ii. 44). See Movers, Die Phönizier, II. i. 141 f.

2. The artificer procured by king Solomon from Tyre for the purpose of casting the various vessels and ornaments of brass for the temple (1 K $7^{13f.}$): acc. to 2 Ch 2^{13}, he was also 'skilful to work in gold and in silver . . . in iron, in stone, and in timber, in purple, in blue, and in fine linen, and in crimson.' The more important of his works were the two pillars of brass, the molten sea and the twelve oxen, the ten bases and the ten lavers, all of brass, besides the vessels of brass required for the temple service. According to 1 K 7 his mother was a widow woman of the tribe of Naphtali, and his father a Tyrian brassworker. The Chronicler, however, describes him as 'Huram Abi * (חוּרָם אָבִי ;

---

* 1 K 9^{13} 'and he called them the land of Cabul.' Cabul is usually taken as = 'worth nothing.' It is more probable that the LXX ὅριον represents the truer reading, viz. 'land of Galilee' (אֶרֶץ הַגָּלִיל, supposing him to have connected the word with גָּלָל 'dung.' See Klostermann in loc.). Buhl (GAP p. 221), however, considers that the territory lay somewhere near the town of that name (Jos 19^{27}) in N. Galilee: in this case the LXX ὅριον is treated as a mistranslation of כָּבוּל, as if גְּבוּל.

* The word 'Abi' (אָבִי 'my father') is usually taken (Bertheau on 2 Ch 2^{13}) in the sense of 'master,' a title of respect and distinction; cf. Gn 4^{20-22} 45^{8} etc.

4^{16} חוּרָם אָבִיו), the son of a woman of the daughters of Dan' (2 Ch $2^{13f.}$). As Giesebrecht has shown (ZATW, 1881, p. 239 f., but see Cheyne in Expository Times, June 1898, p. 471^{a}), it is probable that the Chronicler has here preserved the truer account; the latter portion of the name was omitted as unintelligible by the author of Kings (cf. LXX to 2 Ch 2^{13} τὸν πατέρα μου, παῖδα μου). He further suggests that the dislike felt by the editor of Kings to the idea of the temple being built by a half-Phœnician, caused him to insert the words 'a widow of the tribe of Naphtali' (אַלְמָנָה . . . מִמַּטֵּה נַפְתָּלִי), the alteration of מִבְּנוֹת דָּן ('of the daughters of Dan') into מִמַּטֵּה נַפְתָּלִי ('of the tribe of Naphtali') being the more permissible, since Dan lay in the territory of Naphtali. Josephus (Ant. VIII. iii. 4) describes him as of the tribe of Naphtali on his mother's side, his father being Ur of the stock of Israel (cf. on this later tradition Ed. König in Expos. Times, May 1898, p. 346^{a}).

J. F. STENNING.

HIRE, HIRELING.—Hire in AV is equivalent always to mod. wages. Thus Gn 31^{8} 'The ring-straked shall be thy hire'; Is 23^{18} 'And her merchandise and her hire shall be holiness to the LORD' (Del. 'her gain and her wages become holy unto J"'); Mic 3^{11} 'The heads thereof judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire'; Lk 10^{7} 'the labourer is worthy of his hire.' Tindale has the word very much as in the mod. use in Mk 12^{1} 'And let yt out to hyre unto husbandmen.' The plu. 'hires,' now obsolete, occurs once in AV, Mic 1^{7} 'All the hires thereof shall be burned with fire.' So Wyc. (1388) in Lv 25^{53}, Ezk 16^{33}, and (1380) Ro 6^{23} 'Treuli the hyris of synne, deeth' (1388, 'For the wagis of synne is deth').

A hireling is a hired servant (for which see FAMILY, vol. i. p. 849^{a}), and properly carries no suggestion of unfaithfulness. Thus Tindale, Works, i. 146, 'Hereby mayest thou not understand that we obtain the favour of God, and the inheritance of life, through the merits of good works, as hirelings do their wages.' So Rhem. has 'hireling' in Lk $15^{17.19}$, where all the other VSS have 'hired servant.' And cf. Sir 7^{20} 'Whereas thy servant worketh truly, entreat him not evil, nor the hireling that bestoweth himself wholly for thee.' But through Christ's use of the word in Jn $10^{12.13}$ it has come to express not only one who has no interest in his work, but even one who is unfaithful in the doing of it. Gosson (Schoole of Abuse, Arber's ed. p. 25) says, 'Poetrie and pyping have allwaies bene so united togither, that til the time of Melanippides, Pipers were Poets hyerlings; but marke I pray you, how they are nowe both abused.' The word 'hireling' is now as greatly abused as either, being carried quite beyond our Lord's meaning and intention. Shaks. does not use the word; but Milton (PL iv. 193) gives us—

'So clomb this first grand Thief into God's fold;
So since into his church lewd hirelings climb.'

Then South, Sermons, iv. No. 5—'If we consider even Judas himself, it was not his carrying the bag, while he followed his master, but his following his master only that he might carry the bag, which made him a thief and an hireling.' Finally, Cowper, Truth—

'But with averted eyes th' omniscient Judge
Scorns the base hireling, and the slavish drudge.'

J. HASTINGS.

HIS.—Under an impression, probably, that the 's of the poss. case was a shortened form of his (though it is really the remains of the Anglo-Saxon genitive ending -es), this adj. was employed throughout a long period to indicate possession. It probably arose from a desire to avoid adding s to a word which already had that sound, perhaps more than once. Hence it is generally found after words ending in s, and especially after proper names. Thus Ridley, Brefe Declaration (Moule's ed.), p. 119, 'Innocentius his fantastical invention'; and p. 140, 'Duns his fantastical imagination'; Knox, Hist. p. 101, 'Secondarily, said he, I greatly doubt whether James his commandment or Pauls obedience, proceeded of the holy Ghost'; Fuller, Holy Warre, I. 3 (p. 4), 'But his Holinesse his converting facultie worketh the strongest at the greatest distance.' It is freely employed, however, where there is no need to avoid repeating s. Thus Cranmer, Works (Parker Soc.), i. 2, 'And where he had reasons for the King his party, that he was moved of God his law, which doth straitly forbid and that with many great threats, that no man shall marry his brother his wife.' And, on the other hand, old writers had not so nice an ear as we ourselves in the matter of multiplying sibilants. We find in Cranmer, Works, i. 18, 'the King's Grace's most honourable Council,' and p. 151, 'the King's Highness's realm'; * and in Hall (Works, ii. 190) even 'We are Moseses disciples.' The idiom indeed was left after a time to the caprice or taste of the writer. Tindale gives us in Mt 22^{32} 'I am Abrahams God, and Ysaacks God, and the God of Jacob.'

In AV 1611 his was used for the poss. case in 1 K 15^{14} 'Asa his heart was perfect with the LORD all his dayes,' and in Est 3^{4} 'to see whether Mordecai his matters would stand.' In 1762 these were changed into the usual form with 's. But in the heading of Dt 10 'Moses his suit' remains, and even 'Sarai her name' in Gn 17^{heading}, and the foll. examples of his are still found in the Apocr., 1 Es 1^{heading} 2^{30} $3^{7.8}$, To 1^{heading}, Jth 12^{16} 13^{9} 15^{11}. Three$^{\text{heading}}$ 2 Mac 1^{33m} 4^{38} 12^{22}; and in the Translators' Preface we find, 'Doth not their Paris edition differ from the Lovaine, and Hortensius his from them both,' and 'We might be taxed peradventure with S. James his words.'

For his=its, see ITS. J. HASTINGS.

HITHERTO was formerly an adv. of space as well as of time, as in Shaks. I Henry IV. III. i. 74—

'England, from Trent and Severn hitherto,
By south and east, is to my part assigned.'

So in AV, Job 38^{11} 'Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further' (עַד־פֹּה); 2 S 7^{18}=1 Ch 17^{16} 'Who am I, O LORD God, and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?' (עַד־הֲלֹם, RV 'thus far'). Even when the ref. is to time, 'hitherto' was used in a sense that is now unfamiliar, expressing not only what has been up till now, but what is still going on. In Jn 16^{24} 'Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name,' the meaning is that that which is true up till now is no longer to be so. But in Jn 5^{17} 'My Father worketh hitherto, and I work,' though the Gr. (ἕως ἄρτι) is the same, the meaning is that the work still goes on (RV 'even until now'). Cf. Hamilton's Catechism, fol. 14^{b} 'Quhat is the trew sence of the same bukis is ye consent and authorite of our mother the haly kirk, fra the Apostils tyme hitherto'; and Udal, Erasmus Paraphrase, ii. fol. 279^{a} 'He is as yet hitherto alyve, that the hater wisheth evill unto, and yet he him selfe is al ready dead. That mans life is safe: and this hath lost everlasting lyfe, being his owne murtherour.' J. HASTINGS.

HITTITES (חִתִּי Ḥittî, pl. Ḥittîm,† Χετταῖοι).—In Jos 1^{4} the country between the Lebanon and the Euphrates is described as 'the land of the

---

* Cf. Lk 4^{38} 'Simon's wife's mother.'

† The proper name חֵת Ḥeth (Gn 10^{15} 23^{3}) may be an assimilation to the Bab. name Khatti which we find in contract-tablets of the age of Abraham.

Hittites,' which is more closely defined in Jg 1^{26} as to the north of Palestine. In 2 S 24^{6} the unintelligible and corrupt 'Tahtim-hodshi' must be corrected into 'the Hittites of Kadesh,' according to a corrected reading of the LXX (Luc. εἰς γῆν Χεττιειμ Καδής), so that the power of David extended northward as far as Kadesh on the Orontes close to the lake of Homs. Solomon imported horses from 'the kings of the Hittites,' as well as from the kings of Aram, from Egypt, or perhaps a northern Miẓir, and (according to a suggestion of Fr. Lenormant) from Ḳue on the Gulf of Antioch, the price of a horse being 150 shekels of silver (about £25, 1 K $10^{28.29}$). These northern 'kings of the Hittites' were supposed by the Syrians of Damascus, when they were besieging Samaria at a later date, to have been 'hired' against them by the king of Israel (2 K 7^{6}).

Besides the northern Hittites, other Hittites, or 'sons of Heth,' are mentioned in the OT as inhabiting the south of Palestine. Abraham found them at Hebron (Gn 23^{3} 25^{10}); in Nu 13^{29} the Hittites are named along with the Jebusites and Amorites as dwelling in the mountains of Canaan; and Ezk (16^{3}) declares that the father of Jerus. was an Amorite, and its mother a Hittite. These southern Hittites are probably alone meant in Gn 10^{15}, though, as the Hamathites are also included among the children of Canaan, it is possible that the northern Hittites may be referred to as well. 'Uriah the Hittite' (2 S 12) may have belonged to the Hittites of the south, like the two Hittite wives of Esau (Gn 26^{34} 36^{2}; cf. 27^{46}).

On the Egyp. monuments the Khata or Hittites are first mentioned in the Annals of Thothmes III. of the 18th dynasty (B.C. 1503–1449). In B.C. 1470 the Pharaoh marched to the banks of the Euphrates and received the tribute of the land of the Hittites, 'the Greater,' consisting of 8 rings of silver 400 lb. in weight, and 'a great piece of crystal.' In B.C. 1463 tribute was again sent from 'the king of the Greater Hittite land.' Thothmes IV., the grandson of Thothmes III., repulsed an attack made by the Hittites upon Tunip (now Tennib) in N. Syria, and his two successors, Amenôphis (Amen-hotep) III. and IV., as we learn from the Tel el-Amarna tablets, were constantly called on to oppose the Hittite 'king,' who led his forces through the passes of the Taurus into the Egyp. province of N. Syria, or intrigued with disaffected Canaanites in Palestine. We hear, finally, of Eta-gama, the native governor of Kadesh on the Orontes, joining with the king of the Hittites and the king of Mitanni or Aram-naharaim against the Egyptians.

The decay of the Egyp. power in Syria enabled the Hittites to establish themselves, not only at Carchemish on the Euphrates, but also in the Amorite city of Kadesh on the Orontes, near the lake of Homs. Seti I., the second king of the 19th dynasty, claims to have overthrown them. They were ruled at the time by Mutal, the son of Mul-sar, who had been murdered, and who was the son of Saplil. Ramses II., the successor of Seti, continued the war. In the 5th year of the Pharaoh's reign (B.C. 1343), Ramses, while besieging Kadesh, saved himself from a Hittite ambuscade only by performing prodigies of valour, which formed the subject of a sort of epic on the part of the court-poet Pentaür. In the 21st year of Ramses (B.C. 1327) a treaty, offensive and defensive, was made between him and 'the great king of the Hittites,' Khata-sar, who had succeeded his brother Mutal, which put an end to the war. Among other stipulations it was agreed that all political refugees on either side should be pardoned. The observance of the treaty was placed under the protection of the Hittite and Egyptian deities, and the Hittite text of it was engraved on a silver plate, on which was an image of the god Sutekh embracing the Hittite king. The plate was brought to Egypt by the Hittite ambassador Tar-Tiseb. The treaty was faithfully kept, being cemented by the marriage of the daughter of the Hittite king to Ramses, and Kadesh continued to mark the southern limit of Hittite rule.

In the Aramæan districts south of the Taurus the Hittites do not seem to have been more than a conquering caste, and their power was broken by the invasion of the hordes from the islands and coasts of the Greek seas, who poured through Syria and the land of the Amorites into Egypt in the reign of Ramses III. of the 20th dynasty. When the Assyr. monuments, in the time of Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1100), first begin to refer to the Khattâ (also written Khatê), in place of a single Hittite king who is able to summon allies from the distant regions of Asia Minor, we find a number of separate Hittite states. Of these Carchemish seems to have been the wealthiest and most important. The Assyrians penetrated into Kummukh (Commagênê), and compelled Sadi-Tesub (or Sadi-Anteru), son of Khattu-sar, the Hittite king, to become tributary. The name of Khattu-sar is plainly the same as that of the opponent of Ramses II.

In B.C. 880 Assur-naẓir-pal, the Assyr. king, received tribute from Sangara of Carchemish, and forced his way over the fords of the Euphrates to the west. His successor, Shalmaneser II. (B.C. 854), defeated a league of Hittites and Aramæans from Kummukh and the adjoining countries, of which Sangara was the head. The Assyrians had already extended the name of 'Hittite' from the Hittites proper to all the inhabitants of Syria and Palestine, and we find Shalmaneser II. including even the kings of Israel, of Ammon, and of the Arabs, among the 'Hittite' princes. Just as the Babylonians had given the name of 'Amorites' to all the inhabitants of Syria and Palestine, the 'Amorites' having been the dominant people of the west when the Babylonians first became acquainted with it, so the fact that the Hittites were the first and most powerful of the antagonists whom the Assyrians encountered in their Syrian campaigns, caused the name of 'Hittite' in the Assyr. period to be applied to all the nations west of the Euphrates. The capture of Carchemish by Sargon in B.C. 717, and the death of its last king, Pisiris, broke up the Hittite power in northern Syria, and threw the trade of W. Asia into Assyr. hands.

The Hittites under the name of Khatê are mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions of Armenia or Ararat. In the 9th cent. B.C. Menuas, king of Biainas or Van, defeated the Hittite king Sada-halis, and sacked the towns of Surisilis and Tarkhi-gamas. His son and successor, Argistis I., continued the war and conquered the Hittite city of Milid (the modern Malatiyeh). The 'land of the Hittites' of the Vannic inscriptions extended along the banks of the Euphrates from Palu in the east to Malatiyeh in the west.

A study of the Hittite proper names preserved in the Egyp. and cuneiform texts goes to show that they all belonged to the same family of speech, and that they can be traced far to the westward in Asia Minor. Thus the names of the Hittite princes, Saplil, Mutal, and Khata-sar, mentioned by the Egyptians, reappear in those of Sapalulvi, Mutallu, and Khattu-sar, who, according to the Assyr. monuments, were kings of Gurgum (in the neighbourhood of Zinjerli, N. of the Gulf of Antioch) and of Kummukh or Commagênê, while Mutallu is the Motalos of certain Gr. inscriptions of Asia Minor. It is further clear from the Tel el-Amarna tablets that the Hittites were of Cappadocian origin, that they had poured down from the fastnesses of the Taurus and had occupied the Aramæan cities and fertile fields of northern Syria. We may further gather from the Egyp. records that in the 14th and 13th cent. B.C. they had not only established themselves so far to the south as Kadesh on the Orontes, but had founded a military empire, which enabled the king of Kadesh to summon allies and vassals from Asia Minor.

The Hittites, as represented on the Egyp. monuments, were an ugly race, with yellow skins, black hair and eyes, receding foreheads, and protrusive upper jaws. The type is still preserved among some of the Cappadocian peasantry, especially S.W. of Nigdeh in the neighbourhood of the ancient Tyana. They wore boots with upturned ends, originally intended for use among the snows of the Taurus mountains; but they became so characteristic a national dress that at the Ramesseum in Thebes even the Hittites of Kadesh, on the warm plains of Syria, are depicted as wearing them. Over a tunic they also wore a long robe, which was allowed to fall open on one side in walking, and they seem to have gathered the hair at the back of the head into a sort of pigtail.

A curious class of monuments has been discovered of late years in Asia Minor and northern Syria, on which all these characteristics are reproduced. The monuments consist of bas-reliefs in a peculiar style of art, and of inscriptions in an equally peculiar hieroglyphic system of writing. Both the sculptures and the inscriptions exhibit heads and figures with exactly the same features, the same pigtails, costume, and snow-shoes as those which the Egyp. artists assigned to the Hittites. As we learn from the Egyp. records that the Hittites had a script of their own, as, moreover, the monuments referred to are found in the region over which the Hittite power extended according to the Egyp. and Assyr. texts, while there is no other known power to which they can be ascribed, the conclusion is obvious that they must be the monuments of the people called Hittites by the Hebrews, Egyptians, Assyrians, and Armenians. A reminiscence of their empire is probably preserved in a passage of Solinus (ch. xli. p. 195, ed. Mommsen).

Hittite art was based on that of early Babylonia, though some of the later monuments of it are modelled on the Assyr. art of the 9th and 8th cent. B.C. But, though based on Babylonian art, the elements which had been borrowed were profoundly modified, and a new and remarkable style of art was thus developed. The Hittites seem to have had a special fancy for combining parts of different animals into strangely composite and sometimes grotesque forms. It was through the Hittites that the winged horse made its way into Europe, like the two-headed eagle, originally derived, it would seem, from the heraldic symbol of the ancient Bab. city of Lagas (Telloh), but in later days adopted by the Seljukian sultans, and borrowed from them by the Crusaders.

Hittite sculptures and inscriptions can be traced as far south in Syria as Hamah (Hamath), and as far westward in Asia Minor as Lydia. In the pass of Kara-bel, near the site of Sardis, are the figures of two Hittite warriors, one of them accompanied by Hittite hieroglyphs, and supposed by Herodotus (II. 106) to be memorials of Egyp. conquest, while other Hittite hieroglyphs have been found at the side of the so-called 'Weeping Niobê' on Mount Sipylus. From the fact that the figures in the pass are those of warriors, and that in such of the inscriptions as are legible, including one discovered by Ramsay in Phrygia, the characters which denote the grammatical affixes are always the same, we may infer that the Hittite monuments, both of Syria and of Asia Minor, all belong to one people, and that the more distant of them imply conquest on the part of a great military power rather than artistic influence. The influence of Hittite art, which can be traced into prehistoric Greece, is of a different character.

There is a bilingual inscription, in cuneiform and Hittite characters, on the silver 'boss' of Tarkondêmos, but it has proved insufficient to furnish a key to the interpretation of the inscriptions. A brilliant attempt has been made, indeed, by Jensen (ZDMG, 1894, pp. 235 ff., 429 ff.), of which Hilprecht speaks very highly (Rec. Res. in Bible Lands, p. 178, 'correct in its principal results'; cf. Bab. Exped. of Pennsyl. i. 13, 'Jensen has forced the Hittite sphinx to surrender her long guarded secret'). The present writer cannot assent to Hilprecht's verdict. All we can gather with certainty is that the hieroglyphs are partly ideographic, partly phonetic; that some of them are determinatives; that the lines read alternately from right to left, and from left to right; and that the grammatical relations are marked by affixes. Most of the inscriptions are in relief. The proper names of genuine Hittite origin found in the Egyp. and Assyr. texts are non-Semitic, and a comparison of them goes to show that the nom. sing. of the noun was characterized by the suffix -s. As the Hittites ruled over an Aramaic population in N. Syria, we naturally find Aramæan by the side of Hittite names. The Hittite hieroglyphs were of native origin, and may have been selected from an older pictorial system of writing, once used in Asia Minor, of which certain characters on two seals discovered at Yuzghât, on the one side, and the Cretan pictographs recently brought to light by Evans, on the other side, may be further relics.

The primitive home of the Hittite race was probably Cappadocia. Here, at any rate, in the ruins of Boghaz Keui and Eyuk, to the east of the Halys, are the remains of two of their most important cities. Boghaz Keui seems to have been a centre of religious worship, and the figures of numerous deities are carved in relief upon its rocks. The mural crown worn by some of the goddesses passed westward into Greek art. Ramsay (Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, I. pp. xiii–xv, 1895) has pointed out that the ancient high-roads which intersected Asia Minor and led to northern Syria met at Boghaz Keui, indicating that here was the centre of an empire which once extended from Kadesh on the Orontes to the shores of the Ægean.

The relation between the Hittites of N. Syria and the Hittites of Genesis and Ezekiel who lived in S. Palestine is uncertain. We may infer, however, from the identity of name, that in the view of the biblical writers the two populations were connected in race. This is supported by the fact that, according to the Egyp. monuments, the Hittites and Amorites were interlocked in the north, just as they were, according to the OT, in the south. It is further verified by the expression, 'the land of the Hittites, the Greater,' used by Thothmes III., which implies that there was another lesser Hittite-land, as well as by a bas-relief at Karnak in which the people of Ashkelon are represented with characteristically Hittite features. This shows that a fragment of the Hittite race must have been settled in the south of Palestine (but see Gray, Expos. May, 1898, p. 340 f.).

A. H. SAYCE.

HIVITES (חִוִּי, always with the art. collectively,

חִוִּי; Εὐαῖοι).—The name of one of the petty tribes inhabiting Canaan, who were dispossessed by the Israelites. To judge from the passages which localize them most definitely, their home was in Central Palestine; in Jos 9^{7} (JE) and 11^{19} (D^{2}) the inhabitants of Gibeon, about 6 miles N.N.W. of Jerusalem, and (it seems to be implied in 9^{17}) of certain neighbouring cities, are called Hivites; in Gn 34^{2} (P; or [Corn.] E) the term is applied to Hamor, father of Shechem (who is here represented as an individual),* likewise a city in Central Palestine (Gn 33^{18}, Jg 9 etc.), 30 miles N. of Jerusalem; 2 S 24^{7} is ambiguous; but the statement that Joab passed from Zidon, through 'all the cities of the Hivites' to Beersheba, in the S. of Judah, is evidently quite consistent with the same locality. The expression, 'all the cities of the Hivites,' in this passage is, however, peculiar, and would seem to point to a somewhat considerable group of cities, still inhabited by Hivites, and possibly even further to the N. than Shechem. But if such existed, we do not know more about them; and it is remarkable that in the accounts in Jos 16^{10} $17^{12\text{-}13.\,14\text{-}18}$, Jg 1 of the districts which the Israelites failed to conquer, there is no mention of Hivites. The other notices of the Hivites are (1) in the rhetorical lists of nations expelled by the Israelites (JE, D, D^{2}), Ex $3^{8.\,17}$ 13^{5} $23^{23.\,28}$ 33^{2} 34^{11}, Dt 7^{1} 20^{17}, Jos 3^{10} 9^{1} 11^{3} 12^{8} 24^{11}, Jg 3^{5}, 1 K 9^{20} (=2 Ch 8^{7}), from which nothing definite can be inferred respecting the place of their abode (unless their being mentioned usually before the Jebusites [of Jerusalem] may be taken as an indication that they were pictured as having lived near them); and (2) in Gn 10^{17} (=1 Ch 1^{15}), where, in accordance with the custom of Hebrew genealogists of representing the peoples inhabiting a country as the 'sons' of its eponymous ancestor, they are included among other tribes 'begotten' by Canaan.†

We do not possess the necessary data for determining with any confidence the character or racial affinities of the Hivites (see speculations in Ewald, Hist. i. 237; Sayce, Races of the OT, 119 f.). They were the actors in the ruse by which the Gibeonites secured themselves against the Israelite invaders; and if the isolated notice in Gn 34^{2} is to be depended upon, the people of Shechem, who take part against the Israelites in the graphic narrative of Jg 9, may have been Hivite (though they are not so termed in the narrative itself). Shechem and Gibeon are elsewhere (Gn 48^{22} E; 2 S 21^{2}) spoken of as 'Amorite'; but, in view of the manner in which the term 'Amorite' is employed (above, vol. i. p. 84; Driver, Deut. pp. 10–12), it is doubtful whether this fact authorizes the definite conclusion that the Hivites were racially 'Amorite.'

In Gn 36^{2} 'Zibeon the Hivite' is almost certainly an error for 'Zibeon the Horite' (see vv.$^{20.\,24}$): in Jos 11^{3} read with LXX, and in agreement with the known home of the Hittites in the N., 'the Hittite under Hermon' in v.^{b}, with 'the Hivite' for 'the Hittite' in v.^{a}; and similarly in Jg 3^{3} 'the Hittites (for 'the Hivites') that dwelt in Mount Lebanon.' It has been conjectured that חִוִּי is connected with Arab. ḥiwā', 'a circle of tents' (cf. HAVVOTH-JAIR), and means properly 'tent-dweller,' 'villager' (Ges. 'paganus'); but it is extremely uncertain if this is really the case (cf. Moore on Jg 3^{5}).

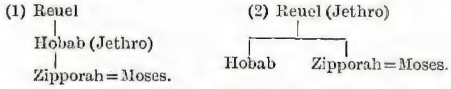
HIZKI (חִזְקִי, possibly shortened from חִזְקִיָּהוּ, 'J" strengthened').—A Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^{17}, AV Hezeki. See GENEALOGY.

HIZKIAH (AV Hezekiah).—A son of Neariah, a descendant of David, 1 Ch 3^{23}.

HO.—The oft-occurring interjection הוֹי, which is more sympathetic—has more of grace in it—than אוֹי Woe!, is tr^{d} 'Ho!' in Is 55^{1} and Zec $2^{6\,bis}$; to which RV adds Is 29^{1}. Ho! does little more than arrest attention, unless its occurrence in Is 55^{1} has given it something of an evangelical tone. Shaks. uses it very often, expressing by its means (1) mockery or rebuke, (2) exultation, (3) pain, and (4) simply calling attention. See AH, HA.

HOBAB (חֹבָב 'beloved,' Ges.; 'serpent,' Wellh.).—The name occurs twice (Nu 10^{29}, Jg 4^{11}. In Jg 1^{16} B inserts Ἰοθόρ [so Jos. Ant. v. ii. 3]; A, Ἰωάβ). It is uncertain whether he was (1) the father-in-law (AV, RVm) or (2) brother-in-law (RV) of Moses.

The conflicting views may be tabulated thus—



Nu 10^{29} is ambiguous, as חֹתֵן 'father-in-law' may refer either to Hobab or Reuel. In support of (1) it may be stated that (a) חֹתֵן is always rendered father-in-law except in RV text of Jg 1^{16} 4^{11}. (b) Mohammedan tradition, almost without exception (Lane's Kuran, p. 47 n.), identifies Shoaib or Sho'eib [a corruption (?) of Hobab], a prophet sent to the Midianites (Koran, Sur. 7. 11. 26. 29) with Moses' father-in-law Jethro. (c) The narrative in Ex 2 seems to preclude the idea that the priest of Midian had sons. On the other hand, (a) חֹתֵן possibly means any relation on the wife's side, and (b) Reuel (Hobab's father) and Jethro seem to be identified (Ex 2^{18} 3^{1}, so Jos. Ant. v. ii. 3). However, Ewald (HI ii. p. 25 n.^{7}) conjectures that in Ex 2^{18} we should read 'Jethro the son of Reuel' (LXX ins. Ἰοθόρ in v.$^{16\,bis}$, and A substitutes Ἰοθόρ for Reuel in v.^{18}). 'Hobab was the man's real personal name, and Jethro, which signifies prefect, his title.' (c) In Ex 18^{27} (E) Jethro, unopposed by Moses, 'went his way into his own land'; whereas in Nu $10^{29\text{ff.}}$ (JE) it is implied that Hobab yielded to Moses' importunity, and remained with Israel. A parallel difficulty occurs in Nu 24^{25} (JE) compared with Nu 31^{8} (P). In each case we must remember that we have not all the facts before us: we are dealing, not with one consecutive narrative, but with a compilation of fragments. A difficulty, which equally affects both views, is the fact that Hobab is called a Kenite (Jg 1^{16} 4^{11}), whereas Exodus speaks of Moses' father-in-law as a Midianite. See, further, Dillm.-Ryssel, Ex-Lv, 1897, 25 ff.

Whoever Hobab was, he was the human agent by whom God led His people through the wilderness. This service to Israel was long kept in grateful remembrance (1 S 15^{6}).

HOBAH (חוֹבָה).—The place to which, acc. to Gn 14^{15}, Abraham pursued the defeated army of Chedorlaomer. It is described as 'on the left hand (מִשְּׂמֹאל, i.e. 'to the north') of Damascus.' It is identified by Wetzstein (see Del. Genesis,^{4} p. 561 ff.) with the modern Ḥoba, 20 hours N. of Damascus. This certainly appears to be 'etwas weit,' as Siegfried-Stade remark; but the identification is accepted by Dillmann as more probable than one with a Ḥoba mentioned by von Troilo about a mile N. of Damascus.

J. A. SELBIE.

HOBAIAH.—See HABAIAH.

HOD (הוֹד 'majesty').—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{37}. See GENEALOGY.

---

* In 33^{19} 'the children of Hamor, the father of Shechem,' Shechem is clearly the place (father=founder, as 1 Ch $2^{50.\,51}$ etc.); cf. Jg 9^{28} 'the men of Hamor, the father of Shechem.'

† 'Hivite' is read also by LXX, followed by Lagarde, Cheyne, Orelli, Duhm, and others, in Is 17^{9} ('like the deserted places of the Hivites and the Amorites, which they deserted before the children of Israel').

HODAVIAH (הוֹדַוְיָה or הוֹדַוְיָהוּ; Kittel prefers to vocalize הוֹדוּיָה, cf. LXX A Ὠδουία).—1. A Manassite clan, 1 Ch 5^{24}. 2. The name of a Benjamite family, 1 Ch 9^{7}. 3. A Levitical family name, Ezr 2^{40}, called in Neh 7^{43} Hodevah (which see). 4. A descendant of David, 1 Ch 3^{24} (הוֹדַוְיָהוּ; AV, following Kethibh הוֹדַיְוָהוּ, Hodaiah).

HODESH (חֹדֶשׁ 'new moon').—One of the wives of Shaharaim, a Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^{9}. See GENEALOGY.

HODEVAH (Kethibh הוֹדְוָה, Ḳerê, followed by RVm, הוֹדְיָה Hodeiah).—A Levitical family name, Neh 7^{43}, called in Ezr 2^{40} Hodaviah (which see).

HODIAH (הוֹדִיָּה 'my "majesty" is J″').—1. A man of Judah, 1 Ch 4^{19}. AV wrongly takes it as a woman's name (see GENEALOGY, IV. 55). 2. A Levite, Neh 8^{7} 9^{5} 10^{10}. 3. Another Levite, Neh 10^{13}. 4. One of those who sealed the covenant, Neh 10^{18}.

HOGLAH (חָגְלָה 'partridge'). — Daughter of Zelophehad, Nu 26^{33} 27^{1} 36^{11}, Jos 17^{3} P.

HOHAM (הוֹהָם), king of Hebron, formed an alliance with other four kings against Gibeon, but was defeated by Joshua at Beth-horon, and put to death along with his allies at Makkedah (Jos $10^{3\text{ff.}}$). According to Hommel (AHT 223 n.), Hoham is identical with the Minæan name Ḥauhum (beginning with the guttural aspirate); but this combination is extremely precarious.

HOISE.—This is the older and more correct form of hoist, to which the t has probably been added from its presence in the past ptcp. It occurs Ac 27^{40} 'they . . . hoised up the mainsail to the wind.' Cf. Hall, Works, ii. 37, 'Who can pitty the shipwracke of those marriners, which will needes put forth, and hoise sailes in a tempest?' RV gives 'hoisting up the foresail,' and introduces 'hoist' also in 27^{17} for the simple vb. (αἴρω) of which the compound (ἐπαίρω) is here used. Both 'hoist' and 'hoised' are found as participles. Thus Hall, Works, ii. 40, 'Mee thinkes, I see Christ hoysed upon the highest battlements of the Temple'; and Shaks. Hamlet, III. iv. 27—'Hoist with his own petard.' J. HASTINGS.

HOLD.—As a subst. 'hold' occurs frequently in AV for a protected place, mod. 'stronghold,' for which the Heb. is generally מְצוּדָה or מְצֻדָה. In Jg $9^{46.\,49}$ the word so tr^{d} is צְרִיחַ, which occurs elsewhere only in 1 S 13^{6}, and of which the meaning is so doubtful that Moore declines to give it any rendering. Some commentators reckon it a secret chamber. RV retains 'holds' in Jg and gives that tr^{n} in 1 S, with 'holes' in marg. See Moore on Jg 9^{46}. The 'hold' of Ac 4^{3} is a general word, lit. 'keeping' (τήρησις). The same word with the adj. δημόσιος is tr^{d} in 5^{18} 'public prison.' RV gives 'ward' and 'public ward.' In Rev 18^{2} is found another general word (φυλακή), also originally an abstract term, 'guarding,' then a 'guard-room.' It occurs twice in this verse, being rendered in AV first 'hold' and then 'cage' (RV 'hold'). Perhaps 'dungeon' would be the best word here. For the Eng. word it will be enough to quote Bunyan, Holy War, p. 18, 'Wherefore into the castle he goes: it was that which Shaddai built in Mansoul for his own delight and pleasure; this now was become a Den and Hold for the Giant Diabolus.'

The verb 'to hold' is used in some obsolete or archaic senses: 1. To reckon, account, in 'hold guiltless' Ex 20^{7}, Dt 5^{11}, 1 K 2^{9}, or 'not guilty' Zec 11^{5}; 'hold innocent' Job 9^{28}; and 'hold contented' Sir 29^{3}. 2. To grip, Job 41^{26} 'The sword of him that layeth at him [leviathan] cannot hold' (RV 'avail'; Davidson, 'The sword does not hold or bite, but glances off his adamantine armour'); or restrain, keep under restraint, Lk 24^{16} 'But their eyes were holden that they should not know him' (ἐκρατοῦντο); Ro 7^{6} 'But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held' * (κατειχόμεθα, RV 'we were holden'); or retain, keep hold of, Job 23^{11} 'My foot hath held his steps' (RV 'held fast to his steps'); Col 2^{19} 'And not holding the Head' (κρατῶν, RV 'holding fast'); or arrest (fig.) Ca 7^{6} 'The king is held in the galleries' (RV 'held captive'). Cf. Mk 3^{21} Tind. 'They went out to holde him. For they thought he had bene beside himselfe' (κρατῆσαι, Cran. 'to laye handes upon him,' AV 'to lay hold on him'). 3. To support, maintain, Ps 139^{10} 'thy right hand shall hold me'; 1 Mac 6^{52} 'Whereupon they also made engines against their engines, and held them battle a long season' (ἐπολέμησαν ἡμέρας πολλάς, RV 'fought for many days'). Cf. Defoe, Crusoe, p. 366, 'The battle, they said, held two Hours, before they could guess which Party would be beaten.' 4. Some phrases deserve attention: (1) Hold forth, Ph 2^{16} 'Holding forth the word of life' (ἐπέχοντες, Tind. 'holdinge fast,' Gen. [1557] 'putting forth,' Lightfoot 'holding out'). (2) Hold in, Jer 6^{11} 'I am weary with holding in.' (3) Hold of, Wis 2^{24} 'Nevertheless through envy of the devil came death into the world: and they that do hold of his side do find it' (οἱ τῆς ἐκείνου μερίδος ὄντες, RV 'they that are of his portion'). Cf. Tindale, Pent., Prologue to Numbers, 'He will hold of them and be sworne unto them to be their servauntc.' (4) Hold to, Sir 30^{13} 'Chastise thy son and hold him to labour' (ἔργάσαι ἐν αὐτῷ, RV 'take pains with him'); Mt 6^{24} (=Lk 16^{13}) 'either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other' (ἀνθέξεται). Cf. Dt 17^{16} Tind. 'But in ani wyse let him not holde to many horsses, that he bringe not the people agayne to Egipte thorow the multitude of horsses' (quoted also by Latimer, Sermons, Arber's ed. p. 25). (5) Hold up=support, Ps 119^{117} 'Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe'; 17^{5} 'Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not' (תָּמֹךְ אֲשֻׁרַי בְּמַעְגְּלוֹתֶיךָ, RV 'My steps have held fast to thy paths'; Wellhausen-Furness, 'My steps—they have followed close in thy footprints'); and the phrase 'hold up my face to,' 2 S 2^{22} 'Wherefore should I smite thee to the ground? how then should I hold up my face to Joab thy brother?' (6) Hold with, Dn 10^{21} 'And there is none that holdeth with me in these things but Michael your prince'; 1 Mac 3^{2} 'And all his brethren helped him, and so did all they that held with his father' (RV 'that clave unto'); Ac 14^{4} 'But the multitude of the city was divided: and part held with the Jews, and part with the apostles.' So Hos 11^{12} Cov. 'But Ephraim goeth aboute me with lies, and the house of Israel dyssembleth. Only Juda holdeth him with God, and with the true holy thinges.' J. HASTINGS.

HOLINESS.—IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.—The notion of holiness is expressed in Heb., as in the Semitic languages generally, by the two roots קדשׁ and חרם. Of these the latter was most widely diffused amongst the Semitic peoples, but in Heb. usage it was restricted to certain extreme kinds of consecration, usually involving the total destruction of the devoted thing (see CURSE). The distinctively OT developments of the idea are connected with קָדַשׁ, which is the root commonly employed by the Northern Semites; and in this article the various applications of this root will alone be considered.*

---

* Cf. Lk 4^{38} Rhem. 'And Simons wives mother was holden with a great fever.'

The original idea conveyed by the words is altogether uncertain, neither etymology nor the analogy of the cognate dialects having as yet thrown much light on the subject.† The truth is, that the words are nowhere found save in a religious sense, and the attempt to ascertain the physical conception on which this use is based is generally abandoned by modern scholars as hopeless. There is, however, a certain probability that the primary idea is that of 'separation' or 'cutting off.'‡ Although this view is not capable of demonstration, it may be adopted provisionally as one that fits in remarkably well with OT usage. Thus the technical antithesis to קֹדֶשׁ is חֹל, a word which means simply 'open to common use,' 'profane' (see 1 S 21^5, Ezk 22^{26} etc.). At all events, it is correct to say that a holy object is one 'separated' from common use and contact by supernatural sanctions; and if we start from this negative definition of what the OT means by holiness, we shall probably not be far from the fundamental meaning of the root. It only needs to be remarked that in hardly any case does the 'separation' denoted by קדשׁ amount to absolute removal from human use or contact (as is the case with חרם). All that is usually involved is that the use of the 'holy' is restricted by ceremonial rules, or confined to privileged persons or to particular times—a principle of which abundant illustration will be found in what follows. The holiness of places, things, seasons, even of persons, is thus safeguarded by a set of recognized religious usages, which sometimes, as in the Levitical ritual of OT, attain a high degree of complexity.

It is obvious from what has been said, that holiness, as a religious term, did not originate within the sphere of the revealed religion of Israel. It is one of those primitive concepts which have been taken up and purified by revelation, but which may retain some traces of their origin in a lower stage of belief. It is not surprising, therefore, if some survivals of ancient Semitic heathenism should appear amongst OT applications of the idea of holiness. One such survival is probably to be found in the conception of holiness as a quality transmissible by contact, and constituting in certain circumstances a danger to be scrupulously avoided (see Ezk 44^{19} 46^{20}, Ex 29^{37} 30^{29}, Lv 6^{27} etc.; cf. Hag $2^{12f.}$).§ Another peculiar case is that of the vineyard (or field) sown with different kinds of seed, which is said thereby to 'become holy' (Dt 22^9; cf. Lv 19^{19}). Again, in the pagan rites described in Is 65^5, the bystanders are warned not to come near lest they should be 'sanctified' (the verb to be pointed as Piel). These phenomena, which appear to our minds to introduce an irrational element into the idea of holiness, irresistibly suggest an affinity with a custom universal amongst primitive peoples, according to which man's free use of natural objects, etc., was restrained by fear of supernatural penalties. This institution has come to be denoted by the name taboo, and the instances just cited seem to indicate a close analogy between taboo and the primitive associations of the word 'holiness' in Semitic religion. This would account for the remarkable points of contact between the laws of holiness and those of uncleanness; the two notions being in their origin practically identical. The first great step towards the spiritualizing of the idea of holiness was taken by OT religion when it established a distinction between things whose use is prohibited because they are appropriated to J″, and things that may not be touched because they are hateful to Him. The latter belong to the category of the UNCLEAN (see the art.), while the term 'holy' is, as a rule, reserved for the former.*

In considering OT uses of the terms for holiness, it will be convenient to arrange them in the following order: I. Holiness of places, things, and seasons; II. Holiness of God and angels; III. Holiness of man.

I. HOLINESS OF PLACES, THINGS, AND SEASONS. —The material objects classed as holy are far too numerous to be separately mentioned here. The general principle of OT religion undoubtedly is that things are holy in virtue of their connexion with the worship of J″. The sanctuary itself in all its parts, the utensils employed in the ritual, the clothing of the attendants, the sacrifices and everything dedicated to J″, are sacred in various degrees through having been brought within the sphere of J″'s worship, and so 'separated' from their natural and common relations. It is true that the cases mentioned above (Dt 22^9, Ex 29^{37}, Lv 6^{27} etc.) can only with some difficulty be brought completely under this principle. An attempt is made to sustain the rule by the theory that such things or persons were forfeited for the use of the priests or the service of the sanctuary, as was the case with the censers of Korah's company, which having become holy through being presented to God were unfit for use, and were directed to be made into plates for the altar (Nu 16^{36-40} [Heb. 17^{1-5}]). This is possible, although there is no clear evidence of it, and, in the case of the field (Dt 22^9), a more likely supposition would be that the crop was simply not to be used. Even if it was confiscated, that was only a consequence of the holiness it had already contracted for a different reason; and it is probable that in such cases we have a survival of a conception of holiness in which a relation to J″ was not the exclusive regulating principle. But, with these unimportant exceptions, the rule holds good that holiness is an attribute of the things pertaining to the worship of J″, and is acquired by them through nearness to Him who is the source of all holiness. Holiness, in short, expresses a relation, which consists negatively in separation from common use, and positively in dedication to the service of J″.

An important corollary from this principle is that there is no such thing as natural or inherent holiness in any class of created objects (Baud. p. 45).

* The two primary words in which the root appears are the abstract noun קֹדֶשׁ (holiness) and the adj. קָדוֹשׁ (holy); the verbal forms in use appear to be all denominatives derived from these. The simple form of the verb (קָדַשׁ) occurs only 10 times, always with the sense of 'become holy,' or 'contract holiness'; Ex $29^{21.37}$ 30^{29}, Lv $6^{11.20}$, Nu $17^{2.3}$, Dt 22^9, 1 S 21^6, Hag 2^{12} (in Is 65^5, and possibly 1 S 21^6, the text is wrongly pointed). The secondary sense is, of course, still more obvious in the two causatives (קִדֵּשׁ and הִקְדִּישׁ) and the two reflexives (נִקְדַּשׁ and הִתְקַדֵּשׁ). The other derivatives are מִקְדָּשׁ (sanctuary), קָדֵשׁ [f. קְדֵשָׁה] (ἱερόδουλος), and the proper names קֶדֶשׁ and קָדֵשׁ.

† Dillmann (AT Theol. p. 254) refers to the Assyr. ḳuddušu (said to be a synonym for 'bright'), and is disposed to connect the root, as others have done before him, with חדשׁ (new). Delitzsch, on the other hand (*PRE*², art. 'Heiligkeit Gottes'), reasoning from the Sumerian equivalent of ḳadištu (sacred prostitute), found a confirmation of the old theological definition of holiness as freedom from defect (omnis labis expers). But these are highly speculative constructions, which command no confidence, and, moreover, give no assurance that they reach the original sense of the word.

§ An Arabian parallel to the communication of holiness by clothing is given by W. R. Smith in *Rel. Sem.*² p. 451. 'At Mecca, in the times of heathenism, the sacred circuit of the Caaba was made by the Bedouins, either naked, or in clothes borrowed from one of the Ḥoms, or religious community of the sacred city. . . . It appears that sometimes a man did make the circuit in his own clothes, but in that case he could neither wear them again nor sell them, but had to leave them at the gate of the sanctuary.'

* On the analogies between taboo and the Heb. laws of uncleanness and holiness, see J. G. Frazer, *Encyc. Brit.*⁹ art. 'Taboo'; and W. R. Smith, *Rel. Sem.*² pp. 151 ff., 446-454. A good account of Taboo will be found in Jevons' Introd. to the History of Rel. chs. vi.–viii.

Things are clean or unclean according to their natural condition,* and all that man can do is to recognize the fact and regulate his attitude to them accordingly. But things become holy by being dedicated to J″, and for nearly every kind of holy object the law prescribes specific ceremonies of consecration. Naturally, only things inherently clean could be so dedicated; hence, to some extent, holiness and cleanness are practically identical, and in OT the terms are liable to be interchanged. Nevertheless, the ideas are radically distinct, the category of cleanness is much more comprehensive than that of holiness, and nothing but confusion of thought can result from overlooking the distinction.†

Of all material embodiments of the idea of holiness, the most instructive and the most fundamental is the 'holy place' or sanctuary.‡ Without a particular place set apart for religious purposes, there could be no such thing as sacred objects or times or even persons in the OT sense (W. R. Smith, Rel. Sem.^{2} p. 141). A holy place is in the first instance a space marked off, 'separated,' from common ground (see Ezk 42^{20}), and only to be entered by those who comply with the conditions of sanctity prescribed by usage or law. These conditions may in some cases be very simple (Ex 3^5, Jos 5^{15}), in others, as in the central sanctuary of Israel, they are extremely complicated; but they always exist, and compliance with them constitutes the holiness of the persons concerned. What in Israel makes the holiness of a place is the presence of J″, whose nature as the Holy One is expressed in the rules which regulate admission to His dwelling-place. Every spot where J″ appears to men is holy ground (Ex 3^5, Jos 5^{15}); even the temporary camp in time of war is consecrated by the presence of the God of the armies of Israel (Dt 23^{15}). The sanctuaries frequented by Israelites in pre-exilic times were the stated places where at set seasons the worshippers appeared before J″, and probably were all regarded as having been consecrated by a Theophany, in accordance with Ex 20^{24}. When the sacredness of these places was abolished by the law of the one sanctuary, the temple of Jerusalem became the sole earthly dwelling-place of J″ (Ezk 43^7, Ps 132^{14}, Zec 2^{10} etc.), and the centre from which the whole life of the people was sanctified. The symbolism of the second temple in particular, with its graduated series of sacred spaces culminating in the inmost shrine or most holy place, its different classes of ministers, and its minutely regulated ceremonial, was so designed as to form an impressive exhibition to the Israelites of the ruling idea of holiness. The quality of holiness pertains also to Mount Zion and Jerusalem (Is 11^9 27^{13}, Zeph 3^{11} etc.; Is 48^2 52^1, Dn 9^{24} etc.), and in a less degree to the whole land (Zec 2^{10} etc.). There is but one passage dating from before the Exile (Ex 15^{13}) in which holiness is directly predicated of the land of Canaan; but the idea is implied in Hos 9$^{3.\,4}$ and elsewhere, and must be ancient.

Holy seasons, in like manner, are portions of time set apart from ordinary employments and dedicated to J″ by acts of worship (Neh 8$^{9\text{-}11}$ 10^{31}). The chief of such seasons was the Sabbath (Gn 2^3, Ex 20$^{8.\,11}$, Is 58^{13} etc.). The relation to the cultus is less apparent in the case of the year of Jubilee (Lv 25^{12}), but the separation from common time is equally obvious.

Amongst the various objects belonging to the temple ritual the term holy is applied to the sacrifices (Ex 28^{38} etc.), the shewbread (1 S 21^5), the incense (Ex 30$^{35.\,37}$), the anointing oil (which the people were expressly forbidden to compound for common use, Ex 30$^{25.\,33}$ etc.), the priestly clothing (Ezk 42^{14}, Ex 28$^{2.\,4}$ etc.), etc. etc. (For a complete enumeration, see Baud. p. 44 f.).

II. HOLINESS OF GOD (AND ANGELS).—From a very early time the word 'holiness' appears to have been used by the Northern Semites to express the general idea of Godhead. In this vague sense it occurs in the Phœnician inscription of Eshmunazar in the title 'holy gods,' and the same phrase is found in the mouth of heathen speakers in Dn 4$^{8.\,9.\,18}$ 5^{11}. In that expression 'holy' is not intended to convey any information as to the character of the gods; it is a mere 'otiose epithet, "the holy gods" meaning nothing more than "the gods."'* It will be found that no sense less comprehensive than this suffices to explain the Hebrew usage of the term. There are, no doubt, passages where one special attribute is more immediately suggested to the mind by the context, but there are others where it is clear that no particular divine quality is meant to be predicated, and indeed there is no single attribute which will cover all the applications of the word 'holiness' to God. The plural קְדֹשִׁים (a so-called pl. of majesty formed after the analogy of אֱלֹהִים) is used of J″ almost as a proper name in Pr 9^{10} 30^3 (? Hos 12^1), and similarly the sing. קָדוֹשׁ in Is 40^{25}, Job 6^{10}, Hab 3^3. A predicate which is thus capable of being elevated to a proper name may be presumed to be that which includes all specific attributes, viz. divinity. Again, when J″ is said to swear by His holiness (Am 4^2, Ps 89^{35}, cf. 60^6 108^7), it might be supposed that the expression signifies to swear by that special attribute which is to be exercised in the act promised, just as when He swears by His strength (Is 62^8). But the more natural interpretation is, that to swear by His holiness is to swear by His divinity, or, as it is elsewhere expressed, by Himself (Am 6^8, Gn 22^{16} etc.). It is probably in the same vague sense that the adj. is used of the divine arm (Is 52^{10}, Ps 98^1), or the divine word (Jer 23^9, Ps 105^{42}). So also in the numerous passages where holiness is predicated of the name of God (Am 2^7, Ezk 20^{39}, Lv 20^3 etc.), the name of J″ being the expression of His whole being as revealed in Israel. Nor is the case different in such expressions as 'there is none holy as J″' (1 S 2^2). The meaning there is not that among divine beings J″ alone possesses the specific attribute of holiness, but that He alone is worthy to be regarded as truly divine; in other words, what is asserted is not anything about His character, but simply His supreme Godhead.†

It is plausible, though possibly misleading, to connect this most general sense of holiness with the assumed root-idea of the word, and to say that the aspect of divinity denoted by holiness is the

---

* i.e. from the standpoint of the law and the religion generally. There is much to be said for the view that originally uncleanness itself denoted a relation, viz. a relation to false deities.

† The antithesis of קֹדֶשׁ, as has been said, is חֹל; the opposite of טָהוֹר (clean) is טָמֵא (unclean). See Baud. p. 22 ff.

‡ The proper designation of a sanctuary is מִקְדָּשׁ (used even of the sacred places of the heathen Is 16^{12}, Ezk 28^{18}); but in the Law the central sanctuary (tabernacle) is more frequently described simply as קֹדֶשׁ, sometimes also as מָקוֹם קָדוֹשׁ = 'holy place' (but only in such expressions as 'eat [wash] in a holy place'). קֹדֶשׁ is also used of the temple in Ezk, Ps, Dn, Ch.

* Davidson, Ezekiel (Camb. Bible), p. xxxix.

† The facts adduced in this paragraph are adverse to the view held by some writers, that holiness, even when predicated of J″, is a merely relative idea, denoting His fidelity to His covenant with Israel. There are, no doubt, passages which, taken by themselves, might seem to countenance that explanation. But when we take account of all the uses of the word, and especially of the fact that it was a common epithet of heathen deities, it is abundantly clear that holiness is an essential attribute of J″, apart altogether from His special relation to Israel. All the applications of the term can be explained in harmony with this position. Thus, to take a salient instance, the phrase 'Holy One of Israel' (see below) need not be paraphrased: 'the God who is Holy in virtue of His relation to Israel.' It may equally mean, and in point of fact does mean, 'the (essentially) Holy Being, who is God of Israel.'

'separation' of God from the world, or His transcendence. There is no doubt that the term does express the sense of an awful contrast between the divine and the human (Hos 11^{9}), although hardly, perhaps, between God and the universe. The opposition which is implied in its application to J″ is rather to the presumption and pride of man on the one hand, and the pretended deity of false gods on the other, than to the whole of created existence.* But whether this idea lies in the word itself, or whether it was reached through the impression caused by the multitude of inviolable things belonging to the sphere of deity, is a point which cannot be certainly determined. It has to be remembered that, in early times at least, the holiness of the gods had no definite meaning apart from the holiness of their physical surroundings.† An illustration of this mode of thinking is furnished by the exclamation of the men of Beth-shemesh after they had looked into the ark: 'Who is able to stand before J″ this holy God?' (1 S 6^{20}). There it is evident that the holiness of J″ and the holiness of the ark are practically identical, J‴s holiness being the quality manifested in His vindication of the inviolability of the sacred symbol. And so it must have been to a large extent in ancient religion: the divine holiness was not so much an object of intellectual contemplation as a fact borne in upon the mind by the constant presence of things and persons that might not be touched, places that might not be entered, and times in which ordinary employments were suspended, because of their appropriation to the service or worship of God.

The question as to the contents of the idea of divine holiness thus resolves itself into the larger question of the conception of Godhead by which religious practice and devotion were ruled; and the development of the idea in OT may be expected to proceed step by step with the progressive revelation of the character and nature of J″. Certain features of divinity, no doubt, retain a prominence due to the ancient associations of the word. The term never ceases to emphasize the awful side of the divine manifestation, and even in later writings this may sometimes be the only thought conveyed by its use. But that, after all, only means that J″ was always regarded as a Being of awful and unapproachable majesty, to be feared just because He was divine. And while the history of the idea certainly does not show any abatement of the sentiment of awe due to J″ as the Holy One, it does exhibit an advance towards the conception of Him as one to be feared, not simply because He is all-powerful, but because of His opposition to all that is impure and sinful.

There are three main aspects of deity specially associated with the term 'holiness' in different parts of the OT; and all of these might without difficulty be derived from the fundamental sense of unapproachableness, which is never absent from the notion of J‴s holiness.

(1) The negative idea of unapproachableness readily passes over into the positive conceptions of greatness, power, majesty, and the like. Of all uses of the word this is the most widely prevalent; and in nearly every part of the literature we find expressions where holiness conveys no other thought than the might and majesty of the God of Israel, or the awe and fear which His presence inspires in man. This appears, e.g., in the words of the men of Beth-shemesh already cited (1 S 6^{20}). So in Is 8^{13} to 'sanctify J″' is to regard Him as an object of fear and dread. In Ex 15^{11} J″ is extolled as 'glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders.' In the Psalms He is addressed as 'terrible out of his holy places' (68^{35}); His name is 'holy and terrible' (111^{9}); 'J″ is great in Zion, and exalted above all the peoples,' therefore they are exhorted to praise His 'great and terrible name; holy is it' ($99^{2.\,3}$). This conception is specially prominent in the Bk. of Ezekiel, where the divine holiness appears to denote no other attribute than that of majesty, exhibited in the exercise of irresistible power. J‴s 'holy name' is synonymous with His 'great name' (36^{21}, cf. v.^{23}); and when He is said to 'sanctify himself' (i.e. show Himself to be holy), or to 'sanctify his name,' which is profaned when He is forced to conceal any of His divine attributes, the meaning always is that by a display of might He produces the recognition of His true majesty (36^{20-24} $38^{16.\,23}$ 20^{41} etc.). These illustrations, which might easily be multiplied, will serve to show how largely the usage of the words for holiness is influenced by the majestic and awe-inspiring side of the divine nature.

(2) The priestly Torah, being largely occupied with questions of cleanness and uncleanness, was naturally led to present divinity as opposition to all that is impure; and hence in the legal books the idea of holiness approximates to that of physical purity (cf. Lv $11^{44\mathrm{ff.}}$ $20^{25.\,26}$, Ezk $43^{7.\,9}$ etc.). It is an undue exaggeration of this fact that has led some theologians to suppose that the primary significance of holiness is purity in a physical sense, or freedom from defect, or 'normality of life' (Diestel). In reality this is but one manifestation of divinity (readily intelligible as a modification of the fundamental conception of unapproachableness); and although it is necessarily emphasized by priestly writers, it is altogether inadequate to explain the whole range of meaning covered by the term 'holy.' What it expresses is J‴s jealous care for the purity of His own worship, and that, again, is probably rooted in antagonism to the worship of heathen deities and other forms of superstition, especially the worship of dead ancestors (see Lv 19^{28}, Dt 14^{1} etc.). The most characteristic expression of the idea is perhaps in the striking but somewhat difficult sentence, 'Be ye holy: for I am holy' (Lv 11^{44} 19^{2} 20^{26}, cf. 20^{7} 21^{6-8}). Evidently, the holiness of Israel is there conceived as in some sense a reflexion of the holiness of J″, for it is hardly reasonable to take the word 'holy' in two diverse acceptations in the two members of the sentence. While there are many ways in which holiness might be predicated of J″, and many also in which it might be predicated of Israel, there are very few in which the word could be applied to both. At all events, in such a connexion the holiness of God cannot be His deity in general, nor His power or majesty, but must mean that separation from impurity which belongs to His nature, and is to be reproduced and exhibited in the life of His people. Holiness in this sense is the ruling principle of the Levitical legislation, just as ethical righteousness is the supreme idea of prophecy. Although the expression of the idea occurs chiefly in later writings (esp. Ezk and the Priestly Code), the thought itself is undoubtedly ancient, and must have exercised an influence on the development of the notion of holiness.

(3) The ethical sense of the divine holiness is most clearly to be discerned in some parts of the prophetical writings, particularly in those of Isaiah. To the prophets J″ was essentially a moral Being, 'of too pure eyes to behold evil' (Hab 1^{13}), and swift to resent and punish the iniquity of His people. And since holiness embraced every distinctive attribute of Godhead, it was to be expected that, in the light of this ethical concep-

---

* The opinion that holiness was predicated of the gods as having their dwelling-place in heaven does not appear to be well founded.

tion of God, the word should take on the sense of moral perfectness, at least on its negative side of opposition to human sin. Accordingly, in Am 2^{7} we find the holiness of J″'s name set in contrast to the immoral practices of Canaanitish heathenism which had been introduced into the religion of Israel. It may be objected that in this instance the opposition to J″'s holiness lies not so much in the immorality of the custom as in its association with the worship of strange gods. But, even if that be true, the significance of the allusion is hardly diminished. The fact remains that a rite consistent with the godhead of other deities was inconsistent with the holiness of J″, and the only reason that can be assigned for the difference is that J″'s godhead or holiness included a moral element which placed a wide gulf between Him and the deities of the Semitic pantheon. In the teaching of Isaiah the thought of the divine holiness has a central importance which it possesses in that of no other prophet; and it is there also that the ethical aspect of the idea receives the fullest expression. In his inaugural vision the great fact impressed on his mind is the holiness of the God of Israel (Is 6^{3}), and this perception awakes in him the consciousness, not merely of creaturely infirmity, but of uncleanness in a moral sense, as adhering both to himself and his nation (v.^{5}). The connexion of holiness and morality is again expressed in a striking manner in the words of 5^{16}, where we read that 'the holy God shall sanctify himself in righteousness,' i.e. He shall show Himself to be holy by the exercise of punitive righteousness. But indeed Isaiah's whole conception of national sin as rebellion against J″ and ignorance of His character, and his demand that J″ should be 'held holy' by compliance with His revealed will (1^{4} 3^{8} 8^{13} 29^{23} etc.), imply a view of holiness which is profoundly ethical; and all this is embraced in the divine title which is continually on his lips, 'the Holy One of Israel.' There is, however, no passage of the OT where it can be supposed that moral purity exhausts the idea of holiness. It never appears detached from the underlying thought of majesty and power; it is, in short, an element of holiness as conceived by the prophets, but neither in their writings nor in any other part of the literature does it supersede the vaguer original meaning of the word. So in a later prophet the words, 'Thou that art of too pure eyes to behold evil,' etc. (Hab 1^{13}), are no doubt connected with the name 'my Holy One' in the previous verse, but at the same time they cannot be regarded as the complete equivalent of that phrase.

There are some other applications of the word which fall to be mentioned here, although they can scarcely be said to throw any additional light on its meaning. (1) The expression Holy Spirit (wh. see), so frequent in NT, occurs in OT only 3 times (Ps 51^{11}, Is 63$^{10.\ 11}$). In such a connexion 'holy' may mean much or little; it may be equivalent to 'divine Spirit' in any of the senses in which holiness is predicated of J″, or it may describe the Spirit as the source of moral purity in the life of the consecrated nation. It is, at all events, of some importance to observe that 'the divine Spirit is not called the holy Spirit in so far as it is the principle of cosmical life, but only in so far as it works in the Theocracy' (Oehler). (2) Angels are called 'holy ones' in Job 5^{1} 15^{15}, Ps 89$^{6.\ 8}$, Dn 8^{13} etc., not on account of their superior purity (see Job 4^{18} 15^{15}), but as partaking of the divine nature ('sons of God'). (3) Lastly, heaven, as the dwelling-place of God, is frequently spoken of as a holy place (Hab 2^{20}, Jer 25^{30}, Is 63^{15}, Zec 2^{13}, Ps 11^{4} 20^{6} etc.).

III. HOLINESS OF MEN.—The OT applications of the word 'holy' to human persons are of two kinds. There is first an external holiness, which consists merely in consecration to religious functions, and does not differ materially from the holiness of things. In this sense the term is applied to several classes of persons in Israel. The degraded beings devoted to shameful practices in the Canaanitish sanctuaries were known as קְדֵשִׁים and קְדֵשׁוֹת ('holy men' and 'holy women'), in token of their dedication to the service of the god or goddess (Dt 23^{18} etc.). This, of course, is a heathen usage, which has nothing to do with the specifically OT idea of sanctity. Again, soldiers on a campaign are consecrated persons (1 S 21$^{5.\ 6}$), war being a religious act initiated by sacred rites (Is 13^{3}, Jer 6^{4} 22^{7}, Mic 3^{5} etc.). The Nazirites are holy during the period covered by their vow (Nu 6$^{5ff.}$). An official holiness belongs to the priests and Levites, who are consecrated to J″ by special ceremonies (Ex 29$^{1ff.}$, Lv 8$^{12.\ 30}$ etc.), and whom Israel is enjoined to 'sanctify,' i.e. treat as sacrosanct persons (Lv 21^{8}). In a similar sense we are probably to understand the sanctity ascribed to the prophets (2 K 4^{9}, Jer 1^{5}): when the great lady of Shunem speaks of Elisha as a 'holy man of God,' she is not thinking of the saintliness of his character; he is holy, simply as one who stands in a near relation to God. Finally, the attribute of holiness pertains to the whole people of Israel as a nation severed from the rest of mankind, and consecrated to J″ (Ex 19^{6}, Nu 16$^{3.\ 5.\ 7}$, Dt 7^{6} 14^{2} etc.), and hence inviolable (Jer 2^{3}). In this sense J″ speaks of Himself frequently as the 'sanctifier' (מְקַדֵּשׁ) of Israel (Ezk 20^{12} 37$^{27f.}$, Ex 31^{13}, Lv 20$^{7f.}$ etc.).

But this outward holiness implies, in the case of persons, the observance of certain rules, compliance with which constitutes sanctification in an active and sometimes an ethical sense. No doubt, each of the classes enumerated above was subject to prescribed rules of this kind, as was notably the case with the priests and Nazirites. But the most important developments of the idea are those connected with the application of the term 'holiness' to the religious community as a whole. J″ sanctifies Israel by choosing it from other peoples to be His familiar people, and by taking up His abode in its midst; but Israel is thus bound to sanctify itself, by conforming to the requirements that express J″'s holy will and nature. These requirements, as we have already seen, were mainly external and ceremonial, consisting in avoidance of occasions of physical defilement. But moral precepts are also included (Lv 19, etc.), and are expressly embraced in the formula, 'Be ye holy: for I am holy.' The holiness of Israel, in fact, had to be maintained by obedience to the entire Law of God (Nu 15^{40}); and, in so far as the Law contains a summary of moral duty, the conception of holiness has an ethical significance. It is true that the Law recognizes no distinction between the moral and the ceremonial, and to that extent its teaching is not truly ethical in our sense of the word. Still, where holiness is presented as an ideal to be realized in conduct, and where this ideal is connected with the essential holiness of God (as in the phrase just quoted), the notion is already charged with ethical meaning; and so in the spiritual religion of the Psalms the external element disappears, the conditions of entrance into J″'s 'holy place' being described in terms which are exclusively ethical (Ps 15. 24$^{3ff.}$).

From a theological point of view, the chief interest of the OT doctrine of holiness lies in this progressive spiritualizing of the idea under the influence of an expanding revelation of God. Although the various steps of the process are obscure, the fact is certain that holiness did come to be conceived more and more as a moral quality. It is probable that the ethical aspect was first introduced in the application of the term to God, and thence transferred to the holiness He requires in His worshippers. In OT the development is arrested at a certain stage, because of the material associations with which the use of the word was invested. One step remained to be taken in order to reach the full Christian sense of holiness, and that was the abrogation of the ceremonial as a term of fellowship with God. When our Lord enunciated the principle that a man is defiled, not by what enters into him, but by what comes out of him, He raised religion to a new level, and made it possible to liberate the moral essence of holiness from the imperfections which clung to it throughout the older dispensation.

LITERATURE.—The modern discussion of holiness appears to start from a passage in Menken's Anleitung zum eigenenen Unterricht in den Wahrheiten der heil. Schr. (1805, Schriften, Bd. vi. pp. 46–53). His observations have little scientific value, but seem to have aroused interest by the paradoxical position, laid down with hardly an attempt at proof, that holiness means 'self-humbling love and grace' on the part of God.—Diestel's paper (in JDTh, 1859, pp. 3–63), though in some respects arbitrary and one-sided, is a far more adequate treatment of the subject. His chief results are these two: (1) that, in form, holiness is always a relative idea, Israel being holy as belonging to J″, and conversely J″ being holy as belonging to Israel, in the covenant relation; and (2) that the content of the notion has to be determined from the conditions of the covenant as laid down by the Law, the ruling principle of which Diestel finds to be 'normality of life.'—Baudissin's elaborate monograph (Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, 1878, ii. pp. 3–142) devotes considerable space to the criticism of these and other views of earlier writers. It contains an invaluable and apparently exhaustive collection of the OT material, and for thoroughness of treatment leaves nothing to be desired. The most important result, in the judgment of Nöldeke (LCBl, 1879, No. 12, col. 361 f.), is the conclusive demonstration that throughout the OT the ideas of holiness and purity remain distinct. HOLINESS IN NT.—The study of the NT conception of holiness must proceed mainly from a consideration of the following terms: ἅγιος, ἁγιασμός, ἁγιότης, ἁγιωσύνη. Besides this group of words denoting holy or holiness, we have in NT ἱερός, ὅσιος, σεμνός, ἁγνός, and their cognates. It is the word ἅγιος and its kindred terms which express the characteristic NT idea of holiness. In order to define and illustrate this idea it is necessary to examine the meaning and use of terms synonymous with ἅγιος, so that the significance of the latter may be set in the clearer light.

Etymologically, ἱερός is believed to signify vigorous or strong. The word thus naturally denotes, in classic usage, that which is associated with the gods, that which belongs to them, or that which is divine. It thus approaches θεῖος in meaning. The word is commonly applied, not to persons, but to things, which are ἱερά because they originate with the gods, belong to them, or are bestowed by them. The term is applied to men when it is desired to designate them as having special relation to the gods, or as being under their protection. Kings and persons who are initiated into the mysteries are sometimes called ἱεροί in this sense. The term ἱερός thus denoted an external rather than an internal and moral relation to the gods. It did not imply excellence. It meant sacred in the sense of inviolable, entitled to reverence, but did not bear the meaning which we attach to the terms morally pure and holy. While in NT the word has higher associations because of the circle of religious ideas with which it is there connected, it retains clear traces of its history. It emphasizes an outer rather than an inner and spiritual relation with God. The word occurs as an adjective but twice. In 1 Co 9^{13} οἱ τὰ ἱερὰ ἐργαζόμενοι is a periphrasis for the priests. Τὰ ἱερά, res sacræ, are the rites of the Levit. cultus. These rites are sacred because their performance is an act of divine worship. In 2 Ti 3^{15} (as also in Philo and Jos.) ἱερὰ γράμματα is the OT. These writings are regarded as ἱερά because divinely inspired and teaching divine truth. The use of words cognate with ἱερός in NT agrees with that of ἱερός. Thus ἱερεύς is a priest; ἱερόν designates the temple-enclosure; ἱερόθυτον (1 Co 10^{28}) denotes something which has been offered in sacrifice; and ἱεροπρεπής (Tit 2^3) means befitting sacred things or places, 'reverent in demeanour' (RV). It will be seen that this whole group of words designates ideas and relations which are more distinctively characteristic of OT than of NT, ἱερός in this sense having been taken over from the LXX, where it abounds in 1 Es and the Books of Maccabees.

The word ὅσιος means pious, godly. It is the nearest Gr. equivalent of the Lat. sanctus and of the Heb. חָסִיד. In its classic use it commonly denoted what was consecrated by law or custom, whether of the gods or of men. In NT, however, it has a distinctively religious significance, and means consecrated to God, pure, holy, pious. The NT use of ὅσιος, ὁσιότης may be seen in such passages as He 7^{26}, where Christ, as High Priest, is described as ὅσιος, ἄκακος, ἀμίαντος, κεχωρισμένος ἀπὸ τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν; Lk 1^{75}, where the people of God are spoken of as serving Him ἐν ὁσιότητι καὶ δικαιοσύνῃ; and Eph 4^{24}, where the new man is said to be created according to God ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ ὁσιότητι τῆς ἀληθείας. In both classic and NT usage this group of words is commonly associated with δίκαιος and its cognates. In the LXX οἱ ὅσιοι τοῦ θεοῦ is a frequent designation of God's true worshippers. It will thus be seen that holiness, in the sense of ὁσιοτης, includes especially what is designated by the words reverence, piety, Frömmigkeit.

Σεμνός properly means deserving of reverence or awe, and in classic usage is applied both to the gods and to men. It is even used of things, in the sense of grand, magnificent, impressive. In NT σεμνός denotes deserving of reverence, honourable. It is once applied to deeds, Ph 4^8 (RV 'honourable'), and three times to persons, 1 Ti $3^{8.11}$, Tit 2^2, in all of which cases RV renders grave. In like manner RV renders σεμνότης gravity in all three passages in which it occurs, 1 Ti 2^2 3^4, Tit 2^7. The word signifies something more than gravity; it suggests dignity or worth. It is obvious, however, that σεμνότης designates but a secondary aspect of the NT idea of holiness.

Ἁγνός, ἁγνότης mean pure, purity. In LXX these words refer to ceremonial purity. In NT they refer to freedom from moral faults in general, and esp. to freedom from carnal sins. In one passage ἁγνός is applied to God (1 Jn 3^3). The characteristic use of the word is seen in passages like 2 Co 11^2, Tit 2^5. Ἁγνός represents an aspect of holiness, but only in a limited and negative way. Even the idea of moral purity is inadequate to represent the full content of the Christian conception of holiness.

The characteristic NT word for holy is, as we have seen, ἅγιος. It is the nearest Gr. equivalent of the Heb. קָדוֹשׁ, and is the common rendering of that word in the LXX. It is probably from the same root as ἁγνός (Lat. sacer), and the fundamental meaning of the two words is nearly the same. Ἅγιος, however, which is a rare word in classic Greek, appears to have diverged from ἁγνός in the direction of a moral and religious conception of holiness. It is generally believed that the fundamental idea which underlies the word is that of separation, and that its moral signification therefore is: separation from sin, and so, consecration to God. The Christian use of the word lifted it into accord with the highest ethical conceptions, and gave it the idea of separateness from the sinful world, harmony with God, the absolutely good Being, moral perfection. Thus ἅγιος is, above all things, a qualitative and ethical term. It refers chiefly to character, and lays emphasis upon the demands which that which is sacred (ἱερόν) in the highest sense makes upon conduct.

It is necessary briefly to refer to the LXX use of this word, and to the circle of OT ideas which it represents. We find that ἅγιος is predicated of God as the absolutely perfect One, and of men and things so far as they are devoted to Him, and, as we may say, in some way identified with Him. Israel, e.g., was an ἔθνος ἅγιον because God's peculiar possession. Men are called upon to sanctify themselves, that is, to cleanse themselves from all defilement, to forsake sin, and to come into harmony of life with God. So men may sanctify things by regarding, treating, or using them as sacred, that is, by associating them with God's perfection. The basis of this demand upon men that they be holy is the obligation to be like God: 'Ye shall be holy: for I the Lord your God am holy' (Lv 19^2). Now this holiness, as seen in OT, seems to wear a twofold aspect. It comprehends both 'the goodness and the severity of God.' It issues both in redemption and in judgment. These two aspects of the divine holiness appear continually in inseparable connexion and interplay. 'Holiness (in the OT) is the perfect purity of God, which in and for itself excludes all fellowship with the world, and can only establish a relationship of free, electing love, whereby it asserts itself in the sanctification of God's people, their cleansing and redemption; therefore "the purity of God manifesting itself in atonement and redemption, and correspondingly in judgment"' (Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Lex. s.v.).

It is evident that ἅγιος and its kindred words are best adapted to represent the NT idea. They express something more and higher than ἱερός, sacred, outwardly associated with God; something more than ὅσιος, reverent, pious; something more than σεμνός, worthy, honourable; something more than ἁγνός, pure, free from defilement. Ἅγιος is more positive, more comprehensive, more elevated, more purely ethical and spiritual. It is characteristically Godlikeness, and in the Christian system Godlikeness signifies completeness of life.

The words ἅγιος and ἁγιάζειν occur very frequently in NT. The three nouns (ἁγιασμός, ἁγιότης, ἁγιωσύνη), which are kindred to them, are not of frequent occurrence. The most common among these three nouns, ἁγιασμός, is found ten times (1 Th $4^{3.4.7}$, 2 Th 2^{13}, Ro $6^{19.22}$, 1 Co 1^{30}, 1 Ti 2^{15}, He 12^{14}, 1 P 1^{2}). In five instances it is rendered in AV holiness, and in five sanctification. In RV it is uniformly rendered sanctification. Ἁγιότης occurs twice (2 Co 1^{12}, He 12^{10}), and is rendered holiness in both AV and RV. Ἁγιωσύνη occurs three times (1 Th 3^{13}, Ro 1^{4}, 2 Co 7^{1}), and is tr. in both VSS holiness. Ἁγιότης (sanctitas), ἁγιωσύνη (sanctitudo), ἁγιασμός (sanctificatio), denote the quality, the state, the process, respectively (Lightfoot, Notes, p. 49). Ὁσιότης occurs twice (Lk 1^{75}, Eph 4^{24}), and is rendered holiness in both. AV renders εὐσέβεια (piety) in Ac 3^{12} holiness, RV godliness.

Let us next illustrate the use of the group of words under review, directing special attention to the fifteen passages in which the nouns denoting holiness are used. There does not appear to be anything distinctive in the use of the words by the different NT writers. We shall therefore have no occasion to treat the NT books separately. We find ἅγιος applied to God in Jn 17^{11}: 'Holy Father, keep them in thy name which thou hast given me,' etc., where God, as the One who is absolutely good—wholly separate from all that is sinful and wrong—is besought to guard from evil those whom He has given to His Son. The idea closely resembles that which is found in 17^{25}: 'O righteous (δίκαιος) Father, the world knew thee not, but I knew thee,' etc. The idea of God's righteousness here appears to be the quality which prevents Him from passing the same judgment upon Christ's disciples as He passes upon the sinful world. It is the equitableness of God. In both cases the attribute of God which is referred to is not the forensic or retributive element in the divine nature, but God's moral self-consistency, His justice to His own equity. In Rev 4^{8} God is addressed as 'Holy, Holy, Holy,' because He is worthy of all praise and honour. His holiness is His supreme and absolute excellence.

The term holy is constantly applied throughout NT to the divine Spirit. As proceeding from God, as the bearer of revelation, and as the mediator of spiritual life, the Spirit is pre-eminently holy. It is the special function of the Holy Spirit to make holy the souls of those in whom He dwells. This conception of the Spirit's nature and function is not prominent in OT, where the Spirit is scarcely more than a name for the power or presence of God. There He bestows strength upon heroes, skill upon artificers, and the knowledge of the divine will upon prophets. The designation of the Spirit as Holy accords entirely with the NT idea of the sanctifying function of the Spirit, and the hallowing of the people of God by inward consecration to Him. The Holy Spirit is conceived of as revealing the inner nature and essential goodness of God, and as accomplishing the transformation of men into His moral likeness. Hence the sin against the Holy Spirit represents the acme of wickedness. It is hatred of supreme and absolute goodness. It despises the perfect purity and unselfish love which dwelt in Him to whom God gave the Spirit without measure, and thus treats perfect goodness as if it were evil. Such a state of mind involves complete moral obduracy. In this, and not in the limitation of the divine mercy, lies the impossibility of its forgiveness. See further HOLY SPIRIT.

With special appropriateness is Christ, as the Son and Revealer of God and the Redeemer of mankind from sin, designated as holy. He is the fulfilment of the OT picture of the true and faithful servant of J". He is accordingly spoken of as God's 'holy servant' (ὁ ἅγιος παῖς, Ac 4^{30}), by whom He accomplishes His gracious, saving purposes. So evil spirits are represented as recognizing in Jesus 'the Holy One of God,' the long-promised Messiah, the Messenger of the divine mercy, and the Conqueror of Satan.

Christians are frequently designated as ἅγιοι, holy ones, saints. They are such as the elect or beloved of God, who by faith and love have entered into fellowship with Him, and who by obedience to His will and by purity of life have become conformed to the image of His Son. St. Paul speaks of believers as κλητοὶ ἅγιοι (1 Co 1^{2}), saints by a divine call, in the same sense as he speaks of himself as a κλητὸς ἀπόστολος (Ro 1^{1}), an apostle who became such by having presented to him, and by accepting, a divine commission. Esp. are men represented as holy when they have been made the special instruments of the divine will and have been taken into close fellowship with God in the work of revelation and redemption. In this sense the prophets are designated (acc. to the common reading) as 'holy men of God,' οἱ ἅγιοι θεοῦ ἄνθρωποι (2 P 1^{21}). In like manner, the 'holy prophets' declared the divine purpose to restore all things through the Messiah (Ac 3^{21}). So the 'mystery of Christ,' viz. that the gospel was for the Gentiles, was made known to God's 'holy apostles and prophets in the Spirit' (Eph 3^{5}).

In a secondary sense impersonal objects are spoken of as holy. The ways and means whereby God reveals and accomplishes His will are holy, because they are associated with Him who is pre-eminently holy and are instrumental in the sanctification of men. Thus the gracious call which God in the gospel addresses to men—inviting them to receive a wholly unmerited salvation—is a holy calling, κλῆσις ἁγία (2 Ti 1^{9}). The Messianic promise given in OT times was a holy covenant, διαθήκη ἁγία (Lk 1^{72}). The OT Scriptures are, by reason of the sacredness of their contents and their disclosure of the divine will and purpose, holy writings, γραφαὶ ἅγιαι (Ro 1^{2}).

We turn now to the group of nouns denoting holiness. Ἁγιασμός would properly denote the act of sanctifying, τὸ ἁγιάζειν, and something of this active meaning is preserved in 2 Th 2^{13}: 'God chose you from the beginning unto salvation in sanctification of the Spirit' (ἐν ἁγιασμῷ πνεύματος), that is, in sanctification wrought by the Spirit; cf. 1 P 1^{2}: 'in sanctification of the Spirit,' etc. The active force of the word may also be observed, although in a somewhat different form, in 1 Th 4^{3}: 'For this is the will of God, even your sanctification,' etc. The will of God is this: that He may accomplish your sanctification. In 1 Co 1^{30} Christ is called our 'sanctification,' in the sense that He is the cause or ground of our sanctification.

In most cases in NT, however, ἁγιασμός denotes the effect or result of ἁγιάζειν. (See, however, Sanday-Headlam's note on Ro 6^{19}). In 1 Th $4^{4.7}$ it denotes the sphere of holy action in opposition to the sphere of lustful desire. In Ro 6^{19} ἁγιασμός stands opposed to ἀνομία. These terms denote the ends to which the members are devoted in the sinful and in the Christian life respectively. In the latter the members are presented as servants to righteousness unto the end of sanctification (εἰς ἁγιασμόν). Similarly, in v.^{22} Christians are said to have their fruit unto sanctification (εἰς ἁγ.), that is, to attain it as the result and reward of their life. In these passages from 1 Th and Ro, sanctification is particularly set in contrast to carnal lust, although its nature is not limited by that contrast. In 1 Ti 2^{15} sanctification is contemplated as a virtue, or as the Christian's normal state, and is correlated with faith and love. In He 12^{14} 'the sanctification' (the definite article used only here and in 1 Th 4^{3}) is the Christian character, the goal of Christian effort, the preparation for the presence of God: 'Pursue after the sanctification without which no man shall see the Lord,' that is, enter into blessed fellowship with Christ.

Ἁγιότης is used (acc. to the most probable reading) in 2 Co 1^{12} in ref. to St. Paul's manner of life at Corinth, to the uprightness of which his conscience bears witness. It is here correlated with the sincerity or purity (εἰλικρίνεια) which God effects by the Holy Spirit. Here holiness designates the life and character which the grace of God produces. In the one other passage where the word is used (He 12^{10}) it is applied to God. Earthly parents, says the author, chasten their children with wrong or imperfect motives, or to secure some temporary good, but God chastens His children for their highest final good, that they may be 'partakers of his holiness' (εἰς τὸ μεταλαβεῖν τῆς ἁγιότητος αὐτοῦ), that is, that they may be transformed into moral likeness to Himself, and become partakers in His own eternal nature (cf. 2 P 1^{4}). This passage carries us to a higher point than do those previously examined, in that it represents the holy nature of God as the type and goal of all perfection in man.

Ἁγιωσύνη is twice used of the moral purity, the God-like character, which the gospel requires and imparts: 1 Th 3^{13} 'To the end he may stablish your hearts in holiness before our God,' etc., that is, in the possession of that holy life which will be acceptable to Christ at His coming; and 2 Co 7^{1} 'Perfecting holiness in the fear of God,' that is, perfectly illustrating in character the holy life which comports with reverence for God. In Ro 1^{4} the word occurs in a description which St. Paul is giving of the Son of God, 'who,' he says, 'was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, who was declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection of the dead.' Here the phrase κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιωσύνης stands in evident contrast to the phrase κατὰ σάρκα. The phrase probably means: the spirit of Christ, that is, His inner, essential life, which is characterized by holiness. If this is the meaning, then ἁγιωσύνης expresses the quality of Christ's spiritual nature. He is par éminence holy. He is in absolute accord with God.

We may sum up our results thus: In the absolute sense God alone is holy, and His holiness is the ground of the requirement of holiness in His creatures (1 P 1^{16}). Holiness is the attribute of God, according to which He wills and does only that which is morally good. In other words, it is the perfect harmony of His will with His perfect ethical nature. But the divine holiness is not to be thought of as a mere passive, quiescent state. It is an active impulse, a forthgoing energy. In God's holiness, that is, in the expression of His perfect ethical nature, His self-revelation is grounded. Nay, creation itself, as well as redemption, would be inconceivable apart from the divine holiness, the energizing of God's absolutely good will.

By some theologians holiness and love are identified. More commonly they are sharply distinguished—holiness being regarded as the self-preservative or retributive attribute of God, and love as His beneficent, self-imparting attribute. To discuss this subject here would carry us too far. It seems clear, at least, from our investigation, that holiness and love represent closely kindred conceptions, and that there is an inner harmony between them. They are the two words which best express God's moral perfection, and the difference between them seems rather formal than real. At any rate, in their application to men, they seem to express, better than any other words, the highest aims of human life and the most comprehensive obligation of God's perfect law. See, further, the preceding art., and art. HOLY SPIRIT.

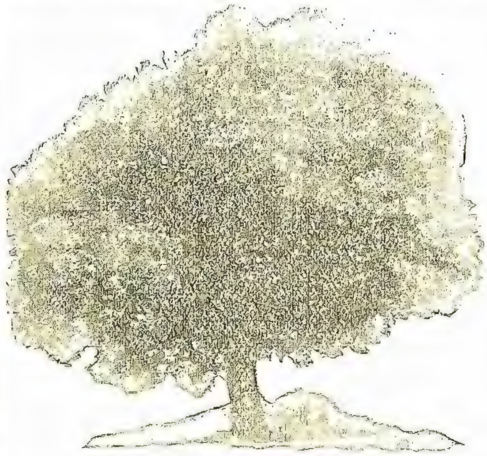
HOLM TREE.—The name of this tree occurs in Is 44^{14} RV as the equivalent of תִּרְזָה. The holm is prob. not the tree there intended (see CYPRESS).

It occurs also in Sus v.^{58}. Two evergreen oaks, both growing in Pal. and Syria, Quercus Ilex, L., and Q. coccifera, L., are prob. included under the LXX πρῖνος, which is the orig. for holm tree. The former is a low tree, growing along the coast and the foot hills of the maritime ranges. The latter is one of the stateliest trees of the East. Its comus is often quite spherical, and sometimes 40 to 50 ft. in diameter. The trunk not infrequently attains a diameter of 6 ft. The leaf of both species is smaller than that of the holly, but resembles it in the fact that it is evergreen, of a rich glossy green, and usually with spiny teeth, though some of the varieties have nearly entire leaves. It is from the resemblance of its leaf to the holly (Old English hollen) that it obtained its name of holm. For the play on the words πρῖνος and πρίσαι see SUSANNA.



THE HOLM OAK, QUERCUS COCCIFERA, L.

The holm oak is the tree, par excellence, around which are grouped the superstitions of the Orientals. One or more grand specimens are sure to be planted over the welys or tombs of the Moslem saints. Abraham's Oak is of this species. The dense mass of dark foliage gives to these fine old trees an aspect of solidity possessed by no others in the East. The Druses and other sects often hang bits of rag on their lower branches as a votive offering. A tree so decorated is called umm-esh-sheratîl, i.e. mother of rags. Such trees have probably existed from time immemorial on the 'high places.' See OAK. G. E. POST.

HOLOFERNES (Ὀλοφέρνης).—The arch-enemy of the Jews, assassinated before Bethulia (i.e. Jerusalem) by Judith, who thus saved her nation. In Jth 2^{4} H. is called 'the chief captain of the army of Nebuchadnezzar.' In the Midrash he is called 'king of Javan,' * and takes the place of Nebuchadnezzar. It is obvious that no one in the days of the historical Nebuch. could have borne the name and played the part of H. as described in Judith. There was an Orophernes king of the Cappadocians in B.C. 158 ff., who was a friend of Demetrius Soter, and supported the latter in his unjustifiable claims as against Ariarathes V., king of the Cappadocians (Polyb. iii. 5. 2, ed. Schweighäuser). Hence the Jews might know about Orophernes as the friend of their great enemy, and might represent him as he is represented in Judith. This would make the date of the book about B.C. 150. See Hicks, Journ. Hellen. Studies, vi. 1885, pp. 261–274. The form Ὀροφέρνης is found on coins discovered at Pirene, and in two inscriptions found on amphora-handles (Knidos); see Dumont, Inscriptions céramiques, Paris, 1872, p. 329, No. 9, and p. 388, No. 7. The same form is given by late classical authors, e.g. Polyb. xxxii. 20. 4, xxxiii. 12. § 2, 3, 9; Aelian, Var. Hist. ii. 41, ed. Hercher; Diod. Sic. xxxi. cc. 32 and 34; fluctuating with Ὀλο- and Ὁλο-, e.g. Appian, Bell. Syr. p. 118, ed. Stephan. 1592; Diod. Sic. xxxi. 19. § 2, 7, ed. Müller. If Ὀλοφέρνης is the original form, ὀλο- will be Greek = 'destroying' (cf. ὀλοεργής), and -φερνης, Persian = 'brilliance, majesty,' cf. Pherendates, Pharnacos, Artaphernes; the root fra = 'shine.' The form Ὀροφ. will then represent the Persian pronunciation of the Greek Ὀλοφ. The aspirated Ὁλοφ is due to confusion with compounds in ὁλο-. The Vulg. form Holofernes is aspirated as in Hiob, Hesther, Hierusalem, etc.

Dante introduces Holofernes in Purgatorio xii. 59 as one of the instances of defeated pride in the Circle of the Proud. The following famous representations of Judith and Holofernes in art may be quoted: Botticelli, in the Uffizi, Florence (see Ruskin, Mornings in Florence, ch. 3); Michael Angelo, in the Sistine Chapel; Cristoforo Allori, in the Pitti; Paris Bordone; Guido, in the Spada Gallery, Rome; Donatello, statue in the Loggia dei Lanzi, Florence.

HOLON (חֹלוֹן).—1. A city of Judah in the Hebron hills, given to the Levites, Jos 15^{51} 21^{15}. In the parallel passage 1 Ch 6^{58} [Heb.^{43}] it is called Hilen. It is noticed with Debir, and probably lay W. or S.W. of Hebron. The ruin Beit Aûla, in the lower hills west of Hebron, would be a suitable site. See SWP vol. iii. sh. xxi. 2. A city of Moab near Heshbon, Jer 48^{21}. Its site has not been recovered. C. R. HOLYDAY.—'That kept holyday' is the trⁿ in Ps 42^{4} of חוֹגֵג, ptcp. of חָגַג 'to make a pilgrimage,' RV 'keeping holyday.' 'Holyday' also occurs in Col 2^{16} as the trⁿ of ἑορτή, feast, RV 'feast day.' See FEASTS.

In both places AV of 1611 has two words, 'holy day' in Ps 42^{4}, 'Holy day' in Col 2^{16}; and it would be well, owing to the mod. associations of the word 'holiday,' to keep that form still.

A. THE OLD TESTAMENT.—i. The word רוּחַ, in LXX πνεῦμα, but also ἄνεμος (about 50 times), θυμός (5 times), πνοή (4 times), ψυχή (twice), etc., belongs to a root רוח flavit, spiravit, used only in the Hiph. (הֵרִיחַ olfecit, e.g. Gn 8^{21}). In OT רוּחַ signifies (1) the breath of the atmosphere, wind: Gn 3^{8} (לְרוּחַ הַיּוֹם = LXX τὸ δειλινόν, Aq. ἐν τῷ ἀνέμῳ τῆς ἡμέρας, Symm. διὰ πνεύματος ἡμ.), Nu 11^{31}, Job 4^{15} 41^{16}, Jer 2^{24} 14^{6}; (2) the breath of man. Since the human breath is at once an indication of animal life, and a vehicle of thought and passion, the word is also used to represent (3) the principle of vitality, in the phrase ר׳ חַיִּים (Gn 6^{17} $7^{15.\,22}$), or absolutely, as in Gn 45^{27}, 1 K 10^{5}, Job 12^{10} 34^{14}, Ps 104^{29}, Ec 3^{19} 12^{7}; (4) the life of passion (Gn 41^{8}, Nu 5^{14}, 2 S 21^{5}, Pr 25^{28}), or of thought and will (Dt 34^{9}, Job 15^{2} 32^{8}, Jer 51^{11}); (5) the spiritual element in human nature (Nu 27^{16}, Ps 31^{5}, Ec 12^{7}); lastly, from the sphere of human nature the word (6) passes into that of the divine. In anthropomorphic descriptions of the life of God it retains its primary sense; God's displeasure is the ר׳ אַפּוֹ (Ex 15^{8}, Job 4^{9}, Ps 18^{15}), His power in operation is the ר׳ פִּיו (Ps 33^{6}, Is 11^{4}; cf. 2 Th 2^{8}). But the writers of the OT conceive also of a Spirit in God which bears some analogy to the higher life of man; the 'Spirit of Elohim' or 'of J″' (ר׳ אֱלֹהִים, ר׳ יהוה, LXX πνεῦμα θεοῦ, πν. Κυρίου) is repeatedly mentioned in every part of the OT. In a few cases, it is true, this phrase may be interpreted of the wind which God sends on the earth (Ex 15^{10}, 1 K 18^{12}, 2 K 2^{16}, Is 40^{7} 59^{19}, Hos 13^{15}), or of the human breath or spirit as deriving its origin from God (Job 27^{3}; cf. Gn 2^{7}). But these are exceptions; in the great majority of passages the 'Spirit of God' is the vital energy of the divine nature, corresponding to the higher vitality of man.* This energy is usually presented in one of its relations to man or to the world, e.g. as a creative or vitalizing force (Gn 1^{2}, Job 26^{13}, Is 32^{15}), or as propagating or sustaining created life (Job 34^{14}, cf. 10^{12}, Ps 104^{30}); as the source of reason and intellect in man (Job 32^{8}), and in particular of special gifts and endowments (Gn 41^{38}, Ex 28^{3} 31$^{3.\,6}$ 35^{31}), such as the artistic skill of Bezalel (Ex 36$^{1\text{f.}}$), the military tact of Joshua (Dt 34^{9}), the heroism of the Judges (Jg 13^{25} 14^{6} etc.), the wisdom of Solomon (1 K 3^{28}); as the well-spring of inspiration in the Hebrew lawgivers, poets, and prophets (Nu 11$^{17.\,25\text{f.}\,29}$, 2 S 23^{2}, 1 K 22^{24}, Ezk 11^{5}, Dn 4$^{8.\,9}$ 5^{11}), and of moral purity and strength and penitence (Neh 9^{20}, Ps 51^{11}, Is 63$^{10\text{f.}}$, Ezk 36$^{26\text{f.}}$, Zec 12^{10}). Especially is the energy of the Divine Spirit connected with the mission and work of the Messiah (Is 11$^{1\text{f.}}$ 61$^{1\text{f.}}$), on whom, as the prophets foresaw, it was to rest in the fulness of strength and goodness.†

ii. These aspects of the working of the Divine Spirit must be separately examined.

(a) Creative and conservative Operations in Nature.—In the cosmogony of Gn 1 the Spirit of God broods — מְרַחֶפֶת — over the formless cosmic matter, before the cosmos begins to emerge out of chaos. The Greek versions render the verb by ἐπεφέρετο or ἐπιφερόμενον (Vulg. ferebatur), understanding by ר׳ מְרַחֶפֶת a wind sweeping over the abyss (cf. Ac 2^{2}). But the verb suggests another image, that of the bird brooding over her nest: see Delitzsch, ad loc., and cf. Dt 32^{11}; Chagigah, ed. Streane, p. 84; Basil. M. Hom. in Hexaem. 2, τὸ ἐπεφέρετο (φησὶν [Σύρος τις]) ἐξηγοῦνται ἀντὶ τοῦ Συνέθαλπε καὶ ἐζωογόνει τὴν τῶν ὑδάτων φύσιν κατὰ τὴν εἰκόνα τῆς ἐπῳαζούσης ὄρνιθος καὶ ζωτικήν τινα δύναμιν ἐνιείσης τοῖς ὑποθαλπομένοις. This metaphor suits the secondary rather than the primary meaning of רוּחַ; it is not the wind, but the divine energy that is regarded as vitalizing the germs which the Divine Word is about to call forth. This conception of the co-operation of the Spirit and the Word is 'specially characteristic of the OT' (Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, p. 322; cf. Ps 33^{6}). It rests on the relation of the breath to the voice, but its significance is not limited by that analogy. The Breath of God vitalizes what the Word creates. Moreover, its vitalizing energy is continuous; it conserves, renews, or withdraws life, in the ceaseless processes of nature (Job 33^{4}, Ps 33^{6} 104^{30}). Thus the OT already justifies the epithet τὸ ζωοποιόν, applied to the Divine Spirit by the Church in the 'Nicene' Creed.

(b) Bestowal of intellectual gifts.—'The Lord God . . . breathed into [man's] nostrils the breath of life' (נִשְׁמַת־חַיִּים, πνοὴν ζωῆς), by virtue of which he 'became a living soul' (נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה, Gn 2^{7}). This ἐμφύσησις (cf. Jn 20^{22}) represents the Breath of God as originating the personal life of man, together with the intellectual and spiritual powers which distinguish it from the life of the mere animal (ר׳ הַבְּהֵמָה Ec 3^{21}). As the sacred Books proceed, they reveal the same Force lying behind the special endowments which mark off man from man. The Divine Spirit is said to be 'in' (Gn 41^{38}, Nu 27^{18}) or 'upon' (Nu 11$^{17\text{f.}}$ 24^{2}) the man who possesses exceptional powers of any kind; he is what he is, because he is filled with the spirit of wisdom and understanding (πνεῦμα θεῖον σοφίας, Ex 31^{3}; πν. αἰσθήσεως, συνέσεως, Ex 28^{3} 35^{31}, Dt 34^{9}).

(c) Inspiration of the Prophets.—One gift stands out as pre-eminently due to the presence in man of the Spirit of God. The 'prophet' (נָבִיא, LXX mostly προφήτης; on the etymology of the Heb. word see W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, p. 390 f.), or 'seer' (רֹאֶה), as he was called till after the age of Samuel (1 S 9^{9}), was in an especial sense the man of the Spirit (אִישׁ הָרוּחַ, ἄνθρωπος ὁ πνευματοφόρος, Hos 9^{7}), Vulg. vir spiritualis. It has been said that 'the ideal of the OT is a dispensation in which all are prophets' (W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} p. 291, citing Nu 11^{29}); and the title of prophet is given to Abraham (Gn 20^{7}) and Moses (Dt 18^{15}), while it is withheld from Balaam, in whom, though 'the Spirit of God came upon' him (Nu 24^{2}), the sacred writers recognize a diviner (τὸν μάντιν, Jos 13^{22}) rather than a true seer. The true prophet is one who is lifted up by the Spirit of God into communion with Him, so that he is enabled to interpret the divine will, and to act as a medium of communication between God and men. The prophetic gift belonged to the nation, as the elect people; but it was realized in its highest degree only by those whose characters and lives fitted them for personal intercourse with God. The professional prophet seems sometimes scarcely to have risen above the level of μαντική (1 S 10$^{5\text{f.}}$ 19$^{20\text{f.}}$); the change of 'heart' promised to Saul (10$^{6.\,9}$) is clearly not of a moral or spiritual kind. On the other hand, the prophets who taught Israel and Judah from the 8th cent. onwards have left us the clearest evidence of a genuine inspiration in the elevation and penetration of their teaching, and the revelation of a spiritual religion which their writings contain. No other national literature presents such a phenomenon. It is attributed by the prophets themselves to the Spirit of God; cf. e.g. 2 S 23^{2} (where see Driver's note), Ezk 2^{2} 3$^{12.\,14}$ etc., Mic 3^{8}, and the frequent appeals to a divine source, such as the repeated כֹּה אָמַר יהוה of Is, and וַיְהִי דְבַר־יהוה in Jer.

(d) Anointing the Messiah.—The Davidic King, in whom the elect nation was to find its crown and consummation, must, as the first Isaiah foresaw (Is 11^{2}), receive all the gifts of the Divine Spirit in their fulness: 'the spirit of wisdom and understanding (intellectual gifts), of counsel and power (practical powers), of the knowledge and fear of J″' (religious endowments). In the strength of this abiding presence (ἀναπαύσεται ἐπ' αὐτὸν πνεῦμα θεοῦ) the Second David will show Himself to be the perfect King. It is remarkable that Deutero-Isaiah foretells a similar equipment of the 'Servant of the Lord,' the ideal Israel. 'I have put my Spirit upon him' is J‴'s assurance (42^{1}), and the Servant answers, 'The Lord God hath sent me, and his Spirit' (48^{16}, cf., however, Delitzsch, ad loc.); 'the Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek' (61$^{1\text{f.}}$). The ideal Prophet no less than the ideal King needs the fulness of the Spirit, and, when He comes, shall receive it. If, as some think (Kirkpatrick, Doctrine of the Prophets, p. 400), the prophet himself and not the Servant of J″ is the speaker in the last passage, the ultimate reference is still to the highest fulfilment of the prophetic office (Lk 4^{21}). The Spirit is the χρίσμα which makes the Christ (מָשַׁח יהוה אֹתִי).

(e) Moral and religious Elevation.—The ethical side of the Spirit's work comes into view in the teaching of the psalmists and prophets. In Ps 51^{11} the Spirit is described as רוּחַ־קָדְשְׁךָ, LXX τὸ πνεῦμά σου τὸ ἅγιον, i.e. the energizing principle of the divine holiness (Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, p. 322; on the idea of 'holiness,' see Kirkpatrick, Doctrine, etc. p. 173 f.),—a title found again in Is 63$^{10.\,11}$. In the Psalm this Divine Spirit of holiness is apparently regarded as imparting to the individual Israelite dispositions which may bring him nearer to the character of God, the 'clean heart' and ‘steadfast spirit’; in the prophetic passage it is represented as having dwelt in the elect nation from the days of the Exodus (cf. Neh 9^{20}, Hag 2^{5}), and as grieved by their rebellions against its guidance. Nor was the moral guidance of the Spirit limited to Israel, if we may adopt the common interpretation of Gn 6^{3}, which represents the Spirit of J″ as judging, ruling, and working in men before the Flood; but the sense of יָדוֹן is uncertain (Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 192), and the ethical application is at least doubtful (Delitzsch, ad loc.). It is certain, however, that the prophets foresee a large extension of the moral operations of the Divine Spirit in the days of the Messianic kingdom (Jer $31^{31ff.}$, Ezk $36^{26f.}$), and the prophecy of Joel (2^{28}) speaks of an outpouring of the Spirit ‘upon all flesh,’ which, although it is conceived under the image of a general bestowment of the gift of prophecy, pointed, in St. Peter's judgment (Ac $2^{16f.}$), to the Pentecostal effusion, which brought with it the setting up of the kingdom of God in the hearts of men of all nations.

---

* 'It is, in fact, the divine working rather than the divine nature that the Hebrew Scriptures regard as spiritual' (W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, p. 61).

† 'The Holy Spirit' is not an OT expression, and 'His' or 'Thy Holy Spirit' occurs only in Is 63$^{10.\,11}$, Ps 51^{11}.

A difficulty arises from the mention in the historical books of an ‘evil spirit sent by or proceeding from J″’ (Jg 9^{23}, 1 S 16^{14} [מֵאֵת י״] 18^{10}, 1 K $22^{21f.}$ [נָתַן י״ ר׳ שֶׁקֶר, וַיֵּצֵא הָרוּחַ], 2 Ch $18^{20ff.}$), and even of an ‘evil spirit of God’ (1 S 19^{9} LXX πνεῦμα θεοῦ πονηρόν). Schultz (OT Theol. ii. 205, 270) contends that the Spirit is in all cases the same, the Spirit of God working good or evil according to the character of the man on whom it operates. But it is incredible that the sacred writers intend to identify the ‘good Spirit’ of God (Ps 143^{10}) with the power which inspired Saul with jealousy and the prophets of Ahab with lying words. The evil spirit is from God and is God's, inasmuch as it is His creature and under His control; but it is not His personal energy. As Wellhausen (on 1 S 16^{14}) points out, the expression ר׳ יהוה is apparently limited to the good Spirit, which is the operative presence of J″ Himself.

iii. ‘The Spirit of God’ as revealed in the OT is ‘God exerting power’ (A. B. Davidson on Ezk 36^{27}). On this account it is invested with personal qualities, and personal acts are ascribed to it. If the truth, mercy, and light of God are partly hypostatized by the Psalmist (Ps 43^{3} 57^{3} etc.; see Cheyne, Origin, etc. p. 322), the Spirit of God, the principle of life which resides in the depth of the Divine Nature, and represents the Divine presence in the world and in man, is necessarily regarded as quasi-personal; it broods, rules, speaks, guides, quickens, because it is the living energy of a personal God. The Spirit of J″ is personal, inasmuch as the Spirit is God (Ps 139^{7}, Is $63^{9.10}$). There is, besides, a quasi-independence ascribed to the Spirit, which approaches to a recognition of distinct personality (cf. e.g. Is 48^{16}), especially in passages where the Spirit and the Word are contrasted (Schultz, ii. p. 184). But the distinction applies only to the external activities of these two divine forces; the concept of a distinction of Persons within the Being of God belongs to a later revelation.

iv. It may be asked whether a progress can be observed in the OT doctrine of the Spirit. On the one hand, certain points are clear from the first: the Pentateuch in its oldest parts reveals the Spirit of God as the source and support of the higher life in man, and as endowing him with intellectual gifts, and in particular with the gift of prophecy. All this belongs to the teaching of JE, while P adds that the Spirit at the first vitalized the cosmos. Even in pre-exilic times the Spirit is revealed as the quasi-personal energy of God in man and the world. The greatest prophet of the 8th cent. already recognizes the office of the Spirit as the Anointer of the Messiah (Is $11^{2ff.}$). But as the revelation proceeds, the ethical character of the Spirit's influence on man comes more distinctly into view. The higher view of prophecy, as contrasted with mere soothsaying, appears first in Deuteronomy (see Driver on Dt 18^{9-22}); and it is to the period of the Exile and the days that followed it that we must probably attribute the thought of the Spirit as the regenerating and directing force in human nature, and of its operations as about to be extended to men who lay beyond the circle of kings and prophets, and beyond the fold of Israel (for the date of Ps 51, cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2}, p. 440; Kirkpatrick, Psalms, ii. p. 284; and for the date of Joel, see Driver, Camb. Bible, Joel and Amos, p. 11 ff.).

B. THE APOCRYPHA OF OT AND OTHER JEWISH LITERATURE.—i. In the non-canonical literature of Palestine, references to the Divine Spirit are rare, and when they occur are little else than echoes—sometimes broken and imperfect echoes—of the canonical teaching. The religious man is filled with the spirit of understanding (Sir 39^{6}; cf. Is 11^{2}); on the ungodly God sends the spirit of error (Ps-Sol 8^{15}; cf. Is 19^{14}). The youth Daniel, seized by righteous indignation at the miscarriage of justice in the case of Susanna, is represented as having his holy spirit (τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον παιδαρίου) stirred within him by the act of God, or as suddenly endowed with the spirit of wisdom by the angel of the Lord (Sus ^{45}, Theod., LXX). The son of David is to be mighty in the Holy Spirit (δυνατὸν ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ, Ps-Sol 17^{42}); but, as the Cambridge editors of the Psalms of Solomon point out, there is in this no approach to a belief in a personal Spirit of God, although the use of τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον and πν. ἅγιον (first in Ps 50 [51]^{13}, Is 63^{11}, LXX) is interesting as an anticipation of NT phraseology. The above list nearly exhausts the references to the Holy Spirit in the Palestinian books. The growing angelology of the Pharisees (see Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. p. 748) may possibly have obscured the biblical conception of the Divine Spirit as the operative force in nature and in man: thus in the Book of Enoch ($60^{12f.}$, ed. Charles, p. 156) the powers of nature are represented as wielded by created spirits, amongst whom they have been distributed; God is the ‘Lord of Spirits,’ but of a ruling Spirit of God no mention is made. To the later Jews the Holy Spirit was chiefly the spirit of prophecy (Cheyne, Origin, p. 333); they recognized that David spake by the Holy Spirit (Mk 12^{36}), while they attributed the works of Christ to the operation of a πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον (Mk 3^{30}). Of the inspiration of Scripture they entertained the strongest belief; although the Torah possessed unique authority, all the books of the Canon were sacred (αἱ ἱεραὶ βίβλοι, τὰ ἱερὰ βιβλία, Josephus, Philo; see the reff. in Ryle, Canon of the OT, p. 291); it was realized that the prophets were taught by a divine afflatus (Jos. c. Ap. i. 8, τῶν προφητῶν τὰ μὲν ἀνώτατα καὶ παλαιότατα κατὰ τὴν ἐπίπνοιαν τὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ μαθόντων; cf. Ant. IV. vi. 5, VI. viii. 2). But when prophecy ceased, it seemed as if the presence of the Divine Spirit had been suspended or withdrawn.

ii. At Alexandria, on the other hand, the old consciousness of the perpetual activity of the Spirit of God survived, associating itself with the philosophical thought of Hellenism and growing under its influence into new forms of belief. The Book of Wisdom recalls the teaching of the OT as to the omnipresence of the Spirit (1^{7}, πνεῦμα Κυρίου πεπλήρωκεν τὸν κόσμον, 12^{1} τὸ γὰρ ἄφθαρτόν σου πνεῦμά ἐστιν ἐν πᾶσιν), its conservating and sustaining power in nature (1^{7} τὸ συνέχον τὰ πάντα), its special relation to man, as the author of his spiritual nature (15^{11}), and of his intellectual endowments and religious knowledge (7^{7} ἐπεκαλεσάμην καὶ ἦλθέν μοι πνεῦμα σοφίας, 9^{17} βουλὴν δέ σου τίς ἔγνω, εἰ μὴ σὺ ἔδωκας σοφίαν καὶ ἔπεμψας τὸ ἅγιόν σου πνεῦμα ἀπὸ ὑψίστων;). This connexion of Wisdom with the Spirit appears in the canonical books, but in Alexandrian Jewish thought it is carried further. The Spirit is sometimes identified with Wisdom ($1^{5\mathrm{f.}}$ ἅγιον γὰρ πνεῦμα παιδείας . . . φιλάνθρωπον γὰρ πνεῦμα σοφία . . . ὅτι πνεῦμα Κυρίου, where the linking of the clauses seems to leave no doubt as to the author's meaning; cf. 9^{17}), sometimes regarded as its indwelling power ($7^{22\mathrm{f.}}$ ἔστιν γὰρ ἐν αὐτῇ πνεῦμα νοερόν, ἅγιον, μονογενές . . . παντοδύναμον, παντεπίσκοπον). The Alexandrian doctrine of the Spirit finds its completion in Philo. The Spirit of God, he says, is ἡ ἀκήρατος σοφία ἧς πᾶς ὁ σοφὸς εἰκότως μετέχει (Gig. 5 f.). Indivisible in itself, it can be distributed and communicated like fire from torch to torch. In a sense the Spirit comes to all men, since even the worst of men have their moments of inspiration, their glimpses of better and higher things; with a few, the wisest and the best, the divine afflatus abides, and they become the 'hierophants' and instructors of their kind (Gig. 12). Philo's conception of the prophet reverts largely to the Platonic ἐνθουσιασμός (Tim. 71 D). The prophet is simply the interpreter of the divine voice, and so long as he is under divine influence he cannot exercise his reason, for he has made over the citadel of his soul to the Divine Spirit, which is in full possession of it (De spec. legg. 8, καθ' ὃν χρόνον ἐνθουσιᾷ . . . μετανισταμένου μὲν τοῦ λογισμοῦ καὶ παρακεχωρηκότος τὴν μὲν ψυχῆς ἀκρόπολιν, ἐπιπεφοιτηκότος δὲ καὶ ἐνῳκηκότος τοῦ θείου πνεύματος: cf. Quis rer. div. her. 53, and other passages quoted by Sanday, Inspiration, p. 74 f.). This mechanical inspiration was shared, according to Philo, even by the Alexandrian translators of the OT (Vit. Mos. ii. 7, καθάπερ ἐνθουσιῶντες προεφήτευον). Of the ethical aspect of the Spirit's work in man, Philo has little to say, except that its function is to promote clearness of mental vision and capacity for the intellectual knowledge of God, and that it fulfils this mission either by purifying and elevating, or, as in the case of the prophet, by superseding the natural faculties. Of the Spirit as restoring the moral nature of man we hear nothing; the writings of Philo contain no reference to Ps $51^{10\mathrm{f.}}$ or Ezk 36^{26} (cf. Ryle, Philo and Holy Scripture, p. 291 ff.). The omission may be partly due to the circumstance that he employs himself chiefly about the Pentateuch, but it is more probably to be traced to the predominance of the intellectual interest in Alexandrian thought.

C. THE NEW TESTAMENT.—i. The NT adopts the phrases used in reference to the Divine Spirit by the Greek translators of the OT. Thus we find in the NT as in the OT the terms τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον (πνεῦμα ἅγιον), τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ, or πνεῦμα θεοῦ, πν. Κυρίου, or simply τὸ πνεῦμα, or in certain contexts the anarthrous πνεῦμα. But they are used in quite different proportions: thus τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον (πν. ἅγ.), found in the Greek OT only in Ps 51 and Is 63, occurs in the NT between 80 and 90 times, while τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ θεοῦ (πν. θεοῦ, Κυρίου), the normal expression in the LXX, is comparatively rare in NT. Moreover, the writers of the NT employ phrases which are unknown to the LXX; the Spirit of God is further defined as the 'Spirit of the Father' (Mt 10^{20}), 'the Spirit of his Son' (Gal 4^{6}), the 'Spirit of Jesus' or 'of Christ' (Ac 16^{7}, Ro 8^{9}, Ph 1^{19}, 1 P 1^{11}). In a few instances the plural is used to denote the various gifts or μερισμοί (He 2^{4}) of the one Spirit; e.g. 1 Co 14^{32}, Rev 1^{4} 4^{5} 5^{6} 22^{6}. New attributes are assigned to the Spirit, corresponding to new gifts bestowed upon men; we read not only of the spirit of wisdom (Ac $6^{3.\ 10}$), but of the spirit of truth (Jn 14^{17} 15^{26} 16^{13}), of life (Ro 8^{2}), of grace (He 10^{29}), of sonship (τῆς υἱοθεσίας, Ro 8^{15}). Above all, the Spirit receives a personal name, which it shares with the Son of God in His historical manifestation (Jn 14^{16} ἄλλον παράκλητον; 14^{26} 15^{26} 16^{7} ὁ παράκλητος). These facts warn us that in passing from OT to NT we may expect a fuller theology of the Spirit.

ii. The new light which is thrown upon the subject by the Christian revelation is largely historical. (a) The gospel history opens with an outburst of prophecy. As the moment of the Incarnation drew near, men and women in Israel found themselves lifted up by the Spirit into new regions of thought and endowed with new powers of expression. The movement began in the family of a priest. A child was born of whom it was foretold that he should 'be filled with the Holy Spirit from his mother's womb' (Lk $1^{15.\ 80}$); and the inspiration was shared by his parents (Lk $1^{41.\ 67}$). Others were touched by the same current of divine energy—Simeon, to whom there came an oracular warning from the Holy Spirit of the presence of the infant Christ (Lk $2^{25\mathrm{f.}}$ πνεῦμα ἦν ἅγιον ἐπ' αὐτόν, καὶ ἦν αὐτῷ κεχρηματισμένον ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος, κ.τ.λ.); Hannah, the daughter of Phanuel, who was accounted a prophetess (προφῆτις, Lk 2^{36}). Such a revival of prophetic gifts had not occurred since the days of Ezra and Nehemiah; even the Maccabæan age had looked for it in vain (1 Mac 4^{46} 14^{41}).

(b) The new prophecy proclaimed the advent of the Messiah, partly preparing His way, partly welcoming and announcing Him when He came. But the chief outpouring of the Spirit was on the Messiah Himself. It fulfilled itself in two miraculous events—the Conception and the Baptism; the first introductory to the human life of the Christ, the second to His ministry and Messianic work.

(α) Two Gospels relate in independent yet not inconsistent narratives the miracle of the Conception and Virgin Birth (see Gore, Dissertations, p. 36 f.). In both it is ascribed to the Holy Spirit (Lk 1^{35}, Mt $1^{18.\ 20}$). Both contexts are conceived in the spirit of the OT and belong to the earliest age of Christianity, when the fullest teaching of the gospel had not yet been assimilated. We shall therefore probably be right in interpreting πνεῦμα ἅγιον here in its OT sense, as the power of God in active exercise, although we may believe that the Church has rightly identified this power with the personal Holy Ghost revealed by Christ. It is not without significance that in both Gospels the power which wrought the Conception is described as πνεῦμα ἅγιον rather than as πνεῦμα θεοῦ or Κυρίου. The Holy Spirit sanctified the Flesh which it united with the Word (Lk 1^{35} διὸ καὶ τὸ γεννώμενον ἅγιον κληθήσεται). Not only was 'the new departure in human life,' which began with the birth of the Second Adam (Gore, Diss. p. 65), fitly preceded by a directly creative act, but the new humanity was consecrated at the moment of its conception by the overshadowing of the Divine Spirit. The Conception was therefore truly 'immaculate'; that which was conceived, although true flesh, was free from the taint of human corruption. It is worth while to notice, in passing, that the Gospels do not hint at an immaculate conception of the mother of the Lord; the special illapse of the Spirit is limited, so far as we can learn, to the conception of her Son. (On the miraculous conception as an article of the Christian faith the reader may consult Pearson, On the Creed, art. iii., and, on the early history of the doctrine, the present writer's Apostles' Creed, iv.).

(β) The Holy Spirit did not leave the sacred humanity which it had sanctified in the moment of conception; the childhood of Jesus was filled with a strength and wisdom which were the marks of a special grace (Lk 2^{40} τὸ δὲ παιδίον . . ἐκραταιοῦτο πληρούμενον σοφίᾳ, καὶ χάρις θεοῦ ἦν ἐπ' αὐτό; cf. v.^{52}). But in or about His thirtieth year (ἦν . . ὡσεὶ ἐτῶν τριάκοντα) a stage was reached when a new illapse of the Spirit on the Second Adam became necessary. The first had sanctified His humanity, the second was to consecrate His official life. It came in connexion with the baptism of John. With the majority of the religious Israelites of His generation, Jesus went to be baptized. As He rose from the Jordan, the sign was given by which the Baptist knew Him to be the Messiah (Jn 1^{33}); John saw the Spirit descend in the form of a dove and rest upon Him. Mr. F. C. Conybeare (Expositor, IV. ix. p. 455) cites Philo to show that the dove was the accepted symbol in Alexandrian thought of the divine reason or wisdom, and concludes that the evangelists have converted a metaphor into a fact. But the evangelists—the Synoptists in any case—were strangers to Alexandrian symbolism, and they limit themselves to what they believed to be matters of fact. In this case the fact depends on the eye-witness of the Baptist, attested by his disciple, St. John. The evangelists, however, guard against the impression that the Spirit assumed a material form (Mt ὡσεὶ περιστεράν, Mk, Lk, Jn ὡς π.); even St. Luke's σωματικῷ εἴδει does not involve this inference. The appearance, whether real or subjective, was doubtless symbolical, but the symbol rests on the OT. It carries our thoughts back to the birdlike motion attributed to the Spirit in Gn 1^2. At the baptism of Jesus the Spirit of God brooded a second time over the waters, to vivify a new creation by resting on the new Head of mankind. If the symbolism of the dove is to be pressed, it may be taken to indicate the character of the Lord's ministry and of the kingdom of heaven (Mt 10^{16}).

The illapse at the baptism was regarded by the first generation as the anointing of the Christ (Ac 10^{38} ἔχρισεν αὐτὸν ὁ θεὸς πνεύματι ἁγίῳ καὶ δυνάμει). In the historical books of the OT הַמָּשִׁיחַ, LXX ὁ χριστός, is the title of the priest (Lv $4^{3.5.16}$ 6^{15}), and the king (1 S 12^3 etc.), who were admitted to their respective offices by the ceremony of unction. In the Psalms and Prophets the title is specially given to the Davidic king (Ps 2^2 17^{54} 19^6 etc.), or to a king raised up by God for a certain work (Is 45^1 τῷ χριστῷ μου Κύρῳ), or to Israel regarded as the servant of the Lord, or to a prophet who speaks in His name (Is 61^1). But when the form of the Second David took shape in the inspired thought of the Prophet and the expectations of the Jewish people, it was to the future king of Israel that the name was usually applied. The Psalms of Solomon already speak of 'the Lord Christ' (17^{36} $18^{\text{tit.}}$, see Ryle and James, note on 17^{36}), and the Gospels show that at the time of the advent the Christ was expected both by Jews (e.g. Jn 1^{20}) and Samaritans (Jn 4^{25}). The Jewish Messiah, however, was chiefly the anointed king; the conception of Messiah as the Prophet was less distinct, and that of a Christ-Priest (ἱερεὺς ὁ χριστός, Lv $4^{5.10}$ 6^{22}) entirely wanting, until it presented itself to the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (Stanton, Jewish and Christian Messiah, p. 293 ff.). Yet the Church has rightly seen that the work to which the Messiah was anointed was sacerdotal and prophetic as well as regal. The baptism, with the descent of the Spirit, was the consecration of Jesus to the Messianic office in all the fulness of its functions and powers. Some of the Fathers find the moment of the Messianic unction in the miraculous Conception (so Gregory of Nazianzus expounds Ps 45^7, and see Aug. De Trin. xv. 46, cited by Mason, Baptism and Confirmation, p. 94), but the earlier interpretation fixes upon the Baptism: see Iren. III. ix. 3, 'Verbum Dei . . qui est Jesus . . qui et assumpsit carnem et unctus est a Patre Spiritu, Jesus Christus factus est'; cf. Jerome on Is 61.* The Gnostic schools exaggerated the importance of the Baptism, confusing the descending Spirit with the pre-existent Christ and ignoring the miraculous Conception. But if the Incarnate life began with the overshadowing of Mary, the official Messianic life dates from the Baptism (cf. Pearson, art. ii.). (γ) From that moment Jesus began His Christ-work (Lk 3^{23} ἦν Ἰ. ἀρχόμενος), and in the oldest record of the ministry it is regarded as the ἀρχὴ εὐαγγελίου (Mk $1^{1.9}$). Henceforth His life is full of the manifested workings of the Spirit, in whose energy the evangelists find the source of the teaching, miracles, and entire ministry of the Christ (Mk 1^{12}, Lk $4^{1.14}$, Mt 12^{28}, Ac 1^2). Some of these revealed relations between the Holy Spirit and the ministry of Christ are of special interest. Immediately after the baptism the Spirit impelled Him to meet the Tempter in the wilderness (Mt, ἀνήχθη ὑπὸ τοῦ πνεύματος; Mk, τὸ πνεῦμα αὐτὸν ἐκβάλλει). The conquest of evil being at once the first responsibility of the Second Adam, and the first step in the redemption of the race, it was the first work of the Spirit in the Christ. The Spirit of God in man was shown to be the power by which the spirit of evil is to be overcome: 'every victory won' is 'His alone.' To the Holy Spirit also our Lord attributes His power to cast out unclean spirits from the possessed (Mt 12^{28}). We may extend the saying to His other miracles (cf. Jn 14^{10} ὁ δὲ πατὴρ ἐν ἐμοὶ μένων [i.e. by the Spirit] ποιεῖ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ). When in the 5th cent. Nestorius unduly pressed this point, Cyril of Alexandria guarded the doctrine of the Incarnation by insisting that the Spirit by which Christ wrought was His own, and not an imparted power, foreign to His personal life (Anath. 9). Nevertheless, the truth remains that the Spirit, who is one with the Son in the Divine Unity, was imparted to His humanity, and strengthened it with supernatural power. The same is true of Christ's teaching; the Lord Himself ascribes it to the anointing Spirit (Lk $4^{18\text{ff.}}$). As the supreme prophet He spoke in the power of the Spirit, not at intervals as other prophets, but whenever He opened His lips to teach. Yet behind the human faculties which were guided by the Spirit, was the eternal Word in personal fellowship with the Father; His formula is not that of the old prophets, 'Thus saith the Lord,' but one which expressed personal authority, 'Verily I say unto you.'

(c) The Spirit descended on the Second Adam to abide (Jn $1^{32.33}$; contrast Gn 6^3 LXX). The illapse was not a momentary act, but a new departure in human life, the beginning of a permanent indwelling of the Spirit in man. The 'Gospel of the Hebrews' has rightly seized upon this point: 'descendit fons omnis spiritus sancti et requievit super eum et dixit illi: Fili mi, in omnibus prophetis expectabam te ut venires et requiescerem in te; tu es enim requies mea.' But the Baptist's testimony reaches further. The Spirit became immanent in the Sacred Humanity, that it might be communicated through the Christ to mankind. Jesus was baptized with the Spirit, that He might baptize the world therewith (Jn 1^{33}; cf. Mt 3^{11}, Mk 1^8, Lk 3^{16}). The experience of the first generation of believers showed that this hope was realized; Christians shared Christ's unction (1 Jn 2^{20}), and the unction abode in them, as it abode in Christ (v.^{27}). This conviction was expressed in the early use of unction in connexion with Christian baptism (Tert. De bapt. 7; Cypr. Ep. 70; Cyr. Hier. Cat. myst. ii.).

Two historical events mark the extension of the Messianic unction to the Church. (α) On the night that followed the Resurrection Christ communicated the Spirit to the apostles (Jn 20^{22} ἐνεφύσησεν καὶ λέγει αὐτοῖς Λάβετε πνεῦμα ἅγιον). The act which accompanied the gift clearly looks back to Gn 2^{7}; a new spirit was breathed into humanity by the risen Lord. He began with the apostles, quickening them by communicating His own Spirit, that they might be prepared to carry on His work (καθὼς ἀπέσταλκέν με ὁ πατήρ, κἀγὼ πέμπω ὑμᾶς). The gift 'answers to the power of the Resurrection' (Westcott, citing Godet): it is primarily the quickening of the spiritual life of the apostles, but it is conferred with special reference to the work which lies before them. There is therefore no necessity to interpret λάβετε as if it were λήμψεσθε (Theodore of Mopsuestia), and to refer it to the Pentecostal effusion. The apostles received on Easter night the first-fruits of the new life of the Spirit secured to the Church by the Lord's Resurrection, and were thus consecrated and endowed for their great ministry. Their successors were, potentially at least, included in the gift, and the Western Church of the Middle Ages rightly saw in the words Accipite Spiritum sanctum the promise of all ministerial power (Hooker, Eccles. Pol. V. lxxvii. 5).

* Pearson points out that the two views are not necessarily inconsistent, referring to the double unction received by David (1 S 16^{13}, 2 S 2^4, 5^3).

(β) If the Resurrection brought the quickening power of the Spirit to the Eleven and to those who should succeed them in the ministry of the word, the Ascension was followed by the outpouring of the fulness of the Spirit on the Church (Ac $1^{5.8}$ $2^{1ff.}$). As at the baptism of the Christ and the consecration of the apostles, the descent of the Spirit was accompanied by external signs. The dove did not reappear, nor was the breath of Christ felt, but the sound of a great gale (ἦχος ὥσπερ φερομένης πνοῆς βιαίας) fell upon the ear, and tongues of flame, darting hither and thither and finally resting on the heads of all, appealed to the eye. The symbolism of the wind had been explained by our Lord (Jn $3^{7.8}$); the fire would remind the apostles of the prediction of the Baptist (Mt 3^{11} etc.). Every detail had its significance. The sound of the rushing wind seemed to fill the house, for the new life was to permeate the whole world. The tongues of fire were self-distributing, and none was left without his portion, for the Spirit divideth to every man as He wills (1 Co 12^{11}), and all believers are made to drink of the same Fountain (ib. ^{13}). The gift was at once collective and individual; it was for the whole body, and for each member.

Both from the promise of Christ and from the event, it is clear that the Pentecostal gift marked the beginning of a new era in the history of the Spirit's relations to mankind. The 'dispensation of the Spirit,' which began at the Pentecost after the Crucifixion, was so great an advance on all earlier manifestations that St. John does not hesitate to deny that there had been any gift of the Spirit before it (Jn 7^{39} οὔπω γὰρ ἦν πνεῦμα: see Westcott ad loc., and cf. Ac 19^{2}). The new manifestation differed from the old, not in degree only, but in kind; before the Incarnation the Spirit had no abiding place in man; since Pentecost the presence of the Spirit is immanent in the Church (Jn 14^{16}; cf. Cyril. Alex. on Jn 7^{39} τὴν ὁλοσχερῆ καὶ ὁλόκληρον κατοίκησιν ἐν ἀνθρώποις τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος σημαίνειν αὐτὸν ὑποτοπήσωμεν). The coming of the Spirit corresponds to the coming of the Son, mutatis mutandis. The Son came to unite Himself to human nature, the Spirit came to inhabit it. The Son came to tabernacle amongst men, the Spirit to dwell in them. But with each coming a divine mission began which marks a new departure in God's dealings with mankind.

(γ) The coming of the Spirit, like the coming of the Son, manifested itself at first by supernatural signs. To regard the gifts of tongues as unhistorical (Zeller, Weizsäcker), is permissible only to those who deny the possibility of the miraculous. That the fact is recorded by so careful a historian as Luke, writing within half a century of the event, and with opportunities of investigating the truth of the story which reached back at least twenty years further, may lead us to hesitate before we assent to these views. The γλωσσολαλία of Ac 2 may have been, like the wind and the fire, rather a sign of the Spirit's coming and a symbol of His work, than a gift intended to supersede the acquirement of foreign tongues, or even an actual assistance to the apostles in their subsequent preaching. But if we may trust the primitive fragment appended to St. Mark's Gospel, the Lord Himself had promised His disciples some manifestation of this kind ('Mk' 16^{17}); and one of St. Paul's undoubted Epistles leaves no doubt that some form of the manifestation existed in the Church of Corinth (1 Co 12^{28} $13^{1.3}$ $14^{2ff.}$). Further, we have the witness of Irenæus (ap. Eus. HE v. 7) that he had himself heard the gift exercised in its Pentecostal form (πολλῶν ἀκούομεν ἀδελφῶν . . παντοδαπαῖς λαλούντων διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος γλώσσαις). The gift was, however, singularly open to abuse, and St. Paul seems to have felt that it had nearly fulfilled its purpose, and might soon disappear (1 Co 13^{8}). Prophecy, another Pentecostal gift, if less novel and impressive, fills a larger place in the early history of the Church. On the day of Pentecost, St. Peter claimed that the words in which Joel foretold a great revival and extension of prophecy in the latter days had been fulfilled by the coming of the Spirit (Ac $2^{16f.}$). Prophets accordingly arose in the Apostolic Church (Ac 11^{27} 13^{1} 15^{32} 19^{6} 21^{9}), and took rank next after apostles (1 Co 12^{28}, Eph 2^{20} 3^{5} 4^{11}), in some localities surviving as an order into the second or third generation (Didache, 10–13). The new prophecy surpassed in St. Paul's esteem all other spiritual gifts, because of its ethical value (1 Co $14^{1.3.4}$). The NT prophet was the inspired teacher of the first age: if he left no literary remains which can be compared with the writings of the Hebrew prophets, it is difficult to exaggerate his importance in the infancy of the Church, when the local bishops or presbyters were as yet but little qualified to instruct their congregations in the mystery of the gospel, and the apostles' writings were as yet incomplete or imperfectly circulated. But the institution, as St. Paul saw (1 Co 13^{8}), lacked permanence, and it was gradually superseded, notwithstanding the Montanist reaction, by the local ministry, strengthened by the growth of the Episcopate.

One invaluable monument of the spiritual gifts of the first generation has survived to our own time. It was promised that the Holy Spirit should bring to the remembrance of the apostles the words and acts of Christ, and that He should lead them into the whole cycle of Christian truth. The Gospels witness to the fulfilment of the first of these promises; the Acts, Epistles, and Apocalypse correspond to the second. The literature of the first generation, preserved in the Canon of the NT, bears the impress of an inspiration which we miss when we pass to the Epistles of Clement and 'Barnabas.' It is a standing proof of the reality of the miracle of Pentecost that the first age of the Church should have produced a series of writings which, in the elevation of their spiritual tone and the fruitfulness of their teaching, remain absolutely alone. Side by side with this monument of the Spirit's work must be placed another—the Christian Society, or Catholic Church. As the idea of the Church rose before the mind of St. Paul, he saw in its external form a body which the Spirit of God animated and made one (1 Co 12^{13}, Eph 4^{4}). History has proved his words true. The vitality of the greatest and oldest community in the world witnesses to the divine power which brought it into being. The Church on her part has marked her sense of her dependence on the Spirit by the order of her creed: she believes in her own permanence and life, because she believes in the Holy Ghost. Credo . . in Spiritum sanctum, sanctam Ecclesiam.

iii. We turn now from the historical facts connected with the coming of the Spirit to the teaching of Christ and the apostles in reference to the nature and work of the Holy Spirit.

(a) (α) With one conspicuous exception, hereafter to be stated, the teaching of Christ upon this subject, so far as it is reported by the Synoptists, goes but a little way beyond that of the OT. He recognizes the inspiration of the OT Scriptures (Mt 22^{43}, Mk 12^{36}, Lk $24^{25f. 44}$) and His own Messianic unction (Lk 4^{18}, Mt 12^{28}); to ascribe His works to Beelzebul is to blaspheme the Spirit, and therefore to commit an 'eternal sin' (Mk 3^{29}). This saying, viewed in the light of its context (Mt 12^{32}), attributes Deity to the Holy Spirit, but does not on that account exceed the limits of the OT revelation (see above, p. 404). Occasionally, the Synoptic Gospels represent our Lord as looking forward to a fuller coming of the Spirit. The apostles will be inspired to defend themselves before the world (Mt 10^{20}); nay, the Holy Spirit will be given by the Father in heaven to all who ask Him for the gift (Lk 11^{13}). A remarkable reading in St. Luke's recension of the Lord's Prayer gives the petition, ἐλθέτω τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμά σου ἐφ' ἡμᾶς καὶ καθαρισάτω ἡμᾶς (Chase, The Lord's Prayer, etc., 24 f.; Resch, Agrapha, p. 398); but it is valuable only as showing the interpretation which the Church put upon the opening clauses of the Prayer.

(β) The Fourth Gospel, however, relates a series of conversations running through the course of our Lord's ministry, which reveal entirely new views of the Spirit's relation to the individual life, to the Church, and to God. The conversation with Nicodemus (Jn 3^{5-8}) asserts the principle of the new birth, tracing the beginnings of the spiritual life in men to the Spirit of God, and apparently connecting the birth of the Spirit with the future sacrament of Christian baptism. Similarly, the discourse of Jn 6 speaks of the spiritual food of the new life, which was to be imparted in the mystery of Christ's body and blood. In the conversation with the woman of Samaria (Jn 4^{10}), and the proclamation at the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn $7^{37f.}$), the Lord directs attention to Himself as the Fountain of the Spirit, from which believers should continually receive, and in turn communicate, fresh supplies of the water of life. The language is mystical, but the evangelist was able after the event to find its fulfilment in the dispensation of the Spirit (Jn 7^{39}, Rev 22^{17}). But the fullest and clearest revelation was reserved for the last discourse on the night before the Passion (Jn $14^{16. 17. 26}$ 15^{26} $16^{7. 13}$). It opens with the promise, 'I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Paraclete, to be with you for ever, the Spirit of truth' (cf. v.^{26} ὁ δὲ παράκλητος, τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, where the identification is complete). The Holy Spirit, then, was to be Christ's substitute and representative on earth, a vicaria vis (Tertullian, Præscr. 13); and the work assigned to Him is that of an advocate (on παράκλητος see Westcott's detached note, and Lightfoot's early work, On a Fresh Revision of the NT^{2}, p. 50 f.). No function more characteristic of personal life could have been attributed, and Christ speaks accordingly of the Spirit as ὁ παράκλητος, not as τὸ παράκλητον,—a choice of gender which is emphasized by the repeated use of the masculine pronoun (ἐκεῖνος μαρτυρήσει . . ἐκεῖνος ἐλέγξει . . . ἐκεῖνος ἐμὲ δοξάσει.) But the personality of the Deputy is in fact essential to the Lord's reasoning; no impersonal influence could supply the lack of personal guidance and probation which the apostles would feel when the Lord was taken from them.* It is therefore futile to compare His mode of speaking in this passage with the prosopopœia by which in the OT and Apocrypha the wisdom of God is described as a personal (female) agent. Further, it cannot be maintained that Christ is speaking in Jn 14–16 merely of a new operation of divine power in man (cf. Ps 139^7), or of His own Spirit as perpetuating itself in the lives of His disciples. For He proceeds to distinguish the coming Paraclete both from the Father and from Himself: 'the Father will give you another Paraclete . . . the Father will send [him] in my name . . . I will send him from the Father . . . the Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father.' The differentiation is perfect; the Spirit is not the Father, nor is He the Son; as a Person, He is distinct from both. Again, we are permitted to learn something as to His relation to both. He is sent by both, but He is sent by the Son from the Father; He proceeds from the Father (παρὰ τοῦ πατρός). Although this is scarcely equivalent to the ecclesiastical phrase ἐκ τοῦ πατρός (see Westcott, ad loc., and on the origin of the later phrase, cf. Hort, Two Dissertations, p. 86 f.), the words used by Christ teach implicitly that the Spirit possesses an eternal relation with the Father upon which His temporal mission rests (cf. Jn $16^{27. 28}$ with 1^{14}, and Westcott's notes).

The Lord proceeds in the same great discourse to shadow forth the work to which the new Paraclete was about to be sent. His mission would be primarily to the disciples and the Church (Jn $14^{16. 17}$), in the way of fellowship (μεθ' ὑμῶν), presence (παρ' ὑμῖν), and indwelling (ἐν ὑμῖν); and this threefold relation was to be permanent (εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα), not, as Christ's historical manifestation, transient (Westcott). His functions would be (1) to carry on the teaching work of Christ, partly by quickening the memories of Christ's immediate followers (Jn 14^{26}), partly by guiding them into new truth, till all had been learnt (Jn 14^{26} 16^{13}), and revealing the new order (Jn 16^{13} τὰ ἐρχόμενα ἀναγγελεῖ ὑμῖν); (2) to glorify the Son, as the Son glorifies the Father, by revealing the Son to the Church in the fulness of the divine life (Jn $16^{14. 15}$). But the Spirit would also have a mission to the world, although it could not discern or recognize Him (14^{17} οὐ θεωρεῖ αὐτὸ οὐδὲ γινώσκει). He would co-operate with the Church in bearing witness to Christ (Jn $15^{26. 27}$), and His witness would carry the force of an irresistible conviction (Jn 16^8 ἐλέγξει τὸν κόσμον) concerning the great facts of human sin, divine righteousness, and the process of judgment by which, from the Advent onwards, the victory of righteousness is being determined.

(γ) The crowning revelation followed the Resurrection, and is recorded by St. Matthew alone (28^{19}). The disciples had been taught that the Divine Spirit is a living Person, and that He is not to be identified with either the Father or the Son. From the formula of baptism they now learnt that the three Persons are comprehended under One Name; the Spirit is one with the Father and the Son in the Unity of the Divine Life. The words justify the place which has been assigned to the Holy Ghost in the creeds and the worship of the universal Church (Basil, Ep. ii. 125, δεῖ γὰρ ἡμᾶς βαπτίζεσθαι μὲν ὡς παρελάβομεν, πιστεύειν δὲ ὡς βαπτιζόμεθα, δοξάζειν δὲ ὡς πεπίστεύκαμεν). But they also foretell the new relation which under the gospel was to subsist between the human spirit and the Spirit of God. To be baptized ‘into the Name . . . of the Holy Ghost’ is to be placed in a position of lifelong dependence upon the Divine Spirit, and consecration to the service which He inspires.

---

* When Beyschlag (NT Theology, Eng. tr. ii. p. 279) writes, 'The notion of the Holy Spirit as a third Divine personality . . . is one of the most disastrous importations into the Holy Scriptures,' he assumes that this idea has been imported, and that his own construction of the Lord's words ('just a pictorial personification') is convincing and even necessary. Against these assumptions must he set (1) the plain and natural interpretation of Christ's words, and (2) the judgment of the Christian Society, in which, according to Christ's promise, the Spirit dwells.

(b) From the moment of the Pentecostal descent the presence of the Paraclete entered as a fact into the daily life of the Christian society. (a) The apostles realized at once that the promise of Christ had been fulfilled, and that a new dispensation had begun (Ac $2^{33.\,38\text{f.}}$). As the years went on, they were able to interpret from their own experience the details of Christ’s teaching (cf. Ac 5^{32}, 1 Jn 5^{6} with Jn 15^{26}; Ac 9^{31} with Jn 14^{16}; 1 P 4^{14}, Ja 4^{5} with Jn $14^{16.\,17}$). They realized that as apostles they were specially endowed with the Spirit of God; to practise a deception upon them in their apostolic character was to attempt to deceive the Holy Spirit, and therefore to lie to God (Ac $5^{3.\,4.\,9}$); when they and other officers of the Church took counsel on matters of discipline, the Holy Spirit shared their deliberations and their judgment (Ac 15^{25}); to them, as apostles, belonged the power of imparting the Holy Spirit to the baptized by the laying on of their hands (Ac $8^{15\text{f.}}$ 19^{6}, cf. He 6^{2}); individually, they were conscious of receiving direct communications from the Holy Spirit (Ac 11^{12} 13^{2} $16^{6.\,7}$). But they recognized also that the gift belonged to the whole Church and to every member of it (Ac 2^{28} $10^{44\text{-}47}$ $11^{15.\,16}$ 13^{52} $15^{8.\,9}$). This fact was evidenced, not merely by miraculous manifestations (Ac 10^{46} 19^{6}), but by the new life of the Christian brotherhood. Miracles might have chiefly attracted attention in the first days, but even then the practical wisdom and joyful spirit of the common Christian life were seen to be fruits of the Spirit of Christ (Ac 6^{3} 13^{52}); and the maturer experience of the Apostolic Church realized that the Holy Spirit is the source of Christian holiness (1 P 1^{2}), the inspirer of prayer (Jude ^{20}), the means of an abiding union between Christ and Christians (1 Jn 3^{24} 4^{12}), the pledge of future glory in the presence of God (1 P 4^{14}).

(β) It is, however, to the Epistles of St. Paul that we must turn for the fullest treatment which the doctrine of the Spirit receives within the limits of the NT. Not that St. Paul sets himself to construct a philosophy of religion in which the relation of the Holy Spirit to God, to the Church, and to the human soul receives scientific treatment. He treats the whole subject incidentally and in connexion with his argument, or with the practical interests of the communities he is addressing. But he treats it with an insight, a freshness, and a precision due partly to his unique experience, partly to the intensity of his interest in the gospel and its workings upon human nature. There is a manifest progress in the apostle’s handling of this subject which corresponds to the progress in his own life and work. In the earliest group of Epistles (1 and 2 Th) he scarcely exceeds the usual teaching of the first generation. He connects the gift of the Holy Spirit with spiritual power (1 Th 1^{5}) and joy (v.^{6}), with moral purity (1 Th 4^{8}) and religious consecration (2 Th 2^{13}); he offers practical guidance in reference to the miraculous χαρίσματα, warning believers against indiscriminately accepting all prophetic utterances on the one hand, and despising them all upon the other, and thus quenching the heavenly fire (1 Th $5^{19\text{f.}}$, cf. 2 Th 2^{2}). One interesting verse shows that he recognized in human nature an element corresponding to the Divine Spirit, and fitted to be the sphere of His operations (1 Th 5^{23} ὑμῶν τὸ πνεῦμα). The next group of letters (Ro, 1, 2 Co, Gal) carries us into the heart of his teaching on this subject, and we find ourselves in the midst of what is largely a new revelation. In these Epistles, St. Paul, starting with his conception of the human spirit (Ro 1^{9}, 1 Co 2^{11}, Gal 6^{18}), sometimes places the Spirit of God in sharp contrast with the spirit of man, whilst in other places he exhibits the two in close correspondence and co-operation. Instances of the former point of view will be found in Ro $8^{16.\,26}$, 1 Co l.c., Gal 4^{6}. In such passages the distinct personality of the Divine Spirit comes strongly into view; the Spirit of God bears witness with the spirits of men (Ro 8^{26}), helps our infirmity, and makes entreaty for us with sighs too deep for words (ὑπερεντυγχάνει στεναγμοῖς ἀλαλήτοις, Ro 8^{26}), calling from the depth of our hearts upon the Father (Gal 4^{6}, cf. Ro 8^{15}); while at the same time He abides within the life of God, searching the depths of the Divine Nature and counsels, even as the human spirit is privy to the inmost thoughts of man (1 Co 2^{11}). The Spirit of God is, from St. Paul’s point of view, uncreated and divine, for it is internal to the Essence of God. Where the Spirit dwells and works, God dwells and works (1 Co 3^{16} 6^{19}, 2 Co 3^{16}); it is by the Spirit that God is immanent in men. Yet the identification is not so complete as to exclude a true distinction between the Spirit and other Persons in God. The Holy Ghost is the Spirit of Him that raised up Christ from the dead (Ro 8^{11}), i.e. the Father; He is also the Spirit of Christ (Ro 8^{7}), not merely because He anointed the Messiah, but on account of His personal relation to the Son of God (Gal 4^{6}); He is the Spirit of the Son. Lastly, the three Persons are named in the same sentence as distinct hypostases (2 Co 13^{14}). In a few passages the Spirit of Christ in St. Paul appears to mean either our Lord’s human spirit (Ro 1^{4} κατὰ πνεῦμα ἁγιωσύνης: see Sanday-Headlam, ad loc., and Westcott on He 9^{14}), or His pre-existent nature (2 Co 3^{17} ὁ δὲ κύριος τὸ πνεῦμά ἐστιν), or His risen life (1 Co 15^{45} ὁ ἔσχατος Ἀδὰμ [ἐγένετο] εἰς πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν); in other contexts the Holy Spirit is identified with Christ, because it is through the Spirit that the ascended Lord dwells in the Church and operates in believers (Ro $8^{9.\,10}$). But the ambiguity rarely occurs; in the great majority of cases the distinctness of the Persons is clearly seen, and the reader can discriminate between the spiritual nature of Christ, and the Spirit who anointed Him and is one with Him in the unity of God.

But by far the larger number of St. Paul’s references to the Spirit in these Epistles are concerned with His operations on the spirit of man. Living in an age of physical manifestations, the apostle does not ignore the miraculous gifts (Ro 12^{6} $15^{18.\,19}$, 1 Co 12. 14, Gal 3^{5}), and in one place (1 Co l.c.) he treats of these at length; they, too, are χαρίσματα (Ro 1^{11} 12^{6}, 1 Co 1^{7}, cf. Lightfoot, Notes, etc. p. 148 f.), but not the chiefest or best (1 Co 12^{31} 13^{1}), or the most abiding. The permanent results of the Spirit’s coming are faith, hope, and love (1 Co 13^{13}); its normal fruits are the virtues which make up the fulness of the Christian life (Gal $5^{22.\,23}$). The Holy Spirit consecrates even the human body which has received the sacramental pledges of His presence, and has thus become the temple of God (1 Co 3^{16} 6^{19}); and He will hereafter raise it up in the likeness of Christ’s resurrection (Ro 8^{11}), a spiritual body (1 Co $15^{42\text{-}44}$), not liable to corruption or death. But His special sphere is the human spirit. Here His indwelling already works a new life, answering to the life of the Risen Christ (Ro 8^{2} 10^{13}). This life of the Spirit in man is pre-eminently a life of sonship towards God; those who follow it possess the privileges of sons in the divine family (Ro 8^{14}); they are joint heirs of the Heir of all things (Ro 8^{17}, cf. Mt 21^{38}, He 1^{2}), brethren of the First-born of God (Ro 8^{29}). If the sonship is secured by the Incarnation and the Resurrection, it is manifested and sealed by the gift of the Spirit, who is the πνεῦμα υἱοθεσίας (Ro $8^{15.\,16}$, Gal 4^{4-6}). He creates in the adopted sons a character corresponding to their new relation to God and to Christ (Ro $8^{29.\,30}$), by a renewal of the mind which works a transformation in their lives (Ro 12^{2} μεταμορφοῦσθε τῇ ἀνακαινώσει τοῦ νοός), and has the effect of engraving the divine will, once written on tables of stone, upon hearts of flesh which will retain the impression and translate it into human life (2 Co 3^{3}). Yet all these operations of the Spirit are but the foretaste of greater things to come. The gift of the Spirit already received by the Church is the ἀπαρχή (Ro 8^{23})—the first-fruits of the harvest yet to be reaped; the present indwelling of the Spirit in the heart is the ἀρραβών (2 Co 1^{22} 5^{5})—the first instalment of the fuller life, and the earnest that it is to follow (on the word ἀρρ. see Lightfoot, Notes, p. 323). Of the Spirit's future work the resurrection of the body will form a true part, for the reanimation of man's physical nature is at once a proper function of the 'Giver of life' (Ro 8^{12}), and the manifestation of our adoption into the divine family (Ro 8^{3}). But the resurrection itself is but a fresh departure in the history of the race; beyond it there lies an immeasurable life of progress unfettered by sin and death, 'the liberty of the glory of the sons of God' (Ro 8^{21}); and of this also St. Paul regards the Holy Spirit as the motive power.

In some of these contexts it is not easy to determine whether by πνεῦμα the apostle means the Spirit of God in man, or the spirit of man under the influence of the Spirit of God. The question arises especially in passages which contrast the Spirit with the flesh (Ro $8^{4\text{f.}}$, Gal 5^{16}). The σάρξ is human nature on its weak and mortal side; is then the πνεῦμα, which is opposed to it, the same nature in its victory over death and sin? Lightfoot (on Gal 5^{17}) is disposed to reject this view: 'Throughout this passage,' he writes, 'the πνεῦμα is evidently the Divine Spirit, for the human spirit in itself and unaided does not stand in direct antagonism to the flesh.' This is, of course, true; but the objection does not apply to the interpretation which regards πνεῦμα as the human spirit influenced by and so far identified with the Spirit of God. On the whole this interpretation seems preferable, although it is clear that in both places the apostle's thought passes at times from one meaning of the word to another, refusing to be bound by an absolute rule (cf. Sanday-Headlam, Romans, p. 196). A somewhat similar antithesis of πνευματικός and ψυχικός (1 Co 2^{14}, cf. 15^{44}) presents the same difficulty. The ψυχικός is under the control of the ψυχή, or lower rational nature; in the πνευματικός the πνεῦμα, the higher nature, the understanding and the will guided by the Spirit of God, has the ascendant. Here, again, we cannot exclude the thought either of the Divine Spirit or the spirit of the man; the two are regarded as in their operation one, and the one term covers both, although the human spirit is in the foreground of the thought. Similarly, in the antithesis of πνεῦμα and γράμμα (Ro 2^{29} 7^{6}, 2 Co 3^{6}), the heart of the contrast lies in the opposition of the external to the spiritual; and while πνεῦμα points to the action of the personal Spirit, who is the Giver of spiritual life, its precise meaning must be determined by the context. In the two former passages the reference seems to be to the spirit of man under divine influence; in the latter, to the new life of the Spirit which characterizes the gospel as compared with a dispensation of external law. Even the law has its spiritual element, for it was written by the finger of God (Ro 7^{14} ὁ νόμος πνευματικός ἐστιν), and its righteous judgments find an echo in the life of the spiritual man (Ro 8^{4}); but, considered as a mere edict, it stands in direct opposition to the Spirit (Gal 5^{18}), whose sphere is in the heart of the inner man; and he who is guided by the Spirit is emancipated from the external control which he no longer needs.

When we pass from the Epistles of the third missionary journey to those of the Roman imprisonment and the later 'pastoral' Epistles, we find the apostle's point of view somewhat modified. The intensity of his interest in the individual life has now been supplemented by a new interest in the unity and catholicity of the Church (cf. Hort, Romans and Ephesians, p. 128 ff.; Ecclesia, p. 135 ff.). He touches on the relations of the Spirit to the individual with a freshness of conception which shows that he is as keenly impressed as ever with their primary importance (Eph $1^{13.\,14}$ 4^{30} $6^{17.\,18}$, Ph 1^{19}, Col 1^{7}, 2 Ti 1^{14}); yet it is as the Spirit of the universal Church that he now specially delights to contemplate the Holy Ghost. To some extent this position had been occupied in 1 Co, but there 'he is dealing with the Ecclesia of a single city, . . . in the Epistle to the Ephesians he is dealing with the universal Ecclesia' (Hort, p. 141). The Spirit is in these later Epistles the bond of Catholic unity (Eph $4^{3.\,4}$, cf. 2^{18}, Ph 2^{1}), the source of ministerial gifts (Eph 4^{7-12}, 2 Ti $1^{6.\,7}$) and sacramental grace (Tit 3^{5}). Thus the teaching of the earlier Epistles finds its complement in that of the later, where it appears that the same divine gift which sanctifies and perfects the individual member of Christ, is the bond of corporate unity and the source and support of the common life which animates the whole body of the Church.

(γ) One book of the NT remains. The Apocalypse returns to the standpoint of the OT when it represents the Holy Spirit in the light of the Spirit of prophecy (Rev 1^{10} 2^{7} etc., 4^{2} 14^{13} 19^{10} 22^{6}). Yet incidentally it takes up St. Paul's later view. What the Spirit says, He says to the Churches (Rev $2^{7.\,11.\,17.\,29}$ $3^{1.\,6.\,13.\,22}$). For each of the Churches He has a separate message (Rev 1^{4} 3^{1} 4^{5} 5^{6}); the sevenfold gift of God (Rev 1^{4} 3^{1} 4^{5} 5^{6}) fulfils its work in each Christian brotherhood as in each Christian soul under different conditions, and with partial and fragmentary results varying according to the measure in which it is bestowed, and the manner in which it is received. To the universal Church the Spirit bears another relation: He co-operates with it in its witness to Christ; His voice is joined with that of the bride in calling for the bridegroom's return (Rev $22^{17\text{a}}$). Yet in this book of world-wide and time-long interests the need of the individual is not overlooked, and the last mention of the Spirit in the Apocalypse refers to it (Rev $22^{17\text{b}}$ ὁ διψῶν ἐρχέσθω· ὁ θέλων λαβέτω ὕδωρ ζωῆς δωρεάν).

Summary.—It may be well briefly to summarize the results of this examination of the teaching of the Old and New Testaments upon the subject of the Holy Spirit.

The first chapter of Genesis represents the Divine Spirit as co-operating with the Divine Word in the ordering of the cosmos; the last chapter of the Apocalypse represents Him as speaking in the Universal Church. There are few of the intermediate books which contribute nothing to the doctrine of the Spirit. In every section of the Canon He fills a prominent and important place.

If it be asked what the Bible teaches with regard to the essential nature of the Holy Spirit, the answer is on one point explicit and unanimous. The Holy Spirit is, in the strict sense of the word, divine. No biblical writer yields any support to the Arian conception of a created Intelligence above the angels but inferior to the Son, to whom the name 'Spirit of God' is improperly applied.

But to the further inquiry, whether this Divine Spirit is a person, the reply, if on the whole decisive, does not come with equal clearness from the earlier and the later books. The Old Testament attributes personality to the Spirit only in so far as it identifies the Spirit of God with God Himself, present and operative in the world or in men. But the teaching of Christ and of the apostles, whilst accentuating the personal attributes of the Spirit, distinguishes the Spirit from the Father and the Son. The baptismal formula comprehends the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit in the Unity of the Name which consecrates and claims for itself the whole life of man.

On the office and work of the Holy Spirit the Canon throws fuller light, for here a more precise knowledge is necessary to the well-being of the Church. But here again the revelation is progressive, corresponding in its growth to the growing needs of men. The Spirit appears first in connexion with the cosmogony of Genesis, and the writers of the Old Testament frequently refer to His work in sustaining and renewing physical life. But the Hebrew Canon attributes to Him also the endowment of human nature with intellectual and spiritual gifts, and especially regards Him as the source of the great gift of prophecy. It speaks of Him as the author of moral purity and religious consecration. Lastly, it foretells the coming of an ideal King, a perfect Servant of God, in whom the Spirit should rest in His fulness, and an extension of the Spirit's gifts in the last days to the whole nation and to the world. At this point the New Testament takes up the thread of the revelation. The Synoptic Gospels show how the ideals of the Old Testament were fulfilled in the life and ministry of Jesus Christ. The Fourth Gospel predicts the mission of the Spirit to the Church; the Acts and Epistles relate the fulfilment of His mission in the experience of the Apostolic Church. We are permitted to see how it has changed the whole spiritual order, raising a new Israel out of the old, transforming an elect nation into a Catholic Church, pouring new life into the body of the disciples, sanctifying individual wills, carrying conviction to the world, and guiding believers into the fulness of the truth. In St. Paul's writings the biblical doctrine of the operations of the Holy Spirit reaches its completion. The apostle sees in the Spirit of Christ the source of the vital unity which inspires the Church, the quickening and compacting power of the new creation. But he teaches with equal clearness that the Spirit has come to regenerate and restore the personal life of each of the baptized, dwelling in the body as His temple, identifying Himself with the human spirit in its struggle with the flesh and its striving after God, until He has perfected the nature which the Son of God redeemed and has raised it to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

HONEST, HONESTY.—These words have greatly deteriorated in the three centuries that lie between us and the issue of AV. What they mean now we know; then they meant something nearly approaching the meaning of the Latin words from which they come. Honestus (from honos, 'honour') had two meanings in Latin: (1) 'Regarded with honour,' 'honourable'; (2) 'Bringing honour,' 'becoming,'—and those are just the meanings of 'honest' as it is used in AV. The word had at the time a special, one might almost say technical, meaning when used of women: it meant 'chaste.' Thus in his chapter in The Profane State (v. 1. p. 359) on 'The Harlot,' T. Fuller speaks of her crisping and curling and the like, and then adds, 'I must confesse some honest women may go thus, but no whit the honester for going thus.' And this is of course his meaning in The Holy Warre (ii. 46, p. 106), 'Thus Jerusalem, after it had fourscore and eight yeares been enjoyed by the Christians, by Gods just judgement was taken again by the Turks. What else could be expected? Sinne reigned in every corner; there was scarce one honest woman in the whole citie of Jerusalem.' And this meaning occurs once in AV, 2 Es 16^{49} 'Like as a whore envieth a right honest and virtuous woman,' though the adj. so tr^{d} is so general a one as idoneus, 'proper.' With that exception 'honest' means either (1) honourable, or (2) becoming.

Neither adj., adv., nor subst. occurs in OT, a fact not without significance in comparing the OT ethics with that of Apocr. and NT. The commonest word tr^{d} 'honest' is καλός, which means 'seemly' or 'becoming,' but with an ethical content enabling it to describe such character or conduct as deserves respect or esteem. So To 5^{13} 7^{7}, Wis 4^{12}, 2 Mac 6^{23}, Lk 8^{15}, Ro 12^{17}, 2 Co 8^{21} 13^{7}, 1 P 2^{12}. RV retains 'honest' in To 5^{13} 7^{7}, Lk 8^{15}; gives 'honourable' in Wis 4^{12}, Ro 12^{17}, 2 Co 8^{21} 13^{7}; 'his excellent education' for 'his most honest education' in 2 Mac 6^{23}; and 'seemly behaviour' for 'honest conversation' (ἀναστροφὴ καλή) in 1 P 2^{12}. In Sir 29^{14} the adj. εὐσχήμων, 'decorous,' is tr^{d} 'honest' (omitted in RV); and in 29^{14} ἀγαθός, 'good' (as RV); while, lastly, in Ph 4^{8} the word is σεμνός, for which we scarcely have an equivalent adj. (RV 'honourable,' RVm 'reverend').*

These two meanings of 'honest' may be illustrated thus: (1) Honourable, Ac 17^{12} Wyc. 'And sotheli manye of hem bilevyden, and of hethen wymmen honeste (some MSS 'honest heithen wymmen'), and men not fewe'; Ru 1^{22} Cov. 'There was a kinsman also of the kynred of Eli Melech Naemis huszbande, whose name was Boos, which was an honest man'; North, Plutarch, p. 894, 'Now as the Rhodians were desirous to be ridde of this warre, and that Demetrius also was willing to take an honest occasion to do it, the Ambassadours of the Athenians came happily to serve both their desires.' T. Fuller (Holy Warre, v. 7, p. 239) speaks of 'terms honest and honourable'; and Rutherford (Letters, No. 56) says, 'There is no quarrel more honest or honourable than to suffer for truth.' (2) Becoming: Tindale, Pent., Prologe, 'And beholde how righteous, howe honest and howe due a thinge it is by nature that every man love his brother unfaynedly even as him selfe, for his fathers sake.' So Is 52^{1} Cov. 'Put on thine honest rayment o Ierusalem, thou citie of the holy one'; and Golding, Calvin's Job, p. 571 (on 32^{11-22}), 'There is a certaine honest comelinesse to be kept.'

---

* The best rendering, says Vincent (Intern. Crit. Com.), is 'venerable' (as AVm), if divested of its conventional implication of age. And he notices that Matthew Arnold (God and the Bible, p. xxii) suggests 'nobly serious,' as opposed to κοῦφος, 'lacking intellectual seriousness.' 'Honest' is Tindale's word, whom all the VSS follow; Wyc. has 'chaste,' Ellicott chooses 'seemly.' See also J. A. Clapperton in Preacher's Magazine, viii. 457.

The adv. honestly is the tr^{n} in Sir 22^{9} of ἐν ἀγαθῇ ('If children live honestly,' ἐν ἀγαθῇ ζωῇ); in 2 Mac 12^{43} and He 13^{18} (Amer. RV 'honourably') of καλῶς; and in Ro 13^{13}, 1 Th 4^{12} of εὐσχημόνως, 'decorously (Amer. RV 'becomingly').

The subst. honesty occurs only in 1 Ti 2^{2} 'that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty' (ἐν πάσῃ εὐσεβείᾳ καὶ σεμνότητι, RV 'in all godliness and gravity'). For the Eng. word cf. Joy, An Apology to W. Tindale (Arber's ed. p. 19), 'Tindale shulde have goten hym more honesty and lesse shame yf he had writen once lesse to the reader'; and North, Plutarch, p. 852, 'The great force of Demosthenes eloquence . . . did so inflame the Thebans courage with desire of honour, that it trode under their feete all maner of considerations, and did so ravish them with the love and desire of honesty, that they cast at their heeles all feare of danger.' J. HASTINGS.

HONEY.—See FOOD, vol. ii. p. 37^{b}.

HOODS is AV tr^{n} in Is 3^{23} of an article of female attire, designated by the Heb. term צְנִיפוֹת. RV has turbans, and there can be little doubt that this is the correct rendering, and that it might have been introduced into the text of RV in Job 29^{14} and Is 62^{3} (AV, RV 'diadem'), as well as in Zec 3^{5} (AV, RV 'mitre'). The derivation from ẓānaph gives the meaning of something wrapped round, as the similar Arab. liffeh, 'turban-band,' is taken from laff, 'to wrap round.' In the East the head-covering is usually a protection against heat rather than against cold. The habit of keeping the head always covered makes it sensitive to cold, and during a time of severe weather Orientals cover their heads with shawls, after the manner of hoods, but it is not a permanent article of dress. See DRESS, vol. i. p. 626^{b}.

G. M. MACKIE.

HOOK represents various words in both Heb. and Arab., and sometimes the meaning is very different from what is usually understood by the Eng. word hook. 1. The hooks (וָוִים) used in the tabernacle (Ex 26^{32} etc.) are, in the Arab. VS, tr. by a word (ruzaz) which means a hook or ring with a spike for being driven into wood. 2. In 2 K 19^{28}, Is 37^{29}, Job 41^{2}, Ezk 29^{4}, the Arab. VS has ring (khazâmet) as tr. of חַח or חוֹחַ. The ring meant in these passages is one which is put in the nose of a wild animal to bring it under control. In Syria gipsies frequently lead bears about among the villages by means of ropes fastened to rings inserted in the cartilage of the nose. In Ezk 38^{4} חַח is tr. in Arab. shakîmat, the bit of the bridle of a horse. 3. In Ezk 40^{43} שְׁפַתַּיִם (gutters?) is tr. in Arab. maâzîb. 4. Pruning-hooks (מַזְמֵרָה, Arab. manâjil), Is 2^{4} 18^{5}, Mic 4^{3}, Jl 3^{10}. In Syria pruning-hooks are somewhat like the reaping-hooks or sickles used in England, only very much smaller. The handle is of steel, and of the same piece as the blade. It is hollow, and, when the pruning-hook is used to cut down thorns, a long stick is thrust into the hollow handle. 5. Fish-hooks (צִנָּה, סִיר Am 4^{2}, חַכָּה Job 41^{1}, Is 19^{8}, Hab 1^{15}; ἄγκιστρον, Mt 17^{27}). 6. Flesh-hooks (מַזְלֵג or [מִזְלָגָה] Ex 27^{3}, Nu 4^{14}, 1 S $2^{13.14}$; Arab. minshal), with two or three prongs for lifting meat out of a pot.

W. CARSLAW.

HOOPOE (דּוּכִיפַת dûkhîphath, ἔποψ, upupa, AV lapwing).—This bird is mentioned only in the list of unclean birds (Lv 11^{19}, Dt 14^{18}). It is generally admitted that the hoopoe, Upupa epops, L., is the bird intended. It migrates to Egypt and the Sahara in the winter, but returns to Pal. and Syria at the beginning of March, and spreads suddenly over the whole country. The Arabs call it hudhud from its cry. Its Gr. and Lat. names are derived from its habit of inspecting the ground. The head of the hoopoe is depicted on the Egyptian monuments. It was supposed by the ancients, as also the modern Arabs, to search the ground for hidden wells and springs. This opinion is based on its habit of bending its head downwards, and alternately erecting and depressing its crest. The Arabs say that it reveals these secrets. In reality it is seeking its food, which consists of small insects and worms. It resorts to dunghills, finding it easy to dig out the insects from the dung. But this is by no means its exclusive source of supply. Perhaps it was this habit which caused it to be regarded as unclean in the Mosaic law. It is not now considered unfit for food. It is often shot, or caught on bird-lime, and sold with other game birds. Tristram says that the Arabs call it the 'doctor bird.' Its general colour is russet, but the wings and tail are black, with white bars. The feathers of the crest are 2 in. long, and black-tipped. It is as large as a thrush. G. E. POST.

HOPE.—AV tr^{n} of the following Heb. and Gr. words:—

1. בָּטַח (vb.), בֶּטַח (noun), Job 6^{20}, Ps 16^{9} (לָבֶטַח correctly tr^{d} by RV 'in safety'); cf. מִבְטָח Jer 17^{7}, בִּטָּחוֹן Ec 9^{4} (elsewhere only 2 K 18^{19}=Is 36^{4}). The vb. בָּטַח (root perh.='repose oneself on') is very common in OT. AV generally tr. by 'trust.' 2. כֶּסֶל (from root='thick,' 'fat') Job 8^{14} 31^{24}, Ps 78^{7}. It is best tr^{d} 'confidence' (so AV, RV in Pr 3^{26}, its only other occurrence in this sense). The form כִּסְלָה occurs Job 4^{6}. 3. מַחְסֶה Jer 17^{17}, Jl 3^{16} (better RV 'refuge'; so frequently in Pss). 4. מִקְוֶה, תִּקְוָה Ezr 10^{2}, Job 4^{6}, etc. (the root קוה is the frequent 'wait for (on) J″' of OT). 5. 6. Practically synonymous with this are יחל (vb., Niph., Pi., Hiph.), תּוֹחֶלֶת (noun), Job 6^{11}, Ezk 13^{6}, Ps 31^{24} and oft., Pr 13^{12}, and שׂבר (vb.), שֵׂבֶר (noun), Ps $119^{116.166}$ 146^{5}, Est 9^{1}, Is 38^{18} (root meaning 'look closely at,' Neh $2^{13.15}$). 7. חול (root='writhe'), 'wait anxiously,' La 3^{26} (cf. Gn 8^{10} [?], Jg 3^{25}, Mic 1^{12}, Job 35^{14}, Ps 37^{7}, Est 4^{4}).

In NT the noun is ἐλπίς and the vb. ἐλπίζω, always of favourable expectation (contrast ἐλπὶς πονηρά of LXX, Is 28^{19}). In He 10^{23} 'the profession of our faith' should be 'the confession of our hope' (τὴν ὁμολογίαν τῆς ἐλπίδος).

The second in St. Paul's triumvirate of graces (1 Co 13^{13}) has attracted less attention than its companions. With respect to the nature of hope in general, faith is its inseparable condition; in He 11^{1} 'foundation' might almost be substituted for 'assurance.' But its distinctive feature is desire of future good. Hope may accordingly be defined as desire of future good, accompanied by faith in its realization. The object both of faith and of hope is something unseen. Faith has regard equally to past, present, or future, while no doubt in Scripture referring mainly to the future (see, however, He 11^{3}). Hope is directed only to the future. Expectation differs from hope in referring either to good or evil things, and therefore lacks the element of desire.

In the nature of things the grace of hope is peculiarly prominent in OT. That was the time of promise and prophecy, ours is the time of fulfilment (Mt 13^{17}). Everything then had a forward look. The Heb. golden age lay in the future. The pious Hebrew was a minor (Gal 4^{3}). It is quite in keeping with the old economy that the element of faith or confidence which is latent in hope was especially active. In OT Luther often renders 'hope' by 'trust.' It is often hard to say whether faith or desire is most prominent (Ps 38^{15} 78^{7} etc.). 'These all died in faith' is almost equivalent to 'These all died in hope' (He 11^{13}). They 'endured as seeing him who is invisible' (v.^{27}). It is often said that the hope of OT believers was directed less to spiritual than to temporal good, such as health, riches, victory; but this is only partially true. Spiritual aspiration cannot well be purer or stronger than in passages like Ps 63^{1} 17^{15}; and temporal good is not forbidden to Christian hope (Mt 6^{33}). Heb. hope, no less than Christian, was set on God (Ps 33$^{18.\ 22}$ 42^{11} etc.). Jeremiah beautifully addresses J″ as 'the hope of Israel' (14^{8} 17^{13}). If in NT St. Peter is the apostle of hope,—not so much because of frequent express references (1 P 1$^{3.\ 13.\ 21}$ 3^{15}) as from the general strain of his teaching,—in OT Jeremiah may be called the prophet of hope for the same reason (17^{7}· 50^{7}); his hope was deeply spiritual in nature (31$^{33f.}$, He 10^{16}).

In NT hope is wider in range, more definitely spiritual in contents, and is attended with greater certainty. It is a 'better hope,' because grounded on 'a better covenant which hath been enacted on better promises' (He 7^{19} 8^{6}). The blessings it seeks are not limited to the future life, but include all that is promised to faith in the present life. Or, to speak more correctly, distinctions of present and future are often ignored in Scripture. The divine promises and Christian aspiration refer to both (1 Co 2^{9}, Ph 3$^{12\text{-}14}$). Still, the perfect blessings of the future life are often definitely referred to, giving peculiar magnificence to Christian hope (Ro 5^{2} 8$^{21.\ 23}$, Tit 2^{13} etc.). If St. Peter is the apostle, St. Paul is the theologian of this grace. Very significantly, as the prophets make J″ the ground of human hope, St. Paul makes Christ the ground (1 Co 15^{19}, 1 Ti 1^{1}, Col 1^{27}). More specifically, Christ's resurrection is the irrefragable seal of hope (1 Co 15, 1 P 1^{3}); hence it is a 'living hope.' Christian hope accompanies a state of peace with God, is attested by experience, and certain of glorious fulfilment because arising out of a sense of God's fatherly love to us (Ro 5$^{1\text{-}5}$). It is equally with faith a factor in the process of salvation (Ro 8$^{24f.}$). It is a spring of ceaseless joy (Ro 5^{3} 12^{12}). Its object is salvation or eternal life, or the glory of God (Tit 1^{2} 3^{7}, 1 Th 5^{8}, Ro 5^{2}). Its expression is patient doing and suffering (1 Th 1^{3}, He 6$^{11f.}$ 12^{1}). Hope is aptly called 'an anchor of the soul,' staying it amid the buffetings of earthly change (He 6^{19}). St. Paul puts the final honour on this grace by placing it above faith, and only below love (1 Cor 13^{13}). Like its sister graces, it continues in the future life, because the bliss of that life is capable of endless increase. When God is called 'the God of hope,' it must be as the author, not the subject of hope (Ro 15^{13}). St. John has only one reference to hope, describing it as a motive to personal sanctification (1 Jn 3^{3}). 'Fulness of hope' (He 6^{11}) accompanies 'fulness of faith' (10^{22}) and 'fulness of understanding' (Col 2^{2}). Hope stands sometimes for its object (Eph 1^{18}, Col 1^{5}, Tit 2^{13}).

HOPHNI (חָפְנִי, B Ὀφνεί, A Ὀφνί; the meaning 'fighter' suggested by Gesenius [Thes. p. 506] is very doubtful), and Phinehas, 'the two sons of Eli, priests unto the LORD at Shiloh' (1 S 1^{3}).[*] They are described as 'men of Belial (i.e. worthless, unprincipled men) who knew not the LORD, nor the due of the priests from the people' (1 S 2$^{12f.}$ RVm, following the reading of the Versions and most moderns). The particular sin of which the sons of Eli were guilty lay in their abuse of their privileges as priests, in that they claimed more than the customary share of the sacrifices, and further insisted on having it when, and as, they pleased, so that 'men abhorred the offering of the LORD' (see Driver, Deut. p. 216; Wellhausen, Proleg. pp. 68, 153 f.). The further charge of licentiousness which is brought against them (1 S 2^{22b}) is most probably due to a later editor; the clause is wanting in the LXX, and is omitted by Wellh., Budde, Driver, and Klostermann. The mild rebuke of their father had no effect on their evil practices, and, in consequence, a curse is pronounced against the house of Eli, first by an unknown prophet (1 S 2$^{27\text{-}36}$), and afterwards by the youthful Samuel (1 S 3$^{11\text{-}14.\ 18}$). In accordance with the sign given in the former prophecy, Hophni and Phinehas both perished in the battle with the Philistines at Aphek, whither they had accompanied the ark of God (1 S 4^{11}; in 4^{4} read 'and the two sons of Eli, H. and P., were with the ark of the covenant of God').

The history of the house of Eli which is given in 1 S 1–4 clearly belongs to the later (E) of the two documents from which the books of Samuel (see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF) are mainly compiled; but it is probable that the narrative has in parts been expanded (esp. in 1 S 2$^{27\text{-}36}$ [*]) by a later Deuteronomistic editor.

HOPHRA (Heb. חָפְרַע; LXX Οὐαφρῆ; Herod. Ἀπρίης; Manetho Οὔαφρις).—The Egyptian original, whence the other forms were derived, is W'ḥ-ib-r' (see p. 656^{a} note, vol. i. of this DB). The name of this king—the fourth of the 26th or Saite Dynasty—occurs but once in the Bible (Jer 44^{30}); yet his influence upon Jewish history was considerable. He was the son and successor of Psammetichus II, and reigned from 588 to 569. Although Hophra-Apries is mentioned on numerous Egyptian monuments, there is an almost complete dearth of native documents from which to reconstruct his history. Material, however, for the two chief episodes of his reign is supplied, on the one hand by the contemporary prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and on the other by Herodotus, who visited Egypt not much more than a century later.

The constant ambition of the Saite Pharaohs was the recovery for Egypt of her ancient position of suzerainty in Asia. In this none of them had hitherto been more than temporarily successful; the Syrian conquests of Necho had been cancelled by the revival of Babylonian power under Nebuchadrezzar, while in the next reign—that of Psammetichus II—we hear of no campaigns except in Nubia. But, on the accession of Apries, an Asiatic policy became again the king's main interest. A favourable opportunity seemed to be offered by a return to power of the patriotic faction in Judah, and the consequent revolt of Zedekiah. The Babylonian force sent to punish this display of independence was compelled, by the appearance in the south of an Egyptian army, to desist from the siege of Jerusalem (586). The check, however, was but momentary. Apries does not appear to have ventured a battle, and the Jews once more learned the value of Egypt's friendship. While their Egyptian allies withdrew, Jerusalem fell, and the Babylonians wreaked their vengeance on the nation. Nevertheless, the succeeding years of anarchy and bloodshed in Judah induced many of the remaining inhabitants to quit their homes and fly to Egypt for protection. Apries received them and settled them in the frontier fortress of Daphnæ (Tahpanhes, Tell Defeneh), in the eastern Delta, the station of one of the mercenary corps of Ionians and Carians who formed at the time the strength of the Egyptian armies. Certain remains of buildings on this site have been identified with the pavement, etc., referred to by Jeremiah (43^{9}), who himself shared the Egyptian exile of his countrymen.

[*] Possibly, the account here given is incomplete. Wellhausen (Büch. Sam. 35) points out that the sons of Eli are mentioned before he himself has been introduced. Thenius and Klostermann insert 'Eli and' with the LXX; more probably we should read simply 'and Eli, priest unto the LORD, was there' (Budde, Richter u. Samuel, p. 196).

[*] The text of this section is in considerable confusion, and the meaning can be extracted only with difficulty. The two events which are foretold are: (1) the almost entire destruction of Eli's house (v.^{31}, referring to the massacre of the priests at Nob, 1 S 22$^{17\text{-}20}$); (2) the raising up of a faithful priest (v.^{35}, referring to the appointment of Zadok in the place of Abiathar, the great-great-grandson of Eli, by Solomon, 1 K 2^{27}). The sign given in attestation of the prophecy (v.^{34}) is the death of Hophni and Phinehas in one day. See Wellhausen, Der Text der Bücher Sam. p. 48 f.; Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. p. 32 f.; Budde, op. cit. p. 199 f.

The much discussed inscription, in which some have recognized a reference to Nebuchadrezzar's punitive expedition to Egypt and to the reign of Apries, more probably relates merely the repression of some internal revolt (see Æg. Zeitschr. 1884, 87, 93); while the cuneiform fragment, claimed as corroborative evidence for the same event, can be so regarded only on the hypothesis — otherwise unsupported — of a temporary co-regency of Apries and Amasis, since the war it relates appears to have been directed against the latter king. It is curious, though scarcely important, that a tradition of Nebuchadrezzar's invasion should have survived even into Mohammedan times.*

The event of the reign, of which we hear most from Herodotus, is a campaign, undertaken later than those in Syria, in response to an appeal by the Libyans for help against the encroaching Greeks of Cyrene. The expedition was unsuccessful, and the consequent national resentment led to the deposition of Apries in favour of I'ḥms-Amasis, one of his generals, by whom he and the Greek mercenaries were defeated at Momemphis. Apries, detained for a time in captivity, was eventually given over to popular vengeance and strangled.

HOR (MOUNT) (הֹר הָהָר, Arab. Jebel Haroun, 'Aaron's Mount').—1. A mountain named as a stage in Israel's journey to Canaan (Nu 20^{22} 21^{4} 33^{37}, Dt 32^{50}), and as the place of Aaron's death (Nu $20^{23.25.27}$ $33^{38.39.41}$, Dt 32^{50}) (all P). The modern Jebel Haroun is identified with the closing scene of Aaron's life both by situation and by tradition. Mount Hor is stated to be situated 'by the border of the land of Edom' (Nu 20^{23}); Eusebius states that 'Mons Hor, in quo mortuus est Aaron, erat juxta urbem Petram' (Onomasticon), which is the case with J. Haroun, as Petra lies at its eastern base; and Josephus affirms that Aaron's death occurred on a high mountain enclosing Petra (Ant. IV. iv. 7). Tradition concurs, and amongst the Arab inhabitants J. Haroun is held sacred as the sepulchre of Aaron, and a small mosque marks the site. It is fair to add that the identity of Hor with Jebel Haroun is disputed by Ewald, Knobel, Dillm. (on Nu 20^{22}), Sayce (HCM 265), Buhl (Gesch. d. Edomiter, 11 f., Lex., 'Ganz falsch die spätere Tradition'), and esp. Trumbull (Kadesh-barnea, 128 ff.).

Description.—On approaching the saddle, or watershed, of the Wady el-Arabah from the south, the almost unbroken range of the Edomite mountains opens out to the eastward at Wady Abu Kuseibeh, disclosing a wide valley, at the head of which is J. Haroun, standing out conspicuously amidst an assemblage of broken ridges tumultuously thrown together, and constituting the frontiers of Mount Seir. The mount rises with a bold and precipitous front facing the west, flanked by two lofty bastions of sandstone standing erect on the granitic pedestal, and from its base stretches a wide and gently sloping plain, also enclosed by lesser heights, upon which we can well picture to ourselves the Israelitish host encamped during the solemn period of Aaron's ascent, and in full view of the summit of the mount which was to be his tomb; or (as it is in the narrative) 'in the eyes of all the congregation' (Nu 20^{27}). Here also we may suppose they camped while Moses sent an ambassage to the king of Edom across the intervening pass to ask permission to march through his territory (Nu $20^{14ff.}$). The summit of the mount is marked by a little white mosque supposed to cover the tomb of the high priest, and from this point the ridge descends gradually eastwards until it breaks off in the line of cliffs which enclose the quadrangle of Petra, and the channel for the Wady Musa which flows through the city (see PETRA). The mount is quite inaccessible directly from the west, owing to its precipitous face in this direction; but the summit is gained by ascending from the pass leading into Petra, called the Wady Haroun, which runs along the southern flank of the mount. The elevation of the summit is about 4780 feet above the Gulf of Akabah, or 6072 feet above the surface of the Dead Sea,* and from this point an extensive and remarkable view is obtained when the atmosphere is clear—towards the south, west, and north. In the first direction, the eye follows the range of lofty and rugged heights down along the side of the Arabah towards the Red Sea; in the second, it looks across the wide plain of the Arabah to the white cliffs which bound the Badiet et-Tih (Wilderness of Paran), and across this arid tableland itself for many miles towards the horizon; and towards the north, the deep hollow of the Ghōr may be faintly discerned, with the broken slopes of the hills of Southern Palestine bounding the view in that direction. Turning to the east, the observer marks the white crest of the Arabian Desert plateau, sloping steeply downwards into the deep hollow of the Wady Musa, in which lies, almost hidden from view amongst its red-faced cliffs and precipices, Petra, the ancient capital of Edom. Such was the scene which met the eyes of Aaron ere they closed for ever. His body is supposed to have been laid in a sepulchre immediately below the crest of the mount, and over it stands the little white mosque, conspicuous from afar: a token of the sacred character of the spot in the eyes of the wild inhabitants.

Geology.—Mount Hor is formed of reddish sandstone and conglomerate ('Nubian sandstone' of Russegger) of Cretaceous age; the beds rising in a precipitous wall of natural masonry tier above tier, and presenting a bold front towards the west. These huge beds of sandstone compose the upper part of the ridge to a depth of about a thousand feet from the summit, where they rest on a solid foundation of granite and porphyry of great geological antiquity, associated with which, in some way not very clear, are masses of agglomerate, beds of ash and dykes of igneous rock, all of volcanic origin, but of an age anterior to the Cretaceous sandstone. This latter formation dips towards the east, and gradually descends in the direction of the Wady Musa, where it forms the cliffs which surround the city of Petra. Along the flanks of the escarpment of the Arabian Desert to the eastward the sandstone formation passes below the white marls and limestones of Upper Cretaceous age, which form the surface of the plain at a level of over 5000 feet above the sea.†

2. Another mountain called by the same name (Nu $34^{7.8}$) was to be the northern limit of the inheritance of the tribes of Israel, which was to extend from the shore of the Great Sea (Mediterranean) eastward along the border of Mount Hor unto the entering in of Hamath (Syria and the Lebanon). If Hōr be an archaic form of har, Mt. Hor signifies some conspicuous height among lesser heights; and when we come to apply this meaning to the region of the Lebanon, we cannot remain long in doubt as to the special mount indicated. Among all the mountains on the borders of Syria and Palestine, Mount Hermon is pre-eminently the most conspicuous and important, owing to its enormous mass and great elevation, which reaches 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. On this ground we may identify this second Mount Hor with Hermon, although Porter (Five Years in Damascus^{2}, 333), followed by Neubauer (Géog. du Talm. 9), Furrer (ZDPV viii. 27), and Buhl, prefer Jebel Akkar, a N.E. spur of Lebanon.

LITERATURE.—Mount Hor in Arabia Petræa has been visited by Burckhardt, Léon de Laborde, the Expedition sent out by the Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund in 1883-84, by Lartet under the Expedition of the Duc de Luynes in 1880, by Professor Palmer and Dean Stanley. The principal references to authorities are the same as those under the head of SELA or PETRA.

HORAM (הוֹרָם), king of Gezer, came to the relief of Lachish when it was besieged by Joshua, but was defeated and slain (Jos 10^{33}).

HOREB.—See SINAI.

HOREM (חֳרֵם).—A city of Naphtali in the mountains, Jos 19^{38} (see Dillm. ad loc.). The name means 'consecrated' (cf. Sabæan prop. names חרם, יחרמאל, Halévy, Étud. Sab. 471, 504). It is prob. to be identified with the modern Ḥûrah west of Kedesh-naphtali. See SWP vol. i. sh. iv.
C. R. CONDER.

HORESH.—In 1 S 23^{15} (cf. $^{16.\,18}$) David is found 'in the wilderness of Ziph in a (the) wood' (בַּחֹרְשָׁה, where בְּ and ה locale are combined; LXX ἐν τῇ Καινῇ, implying a reading בַּחֲרָשָׁה; see Driver, Text of Sam. ad loc.). The word ḥōresh means 'wooded height' in Is 17^{9}, Ezk 31^{3} (if the text in these two passages is correct; see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.), 2 Ch 27^{4}, and this is probably its meaning in 1 S, although some would make Horesh a proper name, as in RVm (see Stade, Gesch. i. 245). J. A. SELBIE.

HOR-HAGGIDGAD (חֹר הַגִּדְגָּד).—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites, mentioned only Nu 33$^{32.\,23}$. The Heb., which means the hole or cavern of Gidgad, indicates the character of the locality, and suggests the land of the Horites, or its neighbourhood. The LXX translates τὸ ὄρος Γαδγάδ, reading הַר 'a mountain.' See BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN, GUDGODAH, and EXODUS, § iv.

HORI (חוֹרִי).—1. A son of Seir, Gn 36^{22}=1 Ch 1^{39}. As Dillmann remarks, the national name appears here as a clan name. 2. The father of Shaphat the Simeonite spy, Nu 13^{5}.

HORITES (חֹרִי, AV sometimes Hori, Horims).—The predecessors of the Edomites in the country of Seir. They were there as early as the time of Abraham (Gn 14^{6}). J″ destroyed them before the sons of Esau, and gave the latter their country (Dt 2$^{12.\,22}$). There was, however, such a mingling of the family of Esau and his Horite (in Gn 36^{2} read Horite for Hivite) connexions, that the Horite name and descent was preserved (Gn 36, esp. vv.$^{20.\,21.\,29\text{-}30}$). They are not explicitly said to be rephaim, as are the Emim and the Zamzummim, in Dt 2$^{10\text{f.}\,20\text{f.}}$, but from what is there said it is natural to infer that they were. Except in Dt 2^{12}, they are spoken of as 'the Horite,' using the gentilic noun in the sing., a form of speech that is never used of the other giant peoples; but this can be accounted for by the fact just mentioned, that, in their mingling with their conquerors, the H. name and descent had been preserved, so that, in the time of Moses and later, they were properly a people, and not merely a race of subordinate men, as in the case of the Anakim and others.

The name Horite is supposed to mean 'cave-dweller' (see Driver, Deut. p. 38). On the theory that the Horites were rephaim, this fact is of interest in its bearing on the character of the rephaite civilization; but they did not always remain cave-dwellers. See GIANTS, REPHAIM, and cf. Hommel, AHT 263 f. W. J. BEECHER.

HORMAH (חָרְמָה, Ἑρμά, Ἀνάθεμα).—After the return of the spies, an attempt to go up into the S. of Judah was repulsed by the Canaanite and Amalekite (the Amorite according to Dt), who drove the Israelites to Hormah (Nu 14^{45}, Dt 1^{44}). In this passage of Nu, Hormah occurs with the def. art., and the rendering of Dt 1^{44}, preferred by critics (following LXX, Syr., Vulg.), is 'from Seir to Hormah' (see Driver, ad loc.).

The Canaanite king of Arad (Nu 21$^{1\text{-}3}$) fought against Israel when in the neighbourhood of Mt. Hor, and took some of them prisoners. Thereupon Israel vowed that if the Lord would give them victory, they would place the Canaanite cities under the ban. The place was accordingly named Hormah. According to Jg 1^{17}, Judah and Simeon utterly destroyed Zephath and called it Hormah. If the events of Nu 21^{3} happened immediately after the attack of the king of Arad, it would seem that the Israelites conquered at that time some portion of the S. of Judah, and in that case a way would have been open for an advance northward. The generally received view seems therefore probable, that Nu 21^{3} describes what took place at a later period, and Jg 1^{17} supplies further details.

Hormah is mentioned, Jos 12^{14}, along with Arad as one of the 31 royal cities taken by Joshua, in 15^{30} as 'one of the uttermost cities . . . toward the border of Edom in the South,' and in 19^{4}, 1 Ch 4^{30} as part of the inheritance of Simeon. In 1 S 30^{30} it occurs after the cities of the Kenites (cf. the same connexion in Jg 1$^{16.\,17}$).

The position of Hormah depends upon that assigned to Kadesh, and two identifications have been proposed: that of Robinson, who identifies it with es-Sufah, a pass through the mountains on one of the roads from Petra to Hebron; and that of Rowlands and Palmer, who propose Sebaita as its site, in the Wady el-Abyadh, about 25 miles in N.N.E. direction from 'Ain Kadis. Both identifications are made with Zephath, which is mentioned only Jg 1^{17}, and assume that the old Canaanite name has survived—an assumption not without difficulty, in face of the evidence of the OT that the place was known as Hormah. Either site is appropriate according to the theory adopted as to the position of Kadesh. If the identifications of Ziklag and Jerahmeel (1 S 30^{29}) be accepted as being in the neighbourhood of Sebaita, they would increase the probability in favour of that site. Its distance from Arad may be urged as an objection, but we do not know the extent of the territory belonging to the king of Arad, nor does it state in Nu 21$^{2.\,3}$ that the cities were in his territory. See Robinson, BRP^{2} ii. 181; Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 374 ff.; and art. KADESH.

HORN (קֶרֶן, κέρας) has, besides its usual meaning, three other significations in the Bible. 1. A kind of bugle or cornet (from L. cornu) for military purposes (Jos 6^{5}), which see under TRUMPET. 2. An emblem of strength or power derived from the offensive weapons of some animals. As the word is always used in the sing., it is very likely that the special animal from which this use of it came was the one-horned rhinoceros, or the fabulous unicorn which still appears on the insignia of British arms. This emblematical sense of power is the principal use made of this word in both OT and NT. Thus the horn is said to be 'exalted' (Ps 89^{17}) when the figure represents the show of great power, or 'broken' (Jer 48^{25}) when the idea is that of its destruction. The same metaphor is sometimes used in the sense of arrogance: 'Lift not up the horn . . . speak not with a stiff neck' (Ps 75$^{4.5}$ RV); compare the contrary expression of humiliation: 'I have sewed sackcloth upon my skin, and have laid my horn in the dust' (Job 16^{15} RV). Another form of the figurative sense is when it represents kings (in the Books of Dn and Rev), who wielded the power of a whole nation. There is no real connexion between any of these metaphoric uses and the Ashteroth-karnaim—the two-horned Astarte (Gn 14^{5})—who, in Phœn. mythology, was the goddess of the Moon, and on whose head the crescent is represented in some of her statues. Alexander the Great is also called in the Koran (18. 82), and by Arab. writers, 'the two-horned,' most probably in reference to the two rams' horns seen in some of his coins curling backwards above his ears, which he adopted in honour of Ammon the Egyptian god, to whom the ram was sacred. An equally erroneous idea has been long entertained about the silver horn worn on the head by women of the Lebanon about fifty years ago, which was simply an exaggerated piece of head-dress for supporting the veil to cover the head and face, and had no reference to symbolized power. See DRESS in vol. i. p. 627^{a}, where the horn is figured. 3. The horns of the altar were four projecting points on its corners—sometimes seen on heathen structures of this kind. They were probably ornamental, but among the Jews they were smeared with the blood of sacrificial victims (Ex 29^{12}), and may have been used for binding the animal until the time came for its slaughter (Ps 118^{27}, where, however, the text is corrupt). Criminals enjoyed immunity of danger to their lives from an avenger so long as they took hold of these horns (1 K 1^{50}), just as in the Middle Ages Christian churches and altars were resorted to for the same purpose. See ALTAR, vol. i. p. 77^{a}.

J. WORTABET.

HORNET (צִרְעָה ẓirʻâh, σφηκία, crabro).—The hornet is mentioned thrice in the Hex. (Ex 23^{28}, Dt 7^{20}, Jos 24^{12}). The first two passages contain the general promise that God would send the hornet before the Isr. to drive out their enemies. In the last it is said that God did send the hornet before them to drive out the two kings of the Amorites. (For two here we should certainly read twelve. So LXX, δώδεκα. See Dillm. ad. loc.). We have no details of a pest of hornets in Scripture. It is, however, not impossible that such a pest may have aided in the work. Other insects, as ants and locusts, have, at times, vast desolating power. The author of Wisdom (12$^{8-10}$) takes the passage literally. Hornets multiply at times in large numbers, and there are records in profane history of plagues of them. There are four species in the Holy Land, two of which construct nests of papier maché in bushes and trees, and two underground or in cavities of the rocks. Their sting is exceedingly painful, and that of large numbers at once may be fatal (cf. Driver on Dt 7^{20}). Many have thought that the meaning of hornets in these passages is figurative, and equivalent to the 'terror' (Ex 23^{27}). They argue from the Lat. œstrus, a gadfly, which, from the terror and madness it inspired in cattle, gave its name to those mental conditions. Whether we adopt the literal or the metaphorical sense, the object is to represent that the agency of apprehension and terror prepared the way for the unparalleled victories of the Israelites (Gn 35^{5}, Dt 32^{25}, Jos 2^{11}, Ps 44$^{3.6}$).

G. E. POST.

HORONAIM (חֹרֹנַיִם, perh. 'the two hollows').—A city of Moab, whose site has not been recovered with certainty. It is mentioned in Is 15^{5}, Jer 48^{3} (in both 'the way to H.,' דֶּרֶךְ ח׳) 48^{5} ('the descent of H.,' מוֹרַד ח׳) 48^{34}. Also on the Moabite Stone (ll. 31, 32) it occurs as חורנן, i.e. prob. חוֹרֹנֵן Ḥoronên: 'Chemosh said unto me, Go down, fight against Ḥoronên; and I went down.' The language here, compared with that of Jer 48^{5}, has led some to find its site to the south of the Arnon, at some inconspicuous ruins mentioned by de Luynes in the neighbourhood of the Wady ed-Derâʻa (see Buhl, GAP 272 f.).

In Jos 10$^{10.11}$ the LXX Ὡρωνείν implies a reading חרנים, which ought prob. to be read also in 2 S 13^{34} (see Well. and Driver, ad loc.). In these passages, of course, the reference is to the two Beth-horons.

J. A. SELBIE.

HORONITE (הַחֹרֹנִי, ὁ Ἀρωνεί, Neh 2$^{10.19}$ 13^{28}).—A title given to Sanballat, the opponent of Nehemiah. The name probably denotes an inhabitant of Beth-horon, a town on the borders of Ephraim, about 18 miles N.W. of Jerus. (Jos 10^{10} 16$^{3.5}$ etc.). Some scholars (so Gesen.) have derived the title from Horonaim, a town in S. Moab (Is 15^{5}, Jer 48$^{3.5.34}$), pointing to the close connexion of Sanballat with Tobiah the Ammonite; but see Neh 4^{2}.

H. A. WHITE.

HORROR has greatly strengthened its meaning since it came into the Eng. language. The Lat. word horror (from horrere, to stand on end) is used primarily of the bristling of hair, etc., and secondarily of the fear which causes the hair to stand on end. Now the meaning is expressed thus: 'Horror is that very strong and painful emotion which is excited by the view or contemplation of something peculiarly atrocious in the conduct of another; by some vice which exceeds the usual extravagance of vice; enormities that surpass the bounds of common depravity.' This intensity of meaning has been gained gradually. Even in AV of 1611 'horror' means no more than 'dread.' It occurs in Gn 15^{12} 'An horror of great darkness fell upon him' (אֵימָה חֲשֵׁכָה גְדֹלָה 'a terror, a great darkness'); Ps 55^{5} 119^{53}, Ezk 7^{18}, 2 Mac 3^{17} 'For the man was so compassed with fear and horror of the body' (φρικασμός, RV 'a shuddering'). Cf. Melvill, Diary, p. 144 'Ther was na thing behind bot bitter teares and heavie lamentation, partlie for the present lose, bot mikle mair for the esteat that was till ensew upon the Kirk, quhilk everie an apprehendit in graitter and graitter missour of horrour and feirfulness.' Bp. Hall, speaking of the angel's visit to Zacharias (Works, ii. 3), says, 'It was the weaknesse of him that served at the Altar without horror, to be daunted with the face of his fellow servant.'

Horrible is that which causes great fear: Ps 11^{6} 'Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire, and brimstone, and an horrible tempest' (רוּחַ זִלְעָפוֹת, RV 'burning wind'; King 'scorching blast'), 40^{2} 'He brought me up also out of an horrible pit' (מִבּוֹר שָׁאוֹן, AVm 'a pit of noise,' RVm 'a pit of tumult or destruction,' LXX ἐκ λάκκου ταλαιπωρίας, so Vulg. 'de lacu miseriæ,' and Dou. 'the lake of misery'); Jer 5^{30} 18^{13} 23^{14}, Hos 6^{10} (all 'a horrible thing'='a thing to be dreaded'); 2 Es 11^{45} 15^{28} (both 'horribilis'), 15^{34} ('horridus'); Wis 3^{19} (χαλεπός, Vulg. 'dirus'), 8^{15} (φρικτός, Vulg. 'horrendus'), 11^{18} 'shooting horrible sparkles out of their eyes' (δεινοὺς σπινθῆρας, Vulg. 'horrendas scintillas'), 16^{5} 'horrible fierceness' (δεινὸς θυμός, Vulg. 'sæva ira'), 17^{5} 'that horrible night' (τὴν στυγνὴν ἐκείνην νύκτα, Vulg. 'illam noctem horrendam'), 18^{17} 'visions of horrible dreams' (φαντασίαι ὀνείρων δεινῶν, Vulg. 'visus somniorum malorum'), 19^{17} 'compassed about with horrible great darkness' (ἀχανεῖ σκότει, Vulg. 'subitaneis tenebris'). In every case the word means 'to be dreaded,' 'dreadful'; the element of loathing does not enter.

And so with horribly, Jer 2^{12}, Ezk 32^{10} 'be horribly afraid'; Wis 6^{5} 'Horribly and speedily shall he come upon you' (φρικτῶς, Vulg. 'horrende'). Cf. He 10^{31} Rhem. 'It is horrible to fal into the handes of the living God'; and Defoe, Crusoe, p. 590, 'Never Tyrant, for such I acknowledged myself to be, was ever so universally beloved, and yet so horribly feared by his subjects.'

J. HASTINGS.

HORSE.—Four Heb. words are used for horse, and one, or perhaps two, for mare. 1. אַבִּיר 'abbîr. This word means strong or valiant, and is applied metaphorically to the h. (Jer 8^{16} AV, RV 'neighing of his strong ones'), 47^{3} 'the stamping of the hoofs of his strong horses' (RV 'of his strong ones'), 50^{11} 'bellow as bulls' (AVm 'neigh as steeds,' RV 'neigh as strong horses').

2. פָּרָשׁ pârâsh. The orig. signification of this word is horseman or cavalier (cf. Arab. fâris), as distinguished from the rider of an ass or a camel. It signifies, secondarily, a riding horse, such as is used in war. In this sense it corresponds to the Arab. faras, which, however, is generic for all horses. The reason why the Hebrews designated by pârâsh only cavalry mounts is that civilians did not use horses for riding. Only two clear instances are given in OT of any person, not of military rank, riding a horse,—that of Mordecai (Est $6^{9.\,10}$), who rode the king's horse (סוּס, not פָּרָשׁ) as a special honour; and that of the 'posts on horseback, riding on swift steeds' (סוּסִים Est 8^{10}). In the obscure passage (Is 28^{28}), so differently tr^d^ in AV and RV, it is not certain whether the horses (פָּרָשָׁיו) were harnessed to the cart, or ridden or driven. When the peaceful mission of Christ is announced (Zec 9^{9}), although he is heralded as a king, it is said that 'he is just, and victorious (lit. saved); lowly, and riding upon an ass,' i.e. is not like military conquerors, who ride horses. Then to illustrate the character of this reign it is said (v.^{10}), 'I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse (ṣûṣ) from Jerus.,' i.e. where all is peace the horse is not needed any more than the chariot (see ASS). It is easy in many cases to determine from the context whether pârâsh is to be tr^{d} horse or horseman. Thus 'twelve thousand pârâshîm' (1 K 4^{26}) plainly refers to cavalry horses as distinguished from chariot horses, and not to 'horsemen,' as in AV and RV. It is clear that the people of the house of Togarmah (Ezk 27^{14}) traded, not in 'horsemen,' as in AV, but in cavalry horses, 'war horses,' RV. It is the 'war horses' that run (RVm Jl 2^{4}), not the 'horsemen' (text AV, RV). In the pursuit of Saul 'the chariots and the horsemen (בַּעֲלֵי פָּרָשִׁים, owners of horses) followed hard after him' (2 S 1^{6}). On the other hand, pârâsh (2 S 8^{4}, Jer 4^{29}) can refer only to the 'horsemen.' The 'pârâsh' (Nah 3^{3}) who 'lifteth up,' RV 'mounting,' marg. 'charging,' must be the horseman. Sometimes neither the horse nor his rider seems specially designated, and in these cases pârâsh corresponds to cavalry (Ex $14^{9.\,17.\,18.\,23.\,26.\,28}$, Hab 1^{8}). In other cases pârâsh will apply to either the horse or his rider. Thus (1 S 8^{11}) וּבְפָרָשָׁיו may be 'for his war horses,' as has just before been said 'for his chariots,' or 'to be his horsemen,' as in text AV, RV; and צֶמֶד פָּרָשִׁים (Is 21^{7}) may mean a 'couple of horsemen,' or a pair of horses, or 'horsemen in pairs,' or a 'pair of horsemen,' or horses in pairs (cf. AV with RV text and marg.).

3. סוּס ṣûṣ. This word is often used for chariot horses (Ex 14^{9} etc., Jos 11^{4}, 1 K 4^{26}, Jer 50^{37}, Ezk 27^{14}). It is used even more freq. for riding horses, esp. war horses (Gn 49^{17}, Est $6^{9.\,10}$, Job $39^{19\text{-}25}$, Jer 6^{23} 8^{16}, Hab 1^{8}, Zec 1^{8} etc.). In not a few cases it seems general for horses (Dt 17^{16}, 1 K 18^{5} etc.). In one it seems to refer to a hunter (Job 39^{18}).

4. רֶכֶשׁ rekhesh. This word is used in three places, in all of which RV renders it by 'swift steeds' (Est $8^{10.\,14}$, AV 'mules'; 1 K 4^{28}, AV 'dromedaries,' marg. 'mules' or 'swift beasts'; Mic 1^{13}, AV 'swift beast'). In the last it clearly refers to a chariot horse.

5. רַמָּךְ rammâk. This word, rendered AV 'dromedaries' (Est 8^{10}, RV 'stud'), is Pers. ramah, 'flock' or 'herd.' See DROMEDARY.

6. סוּסָה ṣûṣâh, ἡ ἵππος, equitatus. AV (Ca 1^{9}), following Vulg., renders this word 'a company of horses,' RV 'a steed,' marg. 'the steeds.' These renderings would make the point of similarity between the bride and the horses their triumphant march. Others would make סֻסָתִי=my mare. It is difficult, if this rendering be adopted, to see what is the connexion between this word and the expression 'in the chariots of Pharaoh,' which immediately follows.

It may seem strange that the Isr., who certainly knew the horse well in Egypt (Gn 47^{17}), and who came into a country, many of the tribes of which had large numbers of war horses, should not have adopted and used so noble an animal. The explanation is to be sought in the pastoral habits of the Isr., inherited from their patriarchal ancestors, and continued through the period of their residence in Egypt. These habits led them to seek first the conquest of the hill-country of Canaan. This country is not adapted for the movements either of cavalry or chariots, and the aborigines of these regions seem not to have had horses. But when the Isr. came into the plains of N. Pal. they at once encountered large numbers of chariots and horsemen, but, acting under the command of God, who delivered them into their hands, they houghed the horses and burned the chariots (Jos $11^{4\text{-}9}$). The fact that the Phil. plains had chariots and horses (Jg 1^{19}) prevented the early conquest of that region. An encounter, 150 years later, in the plain of Jezreel, resulted in another overthrow of the chariots. The Isr., entrenched in their hills, were slow in adopting cavalry and chariots. The Arabs of that day do not seem to have used the horse. In the account of the great raid of Zebah and Zalmunna (Jg 7. 8) no mention is made of horses. David began their use by reserving 100 of the chariots of N. Syria, with their horses (2 S 8^{4}). Solomon increased this force by importations from Egypt, at a fixed price of 150 shekels for a cavalry horse, and 600 for a chariot and its three horses (1 K $10^{28.\,29}$). He had 12,000 of the former and 1400 chariots, which, at three horses to a chariot, would make 4200 (cf. 1 K 10^{26} with 4^{26}, where 40,000 should read 4000). When the kingdom was divided, the ten tribes, which held the plains of N. Pal., had many chariots. When nearly all their chariots and horses were taken in the great overthrow by the Syrians (2 K 13^{7}) they never recovered from the blow. The small number of chariots possessed by the Judæan kingdom led to a constant reliance on Egypt for chariots and cavalry in the encounters with Syria and Assyria. Against this the prophets inveighed (Is 31^{1}, Ezk 17^{15} etc., cf. Dt 17^{16}). The cavalry and chariots of Assyria were esteemed the most formidable in the world, and are often mentioned in the prophets (Hab 1^{8}, Nah 3^{2} etc.). The Jews brought back 736 horses from Babylon (Neh 7^{68}). Horses were regularly employed in war in Pal. down to late Roman times. There was a chariot road to Egypt in the days of the apostles (Ac 8^{28}), and there are abundant evidences of the use of these formidable engines of war in the cities E. of the Jordan, in the pass by the Nahr el-Kelb near Beirût, and in many other places in the land. It is probable that the present breed of Arabian horses are descendants of the very fine stock for which Assyria was famous. White horses (Rev 6^{2} $19^{11.14}$) were ridden by conquerors. Horses and chariots were dedicated to the sun by idolatrous kings (2 K 23^{11}). Horses had halters (Is 30^{28}) and bridles (Ps 32^{9}). The bridles were decorated with bells (Zec 14^{20}; Layard, Nin. ii. 29, 275). The horses were often not shod, hence the hardness of their hoofs (Is 5^{28}). Chariots and horses had rich trappings (Ezk 27^{20}). Saddles were rare (Layard, ii. 357).

HORSE GATE.—See JERUSALEM.

HORSELEECH (עֲלוּקָה 'ălûḳah, βδέλλα, sanguisuga).—The obsolete Heb. root עָלַק corresponds to the Arab. 'aliḳa, which means to hang to. The Arab. generic name for leeches is 'ălaḳ, and for an individual 'ălaḳah. If we regard the creature intended as one of the annelids, 'âlûḳâh should be rendered leech rather than horseleech. Of the annelids found in Syria and Pal. the medicinal leech, Hirudo medicinalis, Sav., and the horseleech, Hæmopis sanguisorba, Sav., are the most common. There are also species of Bdella, Trochetia, and other genera of leeches, in the stagnant waters. They cling to the feet and legs of those who wade into such waters. They also infest the fountains and pools, and the watering-troughs of cattle, and attach themselves to the throat or nostrils of beasts and men. The tenacity with which they adhere is such that they must sometimes be pulled apart in order to detach them. The pertinacity with which they suck quite justifies the expression 'the 'ălûḳâh hath two daughters, Give, Give' (Pr 30^{15}). It is, however, possible that the allusion may be to the 'ălûḳ of the Arabs, the ghûl or female spectre, which they allege sucks blood like the vampire, and feeds on the flesh of the dead (see Wildeboer, ad loc.).

HORSELITTER.—Only 2 Mac 9^{8} (φόριον [=φορεῖον], which is trd 'litter' in 3^{27}), RV 'litter' (which see). The word is used in Malory's Morte Darthur (Caxton's text) several times. Thus i. 3, 'So it was done as Merlin had devised, and they carried the king forth in a horse-litter with a great host towards his enemies'; and x. 37, 'Then came queen Morgan le Fay to Alisander, and bad him arise, and put him in a horse-litter: and gave him such a drink that in three days and three nights he waked never but slept.'

HORTICULTURE.—See GARDEN.

HOSAH (חֹסָה 'refuge').—A Levitical door-keeper of the temple, whose station was by the 'gate of Shallecheth,' 1 Ch 16^{38} $26^{10.11.16}$. See GENEALOGY, III. 39.

HOSAH (חֹסָה).—A city of Asher, apparently south of Tyre, Jos 19^{29}. The site is doubtful.

HOSANNA.—An acclamation used by the people on the occasion of our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem. It occurs six times in the Gospels: twice (Mk 11^{9}, Jn 12^{13}) it stands absolutely, twice (Mt $21^{9.15}$) it is followed by the dative ('to the Son of David'), and twice (Mt 21^{9}, Mk 11^{10}) by the adjunct 'in the highest'. The circumstance that in all three Gospels the words 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the LORD,' from Ps 118^{26}, follow it, has given rise to the assumption that it is borrowed from the preceding verse of that psalm, which begins with 'ānnāh J" hoshî'āh nā, i.e. 'save, pray' (Sept. σῶσον δή). This v.^{25} of the psalm, according to the ritual of the temple, is said to have been repeated once on each of the first six days of the joyous Feast of Tabernacles during the solemn procession around the altar of burnt sacrifice and seven times on the seventh day (John Lightfoot, The Temple Service, etc., ch. xvi. § 2; De Sola and Raphall, Eighteen Treatises from the Mishna, 2nd ed., tr. Succah, ch. iv. § 5; M. Schwab, Le Talmud de Jérus. traduit, vol. vi. 33). This seventh day thus came to be called the 'Great Hosanna' (Buxtorf, Lex. 992) or 'Hosanna Day' (Zunz, Gottesdienstliche Vorträge, u.s.w. 2te Aufl. p. 395 n.; Dalman, Gram. d. jüdisch-paläst. Aramäisch, p. 198), and the name was transferred not merely to the prayers of the occasion, but also to the branches of palm trees and willows (Lv 23^{40}) which were carried and waved on that festivity. Similarly, in Christian usage, Palm Sunday, to which our Lord's entry has given name, has in certain periods and regions been called 'Hosanna Sunday' or 'Day of Hosannas,' or simply 'Osanna'; and the term has been applied to the 'Sanctus,' 'Tersanctus,' or 'Triumphal Hymn' (as it is variously called) sung by the people at the conclusion of the 'Eucharistic Preface' in all liturgies (C. E. Hammond, Liturgies Eastern and Western, 1878, p. 381; Bingham, Antiq. xiv. 2, 5); and later the extended use of the word gave rise, especially in the languages of Southern Europe, to such verbs as hosannare, oisisannare, etc., together with corresponding adjectives (see Ducange, Gloss. med. et. infim. Latin., ed. Favre, iii. 167 f.).

How the Hebrew term hos(h)î'āna—employed by Luther not only in his translation of the NT, but even in some editions of his translation of the Psalms (see Bindseil and Niemeyer's ed.), and adopted at first by Tindale in his NT of 1525 (ed. E. Arber, 1871)—became changed into hosana (-anna), those who hold this opinion are not quite agreed. Jerome, in his reply to the inquiry of Damasus about the meaning of the term (Opp. i. 375 ff., Ep. xx. in Migne, Patrol. Lat. xxii.), lets fall in one place the conjecture that the shorter form is an ignorant corruption (cf. Origen on Mt. l.c., ed. Lommatzsch, iv. 58). The more common supposition regards it as having arisen by syncope or contraction (Jerome as above; Levita, Tishbi, s.v.; and the commentators generally); or as a supposed Aramaic form (there is no root ישׁע in Aram.) of the verb with the pronominal suffix (meaning 'Save us.' See Kautzsch, Gram. des Bib.-Aram. 1884, p. 173, and, against this, Dalm. l.c.).

But though the words 'Blessed is he that cometh,' etc., are indubitably borrowed from Ps 118, and though vv.$^{22f.}$ of that psalm receive express Messianic reference both from our Lord (Mt 21^{42}, Mk 12^{11}, Lk 20^{17}) and St. Peter (Ac 4^{11}, 1 P 2^{7}), it may be doubted whether the rejoicing multitudes in the evangelic story were consciously indebted to the psalm or its use at the Feast of Tabernacles either for the cry 'Hosanna' or the festive demonstration with palm and other branches. To find the explanation of either word or act in the psalm and its use, involves the NT interpreter in grave embarrassments. The language of the psalm is supplicatory, that of the Gospels is jubilant. The psalmist's petition looks towards himself and those whom he represents (the English Pr. Bk. even follows the Vulg. in inserting the object 'me': Salvum me fac, 'Help me'); the Hosanna of the Gospels finds its expressed object in 'the Son of David.' This aspect of the case makes equally against discovering the original of our term in the Aramaic אוֹשַׁעְנָא 'Save us.' The obvious incongruity between the supplicatory sense and the tone of the narrative has driven expositors to jejune and far-fetched explanations: some, for example, by transposing the Greek, have extorted the rendering '(Saying) to the Son of David, Oh save'; or, by arbitrarily changing υἱῷ to υἱέ, 'O Son of David, save.' Others, resorting to the secondary sense of Hosanna, have taken the shout to mean 'Triumphal palms to the Son of David' (cf. Syr. Philox.). The phrase 'in the highest' also has been made to signify 'O thou that dwellest in the heavens,' or 'May our cry be ratified in heaven,' or 'taken up by the angels,' etc. The inappropriateness of finding an echo of the psalmist's supplication in the Hosanna of the Gospels is made only the more evident by adducing the ceremonies of the Feast of Tabernacles. For that feast occurred in the autumn; the triumphal entry in the spring. Consequently, some critics (e.g. Wünsche, Erläuterung der Evang. aus Talmud u. Midrasch, p. 241 n.) have felt compelled to assume that the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles have been confounded in the Gospels, or that a usage of the latter festival has been arbitrarily transferred to the former. Nor is the difficulty relieved by the fact that shouts of joy and waving of palms had become usual at the Feast of Dedication as well as at the Feast of Tabernacles (2 Mac $10^{6.7}$). For as the Feast of Dedication occurred only two months later than the Feast of Tabernacles (cf. Jn 10^{22}), the chronological discord is thereby only slightly abated.

This extension of the jubilant usages of the Feast of Tabernacles, however, does seem to point in the right direction, and to set us free to follow the plain contextual indications of the evangelists' narrative. According to those indications, it is most natural to regard the word Hosanna, as respects its form, as neither syncopated nor contracted, but the shorter Hiphil imperative with the appended enclitic (הוֹשַׁע־נָא; cf. Ps 86^2, Jer 31^7). For this form there is distinct Talmudic warrant (Dalman, Grammatik des jüdisch-paläst. Aramäisch, p. 198; Levy, Neuhbr. u. chald. Wörterbuch, i. 461; Schindler, Lexicon Pentaglot. ed. 1653, col. 819). As respects its force, we must, for the same contextual reasons, assume that it had already lost its primary supplicatory sense and become an ejaculation of joy or shout of welcome. As a quaint writer somewhat plumply puts the matter, 'It was a kind of holy hurrah'; and the 'Hosanna in the highest' corresponded roughly to our 'three times three.' Cf. the analogous Greek and Roman exclamations ''Ἰὴ παιάν,' 'Io triumphe, terque quaterque.' The waving of palms, etc., and strewing of the way with garments and branches find abundant precedents in ancient usage, including the Jewish: 2 Mac $10^{6.7}$ 14^4, 1 Mac 13^{51}, 2 K 9^{13}; Jos. Ant. XIII. xiii. 5; see Wetstein, Nov. Test. Græc. i. 460 f.; Keim, Jesu von Naz. iii. 89 n. 4 (Eng. trans. v. 107 n. 2); Schoettgen, Horæ Hebr. etc. on Mt 21^8. The general use of the palm among the Jews on joyous occasions is attested by extant coins: F. W. Madden, Coins of the Jews, Lond. 1881, p. 73.

This ejaculatory interpretation of Hosanna finds some confirmation in the post-biblical history of the word. Not without significance is the circumstance that down to quite modern times it was simply transliterated in versions of Scripture, not translated. The Anglo-Saxon versions seem to be the first to render it 'Hail' (see S. C. Malan, The Gosp. of St. John trans. from the eleven oldest versions, etc., 1862; J. Bosworth, Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Gospels, 1865). Yet Ciasca in his Latin version of the Arabic text of Tatian's Harmony renders it Laus, Gloria, and the Armenian Vulgate, Blessing (see Hill, S. Ephraem's Gospel Commentary, 1896, p. 110). The Didaché (10. 6) and the Apostolic Constitutions (8. 12, al. 13, p. 259, 17, ed. Lagarde; cf. 7. 26, p. 209, 26) attest its early liturgical use in churches of heathen origin; compare its doxological use, too, in the account by Hegesippus (in Euseb. HE II. xxiii. 14) of the martyrdom of James the brother of the Lord. Although it is correctly interpreted (σῶσον δή) in the Gospel of Nicodemus, ch. i. (ed. Thilo, p. 510 ff.; Gesta Pilati, A. c. i. 4, p. 210, ed. Tdf.), yet even Clement of Alex. (Pædag. I. v. 12) says it is equivalent in Greek to φῶς καὶ δόξα καὶ αἶνος, and the diversity of opinion on this point in intelligent Christian circles appears sufficiently in the correspondence between Damasus and Jerome referred to above. By the 10th cent. so thoroughly has its etymological meaning become obscured that Suidas or his annotator (see Gaisford's ed. vol. ii. col. 2794 b) can define it εἰρήνη καὶ δόξα, and add, 'Some say it signifies σῶσον δή; incorrectly.' Especially instructive are the comments of Augustine (in his Doctrina Christiana, ii. 11, Migne, xxxiv. col. 42, and Tract. in Johan. li. 2, Migne, xxxv. col. 1764): he says explicitly that the word is nothing more than an interjection of admiring joy, a term expressing an emotional mood, not a connected thought; and he contrasts it with 'Amen' and 'Hallelujah,' the intrinsic meaning of which evidently in his day still clung to them. The contrast he draws finds illustration in pseudo-Justin in the 5th cent. in his Responsio ad Quæst. 50 (Otto, Corp. apol. christ. ed. 3, vol. v. p. 74), where 'Hallelujah' is correctly interpreted 'Sing praise to the Eternal,' but 'Hosanna' is said to mean 'Transcendent majesty.' The practice of employing the phrase 'Hosanna in the highest' as a glad greeting—deprecated by Jerome on Mt 21^{15} (Opp. vii. col. 152, Migne, Patrol. Lat. xxvi.)—appears as late as A.D. 570, in the Itinerary of Antoninus (ed. Gildemeister, Berlin, 1889, § 40).

LITERATURE.—The discussions of the term are numerous, and widely scattered in commentaries and exegetical works. Specimens of the older may be seen in the Critici Sacri; in Poole's Synopsis; in Lampe on Jn 12^{13}; J. C. Wolf, Curæ, etc., on Mt 21^9, where numerous reff. are given. Worth consulting, also, are the 7th ch. of Gabriel Groddeck's essay on the Feast of Tabernacles in Ugolini's Thesaurus, etc. vol. xviii. p. 534 ff., and the note in F. B. Dach's ed. (1726) of the treatise Succah, ch. iv. § 5, p. 331 ff. Special essays on the word (or the triumphal entry) by Bindrim (1671), Winzer (1703), Zopf (1703), Nothdurfft (1713), Bucher (1728), Wernsdorf (1765), J. C. Pfaff (1789), J. M. H. Harras, J. G. Rau, Sauerbrei, J. G. Walch, and others, are catalogued; but they have not been accessible to the present writer.

i. NAME AND LIFE OF THE PROPHET.—The prophet Hosea (Heb. הוֹשֵׁעַ 'salvation,' Gr. Ὡσηέ, Lat. Osee, so AV Ro 9^{25}), whose name is identical with the original name of Joshua (Nu 13^8), and with that of the last king of Israel (AV Hoshea 2 K 15^{30}), was certainly a native of the Northern Kingdom, the condition and destiny of which he has in view throughout his prophecy. The references in the prophecy to Judah, though pretty numerous, are more incidental, and Jerusalem is nowhere mentioned.* Israel is 'the land' (1^2), its king is 'our king' (7^5), and it is 'the house of Jehu' on which the blood of Jezreel shall be visited, and 'the kingdom of the house of Israel' that shall be made to cease (1^4). It is the localities of the Northern Kingdom that are familiar to the prophet, Gilead and Tabor (5^{1} 6^{8} 12^{11}), Gibeah (5^{8} 9^{9} 10^{9}), Gilgal (4^{15} 9^{15} 12^{11}), Jezreel ($1^{4.5.11}$ 2^{22}), Ramah (5^{8}), Shechem (6^{9}), and particularly Bethel (4^{15} 5^{8} $10^{5.8.15}$ 12^{4}) and Samaria (7^{1} $8^{5.6}$ $10^{5.7}$ 13^{16}). In like manner it is the internal condition of Israel and the state of parties there to which allusion is made: the neglect and selfishness of the priests ($4^{5ff.}$ 5^{1} 8^{11}); the heathenish revelry of the people at the feasts (2^{13} 9^{1}), and their immoralities at the high places ($4^{13.14}$ 6^{10}); and the conspiracies, bloodshed, and anarchy that followed the death of Jeroboam—'all their kings are fallen' (7^{7} 13^{11}).*

* References to Judah are: $1^{7.11}$ 3^5 4^{15} $5^{5.10.12\text{-}14}$ $6^{4.11}$ 8^{14} 10^{11} 11^{12} 12^2. A number of these passages appear to disturb the connexion, and have been thought later insertions or alterations of the text.

Little is known of the prophet's history. His father was named Beeri (1^{1}), and he represents himself as taking to wife a woman called Gomer, who became the mother of several children, to whom he gave symbolical names prophetical of the destiny of his country (ch. 1). The rather obscure passage 9^{8} may imply that he and others were exposed to persecution—'as for the prophet, the snare of a fowler is on all his ways, and enmity in the house of his God.' Whether the words of the previous verse, 'the prophet is a fool, the man of the spirit is mad,' be contemptuous language used by the people (2 K 9^{11}, Jer 29^{26}), to which the prophet replies: Yes, 'because of the multitude of thine iniquity, and the great enmity'; or whether the words be those of the prophet himself, expressing the distraction to which he was driven by the wickedness and hostility of the people (Jer $23^{9ff.}$), is rather uncertain.

There is nothing to indicate with any certainty to what rank of life the prophet belonged. Duhm (Theol. d. Proph. 130 f.) has argued that he was probably a member of the priestly class, on account of his frequent references to the priests ($4^{6ff.}$ 5^{1} 6^{9}), to the Torah of God (4^{6} 8^{12}), to 'unclean things' (9^{3}, cf. 5^{3} 6^{10}), to 'abominations' (9^{10}), and to persecution 'in the house of his God' ($9^{7.8}$). He was certainly a man sufficiently educated to follow and estimate the politics of his country, whether at home or abroad (7^{1-11} $5^{13f.}$), and to pass judgment on the course the national history had taken from the beginning. If any inference could be drawn from the figures and comparisons in which the prophecy is so rich, it would be that the prophet, like Amos, belonged to the country rather than the city. Such images are: (a) those from wild beasts, the lion, panther, and bear (5^{14} 6^{1} 11^{10} $13^{7.8}$), and other creatures of the field, as the wild ass (8^{9}), and birds (7^{11} 9^{11} 11^{11}), and from the snares and pits employed in trapping them ($5^{1.2}$ 7^{12} 9^{8}). (b) Those from agricultural life, e.g. from stubborn cattle (4^{16} 9^{15}), the yoke and ways of easing it (11^{4}), harnessing, threshing, plowing, and harrowing ($10^{11ff.}$); from the operations of the husbandman, as sowing and reaping: 'sowing the wind' (8^{7}), 'sowing righteousness' ($10^{12ff.}$); from the corn floor (9^{1} 13^{3}), and the like. And in general (c) the imagery reflects country life, e.g. references to the vine and fig and the time when their fruit is choice (9^{10} 10^{1}), to the furrows of the field (10^{4} 12^{12}), the poppy (10^{4}), thorns and thistles (10^{8}), nettles (9^{6}), reeds (13^{15}, cf. the images in $2^{21ff.}$ $14^{5ff.}$); to the rains of the various seasons, the winter, early and latter rain (6^{3} 10^{12}), to the morning cloud and the early dew (6^{4} 13^{3}), to the swollen country brooks—'like a splinter on the face of the water' (10^{7}), and to the hot desert wind that smites the vegetation and leaves the fountains dry (13^{15}). Hosea is the only writer before Deut. (19^{14} 27^{17}) who refers to the removal of boundary stones in the fields (5^{10}). Whether this imagery warrants any conclusion regarding the prophet's position in life or not, it is evidence of a fine poetic sensibility, of profound sympathy with nature and love of creature life. The prophet lives in the things that are around him, sympathizing with the life in everything and feeling its charm. It is characteristic of his images that they are painted in a word and never developed. Those of them that refer to human life have usually something pathetic in them: Ephraim's decadence among the nations is like grey hairs coming up on the head of one old before his time (7^{9}); in his inability to grasp the crisis now come upon him, and use it as the entrance upon a larger life, he is like the child that dies on the threshold of birth (13^{13}). In His guidance of His people God has been like one that teaches a child to go (11^{3}). Ephraim must bring out his children to the murderer; more merciful would it be if God would deny them children, giving them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts (9^{11-14}). The pleasant homes of Ephraim shall be overgrown with nettles, his children shall be wanderers among the nations, and a foreign land shall bury them ($9^{6.17}$).

Jewish writers identify Beeri the father of Hosea with Beerah, a Reubenite prince carried captive by Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch 5^{6}). According to Christian tradition the prophet was of the tribe of Issachar, and from a place called Belemoth or Belemon (Baalmoth, Ephrem Syrus in Knobel, Prophetismus, ii. 154; the form Belemon has been compared with a place Balamon [RV], near Dothan, mentioned in Jth 8^{3}). A Jewish legend (in Carpzov, Introd.) states that the prophet died in Babylon, and was carried to Galilee and buried in Safed (Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, 227). According to another tradition he was a native of Gilead, and the grave of Nebi Osha (prophet Hosea) is shown near es-Salṭ (Baedeker, Palest. 337).

ii. THE PROPHET'S TIME.—Chs. 1–3 contain references to events and prophecies of the time of Jeroboam II., though written later; while much in chs. 4–14 reflects the period of disorder that followed his death. The chronology of the period is obscure. The annals of Tiglath-pileser state that Menahem paid tribute to Assyria in 738 (2 K 15^{19}); this must have been towards the end of his reign (said to have lasted about ten years, 2 K 15^{17}); and as his two predecessors reigned only 7 months in all, Jeroboam's death must have occurred c. 746–745. Hosea's ministry therefore began some time previous to this date (1^{4}). The prophet's career probably closed before 735–734, the date of the Syro-Ephraimitic invasion of Judah, as he makes no allusion to this event, nor yet to the deportation of northern Israel by Tiglath-pileser in 734. Gilead is still an integral part of Israel (5^{1} 6^{8} 12^{11}), and Assyria is not spoken of as an enemy but as a delusive support (5^{13} 7^{11} 8^{9} $12^{1.2}$ 14^{3}). The title 'king Jareb' (LXX Ἰαρείμ) given to the king of Assyria (5^{13} 10^{6}) remains obscure. (See JAREB). Not less obscure is 10^{14} 'as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel.' If Shalman were a shorter form of Shalmaneser, reference might be to Shalmaneser III. (783–773), though the period of his reign is rather remote. Others consider that Shalmaneser IV. (727–722) is referred to, and regard the words as a later gloss. Nothing is known of any operation of Shalmaneser IV. against a place Beth-arbel, and it is by no means certain that Shalman is a contraction for Shalmaneser.* Even if the word 'Judah' be genuine in 5^{13} (which there may be some reason to doubt, as it is not repeated in the parallelism), the passage does not say that Judah had recourse to Assyria for help as Ephraim did, and contains no allusion to the appeal of Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser. The reference to the kings of Judah in the heading (1^{1}) is no doubt from the hand of a later editor (cf. Is 1^{1}, Mic 1^{1}). The first part of the title, 'The word of the LORD which came to Hosea, the son of Beeri,' may be older; at any rate the name Beeri is historical. The name 'Jeroboam' may be an inference from 1^{4} 'the house of Jehu,' and be due to the hand which inserted the names of the kings of Judah. If this is not the case, the title must be restricted to chs. 1–3; but there is little probability that these chapters were put out or ever existed separately. Chs. 1–3 appear rather an introductory programme to 4–14, expressing the principle or essential conception of the prophet's teaching, and showing how it was symbolized in his personal experience. Though referring to events in the early part of the prophet's career, chs. 1–3 contain the result of reflection on his whole history and teaching, and in date of composition may be the latest part of the book. The only thing that might seem opposed to this conclusion is the fact that in chs. 1–3 there is no reference to the dynastic revolutions often alluded to in chs. 4–14. But chs. 1–3 are meant to present the prophet's fundamental conception, which is that of the conjugal tie between J″ and Israel, and Israel's unfaithfulness to this tie; and this unfaithfulness, which is a state of the mind, 'a spirit of whoredom,' is most conspicuous in the cultus (though cf. 3^{4} 'without king,' etc.).

Hosea may have heard Amos, he must at least have heard of him and of his teaching, but there is hardly any trace in his book of the earlier prophet's influence. Such parallels as have been cited are entirely inconclusive, e.g. the following (the passages from Amos are placed second): 4^{3}, 8^{8}; 5^{5}, 8^{7}; 5^{7}, 7^{4}; 9^{3}, 7^{17}; 10^{4}, 6^{12}; 10^{8}, 7^{9}; 12^{8}, 8^{5}; $12^{10\text{f.}}$, $2^{10\text{f.}}$. Ch. 4^{15} is certainly an echo of Am 5^{5}, but the verse is in disorder, and its originality doubtful. In other places Bethaven for Bethel (5^{8} 10^{5}) may be uncertain, as copyists sometimes made the change (e.g. LXX has Bethaven in 12^{4}). Ch. 8^{14} ends with a favourite refrain of Amos, but the words are suspicious.

iii. THE PROPHET'S BOOK.—The book has two divisions, chs. 1–3 and chs. 4–14. Chs. 1–3 set forth the history or parable of the prophet's marriage to a woman who became unfaithful, with the moral of the story, which is the love-relation of J″ to Israel, and Israel's unfaithfulness to this relation. The story is told in chs. 1. 3, the exposition of it is given in ch. 2. In chs. 1–3 the prophet has abstracted from his prophetic speeches and career the essential conception of his teaching and set it as a kind of programme at the head of his book. Chs. 4–14 are more a reflection of his prophetic ministry as it was actually exercised, though the chapters have also been written or redacted under the influence of his fundamental idea (cf. for evidence chs. 4–6).

A. FIRST DIVISION.—Chs. 1–3.—'In the beginning when J″ spake to Hosea, J″ said to Hosea, Go, take a wife of whoredoms, and children of whoredoms. And he went and took Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim.' A 'wife of whoredoms' does not mean a woman already a sinner; nor yet a woman with a propensity to unchastity, a sense which the words could not bear. A 'wife of whoredoms' is explained by 'children of whoredoms.' The children did not yet exist; they were born in the prophet's house, for Hosea did not marry a woman with a family; and in like manner the woman when taken was not yet that which she afterwards became. If the events be real, the words are written from a much later period in the prophet's history. Looking back on his experiences with Gomer, and all that he had suffered and learned through them, Hosea felt that his impulse to take this woman to wife was the beginning of J″'s speaking to him (cf. Jer 32^{8}). Whether the events were real or not, chs. 1–3 were probably written at a late period of Hosea's life.

Gomer bare a son, and the LORD said, 'Call his name Jezreel, for I will visit the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu' (1^{4}). The blood of Jezreel refers to the murder by Jehu of all the descendants of Ahab and the whole house of Omri (2 K 10). The name Jezreel is used merely to recall the deed of blood. It is an ominous sound, a knell rung in the ears of Jeroboam and the nation to awaken the sense of guilt and the presentiment of retribution. Again, Gomer bore a daughter, and the LORD said, 'Call her name Lo-ruhamah ('unpitied'), for I will no more have pity on the house of Israel' (1^{6}). Finally, she bore a son who was called Lo-ammi ('not-my-people'), 'for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God' (1^{9}). The three names suggest the three successive steps in the destruction of the inhabitants of the land: Jezreel calling to remembrance the blood that lies on the land; Lo-ruhamah pointing to a condition of Israel, when, no more pitied by J″, she shall be delivered over to calamity and her enemies; and Lo-ammi indicating that the people shall be driven out of Canaan, the house of J″, and go into exile.

Ch. 3 attaches itself to ch. $1^{1\text{-}9}$. The last symbolical word in ch. 1 was Lo-ammi, pointing to a divorce by J″ of His people, or at least a casting of them out of His house. Ch. 3 continues the history. 'And the LORD said unto me,—

Again, go love a woman, loved of a paramour and an adulteress,
As J″ loveth the children of Israel, though they turn to other gods.'

The woman whom Hosea is bidden again go love is of course the same woman Gomer of the first chapter. She is a woman loved of a paramour and an adulteress. The word Lo-ammi (1^{9}) suggests the unrecorded step in the history: the woman had fled or been driven from the prophet's house and become the slave-concubine of another. He is bidden renew his love to her. So he acquired her again to himself for a small price (that of a slave, Ex 21^{32}), returning to her in mind, but deferring for a long time to return to her in union (3^{3}). The explanation is added: 'The children of Israel shall remain many days without king, and without sacrifice,' etc. The LORD's love continues with His people, whom He shall keep in long restraint and discipline in exile, till their mind change and they seek Him. Ch. $2^{2\text{ff.}}$ is the exposition of this history: (1) Israel's whoredoms with the baals (the calf images, which are no God, 8^{6}), vv.$^{2\text{-}5}$; (2) her perplexities when 'unpitied,' vv.$^{6\text{-}13}$; (3) her exile and discipline in the wilderness, vv.$^{14\text{-}18}$; and (4) her change of mind and new espousals and obtaining of mercy for ever, vv.$^{19\text{-}23}$. Though ch. 3 be appended somewhat loosely, it supplies an essential step in the story, and its contents are drawn into the exposition ch. $2^{14\text{-}23}$.

The Marriage of Hosea.—Various opinions have been held on this subject. 1. It has been supposed that Hosea allied himself with a woman already known as a sinner, with the view of reclaiming her. It is very difficult to believe either that the prophet should do such a thing, or that he should represent himself as commanded by God to do it. It is a different thing when he seeks to reclaim the woman afterwards (3^{1}), and represents his efforts to do so as the command of God, because she was then his wife. Moreover, the representation that the woman was already a sinner when taken to wife does not suit the symbolism. It is the view of the prophet and all the early prophets that Israel was pure in the first time of her union to J″, and only corrupted herself later. The LORD says, 'I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness,' a figure suggesting His delight in her (9^{10}); and in Jer 2^{2} He says, 'I remember of thee the kindness of thy youth, thy bridal love, how thou didst follow me in the wilderness.' Though this view was formerly advocated, and deserves mention because supported by Pusey, it has probably few adherents now.

2. It has been maintained by many that the whole story is an allegory. Neither the arguments for this view nor those against it are of much force. (1) It is argued that prophets often represent themselves as commanded to perform actions which, from the nature of the case, could not really have been performed (Ezk $4^{2\text{ff.}}$). The actions were ideal; their meaning was easily seen when they were described; and they had no existence except in the idea and the description. All this is true; but it is equally true that prophets, particularly in early times, did sometimes perform real actions having a symbolical meaning (1 K 22^{11}, Jer 28^{10}). (2) The fact that the names of the children, Jezreel, Lo-ruhamah, and Lo-ammi, are significant makes neither for nor against the allegorical interpretation. Real children might have been given symbolical names, as was the case with Isaiah's sons (7^{3} 8^{1}). On the other hand, no symbolical meaning has been discovered for the name of the mother, Gomer. (3) The argument of Ewald, and others after him, that the prophet would have made himself ridiculous if he had published such a pitiful narrative about himself all the while that his wife was virtuous and his domestic relations happy, has little force. If his hearers understood that he spoke a parable, they would not have given a thought either to himself or his wife, but have attended only to the moral of his tale. (4) The statement so often repeated, that there is nothing to suggest that the prophet is not narrating an actual history, will not be acquiesced in by everyone. When it is said, 'Go, take a wife of whoredoms, for the land committeth whoredom against the LORD' (1^{2}); and then, 'Again go love a woman, an adulteress, as J″ loveth the children of Israel, while they turn to other gods' (3^{1}), the first impression produced by the words is that the actions commanded were not real, but meant merely to clothe an idea. Cf. the exposition $2^{2\text{ff.}}$.

3. It is held by many that a certain substratum of fact underlies the prophet's narrative. The chief arguments for this view are, first, that it is more in harmony with the realism of ancient prophecy to suppose that Hosea alludes, however reservedly, to a fact, than that he is putting forth a mere literary fable; secondly, that no symbolical meaning can be discovered in Gomer-bath-Diblaim, which must therefore be the name of an actual person; and thirdly, that we have thus an explanation of the origin of the prophet's central conception of the love-relation of J″ to His people and their unfaithfulness. The conception was suggested by the prophet's own experiences. Some such miserable history as he narrates had befallen him. His wife had gone astray, sharing the common corruption of morals about her. What had happened to him was not an individual case. It was not individuals that were corrupt, the corruption was general—Israel was corrupt. And meditating on his history he saw in it a reflection of the history of J″ and His people, of His love and Israel's insensibility to it. And reflecting further on it, the conviction forced itself upon him that it was not an accident or a misfortune that had brought him through such painful experiences, it was God's providential way of revealing to him His own heart towards His people—his impulse to take this woman to wife was the beginning of J″'s speaking to him (1^2).

The attempt to fit this theory into the prophet's life is not without difficulty. (1) The prophet's taking Gomer to wife was due to his own natural impulse; it was not till much later that he concluded that the impulse had been prompted by God. The same must be said of his return in love to her after she had left his house (ch. 3): it was due to his own unchanging affection; and it was only later reflection that led him to interpret his own act as the command of God. (2) But now, these events must have covered a good part of the prophet's life. The birth and weaning of three children, according to the habits of Heb. mothers, would occupy 6 to 10 years; and when to this is added the time during which the woman was away from the prophet's home and under the protection of another, and the time occupied in recovering her, it will appear that not much short of the whole prophetic life of Hosea is covered. (3) It is of some consequence to ask, When did his wife's infidelity become known to the prophet? Wellhausen, who claims to have given the cue to the interpretation both of Kuenen and W. R. Smith, argues, and surely rightly, that it was not till after the birth of his first child. But if so, it was not his misfortunes that gave Hosea his prophetic word. Israel's apostasy was plain to him, and he foreshadowed her doom in Jezreel, the name of his first child, before any misfortunes overtook him. At most, his misfortunes may at a later time have given a complexion to his prophetic thoughts. (4) Wellh. (followed by Nowack) appears to think that Gomer's unfaithfulness was discovered before the birth of the other two children. There is really no evidence on the point. There is certainly none in the names of the children, for Lo-ruhamah and Lo-ammi are names having a purely objective reference to the impending fate of Israel; there is not the slightest evidence that they express any feeling on the part of the father toward the children, or any dislike of them as of doubtful parentage. It is hard to believe that Hosea would have continued to retain an adulteress in his house. It is said that 'he concealed the shame of their mother and acknowledged her children as his own, hiding his bitter sorrow in his own heart' (W. R. Smith, Prophets, 179, cf. 183). If he concealed the shame at the time, he certainly took effectual pains to proclaim it to all the world soon afterwards. It would be more natural to suppose that it was only after all the children were born that the woman's character was revealed to the prophet, either through her desertion or in some other way, and that then for the first time he could use the bitter words, 'a wife of whoredom and children of whoredom.' Even the passage 4^{14} leaves any other view improbable.

It is not of much consequence for the interpretation of the prophet's book whether we suppose his marriage real or parabolical. In any case his conception of the relation of J″ to Israel is clear. If the story is a parable, it evidently helped Hosea's mind in conceiving the divine relation to imagine a human analogy to it. And many scholars have felt that it helped them to realize his idea and how he reached it to suppose the story historical:—to fancy a man of the prophet's depth and sensitiveness of nature united to a light woman, who could not even understand a mind and love like his; his anguish and desolateness on discovering how things were; and yet, amidst whatever inward struggles, his patience and self-forgetfulness, and the unchanging trueness of his affection, which could not let his wife go, but sought her out in order to recover her from her evil. Such a history of his own, it is thought, helps to explain the colour which he has thrown over the relation of J″ to His people—the human and moral and personal colour which he gives to the relation.

One or two general considerations may be stated. (1) Israel's unfaithfulness and declension must have been patent to Hosea apart from any history of his own, as it was to Amos and to Elijah a century earlier. And J″'s constant goodness must have been equally patent, as it was to Amos (2^{9-11}) and to Isaiah (1^2). And the fatal issues of the people's ingratitude must have also been clear. These general truths needed no particular history of his own to impress them on Hosea. (2) It is not therefore these ideas of the relation of J″ to Israel that are peculiar to Hosea, but the conception of the marriage tie under which the relation has been brought. Wellhausen considers the conclusion 'unavoidable' that something in the prophet's experience must have suggested this new idea (Kl. Proph. p. 105). But there was little in it new. It was customary to regard the community or land as mother of the inhabitants; to regard the god as the 'baal,' i.e. lord or husband of the land; and also to regard the inhabitants as his children (Nu 21^{29}). It therefore 'lay very near to think of the god as the husband of the worshipping nationality or mother land. It is not at all likely that the conception was in form original to Hosea or even peculiar to Israel' (W. R. Smith, Proph. 171; cf. RS 92 ff.). The idea was so current that Hosea makes Israel express it, 'I will return to my first husband' (2^7), and again, 'Thou shalt no more call me my baal' (2^{16}). It did not therefore need any experiences of the prophet's own to suggest this idea to him. (3) What is strange rather is that he did not reject the idea, considering its associations. He has retained it, and what is new in him lies in this, that he lifts the conception of the marriage relation of God and people out of the nature-sphere, to which it originally belonged, into the moral sphere, and gives it developments of surprising depth and tenderness. No one will affirm that domestic experiences of his own were necessary to this, and no one need deny that they might have been helpful. Even on the latter supposition, it must have been some higher influence that enabled him to make the transition from his own history to that of God and the people, for it was not just every good man with a bad wife in Israel that perceived in his own experiences a reflection of the history of God with His people, and forthwith became a prophet. (4) The question is not without wider connexions. There may be a risk of attributing too much to circumstances and too little to mental idiosyncrasy in the prophets, and of forgetting that they had stable convictions regarding God, and were not dependent on incidents for their ideas of Him. Hosea's conception of God is very unlike that of Amos, but every line of his book proves that he was very unlike Amos in type of mind. There may also be a risk of allowing our general views of the stage of religious development reached by Israel in this age to modify our particular views of Hosea's teaching. If we suppose that Hosea is the first to reach the profound thoughts of the spirituality and love of God which he sets forth, we shall welcome any incident or occasion in his life which just at this time suggested such thoughts. But his allusions to the history of Israel do not suggest that he came with an idea of God learned from some other source which he read into the history. He does not read the love of God into the history, he reads it out of it. It is the history that has taught him what J″ is (9^{10} $11^{1ff.}$ $12^{9ff.}$ $13^{4f.}$).
